MR. GLADSTONE: I am very much obliged to the noble Lord. My memory goes back to 1878, and it goes back somewhat further. I do not bring forward a proposition of this kind without being prepared to examine and to stand by it. As the noble Lord challenges me to begin with that extraordinary precedent, I may say that we had in 1878 a Vote of Credit proposed to this House which is without parallel in our history. We fought that Vote of Credit upon principle. We objected to the most dangerous precedent then established. We objected to the purpose which it had in view. I will on this occasion save hon. Gentlemen the trouble of doing what they are fond of doing—of paying me the compliment of quoting me—and I will quote myself. Someone said to-night—"I wish the right hon. Gentleman would read the speech he made in 1878." It was a most unkind wish. He could not have doomed me to a task more irksome and unacceptable; but, anticipating what was likely to happen, I was beforehand with the hon. Member, and I do not think there is one word which in the same circumstances I should not be ready to repeat. I hope the noble Lord will, when any former speeches of his are referred to, be always in a position to quote them with as much security. On that occasion I ventured to say—

"So far as I know, there is no case when a Conference of the Powers of Europe has been called together where those Powers, as a preliminary to its assembling, have increased, or taken powers to increase, their naval and military establishments."—(3 Hansard, [237] 949.)

I believe no novelty more astounding in form and in substance is to be found than the astonishing proposal that, when the Powers of Europe were about peacefully to meet for purposes of the highest deliberation, to be conducted by pacific means, in the common interest, and with the highest authority in the civilized world, that peaceful meeting was to be disturbed by the clash of arms, and that one of the Governments which are to take part in the proceedings of that Assembly is to spend £6,000,000 in military preparations, for the sake, forsooth, of strengthening its hands.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: What about Alexandria?

MR. GLADSTONE: Interruptions of that kind are totally irrelevant, and are hardly compatible with the decencies of this House. If it be true that on this occasion, with respect to the money we ask for the Soudan, there is a disposition to refuse it upon principle—if the case is really analogous to that of 1878, when our desire was not to grant one farthing of those £6,000,000 for what we deemed to be unlawful and evil purposes—if that parallel prevail, by all means let opposition be made to what we now propose in whatever way you may like to make it. But I understand, on the contrary, that you are prepared to vote the money, and it is on that supposition that I argue. It appears to be said that we ask for information. What information had we given us? I hold all the information given, and it was this, as I summed it up at the time—

“I have heard a great deal said about the Vote of 6,000,000 being intended to strengthen the hands of the Government, to protect British interests, and to put us on a footing with other Powers.”

I should like to know, after receiving information such as that, in what point were we one jot the wiser? We knew nothing of what was to be done. We knew nothing of the Salisbury-Schouvaloff Agreement. We knew nothing of secret Covenants with other Powers, although the Powers of Europe were at the time assembled in Council. We knew nothing of Anglo-Turkish Treaties; we knew nothing of the occupation and administration of Cyprus in particular, to be assumed in defiance of the Treaty of Paris and the law of Europe. All these things were concealed. These were the matters on which we ought to have had information, and if we had had it I am not sure that even the last Parliament would really have voted the £6,000,000. But, Sir, undoubtedly, if that is the sort of information that you want, we can give it; we want the hands of the Government strengthened, we want British interests protected, we want British honour guarded. All these generalities, which were all that we extracted from you upon a former occasion, we are ready to return; but we are not the audacity to pretend that, in paying you off with such coin as that, we think we are really giving you political information.

Sir, the fact is that, so far as I am aware, it has not been the practice of this House to choose Votes of Credit as occasions for general discussion of the matter to which they refer. I will appeal in support of what I have said to the evidence of facts. There are certain occasions which I will not quote, because if we were in the middle of a great war like the Crimean War, and after providing so many millions for the Navy and so many for the Army, my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) were to demand a Vote of Credit over and above, there then could be no occasion for discussion, for the policy of the war must be a thing notorious to and accepted by the House and the country. Votes of Credit of that kind may be given without discussion. I will take another case when it was not so. It was a Vote of Credit proposed when I was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Indeed, it was a double Vote of Credit proposed in 1860 for the purposes of the China War. We began on the 16th of March by proposing a Vote of £850,000. The hour was late, and the necessity was great. There was no statement, and no debate. There was merely a protest made that the Vote was only allowed to pass on account of the great urgency of time in connection with our financial needs. On the 19th the Vote was reported in the regular mode, and debate arose. But the debate which did arise was entirely upon military detail and nothing else; and, although undoubtedly that Vote was upon a very serious subject of policy—a subject which required discussion, and which obtained discussion—it was not discussed on the occasion of the Vote. In the month of July we had to propose, unfortunately, a very much larger Vote for purposes connected with the same Expedition. In that month what happened was this: We had sent to China in the interval certain offers of peace. These offers had failed. Military operations became necessary, and we had to ask for no less than £3,356,000 on the 12th of July. Again there was no statement of policy in connection with it. There was, again, a military debate. Late in the evening Sir John Pakington—not Mr. Disraeli, who demanded no discussion upon it—said he would like, at the end of the speech, a fuller explanation as to the definite objects of the war; and Lord John Russell, in the space of a very few minutes, said he thought that the right hon. Gentleman, belonging to the former Government, was as much responsible for the war as the Government then in Office, and that the terms of peace then offered were quite reasonable. So that there was no discussion on either of those occasions—practically no discussion and no arraignment of the Government.

But, Sir, it may be said, and said truly, that the war was going on. Therefore, I will quote a case which will amply make good what I have said, and when no war was going on. This was the case of the Vote of Credit which it was my duty to propose when I was Prime Minister in 1870. It was a Vote of £2,000,000 of money. On the 1st of August Mr. Disraeli raised a debate on the critical state of affairs on the Continent of Europe. It was in the course of that debate that I stated the intention of the Government to ask for a Vote of Credit without defining the purposes of the Vote further than this—not very much unlike the information we got in 1878. I said—

“We are neutrals in the war. We are on terms of unequivocal friendship with both the parties, and our object is to maintain a dignified and friendly position.”

That, Sir, was the statement made by me on the part of the Government on the 1st of August. On the 2nd of August, no war existing, we being in no way a party to any quarrel, being in no difficulty and in no danger—though we had an object in view, of which the House was aware like the public, in a general way—we asked the House, without a word of statement, for the £2,000,000, and without a word of objection it was given. On the 8th of August Earl Granville produced a Treaty in the House of Lords, and I produced a Treaty in the House of Commons, which we had concluded with a view to the neutrality of Belgium. Some discussion then took place. Mr. Disraeli, in particular, said that he thought that the proceeding was a good and a manly proposal. There was a general concurrence in the House, and such short debate as took place was not of a contentious character. But what I am contending is that that debate occurred a week after the Vote of Credit. The Vote of Credit had nothing to do with it, and the circumstances in which the Vote of Credit was proposed were again deemed to be circumstances which made it wise not to choose that moment for a general discussion on the merits of the question.

Well, now, Sir, what is the present case? I am not at all surprised that Gentlemen in this House should say that the Government are censurable in their determination to ask no money in the present Vote for the prosecution of offensive operations in Egypt. I think that is a question of a dignity and order perfectly warranting the conduct of anyone who may think fit to call the attention of the House to it at a proper time; and if any Vote of Censure is to be moved on the Government for such a purpose from the proper source, and with proper authority, it will have from us every proper attention and accommodation. We shall give every opportunity for its being discussed, whatever its issue is to be. But what we wish to do now is simply to make understood the purposes of this Vote, and to give the opportunity which it has been the custom of the House to use, though I do not wish to tie it down to that custom, for discussing the military provisions which it is the object of the Vote to make. The first thing we ask is a Vote of £4,500,000 for the Soudan, as being likely to be spent in the Soudan, but with the plain declaration, which is the basis on our part of the whole of these proceedings, that, as far as we are concerned, and quite apart from any wider opinions that any of us may entertain against the proceedings in the Soudan, we are all determined, so far as we are concerned, that the Soudan shall not by anything hereafter to be done offer an impediment to the full discharge of the duties of the Empire, with the whole purpose and the whole power of the Empire, in whatever quarter of the world they may happen to lie. For this reason, avowedly and undisguisedly, we ask you to give us this money, because the troops are now in the Soudan. We cannot say how much of it may be spent there, because it is possible that none of it may be spent there, except in connection with certain specified objects there or for bringing the men home. We ask you distinctly to give it to us with an unfettered discretion to apply it elsewhere for higher purposes and for higher duties, if necessary. I hope that is intelligible, and I hope that will not be mixed up with any question of technical fidelity to rules for voting money which on every ordinary occasion we are most desirous strictly and rigorously to maintain.

With regard to the Soudan portion of this Vote, explaining it as I have now explained it, the state of the case is this: I have nothing of a substantial character to add to what I stated on the 20th of April, when, on the part of the Government, and in words agreed upon with and by my Colleagues, I said that we had found it necessary to review the whole situation of the Empire, and that we considered the time to be one at which it was necessary to hold its entire resources well in hand for use and for application wherever they might be wanted. If the Committee does not agree with that proposition, let them reject the proposal we now make. If the Committee does agree in the proposal, they may canvass, they may criticize, they may censure, they may expel and eject the present Government, if they like, and most welcome they will be; but they cannot withhold from us the money which we ask. I wish broadly to draw this distinction between the granting of the money on a Vote of Credit which we ask, and the reservation of the amplest liberty on the part of the House to discuss the merits of the question, and to visit upon the heads of responsible and guilty Ministers a Vote of Censure or whatever penalty they may deserve.

At the same time, while that is really the substance of the proposition that I make on the part of the Government as the basis of this plan, the Committee may naturally remind me that it is not the first declaration made this year on the subject of the Soudan. On the 19th of February, when the House met, I made a declaration on behalf of my Colleagues not less formal, not less binding, than that to which I have now referred. I therefore go back to the 19th of February and the discussion of that evening, and to the decisions which at that time I announced

sanction of Her Majesty. When on the 4th of February we heard of the betrayal of Khartoum, the Cabinet was of course summoned, and it was gathered together next day. The desire of the Cabinet at that time was to endeavour to prevent the spreading of the disturbance to do everything that could be done on behalf of General Gordon, if he were alive—and at that time we had no means of judging whether he was alive or not, or even whether he was continuing resistance or not—and if possible, of course, to go forward at once to the accomplishment of the purpose of Lord Wolseley's Expedition. That was our starting point. As I stated on the 19th of February, Lord Wolseley pointed out to us that we must move forward from that starting point. There were, he told us, two plans of military operations, one based on the idea of taking Khartoum, and the other based upon the abandonment of that object. We thought, Sir, that we were not justified, under the circumstances of the hour, in the abandonment of that idea; and we therefore adopted the plan pointed out by Lord Wolseley, which was meant to reserve to us a full discretion upon the facts as they then stood before us to go forward to Khartoum at a later period, presuming it to be impracticable to effect its capture immediately, and presuming, of course, that Parliament should be found disposed to sanction such a plan, and that we ourselves, on further consideration, should find reason still to adhere to it. On that ground we founded the statement that I made on the 19th of February, and retained to ourselves in full the power to marching to Khartoum.

I referred at that time to various circumstances, and I think that, upon an impartial view, or upon any intelligent view, it must be admitted that many of those circumstances have since that period undergone serious change. In the first place, the heroic General Gordon, we know, has sealed his purpose with his blood. Of that we had no knowledge whatever at the time when we came to the decisions of, I think, the 6th of February. We saw at that time, as the world saw, an indefinite but possibly a very great danger in the effect that might be produced both upon Egypt and with regard to the defence of Egypt, and likewise in other quarters of the East, by a simple policy of retirement.

in the face of a triumphant Pretender to the dignity of a prophet. The Mahdi was then triumphant, and his position was a very grave factor in the case before us. That position has greatly altered. In the flush of his triumph he attempted to move down the river; but not many days were required to show to him the vanity of that operation. He retired to Khartoum. He has retired from Khartoum. He is attacked in his own seat. Left to themselves and not immediately menaced by us, a rival or rivals have started up, and the Mahdi is not the formidable character that he was in the first week of February. As to the defence of Egypt, we in no way relax the obligations under which we hold ourselves to stand. In my announcement last Monday on the part of my Colleagues, we declared that we held to that duty, as we had held to it before. As respects the general effect of the betrayal of Khartoum upon the East, what we had then to contemplate was that, if we had ordered a retirement of our Forces—a retirement accompanied with general inaction in the East—we should have had to compute the probable or possible effect, not in Egypt only, but beyond Egypt—throughout the East and in the Indian Empire—of that retirement. That was the alternative before us then. I could almost wish it were the alternative before us now; but it is not so; and the policy that is necessary in the existing circumstances, which I shall say nothing to exaggerate or to worsen—the policy that is before us now is of necessity a policy of preparatory action in the East, which puts wholly out of view any apprehensions that either a timorous or a prudent man might have entertained in the first week of February, in connection with the possible moral effects of the betrayal of Khartoum, and the apparent triumph of the Mahdi.

There were other smaller, or rather, narrower considerations, although very far indeed from being unimportant. I mentioned to the House at that time that there were several topics which we were unwilling summarily to brush aside; though we did not bind ourselves to do anything beyond what might be found reasonable and practicable in regard to them. One of them, though I did not give it a very prominent place, was the question whether the possession of Khartoum would enable us to impose a serious check upon the prosecution of the Slave Trade. I may say that an examination does not at all tend to show that the possession of Khartoum would have any vital or any very appreciable influence on that evil traffic. A very important consideration, both at that moment and throughout the whole of last year, was this—to whom did General Gordon hold himself bound in honour at Khartoum? General Gordon was under the belief, and that belief we derived from his telegrams, sporadic as they unfortunately were from the necessity of the case, that a large portion of the population of Khartoum were deeply bound up with him in interest and feeling, and that their fate was dependent upon his. But the evidence positive and negative before us—what we have heard and what we have not heard, connected with the betrayal of Khartoum—does not, so far as it goes, support that belief of General Gordon. What is quite plain is this—that with his heroic character and his extraordinary gifts he exercised a power of fascination upon a few of the natives and soldiers who were in personal contact with him, and there is some reason to suppose that he mistook that for a general attachment of the soldiers, and even for something more. We have no reason to suppose that any considerable body ever attached themselves to him, and we have not indeed sufficient reason to suppose that the general population of Khartoum—though I have no doubt some of the immediate adherents suffered in their lives or fortunes—suffered by what has taken place. There was, further, a consideration with respect to the establishment of a Government at Khartoum; but there, again, we are not at present entitled to assert, of our own knowledge or conviction, that the Government of Khartoum is at this moment worse than it was four or five years ago. As regards the Egyptian garrisons, one or two of the smaller garrisons have quite recently been relieved, and the principal garrisons hold their ground. We are not able to say what is their exact condition, what are the motives of their present conduct. We are not able to say that it is not in their power, if they cease to represent Egyptian supremacy in the Soudan, to leave the country. That is a question on which we can give no positive opinion. We never have admitted that we were bound to use the forces and sacrifice the blood and the treasure of England in the heart of the Soudan for the relief of those garrisons, whom we did not send there, and with whose despatch we had no concern whatever. Though we should have been very glad, had it been in our power, to assist them in removal, it would have been a piece of guilt and folly were we to have made that a capital object of our policy, and to expend British life and treasure in relieving them. This is only a reference to changes or modifications of circumstances, but I shall say no more on the Soudan. I go back upon my main proposition.

That proposition is that it is a paramount duty incumbent upon us to hold our Forces in the Soudan available for service wherever the call of duty and honour may summon them in the service of the British Empire. I have heard with great satisfaction the assurance of hon. Gentlemen opposite that they are disposed to forward in every way the grant of funds to us, to be used, as we best think, for the maintenance of what I have, upon former occasions, described as a "National and Imperial policy." Certainly, an adequate sense of our obligations to our Indian Empire has never yet been claimed by any Party in this country as its exclusive inheritance. In my opinion, he would be guilty of a moral offence and gross political folly who should endeavour to claim, on behalf of his own Party, any superiority in that respect over those to whom he is habitually opposed. It is an Imperial policy in which we are engaged.

With respect to this Vote, I have, indeed, heard comments upon the smallness of the Vote. But it is the largest Vote of Credit that has been asked, as far as I know, within the last 70 years, unless it were in the time of the Crimean War. What I wish to observe is this, that the Vote is a little larger than it looks, because while it is stated at £6,500,000, in the first place, it is contemporaneous with a large increase of charge in the annual Estimates for the Army and Navy, dealt with by the House in the course of its regular duty. In the second place, possibly, and more or less probably, it contemplates receiving a considerable addition from the other branch of this Vote of £4,500,000 which we have put down as likely to be spent in the Soudan; and thirdly, and more important than either of those two items, which I do not hold to be trivial, it must be borne in mind that this case is primarily an Indian case of military preparation. Those who want to know what is the total amount of effort now going forward, and the total amount of the charge likely to be entailed by the present preparations upon the subjects of Her Majesty, would require to know, which we certainly do not yet know, what will be the cost of the vigorous and effective measures which, as we hope and believe, are being taken in India, to enable the Government of that country to meet its share of the present obligations.

A demand for information is always a plausible demand, often a reasonable demand, never a demand to be treated with anything but respect. Let us consider what is the present position, and what is the mode and conduct on the part of the Government adapted to that position. It is not a case of war. There is no war before us, actually, or I may even say, perhaps, proximately—although I am slow to deal with epithets that are, of course, liable to some latitude of interpretation. I am not called upon to define, and I should find much difficulty in defining, inasmuch as it does not depend upon any choice of mine or my Colleagues, the degree of danger that may be before us. We labour, we have laboured, and we shall continue to labour, for an honourable settlement by pacific means. One thing I will venture to say with regard to that sad contingency of an outbreak of war, or a rupture of relations between two great Powers like Russia and England—one thing I will say with great strength of conviction, and great earnestness in my endeavour to impress it upon the Committee. It is this: We will strive to conduct ourselves to the end of this diplomatic controversy in such a way as that, if, unhappily, it is to end in violence or rupture, we may at least be able to challenge the verdict of civilized mankind, upon a review of the correspondence, upon a review of the demands made and refusals given, to say whether we have, or whether we have not, done all that men could do by every just and honourable effort to prevent the plunging of two such countries with all the millions that own their sway, into bloodshed and strife, of which it might be difficult to foresee the close.

In my opinion, the question before the Committee at this moment—not the final question—but the question at this moment is a simple, I might say even a narrow question, though in itself a great and important question. What we present to you is a case for preparation. Is there, or is there not, a case for preparation? Look at the facts before you. Try them by that test and by no other. Do not let us urge our own foregone conclusions about the misconduct of Russia or anyone else; do not let us enter into the judicial part of the case—only into that part of it which is prudential. Upon that aspect of the case, and upon that alone, asking for no credit as to the future and no acquittal as to the past, we say it is a case for preparation. All the facts that are within your knowledge are enough to make it your bounden duty so to prepare. Therefore, Sir, if I am asked for more information, my answer is this—it is impossible for us to give you full information. We could not, at this moment, open up the Correspondence that has been going on. We could not lay before you the unsifted intelligence, still less the rumours that have reached us. We could not enable you by any possibility, to judge of a question that has not yet reached a state of maturity for judgment. The evidence is not complete. The development is simply going forward. Do not let us too sanguinely count on a favourable issue. At the same time, do not let us despair that reason and justice may, on both sides, prevail over narrower and more unworthy feelings. We cannot give all the information we possess. If we did give it, it would not place you in a position for conclusive judgment. Were we to give part, we should infallibly mislead you; and, therefore, we stand simply upon what is patent and notorious, and say that, on those patent and notorious facts, with which the whole world is acquainted as well as we are, there is a case, and abundant case, for preparation.

Now, Sir, in order to show that I do not speak wholly without book, shall I, in a very few moments before I sit down, sketch rudely and slightly an outline of these patent and notorious facts?

The starting-point of our movement in this case is our obligation of honour to the Ameer of Afghanistan. He stands between us and any other consideration of policy or of danger. Our obligations to him are not absolute. We are not obliged—God forbid that we should ever be obliged—to defend him, or to defend anybody else, were he misled into a course of tyranny, against the just resentment of his subjects. We are not bound, contrary to our just duty, to sustain him, even in a course of folly. We are bound by no such obligation; but we have a contingent obligation to give him our aid and support; and I think everyone who hears me will say that that obligation should be fulfilled in no stinted manner, if it really be a living obligation, contingent only upon this one condition, that his conduct is such as we can honestly approve. That is the present condition of affairs in connection with the Ameer of Afghanistan.

I have stated distinctly to the House that there have been full communications between him and the Viceroy, and that the language which he holds, and the principles which he announces, are those which absolutely entitle him to call upon us, in concert and in council with him, acting for him and as far as we can acting with him, to protect him in the possession of his just rights. Well, Sir, in this view a plan was framed for the delimitation of the Frontier between himself and what was until yesterday Turcoman territory, but has now become by a rapid process Russian territory. I am not about to enter into any invidious comment. We have made, under the force of circumstances, very rapid progress ourselves in various quarters of the world, and the idea which, beyond all, I desire to carry along with me in every step of this painful and anxious process, is a determination to make every allowance and every concession to those with whom we are dealing that we should claim, and that we should expect for ourselves. Therefore I only say this territory has rapidly become Russian, and Russia, as the head of this Turcoman country, is now in immediate contact with Afghanistan. A plan was framed for the delimitation of the Frontier. That plan has, unhappily, been intercepted in the sense that it has not yet taken effect in action. The question of the delays in the progress of that plan is a question that may have to be carefully examined hereafter. I am not about to examine these delays now. I am not about to make them in any way a matter of charge, but I must point out the injurious effect that they have had in practice; for they led to advances—to military advances upon debated ground, that were obviously, and on the face of them, and in a high degree dangerous—dangerous to peace, dangerous to goodwill, dangerous to the future settlement of the question.

Aware of those dangers, we set ourselves to work to bring about an agreement with the Government of Russia, by which we hoped they might in a great degree have been neutralized. That agreement was concluded on the 16th of March, although it has passed by the date of the 17th of March, inasmuch as, I think, that was the day on which it was telegraphed by Sir Ronald Thomson to Sir Peter Lumsden. The Committee will perhaps recollect the substance of that agreement, and my announcement of it in this House. It made a deep impression on my mind. The agreement consisted of a covenant and of a reservation. The covenant was that the Russian troops should not advance nor attack provided the Afghan troops did not advance nor attack. That was the covenant. There followed the reservation, and the reservation was, "unless in the case of some extraordinary accident, such as a disturbance in Penjdeh." I well recollect the feeling which the reading of that reservation created in the House. The same feeling had been created in our own minds before we announced it in the House. It was obvious that we were just as much entitled to insert reservations on our side. I only now refer to this matter in order to exhibit, as well as I can without injustice, the spirit in which we have endeavoured to proceed—a spirit of liberal construction and interpretation wherever we thought we could apply it without sacrifice of honour or duty. I think it will be admitted that exception might have been taken to that reservation as covering God knows how many and what contingencies, had we been disposed to examine it in a spirit of cavilling or of criticism. But we determined, to give credit for its having been conceived—yes, we thought it our duty and we acted upon that duty—to take it as conceived in honour and good faith. We so construed it, and I do not repent having so construed it. I do not say that the construction is shown to have been wrong, but, come what may, I shall not repent having put that construction upon it. However, it was so taken, and I am bound to say that, although I think the House was somewhat startled by the reservation, it was generally, and I believe wisely, accepted by the House as a binding covenant. Sir, it was a very solemn covenant. It was a covenant involving great issues. There were thousands of men on the one side and on the other—on the one side standing for what they thought their country, on the other side standing for what they thought likewise their patriotic duty, standing in the face of one another without a definite course to contend for, but placed in a position of dangerous contiguity, and with the peril of bloody collision. This engagement came in to stand between the living and the dead, to stand between the danger and the people who were exposed to it, and we hoped and we believed that it would be recognized as one of the most sacred covenants ever made between two great nations with the strictest fidelity, and that if, unhappily, a deviation occurred there would be a generous rivalry between the two Powers to search it out to the bottom, and to exhibit to the world how that deviation had come about, and who was the person, or who were the persons on whom lay the responsibility. All this, Sir, remains in suspense.

What has happened? A bloody engagement on the 30th of March followed the covenant of the 16th. I shall overstate nothing. At least I shall not purposely overstate anything. I hope I shall not inadvertently overstate anything. All I shall say is this—that that woeful engagement on the 30th of March distinctly showed that one party, or both, had, either through ill-will or through unfortunate mishap, failed to fulfil the conditions of the engagement. We considered it, to be, and we still consider it to be, the duty of both countries, and above all, I will say required for the honour of both countries, to examine how and by whose fault this calamity came about. I will have no foregone conclusion. I will not anticipate that we are in the right. Although I feel perfect confidence in the honour and intelligence of our officers, I will not now assume that they may not have been misled. I will prepare myself for the issue; and I will abide by it, as far as I can, in a spirit of impartiality. But what I say is this—that those who have caused such an engagement to fail, ought to become known to their own Government, and to the other contracting Government. I will not say that we are even now in possession of all the facts of the case. But we are in possession of many; and we are in possession of facts which create in our minds impressions unfavourable to the conduct of some of those who form the other party in these negotiations. However, I will not wilfully deviate from the strictest principles of justice in anticipating anything as to the ultimate issue of that fair inquiry which we are desirous of prosecuting, and are endeavouring to prosecute. The cause of that deplorable collision may be uncertain. What is certain is that the attack was a Russian attack. Whose was the provocation is a matter of the utmost consequence. We only know that the attack was a Russian attack. We know that the Afghans suffered in life, in spirit, and in repute. We know that a blow was struck at the credit and the authority of a Sovereign—our ally—our protected ally—who had committed no offence. All I now say is, we cannot in that state of things close this book and say—“We will look into it no more.” We must do our best to have right done in the matter.

Under these circumstances, I again say, there is a case for preparation; and I hope that the House will feel with me, after what I have said about the necessity we are under of holding Soudanese funds available for service elsewhere. I trust that they will not press upon us a demand for time, which can have no other effect than that of propagating, here and elsewhere, a belief that there is some indecision in the mind of Parliament; whereas I believe that with one heart and one soul, and one purpose only, while reserving absolute liberty to judge the conduct of the Government, and to visit them with its consequences, they will go forward to meet the demands of justice and the calls of honour, and will, subject only to justice and to honour, labour for the purposes of peace.*

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF CIVIL DEPARTMENTS.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said that, before discussing this Vote for the House of Lords, he would like to ask the Government for some explanation of a proceeding which appeared to him to be most extraordinary. They had put down on the Paper Classes I. and II. of the Civil Service Estimates, and in the ordinary course the Committee would have been invited to consider the remaining Votes in Class I. before proceeding with any Vote in Class II. They were now very suddenly informed that the Government had postponed one Class of the Votes, and they were at once asked to plunge into Class II. of the Estimates when they had had no intimation whatever that it was the intention of the Treasury to bring that Class under the consideration of the Committee. Before this Vote for the House of Lords was disposed of he wished to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what was the explanation of that proceeding, and why Class II. was to be considered in the first instance before the remaining Votes in Class I. were taken?

MR. HIBBERT said, he had intended to give an explanation of the reason why this Vote was taken out of its order. As a matter of fact, there were only two Votes left in Class I. One of them, which related to the Houses of Parliament, had been postponed, owing to the fact that the Committee appointed to consider the question of the restoration of the outside of Westminster Hall was still sitting, and therefore it was impossible to take that Vote; and with regard to the second, he had been asked by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) on Thursday night to postpone it for the present. It was a Vote which, among other things, had reference to harbours, and there was also an intimation that it was not desirable to discuss it until the Report upon Arklow Harbour was in the hands of hon. Members. He made that explanation in order to justify the course which had been taken. It had been his intention to proceed with the Votes in their regular order. He was still in the hands of the Committee, and if they desired to go forward with the Vote in which the harbours were concerned, he was quite prepared to take it. He had thought, however, that in postponing it for the present he was simply complying with the wishes of the Irish Members, and therefore it could not be said that anybody had been taken by surprise.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he recollected the circumstance to which the hon. Member referred. The hon. Member had certainly been invited to consider whether it was not desirable to postpone the Vote for Public Works in Ireland. The suggestion, in point of fact, emanated from himself, and the Secretary to the Treasury said he would consider the suggestion; but he had never for a moment thought of suggesting that all the other Votes in Class I. should be postponed.

MR. HIBBERT said, there was only one other Vote, and that was for the Houses of Parliament.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that in regard to the Vote now under discussion, he would ask the hon. Member to explain the circumstances in which the Fee Fund of the House of Lords now found itself placed. He believed that the Fee Fund was, to a certain extent, called upon to defray certain salaries and pensions, and he imagined that the pensions, at any rate, which were so drawn from the Fee Fund, were perfectly within the cognizance of the House of Commons. He wished to know what was the amount of the Fee Fund, and what was the amount of the pensions paid out of it, which pensions were indirectly supplemented by something from this Vote?

MR. HIBBERT said, the pensions now amounted to a sum of £2,783 per annum, which was much smaller in comparison with previous years.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked what was the amount of the Fund?

MR. HIBBERT said, the amount received during last year in fees was £32,470, of which nearly £30,000 was paid into the Exchequer. The pensions were calculated upon the salaries, and he believed the House of Commons had no power of reducing them.

MR. CALLAN desired to have some explanation of the reason why the Librarian of the House of Lords had a salary of £810 a-year, and also an official residence. Upon the average, the House of Lords generally rose about 7 o'clock in the evening. He thought that was rather a high average, because that House frequently rose as early as 5 o'clock. The House of Commons generally sat until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning; and while the Librarian of the House of Lords had an official residence, which included light, coal, and freedom from all taxes, the Librarian of the House of Commons, who was up until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, had no official residence at all. He wished, further, to know upon what principle official residences in the Houses of Parliament were granted? He had intended some time ago to move, and he would do so shortly, for a Return showing what the official residences were, and the authority under which they were granted. It seemed to him that, although the House of Commons had not been in existence for much more than 30 years, it had already become an official rabbit warren, overridden by persons who came there and occupied official residences without any authority at all. He could not understand why the Librarian of the House of Lords should have a residence supplied to him, while the Members of the House of Commons, who were engaged in the discharge of their duties until all hours of the morning, had scarcely a place in which to lock up their papers. It was certainly undesirable to give up those enormous buildings to residences for officers who were in receipt of large salaries. He did not suppose there was in the British Empire an official who was paid for the duties he had to perform a higher salary than the Librarian of the House of Lords. He would invite hon. Members to go into the Library of the House of Lords and compare it with that of the House of Commons. They would find that very few of the books were ever removed from the shelves—complete lassitude prevailed from one end of the building to the other—and yet the officer in charge of the Library had an official residence to protect him from the night air in case he might otherwise have been required to go home at a late hour. In order to secure an explanation, and have a clear understanding why this official residence was provided, he would move to reduce the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords from £810 to £500. The item would be found at page 53, sub-section 6.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member propose to reduce the Vote by the sum of £310?

Mr. CALLAN: Yes.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Item of £810, for the Salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords, be reduced by the sum of £310.”—(Mr. Callan.)

Mr. HIBBERT said, the hon. Member was quite right in asserting that it was an anomaly that, while the Librarian of the House of Lords had an official residence provided for him, the Librarian of the House of Commons had none; and he fully admitted that the Librarian of the House of Commons was much more entitled to an official residence than the Librarian of the House of Lords. But, as a matter of fact, this residence was entirely out of the control and management of the House of Commons. The House of Commons had no power whatever over the arrangements of the House of Lords in connection with their own officials. They could only control the salaries; but they had no power over the allotment of the residences. A Committee of the House of Lords managed the whole of the arrangements for the rooms required by that House, and the House of Commons had no control over them. He should be very glad if it were possible to propose a residence for the Librarian of the House of Commons; but that was another matter. He hoped the hon. Member would not press this reduction, because the Committee had really no power over the salary or the residence.

Mr. CALLAN asked who had the allocation of the residences in the Houses of Parliament? He put that question quite irrespective of this particular case. He wanted to know who had the right to grant those residences, and he would go to a division for the purpose of testing what the feeling of the Committee was in regard to the matter. Members of Parliament had no convenience whatever. They sat on a narrow bit of a bench about 14 or 15 inches in breadth, and about two feet high, and all they had in the shape of accommodation was a small box in a Lobby outside; whereas he found that nearly every official had a residence provided for him.

THE CHAIRMAN: The observations of the hon. Member do not apply to this Vote, which is for the House of Lords. The Committee will come to the House of Commons Vote presently.

Mr. CALLAN said, he wanted to know whether the official residences were under the control of the Chief Commissioner of Works, and why the Houses of Parliament had been allowed to become an absolutely official rabbit warren? The House of Lords rose sufficiently early to permit of its Librarian spending the rest of the evening at a theatre or a music hall; and why should he be provided with an official residence while the Librarian of the House of Commons, who was in attendance all night long, had none? He took it that the value of the residence in this case would be about £310 a year, and, therefore, he proposed to reduce the Vote by that sum. The Houses of Parliament belonged to the nation, and this was a matter of great interest. Unless he received a satisfactory reply he should divide the Committee upon the Vote.

Mr. HIBBERT said, he could only explain, as he had already done, that the House of Commons had no power over the official residences, or the allocation of them in the House of Lords. It was a matter entirely under the management and control of the House of Lords itself; and he believed that the Lord Chamberlain made the necessary arrangements in connection with the allocation of rooms. He would remind the Committee that when the House of Commons required rooms for the Grand Committees last year they had considerable difficulty in obtaining them, and only succeeded in doing so after negotiations between the First Commissioner of Works and the House of Lords. In regard to the Librarian of the House of Commons, the provision of a residence for that officer would rest with the Speaker; and he would confer with the Speaker in order to see whether any

MR. HIBBERT said, he could only explain, as he had already done, that the House of Commons had no power over the official residences, or the allocation of them in the House of Lords. It was a matter entirely under the management and control of the House of Lords itself; and he believed that the Lord Chamberlain made the necessary arrangements in connection with the allocation of rooms. He would remind the Committee that when the House of Commons required rooms for the Grand Committees last year they had considerable difficulty in obtaining them, and only succeeded in doing so after negotiations between the First Commissioner of Works and the House of Lords. In regard to the Librarian of the House of Commons, the provision of a residence for that officer would rest with the Speaker; and he would confer with the Speaker in order to see whether any arrangement for rooms could be effected. He was afraid that the great difficulty in regard to official residences in the House of Commons would be to find suitable rooms. He would, however, be glad to bring the matter before the Speaker in any way that would conveniently raise the question. If the hon. Member wished to have a Return of the number of persons who had official residences in the Houses of Parliament, he thought it was a proper subject upon which information should be given, but beyond that he could not go.

MR. CALLAN said, that the explanation was quite satisfactory except in the most essential point. He wanted to know by what statute or authority the Lord Chancellor, or the Lord Chamberlain, or any other official presumed to allocate chambers in the House of Lords, which belonged to the nation, to the occupation of any individual? The buildings and fittings were the property of the nation, and in Committee of Supply the House of Commons voted the salaries of all the officials.

MR. HEALY said, it appeared to him that the question raised by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) was an important one. At the present moment there was a Bill before the House for reducing the judicial expenditure in Ireland, and yet in this case they had a number of useless officials who got annually nearly £50,000, for which the country received no value. He thought it was quite time the House of Commons commenced a systematic attack upon the officials of the House of Lords. He would suggest that Inspector Denning should be sent over to clear out the whole lot, and let them provide a place of their own, or meet, if they chose, in the Westminster Palace Hotel. He thought they ought in that House to attack systematically anything connected with the House of Lords; and he thought the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) was perfectly justified in asking questions, and in moving the reduction of the Vote. He was somewhat surprised to find the empty state of the Benches opposite. If that class of persons who were described as "Robust Radicals" would really devote some attention to the discharge of their Parliamentary duties when these Estimates came on something effective might be done; but he was sorry to say that the "Robust Radicals" were at that moment solely represented by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold). It did appear to him (Mr. Healy) extremely cool that the House of Lords should draw a sum of nearly £50,000 a-year, for which the country did not get 1d. of value, while the Treasury should display such great anxiety to cut down the little salaries that were paid in Ireland. The salaries put down in the Estimates were exceedingly large. There was the Lord Chancellor, whose official salary was stated at £4,000 a-year; the Black Rod, who was put down at £2,000; the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod, who was in receipt of £1,000 a-year; and the principal door-keepers, who were put down as receiving £600 a-year. Those were all gentlemen who were not required to meet until about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and whose duties were generally over about 6, after one hour's work a-day, which they had to perform for less than six months in the year. The fact was that those officials did not do 200 hours work in the whole 12 months; and yet a country, which was supposed to be distinguished for its common sense, went on paying those salaries year after year without protest or objection. There was one item put down under the head of this Vote as to which he should like to ask a question. He referred to an item of £350 which was charged for "Witnesses attending Committees." What was the meaning of that charge for the expense of witnesses attending Committees of the House of Lords? He would remind the Committee that the House of Commons had sent a Bill to that Chamber last Christmas, and they had never heard anything of the measure since. The House of Lords read the Bill a second time, and then choked it by referring it to a Select Committee, and it would appear that they had incurred an expense of £350 in trying to find out what the people of Ireland thought of the Bill; but what had become of the measure since then nobody seemed to know. He maintained that the House of Commons was entitled to know under what circumstances the expenditure of £350, to which he had drawn attention, had been incurred. In his opinion, the time had come when some attack in force ought to be made on those items of excessive expenditure. Here was a charge of £200 for the Secretary to the Lord Great Chamberlain, and all the other items were in proportion. Really something ought to be done in the way of making a vigorous protest against those ridiculous charges.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. and learned Member could give effect to his views in regard to this Vote when the question under discussion was disposed of. At the present moment the matter under consideration was a special item in the Vote relating to the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords, and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) had moved the reduction of the Vote by £310. The discussion ought, therefore, to be confined to that proposal.

MR. HEALY wished to call attention to the fact that a question had been asked with reference to this Vote, to which no answer had been returned. The question was, under what authority, statutable or otherwise, a certain room had been appropriated to the use of a certain official? The suggestion of the Secretary to the Treasury appeared to be that it was by the authority of the Lord Chamberlain.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had intimated that it was under an arrangement made by a Committee of the House of Lords.

MR. HEALY said, the answer just given carried them no further than they had got before. He should like to know who had given the Committee of the House of Lords that power? Surely the House of Commons, which had command of the National purse, was the Body that ought to be consulted in reference to those matters, and he thought that that House ought to assert itself in the face of the Upper House. The House of Lords had shown no hesitation in encroaching on the privileges of the Commons by throwing out Bills which the House of Commons had passed, especially Bills relating to Ireland, whenever they were sent into the Upper Chamber; and the House of Lords ought to be made to feel that in regard to those matters of money expenditure the House of Commons had the power of control, and that there was some other power over the Palace of Westminster than that of a Select Committee of the House of Lords, headed by the Lord Chamberlain. That Committee had no right to give away rooms that belonged to the country at large; and seeing that the officials of the House of Lords were a great deal better treated in every way than those of the House of Commons, who were an exceedingly hard-working body of men, whose time was taken up from 4 o'clock in the afternoon very often until 4 o'clock in the morning, it was time that some satisfactory explanation was given of this Vote.

MR. HIBBERT said, he had already given the explanation asked for. He might, however, state that at the time the Houses of Parliament were built a division was made of the amount of space available as between the two Houses, a certain amount being allotted to the House of Commons, and a certain amount to the House of Lords.

MR. PARNELL asked whether that division was made under an Act of Parliament?

MR. HIBBERT said, he could not say that it was made under an Act of Parliament; but it was made under an arrangement that was come to at the time. Moreover, it should be remembered that several years ago a further arrangement was made, under which the House of Commons had obtained the use of one or two additional rooms which used to be occupied by the House of Lords. The House of Commons had, however, no power over the allocation of the rooms used by the House of Lords, nor had they any power over the regulation of the salaries of the officials of that House. Therefore, whatever opinions might be entertained with regard to the different accommodation afforded to the Librarians of the two Houses, the matter was one with regard to which the House of Commons had no power. They had, however, power, through the Speaker, of communicating with the Office of Works, and endeavouring to obtain accommodation for the Librarian of the House of Commons if the House should think it desirable to take that course.

MR. HEALY said, he had generally found that on occasions of this kind the Treasury were willing to say that when the salary of a certain officer fell in, as, for instance, in case of death, they would give their attention to the matter. In a case of this kind, where the House might be extremely anxious to appropriate the residence allocated by the House of Lords as the residence of the Librarian of the House of Commons—an officer who was constantly kept at his post until the long hours of the morning—he wished to put it to the Government whether they would not come to the conclusion that, whenever the circumstances should arise that would render that residence vacant, they would take the necessary steps to ensure its being given to that officer who had by far the most occasion for it?

MR. HIBBERT said, he could not make the promise asked for; but, as he had already intimated, he should be glad to bring the matter prominently under the attention of the Speaker, and he should feel as much gratified as anyone to see the Librarian properly housed in that building.

MR. CALLAN said, he was glad to see that attention had been drawn to the injustice done to the Librarian of the House of Commons; but he desired to state that in moving the reduction of the Vote on the grounds he had stated he had acted without communication with that officer in any sense or form, and, in fact, had carefully avoided mentioning the matter to him. Still, he felt that an injustice was done to the Librarian of the House, and he should be glad to see the injustice remedied. He had brought the question forward on another ground—namely, because he considered that there had been an assumption of right without any legal authority whatever. He asked, who really was the authority having charge of the Houses of Lords and Commons? Was it not the First Commissioner of Works? If not, who was the official who was responsible for the charge of the two Houses; or was there any responsible authority at all?

MR. HIBBERT replied that the Lord Great Chamberlain was responsible for the House of Lords, and the Speaker for the House of Commons.

MR. CALLAN asked under what statutable authority, if any, such jurisdiction was vested in the two officers named in regard to the Houses of Lords and Commons? It seemed to him that the authority exercised proceeded on the title of internal assumption. He had looked into the matter—he would not say very carefully—but he had recently spent half-an-hour in looking at Acts of Parliament extending over the last 20 or 30 years, in order to find out whether there was any statutable authority under which the Lord Chancellor, or the Lord Chamberlain, or the Speaker of the House of Commons presumed to allocate the different parts of that building to the detriment of the Members of the House of Commons—for it was to their detriment if it precluded them from the use of rooms which might otherwise be at their disposal—and he had altogether failed to find any such authority. They must remember the discussion that had taken place about the allocation of rooms for the telegraph and post offices, when it was made to appear that the jurisdiction was under some antiquated authority, the origin of which was anything but clear. Under the circumstances, he must press his Motion to a division; though he would not take that course if the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), or the Secretary to the Treasury, would furnish the Committee with any definite information as to the statutable authority under which the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chamberlain presumed to exercise authority in regard to the allocation of private residences within that building. If that information were not furnished, then, as a protest against this allocation of private residences to officials who had no right to them, he should go to a division on the Motion he had submitted.

MR. PARNELL said, he always liked to go back to the beginning in discussing questions of this kind; and as a very interesting point had been raised by the subject brought under the consideration of the Committee by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), he should like to ask the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury how it was that there seemed to be so little control in regard to the distribution of space in the House of Lords? How came it that there was so little control over that distribution on the part of the House of Commons? He should like to hear from the hon. Gentleman in what way the title to the land upon which the House of Lords stood was vested, and in what body? Was it vested in the House of Lords itself, or was it vested in some Committee appointed by that Body, or in some official appointed by the House of Lords, or in the Houses of Parliament generally? He should also like to know, going a little further than that, if the land were not vested by prescription; whether it was vested by prescription; and, moreover, he would ask

hon. Gentleman a question as to the buildings themselves. He supposed the Houses of Parliament were originally built under the authority of a Vote of the House of Commons. He had no doubt the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was acquainted with the history of those matters, and that he would be able, consequently, to enlighten his (Mr. Parnell's) ignorance. He assumed that those buildings, which were modern, were originally built out of money provided by a Vote of the House of Commons, and that they were in all probability erected under the direction of a Governmental Department of the State. If he were right in that assumption he should wish, further, to inquire whether the buildings so erected were vested in any particular body, and whether—this being a collateral inquiry to the other question as to the authority in which the land was vested—if the buildings were vested in some particular body, the hon. Gentleman would state in what body they were vested? He put those questions because it might turn out that the House of Commons had a very complete control, not only over the land on which the Houses of Lords and Commons was built, but also over the buildings themselves, and over every portion of those buildings. It must, he thought, be obvious to everybody that the control of the House of Lords over any portion of the buildings was of a very nominal and shadowy character; that if the interest in the ground on which the buildings stood were vested in some particular body under the control of the House of Lords, nevertheless the House of Commons was the authority outside the House of Lords in which the land or buildings were vested, and might say to the House of Lords—“We give you that notice to quit which is so very often given to Irish tenants.” He believed that in this country it would only be a quarter's notice to quit, and that failing a possible surrender on the part of the House of Lords, the House of Commons could direct the sergeants and constables of the Metropolitan Police to take forcible possession of the building from which the Lords were evicted, and hold it according to the will and pleasure of the body of Trustees in whom it was really vested. They had heard something in the course of that discussion about the Lord Chamberlain.

MR. HIBBERT: The Lord Great Chamberlain.

MR. PARNELL said, it had been stated that the Lord Great Chamberlain had the right to allocate the space in the other House. But no statement had been made as to how the Lord Great Chamberlain derived his authority. He (Mr. Parnell) assumed that that authority was derived from a Resolution of the House of Lords; but to go back a little further, how did the House of Lords derive its authority in the matter? Had the House of Lords anything more than a prescriptive right? He must assume that the land and buildings would be property to which there was some title, and he wanted to know what the title to that property was. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury did not appear to have full and sufficient information on the subject; but he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not consider that these inquiries were useless, and that when they came to discuss these matters next year—or, better still, when they came to discuss them on the Report, because they could not control the action of a House to be elected by a new constituency—the Secretary to the Treasury would be able to furnish full information on the interesting questions that had been raised with regard to the original control of the land on which the Houses of Parliament had been built, and also with reference to the original control over the buildings themselves. If the hon. Gentleman were going to purchase property, even if the seller were so great a personage as the Lord Great Chamberlain himself, he would, before he paid for it, ask the Lord Great Chamberlain to produce his title.

MR. HIBBERT said, there were some points that had been alluded to upon which he was not in a position to furnish information, and he thought he could hardly be expected to go back to the history of the building of the Houses of Parliament, and all the circumstances immediately connected with the allocation of the different parts of the building without Notice. All he could be expected to do was to describe the practical effect of the arrangements that were then made, and that he had endeavoured to do. He had already informed the Committee that the Lord Great Chamberlain was responsible for the arrangements carried out in regard to the allocation of space in the House of Lords on the one side, while the Speaker was on the other side entrusted with the requisite authority in respect to the allotment of space in connection with the House of Commons. He had also stated that from time to time the House of Commons had obtained more space for the use of Members and officers, and that that additional space had been given up by the House of Lords. If, however, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) desired to go into the question more closely than he (Mr. Hibbert) was able to do at the present moment, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that he should be glad to obtain the information he desired, either on the Report of the Vote, or when it was again brought forward, supposing he should then hold the Office he now had the honour to fill. In any case, he should be happy to obtain the information, not only for his own sake, but because it had been asked for by the hon. Member.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the question before the Committee was a very narrow one, and with reference to the proceedings of the Committee of the House of Lords on the Office of the Black Rod he should like to ask a practical question. The Committee of the Black Rod had reported on this very subject with reference to the appropriation by the First Commissioner of Works of certain rooms below the Bar in the House of Lords. That Committee had reported to the House of Lords that the First Commissioner of Works had appropriated those rooms, and that they ought to be given up again to the other House. He should like to know whether any decision had been arrived at with regard to that matter, and whether the rooms referred to were to be given back again?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had to state, in reply to the question asked by his hon. Friend, that his action in the matter alluded to had been called in question by the Black Rod Committee, who thought that those rooms, which had originally been allotted to the House of Lords, had been wrongly disposed of. The Committee on the Office of Black Rod had inquired into the matter, and had made the Report to which the hon. Member had referred; but he was not aware that any action had been taken on that Report. He had reason, however, to believe that the House of Lords were satisfied with what had been done. In reply to the question put by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he had to state that in theory the assent of the Lord Great Chamberlain was necessary in relation to any change that might be made in the allocation of rooms in both Houses of Parliament, because he was the appointed Officer of the Queen, and the Houses of Parliament were a Royal Palace. But, as a matter of course, the Lord Great Chamberlain would not make any change in respect of the House of Commons without the concurrence of the Speaker; and, on the other hand, no change would be made affecting the House of Lords without the concurrence of the Committee on the Office of Black Rod. So that, practically, the decision with regard to those matters rested in the one case with the Speaker, and in the other with the Committee of the House of Lords.

MR. PARNELL was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the information he had given, and he thought that what had so far been elicited had furnished proof of the very great anomaly, that not only the House of Lords but also the House of Commons could be turned out of doors by the Queen if it should please Her to take that course. It appeared that not only the ground on which the House of Commons conducted its proceedings, but also the Houses which had been erected upon it were the property of the Queen.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it seemed to him that the position of the two Houses of Parliament in regard to the Lord Great Chamberlain and the Queen, which had been termed an anomaly, was in strict analogy with everything connected with the Constitution; and that if everything belonging to that Constitution was to be pushed to its extreme logical conclusion many other things besides the relations between the Houses of Lords and Commons, as to their accommodation in this Palace, might be brought to a very uncomfortable stand-point. Having himself held the Office of First Commissioner of Works he must say that he had never, during his tenure of Office, found that any practical inconvenience resulted from the slightly confused relations between the great Officers of State. The Lord Great Chamberlain's Office was always conducted with the greatest prudence and respect for all the other authorities; and in the same way Mr. Speaker, acting through the First Commissioner of Works, had invariably pursued a similar course. Until the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had unearthed the question he had introduced that evening, he (Lord John Manners) had never heard of any difficulty arising out of the relations existing between the Lord Great Chamberlain and Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SEXTON having risen,

THE CHAIRMAN said, before the hon. Member addressed the Committee he desired to call attention to the question they were then considering, and which they had for some time been wandering away from in a most extraordinary manner. It had been moved by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) that the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords be reduced by £310; and all the points that had been raised in the discussion which was then proceeding had really nothing to do with that question.

Mr. CALLAN said, he had moved the reduction of the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords because he called in question the authority under which that officer was provided with an official residence, and that was the only way in which he could raise the question as to the advisability of giving an official residence to the Librarian of the House of Commons. The sum put down in the Vote that had been put from the Chair, as the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords, was £810, and in addition to that amount the Lords' Librarian was provided with an official residence. The reduction he had moved was what he took to be the value of that official residence, not merely in the shape of house-rent, but also all the accompaniments of the official residence, including attendance.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Callan) could have no idea of the number of times he had stated the same thing. He should think he was not exaggerating when he stated that the hon. Gentleman had made the same statement 50 times.

Mr. CALLAN said, then he stated it for the 51st time now.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member makes remarks of that sort it will be my duty to adopt a very different course. I hope the Committee will now confine itself to the discussion of the Question immediately before it.

Mr. CALLAN said, he wished to point out that the Librarian's residence included fire, and light, and attendance, which he took it amounted in value to more than £310. He should press the Amendment he had moved; and with all due respect to the Chair, he begged to say that he had not made the same statement more than three times, instead of 50, as the Chairman had stated.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member having contradicted the statement I made just now, I will appeal to the recollection of the Committee as to whether I am not right in saying that I believe he has made the same statement in almost the same words more than 50 times?

Mr. SEXTON said, the question that had been under discussion by the Committee was one that related to the power possessed by the Lord Great Chamberlain, and that had led to the further question whether the Lord Great Chamberlain had the allocation of the space on which the two Houses of Parliament stood? He took the noble Lord who had spoken from the Front Opposition Bench (Lord John Manners) as an authority with regard to Constitutional usage; and the noble Lord had assured the Committee that what had been commented upon as an anomalous arrangement was, in reality, strictly Constitutional. But when the matter was reduced to the stand-point of common sense, it was somewhat startling to be told that the Representatives of the people were liable to be evicted at the discretion of a Court official. That, he thought, threw some light on a recent occurrence, when the Speaker had felt it his duty to make new Regulations as to the admission of strangers to the Lobbies of that House.

THE CHAIRMAN called the hon. Member to Order. The subject he was raising had nothing to do with the Question before the Committee, which was that the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords be reduced by the sum of £310. That Question had no connection whatever with the Regulations made by the Speaker in regard to the admission of strangers to the Lobbies of the House of Commons.

MR. SEXTON said, he would raise the question he had been about to have introduced on the next Vote.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 92: Majority 75.—(Div. List, No. 180.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL desired to move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £350, which was set down as the cost of witnesses attending Committees during the year 1885-6. That appeared to be a constant sum, as a similar amount was taken for the same purpose in 1884-5; in fact, all the expenses of the House of Lords appeared to be of a constant character. Under sub-head M, for instance, £750 was taken each year for short-hand writers, and for miscellaneous expenses £350 was asked for each year. His reason for calling attention to that matter, and moving the reduction in question, was that he thought the House of Commons would do well to exercise a very severe check and control over the appointment of Select Committees by the House of Lords for the purpose of considering Bills, or, practically, hanging up and destroying Bills, which they did not like to oppose openly and directly, which had been passed by the House of Commons, and sent up to the Lords for examination and consideration. He thought that the Government were very much to blame in that matter—the Government, at all events, in the House of Lords—and he assumed the Members of the Government in the House of Lords were in constant communication with the rest of the Government in the House of Commons. He assumed that the action of the Members of the Government in the House of Lords was arrived at, and carried out, after consultation with the rest of the Government. But however that might be, he thought that the Government in the House of Lords, through Earl Granville, or the other responsible Leaders of the House, assented much too easily to the appointment of Select Committees for the purpose of considering Bills which had passed the House of Commons; and that they, in that way, heaped expenses upon the taxpayers of the country—in many cases very useless and unnecessary expenses. He desired very much to know how the expenditure of £350 for witnesses attending Select Committees of the Upper House was incurred? He confessed he did not understand whether all the money was expended on account of witnesses attending Select Committees, or whether some of it was expended on account of witnesses attending ordinary Private Bill Committees. [MR. HIBBERT: Select Committees.] That was his (Mr. Parnell's) impression; but he was not quite certain on the point. They were asked to pay an aggregate sum of £1,500 for the expenses of the Select Committees of the House of Lords; and in order to bring the matter formally before the attention of the Committee of the House of Commons, he proposed to reduce the Vote by the sum of £350, being the expenses of the witnesses attending the Select Committees in question. Now, nothing was complete without an illustration, and in order to bring the matter home to hon. Members, he would give them an example of the way in which that money was spent. In fact, he fancied that that particular item was spent in regard to the very example he should give, as he had not heard that any other Select Committee necessitating the attendance of witnesses had been appointed lately by the House of Lords than the one he had in his mind. His example was the Select Committee which was appointed by the Upper House to inquire into the subject of the Poor Law Guardians Elections (Ireland) Bill. That was a Bill which had passed the House of Commons, with very little opposition, in the Session of 1883. It was then sent up to the House of Lords, and rejected on the second reading by that House without any examination or discussion worthy of the name. In the Session of 1884 the Bill again passed the House of Commons, and was sent up to the House of Lords, which, on that occasion, appeared to be rather chary of throwing the measure out in the summary method adopted on the previous occasion. Their Lordships passed the second reading; but on the Motion for going into Committee they resolved to refer the Bill to a Select Committee for examination.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member seemed to be directing his remarks to the conduct of the House of Lords. He (the Chairman) did not think that that could be fairly discussed in regard to Committees acting on Bills in that House. The hon. Member himself would see that the conduct of the House of Lords could hardly be properly discussed on an item of £350 to defray the cost of witnesses attending Committees.

MR. PARNELL said, he should, of course, bow to the Chairman's ruling. He would not further discuss the conduct of the House of Lords; but he submitted that it was necessary to go, to some extent, into what had been done for the expenditure of the money. It was necessary, in order that the Committee might judge as to whether they ought to vote this money or not, to consider the action of the House of Lords which gave rise to this item.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not desire to interrupt the hon. Member in any observations which were in Order. The province of this Committee was to vote certain sums, or to refuse them, for certain specific purposes. He doubted whether it would be in Order for the hon. Member to go into any great development of the action of the House of Lords, even by way of illustration; because this was a sum of £350 for a specific purpose of defraying the costs of witnesses attending Select Committees in the other House. He should say it would hardly be in Order to discuss the general conduct of the Upper House on such an item as that.

MR. PARNELL appreciated the point of the Chairman's ruling, and, of course, would bow to it. He saw that there was a considerable difference between the action of the House of Lords, from a Constitutional point of view, and the action of a Minister of the Crown. There was, of course, a considerable difference between the manner in which they would approach a Minister of the Crown, and the manner in which they might be permitted to approach a Vote with regard to the action of the House of Lords. Whereas they might freely go into the merits of the action of a Minister of the Crown with reference to any particular matter; whereas they might criticize his action, and the policy of his action, when they were asked to vote a Minister's salary, perhaps the same argument might not hold good with regard to the action of a Committee of the House of Lords, or of the House of Lords itself. He desired, with great respect, without wishing to express any opinion of his own, to bow most humbly to the Chairman's ruling. He would only say why he objected to this Vote for the expenses of witnesses brought over from Ireland for examination before a Select Committee of the House of Lords. In his opinion, those witnesses were not impartially summoned. Of course, he desired to keep himself strictly within the limits the Chairman had laid down, and not to transgress them in any way. He would suggest for the consideration of the Government whether they ought not to take up a firmer attitude in the House of Lords with regard to the Select Committees appointed by that House; whether they should so readily yield to the appointment of those Committees; and whether, when a Committee had been appointed, in the teeth of the Government's protest with reference to a Bill to which they gave their sanction—whether, when a Committee was appointed by the House of Lords in order to oppose a Bill which the Government, and which the House of Commons, had almost unanimously passed, the Government might not fairly set down their foot, and tell the House of Lords—"All we can say is this—if you appoint this Committee we shall not support the payment out of the public purse necessary for this Committee, when that payment is proposed in the House of Commons. We shall leave you to pay for such Committees yourselves." That Bill had been hung up in the House of Lords. It was a Bill which was admittedly necessary, and which nobody had a word to say against. It was a Bill of which they had heard the last in that Parliament; and, forsooth! the Irish and English taxpayers were to pay for the infliction upon themselves of wrong.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £350, for Witnesses attending Committees, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. HIBBERT pointed out to the hon. Gentleman that though this amount appeared to be the sum that was voted in previous years, it was really not the amount that was expended each year. The amount was taken on the assumption that it would probably be required next year. £350 was not spent last year in defraying the costs of witnesses, but only £251; and the year before that the charge under the same head was only £119.

MR. PARNELL: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us what Committees were appointed?

MR. HIBBERT said, that he was not able to do that. He did not know anything about the Select Committees of the House of Lords; indeed, it was a matter with which the Treasury had no right to interfere; and he should doubt whether he should be in Order in going into the question of Committees. He was quite satisfied that he would not be in Order in expressing his opinion as to the action of the House of Lords upon the Poor Law Guardians Elections (Ireland) Bill; and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would excuse him from doing so. The hon. Member objected to this item because it might, he said, be put to the purpose of re-imbursing Irish witnesses who had been brought before the Select Committee on the Bill just mentioned. That could not be the case with respect to this particular £350. This charge was taken for Committees who would sit during the present Session; and, therefore, it was not known whether any such Committee, as the hon. Member referred to, would be appointed. Moreover, it could not be known whether any Irish witnesses would be sent for.

MR. PARNELL: The Committee is sitting now.

MR. HIBBERT begged the hon. Member's pardon, because he did not know that that was the case. This money might therefore be used for the purpose of paying the expenses of Irish witnesses; but perhaps he ought to draw attention to the fact that the payment for witnesses before Committees of the House of Lords was a matter with which the House of Commons had no power to deal.

MR. BIGGAR remarked that the explanation of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) was very peculiar. The hon. Gentleman had stated that although £350 was set down for the expenses of witnesses attending Committees, only £251 was expended last year, and £119 the year before. That seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) to be a rather loose mode of estimating. In fact, they might just as well have no Estimate at all. They might as well, at the end of the year, pass a Vote that whatever was expended should be made legal. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury ought to tell the Committee whether or not he believed that the present system was an advantageous one, and whether he did not think he ought to adopt some revised plan of making Estimates? The money they were now asked to vote seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) to be expended for the purpose of doing harm rather than good; and he certainly thought that the Treasury, who was supposed to supervise the expenditure in all the Departments, should reserve to itself the right to put a veto upon expenditure which it believed to be unreasonable. In point of fact, the Treasury should assist the House of Commons in stopping any payments which they thought were useless. Now, the appointment of the Select Committee of the House of Lords upon the Bill to which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had alluded, was unquestionably made with the object of defeating that very meritorious Bill, and also, if possible, to convey perfectly erroneous ideas as to the real facts connected with the Bill. The Members of the Select Committee were of a partizan character, and would endeavour to mislead the public with regard to the real merits of the case. He thought it should be within the power of the Treasury to refuse the expenses of admittedly useless witnesses, because if that were so, a very considerable saving of expenditure would be effected.

MR. SEXTON said, it appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Vote (Mr. Hibbert) did not possess information sufficient to enable him to give particulars which hon. Members were entitled to receive with reference to this item. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) suggested, in the course of his speech, that some of this money might have been used for the purpose of paying the travelling expenses, and the maintenance expenses, of Irish witnesses summoned before a Committee of the House of Lords. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) replied that he did not imagine such a contingency could arise with respect to any part of the present item.

MR. HIBBERT said, he was not aware when he spoke that the Committee on the Poor Law Bill was now sitting. Had he been aware of that fact, he should not have made the remarks he did.

MR. SEXTON said, the Committee was sitting; it was appointed last year, and had not yet reported; consequently, its investigations were now in course of progress. The assumption made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was one which was substantiated by facts. What degree of information were Members of the House entitled to expect on items of this kind? He had always understood that every Vote in the Estimates was accounted for by some accounting officer; that there was someone whose duty it was to render to the Treasury and the House an account of the manner in which the last payment had been spent. Who was the person to account for this expenditure? Who signified to the Comptroller and Auditor General that the money granted to the House of Lords had been duly and properly expended, and what particulars would that officer afford as to items of that kind? Would he inquire in reference to what Committees that money had been spent, what witnesses had been called before those Committees, and what expense had been paid? He (Mr. Sexton) thought the Committee might claim to have put before them that information, because a very important question was here raised. Evidence brought before the House of Lords was very often used for the purpose of evading information; and he therefore asked in reference to what Committees that money would be applied? He would put a case to illustrate his meaning. A Bill passed through the House of Commons by a large majority, and was rejected by the House of Lords. A second Session it passed the House of Commons, and the House of Lords, being unwilling to incur the odium of rejecting it, though the merits of the measure were well known, and though it was obvious that no further inquiry was required into it, referred it to a Select Committee. In that way time was killed, the Bill was deferred for months—it might be for years—and in that way the wish of the House of Commons was defeated, and defeated to a large extent through the agency of the money they voted to the House of Lords. It was perfectly evident that if the purpose of the appointment of those Committees was to evade legislation the Government should challenge the House of Lords, and ask them to reject Bills finally, rather than to waste money in killing time and calling witnesses in matters on which no information was required. If the information he was now requesting in this item, and, in fact, in all the other items in the Estimate, was not forthcoming, he thought they would not be asking too much that the Votes should be postponed.

MR. P. J. POWER said, that it appeared to him that the House of Lords was too active in the way of obstructing useful legislation.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order!

MR. P. J. POWER said, that if he were not in Order, he would confine himself to the items in the Vote. One of the methods of obstructing legislation pursued by the House of Lords was by referring Bills to Select Committees; and that seemed to him to be about the worst possible mode, as it incurred a large amount of unnecessary expense, and brought witnesses unnecessarily to London. Witnesses were summoned, particularly from Ireland, of a class unfriendly to the Party he had the honour of representing, so that that Party suffered particularly from that mode of referring Bills approved by the House of Commons to Select Committees when they reached the House of Lords. Irish Members were, therefore, bound in duty to, at any rate, offer a protest against that practice of referring Bills to Select Committees when the conclusions were really foregone.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 20; Noes 108: Majority 88.—(Div. List, No. 131.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £45,772, House of Commons Offices.

MR. PARNELL said, they had had an interesting discussion some time ago with reference to the Vote for the House of Lords as to the particular body in which the ownership of the buildings and ground of the Houses of Parliament were vested; and hon. Members had been informed that the Houses of Parliament, being Royal Palaces, were vested in an official—namely, the Lord Great Chamberlain, as representing the Crown. The Lord Great Chamberlain, then, was really the owner, as representing the Crown, of the Houses of Parliament and the ground on which they stood. However, by usage or by custom, the right of allocating a portion of the space within the Houses of Parliament, and the right of dealing with the rooms of the Houses and with the internal arrangements of the Houses generally, seemed to have been transferred to certain bodies and certain individuals; and he supposed the Board of Works had already a great deal to say on the matter, at all events in the House of Commons. But what he wished to call attention to was this—namely, to certain inconveniences which had arisen, owing to the new Rules made by Mr. Speaker with regard to the admission of strangers. He wished to call attention to those inconveniences, and to suggest a remedy. After a recent occurrence in the House—an explosion of dynamite, which he believed took place in the lower corner on the Government side of the House—Mr. Speaker felt it necessary to interfere with the usage that had prevailed with regard to the admission of strangers, and to direct that no strangers should in future be admitted into any part of the House of Commons upon the order of a Member; and the right hon. Gentleman had taken upon himself the right of admitting all strangers to any part of the House. He (Mr. Parnell), of course, did not intend to allude at that moment to the right of the Speaker to make such Rules and Regulations, though he thought that that right might be seriously challenged; but he wished to point to one result of those Regulations. It was formerly the custom to permit Members' secretaries to write from the dictation of Members from the Tea Room of the House; but one of the results of the Rules of Mr. Speaker had been that Members' secretaries could no longer see Members in the Tea Room, and were compelled to remain outside the precincts of the House altogether. It was not possible for Members to bring their secretaries to the Tea Room or any of the Libraries. He believed it would be possible, by going through a very roundabout form, to obtain permission for them, if there was room, to sit in the Strangers' Gallery, to bring them down to one of the Smoking Rooms of the House, and so to enable them to discharge their duties. But that would be a very inconvenient method; and so far as he knew, the private secretaries who were, or had been, in the habit of coming to the Tea Room for the purpose of performing their duties, had not attempted to perform them in any part of the House of Commons since the new Rules were made. Now, what he would suggest would be this—in fact, he might say he had communicated with the Speaker's Secretary on the matter, and had had the honour of receiving a reply that the Speaker was in communication with one of the officials of the House for the purpose of providing a room where Members might see their secretaries. What he would suggest was that proper provision should be made for the convenience of hon. Members in this respect, and what he wished to know was whether any steps had been taken to carry out that half promise of the Speaker? Was there any prospect of a room being provided for the purpose of enabling Members to see their secretaries? If not, would tables be set up in the Central Lobby, and writing paper and envelopes, &c., provided, to enable Members to dictate their correspondence to their secretaries? Would places be provided for secretaries to sit and write, and for Members to come and sign their letters after they had been written? To those Members of the House who had a large correspondence, and whose duties compelled them to be in somewhat constant attendance in the House, this system, under which it was impossible to see their private secretaries, made it extremely inconvenient, almost impossible, to fulfil their duties to those people who were in correspondence with them. It was almost impossible for them to answer letters, and at the same time attend to their functions in the House, because a man obviously could not be in two places at once. Even if a Member's office were in the immediate neighbourhood of the House it was exceedingly inconvenient to have to rush out between divisions and between times when it might be possible for him to devote a few minutes away from his Parliamentary duties to the carrying on of his correspondence. It was next to impossible for a Member to rush out into the street in the snow or the rain, or however inclement the weather might be, perhaps to catch cold, for the purpose of looking after his correspondence. That, he thought, was a matter on which private Members were entitled to ask that some room should be assigned to them to enable them to carry on their correspondence as heretofore. It was almost impossible for a Member to get through his correspondence now, unless he wrote his letters himself. That applied to a Member who had but a small correspondence; because, of course, in the case of a Member with a large correspondence it was obviously next to impossible for him to get through it at all. He hoped this matter might have considerably advanced since the beginning of the Session when, as he had already said, Mr. Speaker had informed him that he was engaged in communication with the officers who had power to deal with the rooms of the House. He hoped he might hear of there being some probability of a convenient, well-aired, well-warmed, and well-lighted room being given to Members for the purpose of getting through their correspondence.

MR. HIBBERT said, he was not aware of the difficulty the hon. Member alluded to with regard to the rights and inconveniences of Members and their secretaries; but, no doubt, all hon. Members had had to submit to inconveniences since those unfortunate occurrences in Westminster Hall and the House of Commons. He was not prepared to give a definite reply as to the position in which the matter now stood; and he could only say that, so far as he was concerned, he should use his influence in order to secure to hon. Members the necessary means for transacting their business in the most comfortable manner possible. At the same time, they all knew there was not very much space at liberty in the House of Commons. With regard to a room being set apart for the use of Members and their secretaries, he could see no objection to the proposal personally, and he would promise to draw the attention of the Speaker to the matter once more. Even if a room were granted, he could not promise that it would be a very comfortable or desirable one for the purpose.

COLONEL NOLAN considered that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was a great deal too modest in bringing forward this question. The grievance was one which he (Colonel Nolan) could thoroughly understand, and which had been very much under his attention. The question was not merely one of providing for the convenience of Members. The Government had at their disposal some 30 rooms in the House—some Members of the Government having two, and some even three. [MR. HIBBERT: No, no!] He thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland had two or three rooms, or ante-rooms. Would the hon. Member say how many rooms the Government had in the House? He (Colonel Nolan) believed it to be somewhere about 30.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. and gallant Member that these observations are not in Order on the present Vote. This Vote is for the payment of officials in the House of Commons, and it is not in connection with the Government nor the Speaker. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) made some observations for the purpose of eliciting information which seemed quite permissible under the circumstances, and, therefore, I did not stop him. But it will not be right on this Vote for anyone to impugn any arrangement made by Mr. Speaker.

MR. PARNELL: I see there is an item here for shorthand writers.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had no business to speak unless he wished to address the Chair on a point of Order, as he (Colonel Nolan) was in possession of the Committee. As the hon. Member was not speaking to a point of Order, he (Colonel Nolan) should like to point out that the Serjeant-at-Arms was in this Vote, and he supposed, therefore, that it had something to do with keeping order in some part of the House, possibly in the Library. He (Colonel Nolan) wished to make a complaint with regard to the Library, and he would ask the Chairman whether he would be in Order in going into that subject?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member may mention whatever he likes in connection with the Serjeant-at-Arms Department.

COLONEL NOLAN: I also see the Department of the Chairman of Ways and Means down in this Vote. I object, Sir, to your having a room.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is perfectly in Order in alluding to that subject.

COLONEL NOLAN said, it was not because he had any fault to find with the Chairman's ruling, or because he did not think the hon. Gentleman had presided very admirably over their Committees; but he thought the Chairman's room ought to be sacrificed until the arrangements of hon. Members were satisfied. Members of the Cabinet had rooms behind Mr. Speaker's Chair, and right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench also had rooms. [An hon. MEMBER: Have they?] Yes. Hon. Members did not seem to be aware of those facts. The Whips of the Government had rooms outside in the Lobby, and the Whips of the Opposition had also got them.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no reference to these officers in the Vote under discussion. They are connected with the Building Vote, and that would be the proper place to raise this question. It would be competent to move the reduction of the salary of the Chairman of Ways and Means, or any other official of the House on this Vote, but not to discuss the allocation of rooms.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that if the Chairman ruled him out of Order on this point—if the Chairman ruled that he had no right to say that he (the Chairman) should not have a room—of course he would reserve his observations to another occasion.

MR. PARNELL said, he was astonished to hear the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Hibbert) say that he had heard nothing, up to that moment, about the matter he (Mr. Parnell) had submitted to him. From the letter he (Mr. Parnell) had received from Mr. Speaker, he was induced to believe that the matter had been brought under the hon. Member's notice, or under the notice of some other official. He had presumed that the hon. Member was the official under whose notice the matter would have been brought.

MR. HIBBERT: No.

MR. PARNELL: Then under whose notice would it have been brought?

MR. HIBBERT: I think the Office of Works.

MR. PARNELL wished to say a few words with regard to the Vote for the Department of Mr. Speaker. He observed that in that Department the House provided salaries for the Librarian, Assistant Librarian, Messenger in Library, Extra Messenger in Library; in short, all the officials connected with the Library. He believed that it would at once strike the Committee that the number of assistants in the Library was very limited indeed, in respect of the duties they were called upon to perform. Now, there had been a discussion a short time since in the Committee on the Vote for the Librarian of the House of Lords. They saw that a very large sum of money was voted to the Librarian of the House of Lords, and he certainly thought that this was a matter which might very fairly engage the attention of the Committee. In the American Congress a very large number of Librarians and assistants were employed to enable the Members to get on with their business. If one required to be informed about any question it was only necessary to go into the Library and state the information required, and within a certain time it was produced, and the whole subject made up, so to speak, cut and dried; but in the case of the Library of the House of Commons, every obstruction and obstacle seemed placed in the way of Members, not by the officials, who, considering their number, did more than their best for the purpose of serving and attending to the requirements of Members, but owing to the system which had been adopted of having a small number of officials who were overburdened with the task of getting down books for Members to read, which made it impossible for hon. Members to get the information they required when it was most wanted. Returning to the subject of shorthand writers and secretaries, if those assistants were not allowed access to Members in the House, he thought it the duty of the Government to provide shorthand writers for them in the Library for the purpose of taking down letters. He believed that with proper facilities the correspondence of Members could be got through with an immense economy of time, and that posts would be saved which were under the present arrangements very often lost. In his own case, he knew that between the impossibility of getting at his shorthand writer and the subsequent delay of his letters in the Post Office which always took place his business arrangements were very much interfered with. Besides the delay caused by missing the post, he found that his letters did not arrive until long after the time at which they should have reached their destination, having in the meantime been examined in the Post Office, and in some cases by the higher officials at the Home Office. But he said that if they were not to have access to their shorthand writers, the Government should put down a Vote for the purpose of supplying shorthand writers for Members who, by the aid of the new type-writers, would then be able to perform their duties to their constituents in a shorter space of time than they were now able to perform them in owing to the existing arrangements. With regard to the placing of paper and ink in the Central Lobby, he would point out that the Lobby was large enough to afford space for a dozen tables. He thought it would be competent to the Sergeant-at-Arms to place tables in the Lobby at which Members could conduct their correspondence, and he did not see why it should not be done. At present there was a little room at their disposal not much larger than the Table at which Mr. Speaker so ably presided; on the outside there was written, "For the use of Members," and inside the room there was a table and three very dim gas-lights. Driven to extremity the other evening, he went into the room for the purpose of writing some letters, and he found the light so dim that it was impossible for him to see the tracings of the pen on the paper. He did not see why a table with the needful appliances should not be placed in the open Hall. Pens and paper were cheap, and there was no reason why Members who were driven away from the House and from the Tea Room by the arrangements of Mr. Speaker should not be allowed to write their letters in the Central Lobby, and that they should not, like the bird sent out of Noah's Ark, be unable to find a place for the sole of their foot.

MR. GIBSON said, he observed that while Mr. Speaker, of course, the Clerk of the House, Assistant Clerk, and Sergeant-at-Arms had official residences, and certain assistants had allowances from the House, it was, in his opinion, absurd that almost the only officer of high rank and position next to Mr. Speaker had no house allowance. He ventured to say that there was no officer except Mr. Speaker whose presence in the House was so constantly needed as that of the Deputy Speaker. That was a matter which had been considered by past Chief Commissioners of Works and past Financial Secretaries to the Treasury, and he would be glad to know whether it was intended to provide a residence for the officer he referred to?

MR. HIBBERT said, they had had a discussion on the subject of a residence for the Librarian, and he was, therefore, unwilling to go again into that question; but he certainly thought that his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) had made out a strong case for providing residences for officials whose presence was required in the House at any hour of the night, and he would take care that the subject was brought before Mr. Speaker. With regard to the suggestions made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), he should be glad to lay all the hon. Gentleman's proposals before Mr. Speaker, who he was sure would, if it were possible, order a suitable room to be provided for Members who had to dictate to their secretaries.

MR. CALLAN said, it was stated in the discussion about an hour ago that the Librarian had no official residence provided for him; but he had ascertained since that time that an official residence was formerly provided for the Librarians, and that by some jerrymandering the present Librarian had been deprived of that accommodation. The total amount of this Vote, £51,772, was spread over three Departments—namely, those of the Clerk of the House, the Speaker, and the Sergeant-at-Arms. Taking the first of those Departments, he thought it was very strange that the Department of the Clerks of the House, which comprised a number of inferior officers, should receive under this Vote £26,201 a-year, and that the sum of £9,456 only should be allotted to the Department of the Speaker. He was ready to acknowledge that the 36 clerks in the first Department who drew this large amount as salaries were useful; but he wished to ask this question—Had those 36 clerks passed a competitive examination? He heard the Secretary to the Treasury say that they did; but he was bound to challenge that statement. He would like to know under what number of marks obtained at competitive examination Mr. Northcote, the son of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in that House, received his appointment? He asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury for the competition warrant. He asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), who was entitled to the credit of having secured for the country the system of competitive examination, whether it was by public competitive examination, by private nomination, or by some test examination that those clerks were appointed? [Mr. HIBBERT: Yes.] But that was not competitive examination. His question was this—By what competitive examination had Mr. Northcote, within the last 10 days, received his appointment as a Clerk of the House? Was it by nomination, or was the appointment given to the best man out of, say, five or six selected for examination; in other words, was the examination a sham or a reality? If the Committee were to vote this £26,000 a-year to the Clerks of the House, he said that they ought to have the right of nomination, or the appointments should be made after public competitive examination. Did the right of nomination lay with Sir Erskine May? If so, he would ask how it was that he only nominated the sons, nephews, and brothers of Members of the House? If hon. Members took up the list of clerks appointed, they would find that they were not men appointed by merit, but because they were relatives of Members of the House; and he said that that was a corrupt system, and a system which, if the country knew of its existence, would be at once put down. In the same way he took the Department of the Speaker. The most overworked Department was that of the Serjeant-at-

Arms, which, he said, was an efficient Department; and the manner in which it was conducted afforded a contrast to the other Departments of the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he also wished to press the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) on this subject. He recollected that the right hon. Gentleman had been very zealous to introduce competitive examination into the Foreign Service and Diplomatic Service, and that he had brought forward Motions on the subject. The question of competitive examination in those Services had been debated in the House of Commons, and he recollected that there were Motions and divisions upon it, and so great had been the strength of public opinion on the subject that it forced the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to establish the system of competitive examination. It now appeared that the service of that House was placed in an entirely different position from that in which the whole of the service of the State was placed. Therefore, he asked the Representatives of the Government now on the Treasury Bench why clerks were to be appointed to the subordinate positions in the service of the House without any competitive examination whatever? The nomination to those appointments appeared to him to be an undue power for any official to possess. Even Ministers of State had not the right to appoint clerks to Parliament. But here, in the House of Commons, in which the principle of competitive examination with regard to appointments in the Public Service had been established, it would seem that that was the only Department in the State which ignored its own rules, and allowed young men to be appointed without competitive examination before the Civil Service Commissioners. He understood the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to say that Mr. Northcote had passed a test examination. He would ask some Member of Her Majesty's Government to say why it was that, with all their interest in the procedure of the House, no Member of the Government had insisted on the same competitive examination with regard to appointments in the service of the House as they had enforced in every other Department of the State? He should be glad to hear from the noble

Mr. Callan

Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, why that great abuse had been allowed to exist in the House of Commons when it did not exist in any other Department of the State?

MR. HIBBERT said, he would point out, in reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), that the appointments of the Clerks of the House were made by the Clerk of the House under an Act of Parliament passed in the Reign of George III. Up to the present time the appointments had always been made by the Clerk of the House under that Statute. There was no competitive examination in the case of those appointments such as had been suggested by the hon. Gentleman; but there was a test examination, and, looking at the clerks who entered the service of the House of Commons, he did not know that the system of test examinations in force had provided them with an inferior staff to those of other Departments in which competitive examination had been adopted. He had seen a great deal of the clerks of the House of Commons, and he thought they were men quite as capable of doing the work they had to perform as if they had been brought into the position by competitive examination. At the same time, he did not say that it was not a strong argument to urge that there should be competitive examination for those appointments; but he would point out that if any alteration were to be made, it would require consideration on the part of the Authorities of the House, and, of course, he was not prepared to enter into that question.

MR. SEXTON said, in looking at that Vote for the House of Commons Officers, there was one matter connected with it on which hon. Members could all agree, and that was the uniform urbanity of the Serjeant-at-Arms and his assistants in everything relating to their convenience. With regard to the question of the examination of clerks on their appointment to the service of the House, he had listened with interest to the discussion which had taken place, and he was bound to say that he thought both the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) and the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had done a public service in calling attention to that subject. Most Members of the House would agree with what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury as to the general efficiency of the staff of Clerks of the House. His own experience was that they were both courteous and efficient. But that was beside the question; and although hon. Members might agree that the present clerks were fit to hold their office, it did not by any means follow that the system under which they were appointed was one which ought to be continued. Now, what were the arguments in support of the present system? The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, in justifying appointments by the Clerk of the House, had fallen back on a Statute of George III. But that Monarch ascended the Throne 135 years ago, and the Committee would know very well that a great many things happened in the Reign of George III. which no one would attempt to justify at the present day. Why should the Clerk of the House have this patronage? [MR. HIBBERT: I have not defended the system.] He was glad to have that declaration from the hon. Gentleman. He asked why the Clerk of the House should have this patronage? Why should the Business of the most important Assembly in the country—the Business of the Departments of the House of Commons—be discharged by men appointed under a system which went back further than the days when, in the language of Lord Macaulay, votes were bought and sold in Smithfield? Why should the ghastly corruption of the 18th century have a place in the 19th? He maintained that if it were necessary to carry out the system of competitive examination in respect of the appointments of officials in the various Departments of the Public Service, it was equally necessary that there should be competitive examination in the case of appointments to the Departments of the House of Commons. With regard to what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on the subject of the want of proper accommodation for Members of the House, he would point out to the Committee that one of the officials of the House of Lords had the use of six rooms. His hon. Friend had made the very moderate proposal that tables and chairs, with the necessary writing materials, should be placed in the Central Lobby, so that Members of the House under pressure of their own business and of public affairs should be saved from having to resort to the grotesque expedient of endeavouring to sign letters upon their knees. If the Government were not prepared to provide Members with shorthand writers, on the ground that it might interfere with the Post Office arrangements to which his hon. Friend had alluded, he pointed out that it would only be necessary for the officials of the Government to go into the Library and open and read the letters before they were posted. He would be glad to know whether the Chairman of Ways and Means was an official subject or not to any other official of the House—whether he was subject to the Rules laid down by the House with reference to such occasions when disorder arose in the House; when Report was made to the House, and when Report had to be made with regard to certain proceedings in Committee relating to hon. Members and otherwise? He believed he was correct in stating that the Chairman of Ways and Means was subject to no other authority than the Rules laid down by the Members of the House.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he had been rather astonished by the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury. The hon. Gentleman accused him of being a reformer; but he might describe the hon. Gentleman as an old retrogressive Tory, because his arguments were always made use of as reasons against reforms in the Public Service. The hon. Gentleman had made a statement in the course of his speech to which he could assent—namely, that the Clerks of the House were an admirable set of men. He quite agreed with that view; but the clerks at the Admiralty and in other Departments of the State were also an admirable class of men, and therefore the statement of the hon. Gentleman was no argument in favour of appointments to clerkships in the House of Commons being made without competitive examination. He might call attention to the argument in reference to the abolition of purchase in the Army, when it was said that the officers of the Army were so good that no change was necessary. But he wished to have an answer on the question of appointments from some

Mr. Sexton

Members of the Government—some of those reformers who with magnificent perorations wound up speech after speech on the subject of competitive examination. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) could perorate on the subject of competitive examination in the Public Service, why could he not perorate on this subject relating to the clerks of the House of Commons? He thought the Committee were entitled to some further reply on the question that had been raised.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that, undoubtedly, the arguments of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) were unanswerable. There was no reason whatever that the great principles of competition which had succeeded so admirably in the Civil Service and in the Army and Navy should not be applied to that House. The present state of things was an admitted anomaly. It existed because it was under cover of a Statute. There was no doubt that the general standard of public morality with regard to appointments in the different Services had been enormously elevated by means of the system of competition which the hon. Member had so eloquently described. The appointments in that House however, were admirably managed; and the reason of it was that they were in the hands of a gentleman who discharged his functions with public spirit enlightened by very great ability. The system was none the less anomalous; and he was quite certain that the legislative measure for which they were all sighing, and by which the Statute would be altered, would receive the most thorough and the most respectful consideration of the Government.

MR. ONSLOW said, he was sorry to disagree with his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), and he was glad to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). There was no one in the House who knew more about competitive examinations than the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Onslow) was one of those who doubted whether the Public Services in England or abroad had been benefited by competitive examinations. In his opinion they had just as good men formerly as now. Certainly an exception ought to be made in the case of the House of Commons. The gentlemen who discharged the duties of clerks in the House should essentially be gentlemen; and he (Mr. Onslow) trusted implicitly in the gentleman who now made the appointments. He defied anyone to get, no matter what the system adopted was, a better class of men than they had at the present time. Considering that everything had worked well, and that no complaints whatever had been made about the clerks, he hoped his hon. Friend would not pursue his course. He (Mr. Onslow) was very glad to hear that the son of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) had recently received an appointment as Clerk in the House of Commons, and he thought that his views would be shared by every Member in the House. Whatever political views the gentleman who now made the appointments might hold, there was no one in the House who could accuse him of jobbery. Why not let things remain as they were now? They could not be improved; and better men could not be obtained. He hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that as a matter of fact there was no Motion before the Committee, and there would be no division. He should certainly, however, bring the subject forward on another occasion.

MR. HEALY suggested that the hon. Gentleman (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) should bring in a Bill on the subject, in order to see with what energy the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hibbert) and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) would address themselves to legislation on the matter. He (Mr. Healy) did not rise, however, to pursue this subject, but for the purpose of directing the attention of the Committee to quite a different matter. In the month of last July, when this Vote was proposed, he raised the question of the propriety of having a Select Committee of experienced Members to assist the Clerks at the Table in the revision of Questions, and in the assistance they gave to Mr. Speaker on points of Order. On the occasion to which he referred he drew attention to the enormous labours thrown upon the clerks, and to the fact that when a Speaker or Chairman of Committee was new to his duties, which, of course, was not the case with the hon. Gentleman (Sir Arthur Otway), it must necessarily happen that, to a great extent, the gentlemen who were in charge of the House, and who controlled all its functions, must be the officers at the Table. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), in replying to him (Mr. Healy), said that the matter was one which was open to consideration, though it was not likely the House would be inclined to change its long-standing practice. Now, it appeared to him (Mr. Healy) rather a hard thing that the hon. Gentleman (Sir Arthur Otway) should have the power of summarily silencing Representatives of the people without there being any appeal. Whatever confidence was placed in the officers of the House, he could not help thinking it was advisable to have an influential, and impartial, and independent tribunal, drawn by lot or nomination from the general body of Members, in the same way as the Committee of Selection was drawn, to whom questions might be referred, and to whom Members would have a right of appeal. He could not but believe that, if such were the case, the rulings of the Chair would be received with much more satisfaction than they were at the present time. For instance, a Speaker, in a moment of pique, might rule an hon. Member to be out of Order, or a Speaker might misunderstand an hon. Member, and rule him out of Order. It was only the other day that he was ruled out of Order for referring to the Orange Party in Ireland as the "toothless Orange Party." The Speaker thought he said "truthless;" but that was altogether a mistake. Again, the word "snobs," which was used the other day, was ruled out of Order. Of course, those were only trivial instances of the inconvenience which arose under the present system; but when it came to be a matter of a Member losing his liberty of action in the House for an entire week—when he was excluded, not only from participation in the debates in the House, but from voting, and from attendance on Select Committees—it was very necessary that there should be a tribunal to whom questions of that kind might be referred. It could not be denied that the Clerks at the Table could exercise, if they were so pleased, almost uncontrolled power over the Speaker; because if the Speaker happened, as must be the case in a new Parliament, to be newly-elected, he was obliged, on nearly every question, to refer to the clerks for guidance. No one had more reason to be thankful to the Clerks at the Table than he (Mr. Healy) had, because he supposed he troubled them as often as anyone else, and he had never failed to receive illumination from them; he had generally found that he was wrong, and that they were right, upon matters on which he had had occasion to confer with them. They were gentlemen of many years experience in the House, and no one could pretend to have the same amount of knowledge of the Forms of the House as they; but he objected to any gentleman, no matter how great his experience, having the right to give, without revision, an opinion on which the Chair might act, and with regard to which hon. Members had no power of appeal. He really did think that if Gentlemen like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), or the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), or Gentlemen who had filled official positions in the House, would undertake the duties, so to speak, of a Court of Appeal, very great good would result. If hon. Members could refer to the Gentlemen he had mentioned for direction, if questions could be submitted to them for revision, if matters occurring one day could be adjudged upon the next day by such Gentlemen—not in hot blood, but in a cool and collected manner—if, when the Speaker, for instance, had ruled an hon. Member out of Order, or a particular expression to be out of Order, or had suspended an hon. Member for a week or a fortnight, or for the whole Session, an appeal could be made to an impartial and independent tribunal, it would be very satisfactory. An hon. Member who had incurred the censure of the Chair would feel much more satisfied if he knew that the ruling of the Speaker had been reinforced by the decision of an independent tribunal. Parliament would be much more democratic in the future than it was at present—at least, it was supposed that it would so become. Members of less experience would enter it, and there would probably be more friction between the democracy and the Chair than there was at present, and in that event it was very necessary that what he suggested should be adopted. There was one matter in particular in which the Clerks at the Table necessarily exercised an almost complete control. It was quite impossible that the Speaker could revise 50 or 60 Questions; and, therefore, the duty devolved upon the Clerks at the Table. If an hon. Gentleman asked a Question on foreign policy which was inconvenient to the Government, and it was stopped at the Table, it would be much more satisfactory to the Questioner if he could refer the matter to a Committee of Gentlemen on whom the House generally could place reliance. The hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would feel greatly relieved, if Questions of theirs were stopped, if they knew that an independent tribunal, altogether apart from the Clerks at the Table, had sat and pronounced upon the propriety of the Questions. He did not intend to take up the time of the Committee any longer. He had laid his views before the Committee on a previous occasion, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) was good enough to say that, although they were not very feasible, they ought not to be entirely excluded from the scope of consideration. In view of what was happening, and in view of the fact that the Speaker in the new Parliament must necessarily be inexperienced, it was not right that Representatives of the people, who had been elected because, in the opinion of their constituents, of their fitness, should be expelled like unruly children from the Chamber simply, perhaps, upon the irate feeling of the Speaker. Of course, they knew that the present Speaker never lost his temper, and his remarks in no sense applied to that right hon. Gentleman. As to the Chairman (Sir Arthur Otway), he (Mr. Healy) must frankly acknowledge that on all occasions the right hon. Gentleman exercised the greatest consideration and courtesy towards all Members of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the hon. Member had made his suggestion with great moderation. He could find no fault with the hon. Member for bringing forward this question, or with the manner in which he had brought it forward. He must say, however, that at the first blush it appeared to him that the suggestion was one which could not be entertained by the House. The hon. Member had said that they looked forward to a more democratic Parliament in the future, and that other Regulations than those which at present obtained would have to be made. Well, that might be the case; but he thought that it was very undesirable for the House of Commons to look forward to what might be necessary in the future. What they had to deal with was the House of Commons that existed now; and it appeared to him that the powers which were intrusted to the Speaker and to the Chairman of Committees were adequate for the proper discharge of the duties of those Gentlemen, and adequate—but not more than adequate—for the preservation and maintenance of Order in debate. The hon. Member had suggested that the Clerks at the Table and the Speaker should be assisted by a Committee in the duty of revising Questions which were placed on the Paper. The hon. Member brought forward that subject last year, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers) gave, what appeared to him (the Marquess of Hartington), an extremely reasonable answer—namely, that the hon. Member himself and other hon. Members, who were a good deal in the habit of putting Questions to Ministers, would be the first to object to any such change of procedure if their Questions had to wait very long for revision—to wait, it might be, until all interest in them was lost. The hon. Member had carried his suggestion a good deal further, for he had said there should be a Court of Appeal, consisting of a number of experienced Members of the House, and that that Court of Appeal should have the power of revising the decisions of the Speaker and of the Chairman of Committees. Now, that was certainly a suggestion to which he (the Marquess of Hartington) could not give any concurrence whatever. It appeared to him that the powers which were intrusted to the Speaker and the Chairman of Committees were powers necessarily of a somewhat autocratic character—powers which were absolutely necessary for the preservation of the decency and order of debate in the House. If the functions of such a Committee as were anything but nominal, the exercise of such functions would, in his (the Marquess of Hartington's) opinion, be destructive of the authority of the Chair. How could a Speaker maintain any effective authority over the administration of the House, and expect to have his decisions respected, if his decisions were subject to appeal; and if in the course of a few days a Committee of experts, such as had been suggested, were to overrule the decision which the Speaker had given? It seemed to him (the Marquess of Hartington) that all they could do was to elect that Member from amongst themselves, in whose fairness, and impartiality, and knowledge of the Rules of their procedure, the House had confidence; and, having so elected that Member from amongst themselves, to place great powers in his hands and implicit confidence in his authority. For those reasons it was quite impossible for him to give any support to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

MR. GREGORY said, that the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) struck directly at the authority of the Chair. It was quite impossible, in the interest of proper debate, that the decisions of the Speaker or of the Chairman of Committees should be subject to appeal. The House selected its Speaker and its Chairman because of their authority in the House, and because they were learned in its traditions and its business; and they reposed in those Gentlemen the most absolute confidence. If it was shown that that confidence was not justified by anything in the rulings from the Chair, it was quite clear that the decisions of the Chair would not be of long standing. The adoption of the hon. and learned Member's suggestion would be destructive of all authority in the House.

MR. HEALY said, that perhaps the Committee would allow him to say a few words for the purpose of correcting, to some extent, the remarks the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had made. The noble Marquess had entirely addressed himself to this subject from the point of view of maintaining the authority of the Chair. He would ask the noble Marquess, was there no other authority in the House to maintain?

Were the rights of the Representatives of the people not to be maintained? It was all very well to talk about the authority of the Chair. Nobody objected more strongly than the English people to the Infallibility of the Pope. The English people railed at Roman Catholics in the most extraordinary manner because they subscribed to the Pope's supreme authority upon Divine and religious matters; but here they were dealing with human affairs, upon which every person could form a judgment of their own, and with regard to which hon. Members met in the House all together upon an independent and equal basis. He asked the noble Marquess if it were not possible for them to have a hasty or angry Speaker; and was it to be tolerated that the rights of 600 Members of Parliament, elected by the people to carry out their will, should be entirely at the mercy of one man, without appeal? He thought it was very desirable that the Speaker and Chairman of Committees should have the right of revising their own decisions, and that right the present Rules did not give. If the Chairman of Committees ruled him (Mr. Healy) to be out of Order, he was bound to respect the authority of the Chair, because he had no means of questioning the decision; but if he had the means of arguing the point, without meaning any disrespect or discourtesy to the Chairman, he might be able to prove that the hon. Gentleman was in the wrong. It might happen that once in 10 times he (Mr. Healy) might be right, and the Chairman wrong; and, therefore, his point was this—that granted the Chairman might once out of 10 times be wrong, and he (Mr. Healy) right, the Chairman should have the right and power to revise his decision. At present, if the Speaker or the Chairman, acting upon the suggestion of one of the Clerks at the Table, said that he (Mr. Healy) was out of Order, or that an expression he used was out of Order, the Speaker or Chairman had no power to revise the decision. The decision appeared upon the pages of Hansard, and it became for all time a cast-iron decision. All he wanted was, that the Speaker or Chairman, as the case might be, should have power to revise his decision, if necessary, with the assistance of experts, so that if it should happen that an hon. Member, who had been ruled out of Order, was able, by letter or other private communication, to show the Speaker or Chairman of Committees that he had mistaken the argument addressed to him, and that the Speaker or Chairman was entirely in error, it should be within the power of the Chair to remedy his error. At present a Member, whose vote on a question of peace or war might turn the scale, could be suspended for a whole week, at the instigation of the Speaker; and it might so happen that during that week a most momentous decision was arrived at. As a matter of fact, the position of the Speaker in the House of Commons was more infallible than the Pope's position in the Catholic Church. The Pope was provided with a Council, but the Speaker of the House of Commons was provided with nothing of the kind. It would be to the advantage of debate, and it would not in the least detract or derogate from the position of Speaker or Chairman of Committees, if those Gentlemen had some authority to guide them, independently of the Clerks at the Table. As he had said before, they had all very great respect for the gentlemen at the Table; but it was quite evident that those gentlemen were bound to impart into all their rulings something of what he might call a professional spirit. They very naturally desired to see the work of the Government done, and they did their best to facilitate the work of the House. A Committee of independent Members of the House, drawn from both Parties, would, he believe, take an independent and impartial view; and it was under these circumstances that he appealed to the noble Marquess not to be led away with the idea that there was nothing in the House to be preserved but the authority of the Chair. At present, when the political temperature was at a great heat, as it might be, for instance, if war were declared tomorrow, there would be no power standing between the rights of minorities and the position of the Chair. He maintained it was very desirable that there should be some Court of Appeal, so that if wrong had been done hon. Members should feel that there was an authority which should set matters right.

Mr. SEXTON said, he noticed that the Clerk of the House was provided he was sure that there was scarcely an industrious Member of the House who had not had occasion to go to him, and had not received from him the greatest assistance. That gentleman was a very quiet, unobtrusive person, limited to the maximum salary of £300 a-year. That maximum had been reached, and that gentleman had been standing at it now for some time. He was not likely to apply for an increase himself, and he (Mr. A. O'Connor) had not heard from him or from anyone else that he was dissatisfied. However, the fact remained the same that that official was not paid a fair remuneration for the quality of the service he performed. He knew so little about that gentleman that he was not even acquainted with his name; but if no one else would do so, at any rate he (Mr. A. O'Connor) would not neglect the opportunity of saying a word for him. He would ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether that gentleman could not be allowed something more handsome than £300 a-year?

MR. HIBBERT said, that before he replied to the hon. Gentleman, he wished to say that, with respect to the attendants in the Office of the Chairman of Ways and Means, they were not really the hon. Gentleman's attendants at all; they were merely attendants in the Private Bill Office.

COLONEL NOLAN: Why are they connected with the Office of the Chairman of Ways and Means?

MR. HIBBERT: Because the Private Bill Committees come under his Department. The messengers are not in attendance upon the Chairman of Ways and Means, however. With regard to the gentleman referred to by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), I have to say that the Government have no power over these salaries in the House of Commons. These salaries are fixed by Commissioners. There are certain Commissioners who have the management of these matters.

MR. HEALY: Who are they?

MR. HIBBERT: They are certain Members, four or five in number.

MR. HEALY: Members of the House?

MR. HIBBERT: I do not know; but I can say that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer belong to the Commission. There are four or five who fix the salaries of the officers. With regard to the matters I have referred to, and also in regard to the Clerks at the Table, the whole question of salaries should be raised before the Commissioners who have the management of the matter. It is not a matter for the Government, though I should be glad to consider any point which the hon. Member may submit to me, and communicate it to the Government.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he made it an invariable rule never to have any communication with a Member of the Government except across the floor of the House; therefore, he did not feel disposed to consult either of the high functionaries to whom the hon. Gentleman had referred. If the hon. Gentleman would mention to them what had passed, however, he should be glad.

MR. HIBBERT: I shall take care to do so.

MR. SEXTON said, he had not yet had an answer to his question with regard to the residence of those clerks who at present had to go home after the House rose. If the hon. Gentleman opposite would put the First Commissioner of Works in motion, it would be well for him to consider whether there could not be a more convenient disposal of the spare space in the Parliament building, particular in connection with the House of Lords, than at present adopted.

MR. HIBBERT said, he should be glad to bring that matter before the notice of the Chief Commissioner of Works.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to Mr. Speaker's counsel. He (Mr. Biggar) did not know who he was or what his duties were, but he should like to know what value they got for their money?

MR. HIBBERT said, he believed the duties of counsel to the Speaker were very important duties. That gentleman had to be consulted on very important points, and it was quite open to any Member of the House who presided at a Private Bill Committee, or who had to do with any other Committee, if a question of law arose, to consult the counsel. It was really a very great advantage to be able to consult a legal authority in that way. He (Mr. Hibbert) himself had experienced the advantage of having that legal authority to appeal to in would know the people to whom he was referring, because the hon. Gentleman had one himself. They were people engaged to attend on the rooms of the officers of the House; and he (Colonel Nolan) was pointing out that those were individuals with whom the Irish Members had nothing to do, for the reason that no rooms were allowed to the Irish Members. He did not say the Irish Members objected to having no office-keepers—what they objected to was that they had no offices for office-keepers to attend to. If he got some explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury as to the Vote this subject would more properly come under, he would defer his observations and move the reduction in its proper place. He wished to know who was responsible for the allotting of rooms in the House? Was the Secretary to the Treasury?

MR. HIBBERT: No.

COLONEL NOLAN: Then is the Speaker?

MR. HIBBERT: Yes; the Speaker, with the First Commissioner of Works.

COLONEL NOLAN: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you would rule that I am in Order in speaking on the allotment of rooms?

THE CHAIRMAN: The fact that the hon. and gallant Member would make his observations on the question of the allotment of rooms does not alter the case in the least. If the hon. and gallant Member wishes to go into that question it must be on the Building Vote. The Question before the Committee is the salaries of the officials of the House of Commons, and has nothing whatever to do with the allotment of rooms.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that if the did; however, he would bring that matter up on the next Vote. He would remind hon. Members of the case of Mr. Burgess in the late Parliament. Mr. Burgess was in the interest of the Government, and his assistant in the interest of the Opposition; and those gentlemen were thoroughly impartial, because when the Government went out Mr. Burgess did not go out with it, but went over to the new Government, whilst his assistant went over to the new Opposition. The Government had had a great deal of experience of the controversy on this matter of rooms, and he (Colonel Nolan) intended to work it out to the best of his ability. What he wanted to know was whether the messengers of the House had any connection with the great political Parties? [MR. HIBBERT: I have said no.] Then he would ask the same question on the next Vote. He considered it very hard that the Chairman and several other officials should have attendance in their offices, and should have 20 or 30 offices for their convenience in that building, while Irish Members, who were so far from their own homes, and who came here against their own wishes, should be accorded none of those facilities.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR must say he had been contemplating the aspect of the Committee for some time with a considerable amount of amusement. That Committee, without a single word being spoken in reply to the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the Motion, had voted £11,000,000 to the Government earlier in the afternoon; but since then they had been, for he did not know how many hours, occupied over the de-

he was sure that there was scarcely an industrious Member of the House who had not had occasion to go to him, and had not received from him the greatest assistance. That gentleman was a very quiet, unobtrusive person, limited to the maximum salary of £300 a-year. That maximum had been reached, and that gentleman had been standing at it now for some time. MR. HIBBERT: Because the Private Bill Committees come under his Department. The messengers are not in attendance upon the Chairman of Ways and Means, however. With regard to the gentleman referred to by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), I have to say that the Government have no power over these salaries in the House of Commons. MR. HIBBERT: I shall take care to do so.

MR. SEXTON said, he had not yet had an answer to his question with regard to the residence of those clerks who at present had to go home after the House rose. If the hon. Gentleman opposite would put the First Commissioner of Works in motion, it would be well for him to consider whether there could not be a more convenient disposal of the spare space in the Parliament building, particular in connection with the House of Lords, than at present adopted.

MR. HIBBERT said, he should be glad to bring that matter before the notice of the Chief Commissioner of Works.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to put a question to the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to Mr. Speaker's counsel. He (Mr. Biggar) did not know who he was or what his duties were, but he should like to know what value they got for their money?

MR. HIBBERT said, he believed the duties of counsel to the Speaker were very important duties. That gentleman had to be consulted on very important points, and it was quite open to any Member of the House who presided at a Private Bill Committee, or who had to do with any other Committee, if a question of law arose, to consult the counsel. It was really a very great advantage to be able to consult a legal authority in that way. He (Mr. Hibbert) himself had experienced the advantage of having that legal authority to appeal to in the House. When acting once as Chairman of Committees, he had found it in the highest degree advantageous to be able to get a legal opinion from Mr. Speaker's counsel.

MR. MOLLOY wished to know where Mr. Speaker's counsel was to be found? Was he a gentleman in attendance on that House during the sittings of Committees, or was he a gentleman who only sat in his chambers to give advice?

MR. HIBBERT said, that Mr. Speaker's counsel was in his office in the House every day.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, Mr. Speaker's counsel had supervision over all the Private Business in the House.

MR. MOLLOY said, he found eight messengers down in this Vote, and he should like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it was possible for two of them to be placed at the disposal of hon. Members for the purpose of bringing in books of reference from the Library during the course of debates? Everyone in the habit of speaking in the House must have noticed that in the course of an evening he found himself in need of books from the Library, and that it was sometimes impossible, when one was speaking, to find a Member near him who could be got to take the trouble to proceed to the Library for the purpose of bringing him a book of reference of which he might be in need. He thought it only reasonable that one or two, and, if possible, several more messengers should be in attendance upon the House in order to wait upon Members in that respect. He had frequently seen on the Ministerial Bench even, Members of the Government obliged to run out to the Library for books of reference for their Colleagues who were speaking. Members of the Government generally had the references beforehand; but in the case of private Members it very often happened that they had not. Although he (Mr. Molloy) was not a very frequent speaker, the inconvenience to which he was pointing had happened to himself. He had happened to require a quotation from a speech to which he had been referring, and there had been no one near him whom he cared to ask to go and bring him the reference from the Library. A private Member, therefore, was thrown entirely on his own resources, and he therefore asked that that favour should be shown to him in future.

MR. HIBBERT said, that so far as his experience went he had never found that Members of the Government or any one else, when they wanted books of reference, were unable to get them. Personally, whenever he had been in want of a book of reference, he had always gone into the Library to fetch it. That, he thought, was the best course to adopt.

MR. MOLLOY said, the course pointed out by the hon. Member was easy enough to follow on some occasions; but he would venture to point out that when a Member was on his legs making a speech, to leave the House suddenly in search of a book of reference would be to bring that speech to an abrupt termination, and when that hon. Member made his appearance again with his book of reference, he would find someone else addressing the Chair. He would, in all seriousness, say to the hon. Gentleman that hon. Members were entitled to the privilege for which he was pleading. He was present in the American Assembly not very long ago, during the course of a debate, and he had there found a large number of messengers going in and out the House attending upon Members. In that Assembly if a Member wanted anything, he had nothing to do but to put up his finger and beckon a messenger, who would at once wait upon him and carry out the mission intrusted to him. If the Member wanted a book it was immediately brought. In fact, he (Mr. Molloy) believed that in every Assembly in the world, except that of Great Britain, those messengers were always in attendance. He did not see why, seeing that the Government were so lavish in their expenditure on employés in that House, that it was too much to ask the Secretary to the Treasury to endeavour to bring about the appointment of two or three messengers for the purpose he had described. The plan he proposed might be adopted to the end of the Session, and then, if it were found that those messengers were not of much use, some other work could be given to them in the coming Session; but, at any rate, the Government ought to try the experiment. There were messengers in the Reporters' Gallery who communicated between the House and the Gallery; but the convenience of Members was very little attended to. If a Member was in the Smoking Room and wanted to know what was going on in the House—if he wanted to know whether the Speaker was in the Chair, or what Bill was under discussion, or when the House was going into Committee, there was nobody to send to make inquiries, but he was obliged to leave his work and do the little mission himself. That was extremely inconvenient when a Member was perhaps going through a very heavy correspondence, or preparing himself for a debate which was coming on. As an illustration of the inconvenience to which he referred, he would mention that the other day two Motions in the names of hon. Friends of his were called on, and neither hon. Member was in his place. Because those Gentlemen were not kept acquainted with the condition of Business in the House they were not present to take charge of their Motions, and, consequently, he (Mr. Molloy) had had to go through the form, which was scarcely proper, of moving one of the Motions, and he had omitted a word here and there from the Resolution in order that it might not appear to be the same as that of his hon. Friend, and he had had to keep the House detained on a subject he knew very little about for 10 minutes, until he could get a Member near him to carry a message to his hon. Friend telling him that the question had come on. That was certainly an undignified method of managing those affairs, and yet hon. Members were obliged to adopt it. They did not like to see Members who had prepared speeches on the subject of Motions they had on the Paper, unable to bring them on because they did not happen to be in the House at the moment they were reached, and there was no one to keep them informed as to the precise condition of Business. He therefore urged that the messengers to whom he referred should be appointed to tell them what was going on from time to time. There was nearly three months more of the Session, and he was sure it would not make much difference to the Government financially if they adopted the plan he suggested as an experiment for that period.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, there was one thing he should like to point out to the hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Molloy). He had referred to the case of America, with which he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) was not familiar; but he was acquainted with the practice in what was euphoneously termed "another place." There the messengers were allowed to go into the House, but that practice was not allowed in the House of Commons. Unless there were to be an entire change of the Rules of the House he did not see how the hon. Member's proposal could be carried out, for the Rule at present was that no one who was not a Member of the House could pass the Bar. Under the circumstances he did not see how they could expect a messenger, who had not the right to pass the Bar, to bring books on to the floor of the House.

MR. MOLLOY said, no doubt, as the right hon. Member (Mr. R. N. Fowler) remarked, there was a stupid tradition in existence which said that nobody should pass the Bar of the House but a Member, but, if it were necessary, that Rule could be done away with. If it were done away with, he did not believe the sanctity of the Chamber would very seriously suffer. If he (Mr. Molloy) were not mistaken, the right hon. Member himself had found himself in the difficulty which had been pointed out. On one occasion he believed the right hon. Member had had to find someone to bring him a book, and, unless his memory deceived him, he believed that he (Mr. Molloy) himself had performed the mission.

MR. HIBBERT said that he would see that the matter was brought before the Commissioners, together with the other questions that had been raised, although he could not hold out much hope that any change would be made this year. Probably when they had a new Parliament many advantageous alterations in the usages and practice of the House would be brought about.

MR. PULESTON said, that with regard to the question raised by the hon. Member (Mr. Molloy), he could not go so far as to support the suggestion that they should employ runners to go between the House and the Libraries or the Smoking Room. Still he believed hon. Members suffered considerable inconvenience, particularly those who were in regular attendance in the House and who had work to do, through there being no means of communication between the House and the ante rooms, by which information could be carried to Members outside with regard to what was going on inside the House. A Member might be interested in a Motion which stood No. 20 or 30 or 40 on the Order Book, and, in the absence of such communication as that he was suggesting, that hon. Member had to spend a good deal of his time running between the Library or the Smoking Room, in which he might be occupied, to the House in order to keep himself informed as to what was going on, and as to the likelihood of the measure in which he was interested being reached. That was a great tax upon the patience of an hon. Member who, no doubt, would feel that his time might be much better spent. He (Mr. Puleston) would make this suggestion, that the existing inconveniences and difficulties should be got over by setting up a communication between the House and the various rooms round it, by telephone or by dial. A dial, if that plan were adopted, might be so arranged as to show what Order of the Day was being considered by the House at the time. He knew that the answer to that suggestion would be that grave mistakes might occasionally occur, and that the wrong Orders might be notified through the carelessness of those who had the care of the apparatus. Well, that inconvenience was, after all, an artificial one, and it must be taken for what it was worth. If a Member wished to keep his position quite secure, he would take measures to make it perfectly certain that he would be in the House at the time the Order in which he was interested came on; he would not trust entirely to the dial. However, he thought such an arrangement as that he proposed would conduce greatly to the convenience of hon. Members, and that the Government would experience very little difficulty in carrying it out.

MR. BIGGAR said, the item of £400 for the salary of the Chaplain was open to some comment. He was of opinion that a Chaplain for the House of Commons was not necessary. The invariable custom was that the Members of the Privy Council and the Members of the Government never attended the ministrations of the Chaplain, although he thought they stood in need of them no less than the other Members of the House of Commons. He thought the time had come when they might do away with the office of Chaplain, on account of which a very substantial sum had been annually paid; and, therefore, he was not disposed to vote for that item in the Estimates.

Vote agreed to.

MR. SEXTON said, there were some questions connected with this Vote which deserved explanation. In the first place, he would refer to the appointments to the office of Postmasters and Sub-Postmasters in Ireland, concerning which he might say that there was an obstinate belief surviving in the minds of some people that the nominations to those posts rested with Members for counties. He himself had had several applications from persons desiring to be nominated. He asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, what was the practice of that Department with regard to the filling up of the office of Postmaster? The office was a small one, but it must be remembered that Postmasters had to discharge duties of considerable public importance. He had known cases in which persons recommended by the most influential men in their district—the clergy and others—had been rejected by the Treasury, while other persons recommended in the dark had received the appointments sought. The way in which those appointments were made had given rise to considerable dissatisfaction in his own county (Sligo). He asked the hon. Gentleman whether the Treasury would be willing to receive and pay attention to such recommendations to the office of Postmasters in Ireland as he had referred to, and whether, if they were unwilling to receive them, he would state on what grounds? He knew a case in which a candidate was very strongly recommended, and whose qualifications and character were suitable for the office; but, notwithstanding that, another person had been preferred, whom he believed was recommended by two Members of that House. Therefore, he said it was desirable to know what sort of influence the Treasury recognized in filling up those offices, and whether there was or not any influence vested in Members of the House with regard to the appointments in question. Then there was another question connected with the Vote, to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee. He observed that lately the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, in replying to the representations of Members from the West of Ireland, had stated that his desire to improve the Mail Service in Ireland was fettered by the curtailment of his discretion by the Treasury. He wished to know to what extent that Department curtailed or limited the discretion of the Postmaster General in respect of the public Mail Service? The matter was one of great importance to the people of Ireland, and it was consequently one in which Members on those Benches took a strong interest. He had mentioned a case in which the right hon. Gentleman stated that his desire was to meet the wishes of those hon. Members, but that the Department of the Treasury placed an obstacle in the way of the exercise of his discretion; and, therefore, he asked the hon. Gentleman whether the Treasury determined that the Postmaster General should spend no more than a specified sum, and whether they were now willing to consider the general convenience of the districts? His reason for putting that question was because the Postmaster General hesitated to improve the Mail Service between Dublin and the West of Ireland, on the ground that it would cost £3,000 a-year more than was now being paid. The next point to which he would call attention had reference to the Circular recently issued by the Treasury on the subject of the expenses of witnesses at the Assizes. Until the date of the issue of that Circular, the Judge of Assize had it in his power by law to fix the amount of the allowance for expenses of witnesses at the Assizes, and did so fix it, the counties paying the expense in the first place, and the Treasury recouping them. Now, by the recent Circular, the Treasury fixed a scale of expenses, and gave it to be understood that when the Judge of Assize decided to give expenses above the scale, the Treasury would only pay according to the scale, and that the loss represented by the difference between the scale and the actual expenses ordered to be paid by the Judge would have to be borne by the counties. He understood that the pressure of legislation lately had been against throwing Imperial charges on local rates. If there was one charge more than another that was distinctly Imperial, it was the charge for sustaining justice. He was at a loss to understand by what right the Treasury presumed to issue a Circular limiting the discretion which the law gave to the Judges of Assize. The Treasury said—"You may fix the amount of expenses, but if you fix it above the amount set forth in this Circular, the counties will have to pay." The result was obvious; the counties, being helpless in the matter, had to pay the money. He contended that there was no reason why the Treasury should intervene, and by an official Minute break down the powers of the Judges of Assize in this matter, and that so long as the Judges retained their powers in law, those powers should be respected, and the counties not fined save by order of a Judge. That action on the part of the Treasury was so unwarranted that he should be disposed to ask the Committee to resist the Vote until some explanation was forthcoming. Again, he should like to obtain some information with regard to what he might call the growing mystery of the management of the Department of Fishery Piers and Harbours in Ireland, and he had lately put several Questions in the House with that object. The year before last, £250,000 was granted for the purpose of developing fishery piers and harbours in Ireland, and a Commission was appointed, of which the hon. Member for Galway was at present Chairman. From Questions lately put in the House, it would appear that a deadlock had been reached as between the Treasury, the Board of Works, Ireland, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the Fisheries and Harbours Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman was raising on this Vote a question which should be raised upon another Vote.

MR. SEXTON said, he raised the question on the present Vote because all Questions relating to piers and harbours in Ireland were answered in the House by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the reason of the hon. Gentleman would apply when the proper Vote was reached, but it did not apply in the present case. If the hon. Gentleman raised the question on the Vote for the Board of Works, Ireland, and also on the Treasury Vote, he raised it twice. He thought, therefore, that if the hon. Gentleman wished to discuss the subject of piers and harbours, it should be on occasions when a Vote was proposed for them.

MR. SEXTON said, there was no Vote for them. On a former Vote, it had been pointed out that the Treasury Vote was the Vote on which to discuss the question of piers and harbours. He asked if he was not now entitled to address the Secretary to the Treasury on that subject?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the question would properly arise on the Vote for the Board of Works, Ireland.

MR. SEXTON asked, if he was to understand that a letter directed by the Treasury to a Public Department could not be discussed in Committee of Supply?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he adjudged the question put by the hon. Gentleman according to the items in the Vote. There was no allusion in the Vote to piers and harbours.

MR. SEXTON asked whether, on the assumption that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury answered Questions that were every day put to him in the House with regard to the salaries of officials, as the responsible Representative of the Treasury, it was not competent to him to raise this question?

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the reasoning of the hon. Gentlemen were carried out, every Question might be addressed to the Treasury.

MR. SEXTON said, he had always understood that when the salary of an official came before the House, his duties were a proper subject for discussion.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to say a few words on one of the subjects brought before the Committee by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). His hon. Friend had alluded to the manner in which the offices of Postmaster and Sub-Postmaster in Ireland were filled up. Now, he thought it would be a far better and simpler plan if the Government were to say at once that Irish Members should have nothing whatever to do with those small Post Office appointments in Ireland, instead of continuing the present system of giving them the appearance of having some influence with regard to them without the least reality. He pointed out that there were Members who objected on principle to writing to the Postmaster General on the subject of those appointments, and he thought it would be better for the Government to make it known that they would not allow any Irish Member to touch them, and that they wiped out the influence Irish Members were supposed to have with regard to them altogether. He had himself written to the Postmaster General eight or ten times, and the invariable reply was that the subject of his communication had been carefully considered, but that the matter rested with the Secretary to the Treasury, and that application should be made to him. So far as Irish Members were personally concerned, it did not matter how the small Post Office appointments were filled up; and, therefore, he thought it would be well to adopt his suggestion, and then if any persons in the neighbourhood in which there was a vacancy wrote to the Postmaster General with the same result, it would be the Irish people who were shut out. He thought it should be clearly stated either that Irish Members had some voice in the disposal of the £8,000,000 contributed by Ireland to the Imperial Revenue, or that it should be boldly stated that as Irish Members they were entirely shut out from having any share in the administration of the country. He might say that previous Postmasters General had been extremely polite in dealing with this subject; they had smoothed the matter down; but the present Postmaster General, whom he saw in his place, made it pretty clearly understood that Irish Members had nothing to do with those appointments.

MR. HIBBERT said, with respect to the question as to the office of Postmaster and Sub-Postmaster, he did not agree with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that the patronage of those small appointments should lie with Members of the House. He agreed very much with the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) in the remarks he had made; but he went further, and not only said that, in his opinion, should the patronage not lie with Irish Members, but that no Member for England or Scotland should have it. In that way he thought that Members would get rid of much troublesome work. Even when Members obtained one of the appointments, if they gave satisfaction to one person, they caused dissatisfaction to others. For his own part, he should be glad if the patronage were transferred to the Postmaster General. With respect to the question of the expenses of witnesses at the Assizes, and the other question raised by the hon. Member for Sligo, they were scarcely within this Vote. It seemed to him that the question as to the power of the Treasury to cut down the amount of expenses in the case of prosecutions should be brought forward on the Vote for the administration of Law and Justice, and not upon a Vote for the payment of the salaries of officials of the Treasury. There was no doubt, however, that the Treasury had power to control prosecutions; they had always possessed that power, and he believed it was used in respect of prosecutions in England and Scotland, as well as in Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he should have been grateful for the answer he had received from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, were it not for the fact that he had received exactly the same answers some years ago. He thought the Committee ought to have the advantage of the presence of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury during the discussion; but as that noble Lord was not on the Treasury Bench, he thought he should be doing his duty by moving that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Colonel Nolan.)

MR. SEXTON pointed out that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had made use of two or three phrases implying that he acquiesced generally in the views expressed by hon. Gentlemen on those Benches; but he gave them no promise that any representation would be made on the subject of the appointments in question; nor did he tell them whether those small appointments were filled on the nomination of Members of Parliament.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he hoped the views expressed by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury would be adopted. He believed he was expressing the opinion of a number of hon. Members who were anxious to get rid of the trouble caused them in matters of this kind, when he said that those appointments should be made on the responsibility of the Postmaster General.

MR. O'SHEA said, he was glad that an hon. and gallant Member on that side of the House (Sir Alexander Gordon) had risen to speak on this subject. He hoped he should not be using too strong an expression in saying that it was positively indecent that the Patronage Secretary should not be present during that discussion. He believed there was no doubt that in view of the way in which patronage was at present administered in this country, it would be much more agreeable to all Members of Parliament that those appointments should rest with the Post Office Department itself. Under the present system there was no doubt that Members of Parliament were caused a great deal of trouble and annoyance. They were pestered with applications from persons seeking to obtain appointments. Whenever an office was vacant—and even before they were vacant—Members were troubled with letters asking them to exert their influence with the Treasury in favour of the appointment of such-and-such an individual. In his opinion it would be better that all Departments should make their own appointments; but instead of that they found that in this case the Treasury imposed its will on the Post Office. It was very often the case that the Treasury wrote to a Member of Parliament, asking him to nominate persons for appointments; but that was not a satisfactory mode of procedure, because, although the Member might nominate a person after taking the best advice he could get, it was impossible for him to know that the individual was fit for the appointment.

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped the Government would see their way to assent to the Motion to report Progress for two reasons. First, because he did not think they would make much further progress that night; and, secondly, because he had not received any answer to his question relating to the expenses of witnesses at the Assizes.

MR. HIBBERT: I said I did not think it was in Order.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought that time should be given to consider whether it was in Order to discuss the action of a Department on the Vote under which the salaries of that Department were paid.

MR. MOLLOY said, hon. Members on those Benches asked that Progress should be reported, because the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury had stated that he was unable to give any satisfactory answer to the question put by them. The Committee were surely entitled to have an answer with regard to the Post Office appointments, especially as the hon. Gentleman had said that he was in favour of the reforms asked for. He would suggest that the Patronage Secretary (Lord Richard Grosvenor) should be asked to reply to questions on the subject which the hon. Gentleman was unable to answer. The noble Lord was just outside the House, and he appealed to the Government to ask him to walk in.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. SEXTON said, that as the noble Lord the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Richard Grosvenor) had now been called into the House by the division, he would like to ask him a question about the appointment to Postmasterships in Ireland. Some people in Ireland appeared still to think, though it must be a delusion, that Members of Parliament had some influence in nominating candidates, or in getting the appointments filled up. He was not aware upon what foundation that impression rested; and he would like to ask the noble Lord whether Members of Parliament practically filled up those appointments; and, if so, was the privilege confined to those Members only who supported the Government? There had been considerable confusion and perplexity over the matter in Ireland, and in one case the candidate recommended by the parish clergy and by other people of influence had been passed over in favour of another candidate of whom nobody knew anything. It would be more convenient for Members and more conducive to the public interest if the supposed right of Members to nominate those officials were altogether put an end to. The Treasury or the Postmaster General, or whoever was most capable, should take the appointments into their own hands.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, the Post Office patronage was exercised to a certain extent by Members of Parliament who supported the Government; but, at the same time, he frequently had communications from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and from hon. Members who sat in the same quarter of the House as the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and he frequently attended to recommendations from them and from parish priests. Such recommendations were always duly considered. He thought it desirable to keep up this patronage. Any hon. Member who did not wish to exercise it need not do so, and could leave it alone; but there were others who did wish to exercise it, and it unquestionably brought them into closer contact with their constituents, and enabled them to confer favours of which there could not be the slightest abuse, inasmuch as all the nominations had to be submitted to the Postmaster General, who had the power to cancel them wherever he found the candidates were unsuitable. The patronage was largely exercised by Members of the House, and as they liked it he did not think it was desirable to abolish it.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE said, he had supported the Motion for reporting Progress, because he thought that was a very favourable opportunity for getting rid of this pernicious system of patronage in reference to those small Post Office appointments. The noble Lord had admitted that he duly considered all the applications made to him by Members of the House, in whatever quarter those Members might happen to sit. But the noble Lord had omitted to state whether he gave them all a favourable consideration. He (Mr. Northcote) had some knowledge of what went on at the Treasury; and, without making any charge against the noble Lord, he must say that he entirely disapproved of the system pursued in those matters—a system to which one political Party had been quite as much committed as the other for many years past. He did not think private Members were much attached to that sort of patronage, and he would be glad to see it in the hands of the Postmaster General.

MR. ONSLOW said, the noble Lord had told them that those appointments all came under the scrutiny of the Postmaster General. But would the noble Lord say that the Postmaster General had ever declined to complete an appointment which the noble Lord had recommended? It might be that now and then that was done; but as a matter of fact those appointments were a huge political job, and the sooner they were taken out of the hands of private Members the better. The whole of the Post Office Service ought to be under the superintendence and responsibility of the Postmaster General. It was absurd to say that those appointments were not given for political purposes, and the result was that all the Postmasters throughout the country took a perniciously active part in politics whenever an election occurred. Whenever this vicious system should be put an end to a great boon would be conferred upon the State. Why the noble Lord wished to maintain it he could not understand.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Postmaster General was not relieved from responsibility in the matter by the fact that Members of Parliament made certain nominations. He made inquiries, and the final appointment rested with him. During the short time that he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had held the Office of Postmaster General he had, on more than one occasion, refused to appoint the person recommended by the Secretary to the Treasury. No doubt there was a good deal to be said in favour of transferring the appointments directly to the Postmaster General; but one result would be that all the pressure which was now brought to bear on the noble Lord (Lord Richard Grosvenor) would be transferred to him (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). No great evil resulted from the present system, and he was rather inclined to leave it as it was.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought he was justified when he moved that Progress be reported; because, if he had not taken that step, they would not have had the valuable speech of the noble Lord the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury. There was not much chance that the system which had been so much complained of that night would be abolished during the next six months, when they were on the eve of a General Election. He would much prefer to see those appointments transferred to the Postmaster General, though he did not pretend to feel very strongly about it, one way or the other. The Irish Members not only had none of that patronage at all, but they had no prospect of ever getting any. The result was that 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 people were altogether left out in the cold, although they continued to pay £28,000,000 taxes for the purposes of the Empire, and their fair share of that £11,000,000 which the Irish Members were foolish enough to allow to pass the other night without protest. It would be well for the Irish people to understand exactly how the matter lay, and that their Members could only obtain those appointments when there were no nominees of anybody else in the way.

MR. CALLAN said, that whenever he applied for one of those appointments he used to go to the Postmaster General direct, and he had always been received in the most kindly spirit. He wished to know from the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury whether it was true that there was a book kept in the Post Office from which, when a vacancy occurred in a particular county which was worth less than £100 a-year, the clerk would know at once whom he should address to ask whether he had anyone to nominate? Such a book used to be kept. Those appointments were managed on very peculiar principles. Suppose a vacancy occurred this week in a county represented by some general supporter of the Government who happened to be absent last Friday night, when the Government were defeated on the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill, what chance would that Member have of getting the appointment for his nominee? They all knew that those appointments were not given for the purpose of corrupting a Member into giving a wrong vote; but they were given as a sop for sitting up at night and helping to "make a House, keep a House, and cheer Ministers." If a Member went home to dinner and did not return, what chance would he have of getting a place in the Post Office for a nominee, in comparison with another Member who did come back, and did what he could to help the Liberal Whips out of the scrape into which they landed the Government on Friday night.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR understood that the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) wished to be a Whip himself, and perhaps in time he might be. When the hon. Member did reach that position he (Lord Richard Grosvenor) would promise to give him, what he appeared so much to wish for, a valuable receipt for keeping his Party in hand.

MR. GRAY said, he knew the Attorney General had a strong objection to giving abstract opinions upon legal questions; but perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would not mind saying whether, if those appointments were given to reward constituents for supporting those Members who obtained them, the whole thing was not a piece of direct jobbery and political corruption, and whether it did not come within the provisions of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not quite understand what was the procedure in reference to those matters. He understood that something mysterious went on, and that the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) was to be told all about it at some future time. But, so far as he (the Attorney General) was aware, he had never known an hon. Member who would willingly be a party to any corrupt influence.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought the object in view in raising that discussion had been attained. That object was to make it understood that the Irish Members had no connection whatever with those appointments. He thanked the noble Lord (Lord Richard Grosvenor) for speaking so frankly, and for confessing that those appointments were really the cement by which the fragments of a Party were kept together. As it was to be understood that those appointments were given to reward those Members who supported the Government, it would be understood in Ireland that there was no use in applying to those Members who represented the national feeling of the country.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. COURTNEY said, he wished to say a few words upon the question of considering the Report of the Votes in Committee of Supply. His hon. Friend had put down the Report for to-morrow. But as the first Vote was of a very important character, he thought that if the Report was to be taken to-morrow, his hon. Friend would, perhaps, agree when the Votes came on for consideration that the first Vote should be deferred to a day and hour when observations could be offered upon it. He would suggest that the Report of the Vote in question should be the second Order of the Day on Thursday next, when the debate would be taken on the Budget. He hoped that attention would be given to his suggestion that the consideration of the Report of the Vote of Credit for £11,000,000 might be deferred.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think the proposal of my hon. Friend would be the most convenient one. It is not likely that the Order could be reached till very late, and no doubt hon. Members would wish to have some time for considering it. Therefore, I propose that the matter should rest until to-morrow, when a definite answer will be given.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he hoped the request of his hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) would be acceded to. No doubt there were many Members of the House who desired to have an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon the circumstances which had led to that important Vote.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POST OFFICE SITES [PURCHASE OF LAND AND EXPENSES].

RESOLUTION.

MR. SEXTON asked the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General if he could state the amount of money proposed to be expended in England, Scotland, and Ireland, under the Bill?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he could not state exactly what the amounts would be; but he believed it would be about £350,000 for the purchase of sites and buildings in London. The other objects of the Bill would probably be covered by £30,000 or £40,000.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of sums required for the purchase of lands, and for the costs and expenses which may be incurred by the Postmaster General in carrying into effect the provisions of any Act of the present Session to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire lands for the public service.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND)

[PAYMENT OF ADDITIONAL BARRISTERS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the salaries of any additional Revising Barristers, and of any person temporarily acting as assistant to a Clerk of the Peace, who may be appointed under the provisions of any Act of the present Session for amending the Law relating to the Registration of Parliamentary Voters in Ireland.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

DOMINION OF CANADA—INSURRECTION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have any further information to give the House with regard to the insurrection in Canada?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I telegraphed yesterday to Lord Lansdowne to know what information he could supply, and I have his answer. He says that there has been no battle since that of Friday, of which we have already received the details. A telegram received at Ottawa confirms the reports as to the severity of the action, and puts the number of casualties rather higher than has been stated in the first accounts. The rebels had disappeared, but General Middleton's advance had been delayed by the care of the wounded and the want of supplies. He intends to push on as soon and as fast as possible. That is all the information I have.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE EGYPTIAN LOAN BILL AND FOREIGN CONTROL.

QUESTION.

LORD LAMINGTON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Egyptian Loan Bill will not entirely supersede the Control of the Egyptian Government, hitherto exercised by Her Majesty's Government, as stated in the noble Earl's Instructions to Sir Evelyn Baring in his despatch of January 4, 1884; and, whether the control of the Six Guaranteeing Powers will be substituted for that Control until the "pacification of Egypt" is effected?

EARL GRANVILLE: I think the noble Lord's Question must have been put under some misunderstanding. With regard to what is called by him "the British Control" in Egypt at the present moment, my view is this—that we are in military occupation of Egypt, and, no doubt, a great responsibility rests upon us; and, being in that position, without attempting to administer the Government of Egypt from this country, it is quite clear, as we think, that we have a right, on all important questions, to give our advice to the Egyptian Government, and to expect that that advice should be followed. I am not aware that the Egyptian Loan Bill in the slightest degree affects that question, and I do not know that the Bill gives to Foreign Powers any right which they do not possess at this moment. They claim, and we admit that the Powers of Europe have an interest in Egypt; but the Bill neither confirms nor increases it in any way.

EGYPT AND FRANCE—SEIZURE OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN"—RUP-TURE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS.
QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to ask the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), Whether any information or Papers will be laid before the House in reference to a matter which has occupied so much of the attention of the public—that of The Bosphore Egyptien?

EARL GRANVILLE: The Papers will be laid upon the Table immediately a final settlement is arrived at. I have no reason to doubt the announcement made yesterday by my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as to the probability of an agreement with France being arrived at.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(NO. 58.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1 (Short title) agreed to.

PART I.

Suppression of Prostitution.

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 8, leave out the words "Suppression of Prostitution" and insert instead thereof the words "Protection of Women and Girls."

Lord Lamington

Clause 2 (Procuring woman to be a common prostitute or to enter a brothel).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in moving in the 2nd sub-section of the clause, as an Amendment, to insert the words "under 21 years of age," said, he did so for the reason that it was really impossible to protect people of mature age from the natural results of their own misconduct.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 13, after ("girl") insert ("under twenty one years of age.")—(The Earl of Milltown.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the sub-section was necessary in order to protect women and girls from deception. The very fact of procuring implied a certain amount of deception. It was shown in evidence before the Commission which sat on this question some time since that all the girls found in foreign brothels were deceived by false pretences.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that though not wishing to express any strong opinion on the subject, he thought there was a decided distinction between procuring for English and foreign brothels.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he thought that as the Bill aimed at the punishment of all those who endeavoured to procure young women for these purposes there should be no limit of age.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Procuring defilement of woman by threats or fraud).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, line 24, leave out ("any") and insert ("himself or any other"); page 2, line 2, leave out ("any") and insert ("himself or any other"); line 7, leave out ("any") and insert ("himself or any other"), and after ("man") insert—

("Provided that this sub-section shall not apply where such woman or girl knew such connexion to be unlawful");

and in line 9, leave out ("any") and insert ("himself or any other.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Defilement of girl under twelve years of age).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that it was very difficult to prove the complete offence; and the most horrible and revolting barbarities were practised on children by wretches who, owing to the existing state of the law, escaped anything like adequate punishment.

Amendment moved,

In page 2, line 27, after ("labour") insert ("and any one who attempts to commit the said offence, or aids or abets any other person to commit the said offence, shall be guilty of felony, and shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for any period not exceeding ten years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour.")—(The Earl of Milltown.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was unable to accept the Amendment, on the ground that it had not been shown that the punishment which an offender could at present be made to suffer was thought insufficient by the administrators of the law.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he thought that the Bill would be weighted too heavily if the Amendment were agreed to.

LORD BRAMWELL opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would introduce an anomaly into the law. When their Lordships considered the severity of two years' imprisonment with hard labour, which he had been told by governors of gaols was almost more than a man could bear, they would, he hoped, think it enough for the attempt, which they must bear in mind might differ morally from the full offence, because the man might have relented. He believed that with the exception of attempt to murder no mere attempt was a felony.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he thought the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Bramwell) was in error. An assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm was a felony, also an attempt to commit murder; and he altogether failed to see why an attempt to commit a horrible crime of the nature in question should not be placed in the same category. He felt so strongly on the matter that he would ask their Lordships to divide.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 35; Not-Contents 69: Majority 34.

Amendment disagreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Defilement of girl between twelve and fifteen years of age).

LORD NORTON, in moving an Amendment the object of which was to fix the age of protection at 16, instead of 15 years, said, the Report of the House of Lords Committee, 1882, over which the noble and learned Earl (the late Earl Cairns) presided, recommended that the age below which consent should be no defence should be 16. That noble and learned Earl said in the debate on this Bill in Committee, 1883—

“In the Select Committee on this subject, the evidence given established a conclusive case of the necessity of raising the age. He (Earl Cairns), therefore, was in favour of making the age 17, though the majority of the Committee had decided against him, thinking that 16 was sufficient.”—(3 Hansard, [280] 1391.)

And this was accepted in 1883 and 1884, after discussion in the House of Lords. Why was it proposed in the present Bill to lower the age to 15? There were the following parallel adoptions of the age of 16 in the Statutes and in legal decisions. The 24 & 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 55, on offences against the person, made it criminal to abduct a girl up to 16 from her guardians, though consenting. There was a case of a father recovering his daughter, though against her will, by habeas corpus. The 38 & 39 Vict., c. 94, amended this Act by raising the age of protection of girls generally. The Court of Divorce adopted the 16 limit of age, and dealt with the custody of children until 16. The Infants Custody Act, 36 & 37 Vict., enabled the Court of Chancery to give the custody to the mother instead of the father up to 16. The Court of Chancery retained special guardianship up to the age of 16, over which it allowed its wards to choose with whom they would live. Boards of Guardians were legally responsible for the care of girls whom they placed out in service up to 16. Finally, in matters of discretion in minors the law took the same limit. In the Friendly Societies, Industrial and Provident Societies, and Trades Unions Acts, infants up to the age of 16 were not recognized as capable of being members except of children's societies. It was, therefore, according to the general principle of our law that the discretion of a girl under 16 should not be thought sufficient to permit her the unprotected disposal of herself. A girl might marry at 12; but then the man bound himself to her protection, and in common liability pledged his own interests as much as the girl's. Practically, there were scarcely any marriages under 16. Lord Cairns's Committee reported, in their evidence, that—

The question now was between raising the age of protection as agreed, in former debates, to 16, or falling back to 15. There was no precedent whatever for the adoption of the age of 15.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 31, to leave out (“fifteen”) and insert (“sixteen.”)—(The Lord Norton.)

Question proposed, “That (‘fifteen’) stand part of the Clause.”

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was sorry he could not accept the Amendment. The Government were extremely anxious that the Bill should have the unanimous support of their Lordships; and they hoped, by reducing the age from 16 to 15, that they would be able to get the Bill through without serious opposition. The Government also desired to have the sanction of the public in regard to legislation of this kind, and in that view were anxious to make the measure workmanlike, practical, and effective. It was doubtful whether the age of 16 would meet with unanimous approval, and, therefore, they proposed to take the age of 15. He thought that in making the alteration they were taking a wise and prudent step; but if they went one step further in the direction of the Amendment they would be going too far, and would ruin the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that in the Select Committee which considered this subject he always voted for the age of 16 when the subject was discussed. There was no doubt that public opinion on the subject was in a very divided and uncertain condition; and if they took too violent a step by adopting the higher age, they would run the risk of turning public opinion against them in this matter. To have public opinion on the side of immorality would be a far more serious loss to the community than as any advantage which could be obtained in the other direction. The Government, he thought, had exercised a wise discretion upon the question in limiting the age to 15, and he hoped the House would not assent to the Amendment.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD said, he hoped the Amendment would be pressed to a division. So far as means existed of ascertaining public opinion, it had been strongly expressed in favour of the Amendment. For many years the House had been receiving Petitions, which prayed that even a higher age than that named by the Amendment might be fixed. If the Government were anxious for the support of public opinion, they would be more likely to obtain it by accepting the Amendment than by adhering to the clause. The House would be stultifying itself to lower the age which, for two years, had been affirmed by divisions, and that without any new reasons having been given for such a change. It was quite an assumption that the opinion of the other House would not be in favour of the higher age. He hoped the higher age would be adhered to as covering a year in the age of girls at which it was exceedingly desirable to protect them from the temptations to which too many were exposed.

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE, in supporting the Amendment, said, attention had been directed too much to the possibilities of fraudulent accusations against men, and too little to the misery and degradation of girls whose inexperience and weakness required such protection as the law could afford. The opinion of competent witnesses examined by the Select Committee was that 15 was too low an age at which the consent of girls should be considered a justification for their seducers. The question of the age at which a girl ought to be considered to become responsible for the disposal of her own person required much information and consideration. Those who had devoted their lives to the rescue of women from degradation advocated the ages of 16, 17, or 18. It was a deplorable fact, which their Lordships could not ignore, that the main subject of this Bill was a trade. Some wished it to be a free trade, with as little restriction as possible. That was a trade in girls for immoral purposes; and, unfortunately for the victims, it was carried on by women, so that young girls were thrown off their guard by their own sex. Looking at the question from that point of view, the question was at what age the trade in girls should be interfered with. Those who objected to the intervention of law for the protection of young girls from enticements and injury might be reminded that laws had been passed to protect young fish and young birds, on the ground that it was to the advantage of the nation that fishes and birds should be allowed to attain to maturity. For the preservation of the young progeny of salmon, anglers were prohibited from casting a glittering fly concealing a cruel hook at the season when the young fish required protection. Wild birds had legal protection from snares and nets of captors, at seasons when injuries would otherwise be inflicted on the unfledged nestlings. Even on the lower grounds on which this legislation could be defended, it was surely important that society should defend itself against the evil consequences of sacrificing, to those who traded in vice, girls who were undoubtedly too young to protect themselves.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERRURY said, that the House and the country would thank the Government for their determination to carry a Bill on this subject; but he did not think the House would thank them, and he was sure the country would not thank them, for lowering the age already fixed by their Lordships by large majorities. The dignity of the House was somewhat compromised, seeing that it had declared, once and again, that 16 was the right age. Now, without any pressure being brought to bear upon the House, or any new arguments being used, it was sought to reduce the age to 15. He asked their Lordships, therefore, not to make a retrograde step, but to adhere to their former decisions. He believed that, without any exception, 16 was the earliest age at which the law recognized the right of girls to exercise independent responsibility. A girl under 16 could not marry without parental consent; a ward in Chancery under 16 could not choose with whom she would live; children under 16 could not be made responsible in any decent and suitable matters of life. Was the law, then, to allow a child under that age, who was not held responsible in other affairs of daily life, to be responsible for handing herself over for self-ruin? Consider the difference the lowering of the age would make to a father in the protection of his daughter. A working man missed his daughter from home; he came to know in what house to look for her, and although he could search that house for a stolen article of trifling value, he could not do so to rescue a child who in no other circumstances could act without him. There was no analogy to the case of marriage under 16; because in the case of marriage there was the consent of the parents, who handed over their child to the care of a man who undertook to maintain and protect her. But even such marriages were extremely rare; for when the statistics were examined, it was found there had been only 130 contracted marriages with girls under 16, out of a total of 750,000 marriages. Public opinion had been gauged in this matter, and the House would be acting in agreement with it, if it maintained the age of 16. The conscience of the people had been roused by recent disclosures on the matter, and they would heartily support that House if it adhered to the higher age.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he must point out to their Lordships that the Bill was not a Bill for the prevention of illicit intercourse between men and women. It was not even a Bill against seduction. The only principle of the Bill was to deal with cases in which men committed offences which, from the age of the girls, amounted to the commission of what might be termed unnatural crime; and that being so, he was in favour of making the age 15, and was by no means sure that even 14 was not a high enough limit, and that it would not have been wiser to have adopted that age. Girls were frequently married at 16, and although he could not admire the wisdom of a man who married a girl at that age, such a marriage was not viewed with repugnance or as an objectionable proceeding. He would warn their Lordships against making the law too severe, and thought that the adoption of the higher age would tend to bring the law into contempt if a man could be indicted whose offence was that only of having intercourse with a prostitute just short of 16 years of age. The Bill would work injustice, and thereby become unpopular, and it was unnecessary and dangerous to meddle with the law as it stood.

LORD NORTON said, he earnestly protested against the distinction which the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Bramwell) attempted to draw between what he thought natural and unnatural in crimes of the kind now under discussion—a distinction unknown to the Statute Book, and entirely in the human breast.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 65; Not-Contents 34: Majority 31.

Amendment disagreed to.

Clause 6 (Householder, &c. permitting defilement of girl under fifteen on his premises guilty of misdemeanour).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendments made:—In page 3, line 30, leave out ("may") and insert ("shall"); line 32, leave out ("guilty of an offence under this Act"); and in line 33, after ("premises") insert ("and have reasonable ground for believing to have been guilty of an offence under this Act.")

Clause 7 (Abduction of girl under eighteen with intent to have carnal knowledge).

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE, in moving, as an Amendment, that a master or guardian who assaulted a girl under 18 years of age should be guilty of a misdemeanour, and be rendered liable to imprisonment for two years with hard labour, said, abuses of power by masters over female servants were common, and by guardians over wards were not rare. A householder was in a position of trust in respect to a servant girl under 18 who had been committed to his care by her parents. If by means of his authority he ruined her morally he ought to be liable to severe punishment.

Amendment moved,

In page 4, line 9, after ("labour") insert ("any person who, being the guardian of a girl under eighteen years, or having the care or charge of her, or being her master in domestic service or other employment, or other person whose lawful commands she is bound to obey, unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful and carnal knowledge of, or indecently assaults such girl, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years with or without hard labour: Provided that it shall be a defence under this section to show that such girl had been unchaste previously to the offence charged."—(The Lord Mount-Temple.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the Amendment was very wide in terms. It was open to grave objection and liable to abuse, and he could not agree to it.

Amendment disagreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Power, on indictment for rape, to convict of indecent assault).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 4, line 13, after ("indictment") insert ("or of an attempt to commit the same.").

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Amendment of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, s. 28).

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 5, line 2, leave out ("only of one police constable") and insert ("of one witness only.")

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN, in moving the omission of the clause, said, it gave an unlimited and most dangerous power of arbitrary arrest to the police, against both men and women, and would leave them indeed, when walking through the streets of London, at the mercy of the police, for it would allow any policeman who saw a man and woman talking together to arrest one or both of them—the man on the charge of importuning, and the woman of soliciting. Even if the charge was dismissed the mischief done could never be repaired. In the interests, too, of the thousands of workgirls, who in a large place like London were obliged to go long distances to their homes, he protested against rendering them liable to the danger of a charge by a corrupt or malicious policeman. As the law stood at present, if this solicitation took place to the annoyance of the passengers or inhabitants, the offence was criminal. That was amply sufficient, and there was no necessity for this clause. A Proviso was inserted to the effect that no committal should take place on the testimony of one witness only. As the Bill originally stood, it was "on the testimony of one police constable." That had been altered on consequence of his remarks on the second reading; but it meant exactly the same thing. That was a very strange inconsistency, as the clause gave the policeman this arbitrary power of arrest, and yet said that his evidence was not sufficient for a committal—in fact, that he was not to be believed on his oath. He contended that the existing powers of the law were ample, and on these grounds he begged to move the rejection of the clause.

Moved, "To omit the Clause."—(The Earl of Milltown.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he would point out that the clause was recommended by the Select Committee on the subject. The words were, that soliciting prostitution in the streets should be an offence. The present condition of the London streets was a very great, if not the principal, cause of the corruption of the young; and the Bill having for its object the protection of the young, it would be impossible to pass over the question of the condition of the streets.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he would point out that the clause, as it stood, differed materially from the recommendation made by the Committee, because there was the remarkable addition that the men should be liable to arrest as well as the women. He thought they were now discussing the question rather from the point of view of those of their own class—those who had houses. But, as their Lordships doubtless were well aware, there was a large portion of the population who, after their day's work was over, went out to walk in the streets and to meet their friends. They walked in the parks and in the streets, and talked with their friends there; and yet by this clause they proposed to make it, if not not an absolute offence, a serious matter of suspicion, if a man spoke to a woman in the streets. Was this a condition of things which their Lordships would like to see brought about? He felt that very serious hardships would result to those who now very largely used public places for recreation. Such large powers placed in the hands of the police would enable them to damage this Act in public estimation, as had been done in the case of another measure which had for its object the suppression of immorality—the Contagious Diseases Acts—in which the police had had to do very unpleasant things, and the prejudice against these Acts was that they put it in the power of a policeman to damage the character of an innocent girl; and he was afraid that under this clause the characters of innocent young girls would be subject to the same danger. By such a clause he thought they would really run the risk of a very considerable social danger, that they would inflict a great hardship, and would do no good whatever. If his noble Friend (the Earl of Milltown) went to a division he should support him.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the question was whether a possible miscarriage of justice under this section was at all to be balanced against the benefit of checking the system if they could. The evil which it was proposed to cope with—the condition of the streets of London—was a very serious and grave one, and full of danger to young persons, and it was felt that this state of things was a source of great public mischief. He would point out that the clause provided that there must be more than one witness to justify a conviction; and, as policemen did not go about in couples, it was certain that the second witness would not be a policeman. As to the case of men, only those were liable who in a thoroughfare or other public place habitually and persistently importuned women for an immoral purpose.

EARL COWPER said, he thought it would be more satisfactory if the matter could have been disposed of by the Committee, and thus the disagreeable discussion, which came before the House year after year, be avoided. But he thought the clause now under consideration would lead to much mischief. In spite of there being more than one witness required, he thought the danger of collusion would be great for the purpose of extorting money, or gratifying any evil design, as in the way of revenge or otherwise. In addition to that, the wording of the clause was too vague, for nothing could be more difficult to define than the words “habitually and persistently importunes.” He could not vote for the clause.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he could not understand why two witnesses should be required to prove the strange, vague offence dealt with in the clause, when one witness was sufficient to prove much more serious crimes. That very necessity for having two or more witnesses, in his opinion, condemned the clause, and he should vote against it.

LORD COLERIDGE said, that the opponents of the clause argued that unfounded accusations of solicitation might be brought against a man; but any other crime might be wrongfully charged against a person in the same way, and, therefore, this argument had no special substance. His only objection to the clause was that it would be very difficult to prove persistent and constant solicitation.

LORD NORTON said, that the condition of some of the streets of the Metropolis was far more disgraceful, and the offence of solicitation was carried to a greater length in London than in any other capital in Europe. In the case of women, the only change effected in the law by this clause would be that it would be no longer necessary to prove that the solicitation with which a woman was charged caused annoyance to passengers.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that in his opinion, at least, the proposed change in the law which the clause would bring about might be tried experimentally.

LORD ABERDARE said, he could not but think that there would be little difficulty about proving the offence of persistent solicitation. Women were now seldom committed for the offence; because it was almost impossible to induce respectable persons to come forward to say that they had been annoyed. It was well known that there were men who habitually solicited young women on their way home from business.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he objected to the clause. It was easy to explain the reason why there were more prostitutes on the streets of London than in Continental towns—namely, that immorality was accepted as an inevitable evil and dealt with accordingly; and houses were licensed where men and women met, and by proper regulations health was protected, as well as any indecent exhibitions in the streets prevented. It was most desirable to protect young girls; but it was impossible, in his opinion, to do away with immorality, which was the vain attempt made by the supporters of the Bill.

On Question, "That the Bill do pass?"

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Before the Bill is passed, I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can name any date or proximate date at which he is likely to be able to fulfil the pledge or species of pledge which he gave the other night that he would explain the definite policy which Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue with respect to the Soudan?

EARL GRANVILLE: I am afraid I cannot fix a date. I am not prepared at present to make the statement.

NAVY (SHIPS BUILDING)—MINISTERIAL PROGRAMME.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH, in rising to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, What steps have been or are being taken by the Board of Admiralty to complete in the Royal Dockyards the shipbuilding programme, presented to both Houses of Parliament on the 2nd December last, for the financial year ending the 31st March 1886? said, it would be in the recollection of the House that on the occasion to which he referred the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Northbrook) made a very important announcement with respect to the Navy. The occasion was an important one, and the circumstances connected with it were important. It was felt that the question was urgent then, and if so it was much more urgent now. In his (the Earl of Ravensworth's) opinion, the provision made in the Naval Estimates for the year in respect of the two iron-clads to be built by the Admiralty was most inadequate. In the present state of the country, he considered it would be a mistake to lay down any new ship in any of the four Government Dockyards—namely, Chatham, Sheerness, Portsmouth, or Devonport; because, when repairing and refitting were going on to a large extent, the work of building was liable to serious interruption. That observation, however, did not apply to Pembroke. He asked particularly for information as to what was being done with regard to the 10 torpedo cruisers known by the name of Scouts, the 30 first-class torpedo boats, and the two torpedo rams of the Polyphemus type, and would conclude by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, it would be desirable, if any other Questions are to be asked, that they should be put before I make my reply; because if they are put afterwards the Rules of Debate prevent me speaking again. I shall be glad to answer the Question of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ravensworth) as plainly as I can. Your Lordships will recollect that, in December of last year, I explained that it was the intention of the Government to ask for money in the Estimates for the current year to enable them to spend a capital sum of £3,100,000 on ships to be built by contract. I explained at the time that for that money we calculated on building one iron-clad, five belted cruisers, two torpedo rams, 10 Scouts, and 30 torpedo boats of the first class, in addition to the ordinary rate of shipbuilding. At the same time, I said I was by no means certain that would be the precise manner in which the money would be spent; I said it might be possible that, instead of giving a contract for one iron-clad, we might give contracts for two or three; and that, of course, involved that the money would not go so far to provide ships of the other classes. I will now explain what we have actually done. Instead of ordering by contract one iron-clad, we have ordered two. We have ordered by contract five belted cruisers and six vessels of the Scout class, and we have ordered the whole number of torpedo boats of the first class. We have thus ordered by contract ships representing the sum of £3,100,000; and, indeed, we have gone somewhat above that sum. I have always endeavoured to go a little beyond the pledges given to Parliament, rather than to fall short of them. An iron-clad is more expensive than two rams and four ships of the Scout class put together. Therefore, the orders given by the Government for ships to be built by contract exceed the expectation held out in the statement I made in the month of December last. Your Lordships will be glad to hear that in no case has our estimate of the cost of the ships been exceeded by the tenders we have accepted. It is also gratifying to find, owing to the ability of the great shipbuilding firms of the country, that we have secured both for the iron-clads and belted cruisers a speed sensibly higher than we expected. We shall have, for the iron-clads, a speed of over 16 knots, and for the belted cruisers 18 knots. With respect to the programme of shipbuilding in the Dockyards, the matter is more difficult. The circumstances were not the same when the Estimates were framed as they were when I made the statement in December. I then said, and it met with the general concurrence of your Lordships, that if it were necessary to spend more money upon the construction of ships of war, it was desirable, both for reasons well known to my noble Friend, as the Chairman of a Committee that had inquired into the subject, and also because there was at the time a want of employment in the shipbuilding trade of the country, that the extra money should be spent in building ships by contract, and that we should be content to let the Dockyards go on steadily at the rate of construction at which they were then carried on. When we came to frame the Naval Estimates, it appeared to us, for reasons it is hardly necessary for me now to explain, that it was desirable that the naval programme of this year should be based upon the policy of completing, as quickly as possible, those ships which could be completed in the course of the financial year. It is not a very economical thing to do, because to complete a large number of ships at the same time disturbs somewhat the distribution of labour. Still, there were reasons which led the Board of Admiralty to the conclusion that it was the best policy to pursue in framing the Estimates for the year. The number of ships we are expecting to complete this year is considerable. We shall complete in the year the Edinburgh, the Collingwood, the Impérieuse, and the Wasp.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: Not the Colossus?

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: The Colossus is complete so far as our programme of shipbuilding is concerned. We shall also complete the Mersey, a new belted cruiser, and three ships of very nearly the same class, the Arethusa, the Phaeton, and the Amphion; these three ships will be completed in the calendar year. I mention that because the financial year is usually understood. There are also, besides these, several small ships I need not mention. That being the basis of our policy, while we are spending this year somewhat more than last year, we are postponing the laying down of ships in the Dockyards until the close of the year. I understand that is the policy the noble Earl approves. During the last few months we have thought it desirable that the ships in the Dockyards should be pushed forward and prepared for sea, and that we should not lay down any new ships, because it would be inconvenient to have the staff diverted from the completion of ships. We propose, towards the end of the year, to make preparations for the commencement of two iron-clads in the Dockyards, one at Portsmouth and the other at Pembroke, of a torpedo ram at Chatham, and a Scout at Devonport. If it were desirable to increase the number of iron-clad ships beyond this programme it would be better to do it by contract than to go to the Dockyards, because we cannot undertake more building of that class than we now have on hand. But, in existing circumstances, I do not think it necessary to push on more rapidly the construction of this kind of vessels. I have often said in this House that it is a growing opinion in the Service that it is by no means certain that these large iron-clads will for ever be the ships of the greatest importance in time of war. Therefore, if we were to increase our building programme at the present time, it might be a wiser expenditure of money to order

ships of a different class. My Lords, I am unable to inform my noble Friend what the precise design of the new ships will be. The Admiralty has of late been so much occupied with other matters that we have not had the leisure at our disposal to consider this question. I have shown that the expectations which I held out in December last have been somewhat more than fulfilled. We are building more by contract than I then expected, and we have kept up the same rate of building in the Dockyards. I said that the annual production of armour-clad ships would be increased by 2,000 tons a-year — from 12,000 to 14,000 tons. In the Navy Estimates of this year it will be found that we expect to build in 1885 14,423 tons. That is nearly the figure I gave last December. In addition to that, we shall build no less than 6,000 tons of protected ships, which, compared with the iron-clad ships of other nations, might almost be reckoned as iron-clads. The total tonnage proposed for this year is 28,052. as compared with 20,650 tons last year. Thus we have somewhat exceeded the programme I sketched out last December. My noble Friend asked whether, now that the Howe was launched at Pembroke, the men would be set at work on a new ship? The answer is that the men would be employed on the Anson and other ships, and can be more usefully occupied by pressing those ships forward than on a new ship. The number of men employed at Pembroke is about the same as last year. There has been a good deal of misrepresentation lately in respect of the policy of the Admiralty, and about one statement in particular which I made in this House. I have been twitted with saying that if the Admiralty had £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 to spend in shipbuilding they would not know what to do with the money. That is a very incorrect interpretation of a remark which I once made in this House. I was referring only to the largest class of ships, and my remark by no means applied to the general construction of ships. I said only what I am sure has been felt by everyone who has considered the subject. I said that if I had put into my hands £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 to spend upon the biggest iron-clad ships, I should find a difficulty in choosing the particular class of ships upon which that money should be spent. I am sure that those of your Lordships who have followed the technical discussions of the merits of one or another class of iron-clads would agree with me in that feeling. I am by no means of opinion that the money could not be usefully spent upon other classes of ships; and this statement is proved by the classes of ships ordered by the Admiralty in consequence of the liberality of Parliament in placing large sums at our disposal during the current year for the construction of ships by contract.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA (BOMBAY)—FOREST DEPARTMENT—THE THANA DISTRICT.

MR. SLAGG asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that the Government of Bombay has recently appropriated, as a "protected forest," about 1,000 square miles of wooded land in the Thana District; whether the population of the district has not, from time immemorial, exercised unlimited right of user over the said woodlands; whether this step has not caused serious discontent among nearly 1,000,000 people, whose trade, agricultural, and domestic necessities have been seriously affected thereby; and, whether he can give, or will obtain, information as to the reasons which are held to justify this step?

MR. J. K. CROSS: To the first clause of my hon. Friend's Question, I must reply that the "reserved" and "protected" forests of the Thana Division amounted in 1879 to 2,034 square miles. In 1844, by abandoning lands which it was not considered absolutely necessary to conserve, they had been reduced to 1,486 square miles. For many years previous to about 1870, the restrictions necessary for the protection of public forests were much disregarded, so that in some cases the people have come to regard as rights practices which really are trespasses and destructive of the forests. The enforcement during the last 15 or 20 years of these restrictions has caused some discontent. But the attention of the Bombay Government has been constantly directed to the subject, and every concession has been and will continue to be made compatible with the preservation of the forests.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—
WORKS AT KINSALE AND MALIN-MORE, BUNDORAN, CO. DONEGAL.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is a fact that before the plans for the present harbour works at Kinsale were finally approved of and settled by the Board of Works, the plans were surveyed or examined by the chief engineer of the Board, Mr. Manning; whether the duty of making the survey was imposed on a junior engineer, Mr. Crosthwaite; whether Mr. Crosthwaite discharged this duty; and, if, when the quay walls as now specified are built, the harbour can be deepened without endangering the stability of the walls, so as to allow fishing vessels to come alongside the quay?

MR. HIBBERT: The plans for the present harbour works at Kinsale were designed by the Chief Engineer to the Board of Works. They were drawn under his direction, and were carefully examined before being approved. The survey was made by Mr. Crosthwaite, acting under the immediate direction of the engineer. When the works are finished, fishing vessels will be able to come alongside the pier at low water, and alongside the quay at half-tide.

MR. LEA also asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, When the works in connection with the piers of Malinmore and Bundoran, county Donegal, will be commenced, in accordance with the recommendation of the Fishery Commissioners, and approved by the Treasury; and, if a Return can now be given of all moneys allocated under the recent special grant from the Church Fund?

MR. HIBBERT: The contract for Malinmore is in hand, and the formalities are being completed. It is hoped that the work will be begun in a couple of months. The contract was accepted for Bundoran; but, unfortunately, the contractor threw it up, and new tenders had to be called for. Probably, the general figures which my hon. Friend desires can be best given in the Report of the Fishery Piers and Harbours Commissioners.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE INCOME TAX ON TENANT FARMERS.

MR. BIRKBECK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has given consideration to the request, made during the debate on Customs and Inland Revenue Bill last Session, as to placing the tenant farmers of England on the same footing as Scotch and Irish in respect of the charges under Schedule (B) of Income Tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I may assure him that I have, since last Session, given great attention to this subject, which is one of much complexity, as he, doubtless, is aware. In my Financial Statement I hope to deal with it in a manner of which the hon. Member will possibly approve.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) —
DISTRICT OF GWEEDORE, CO. DONE-GAL.

MR. LEWIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government are in possession of information regarding the existence of a state of extreme lawlessness in the district of Gweedore, county Donegal; whether special magisterial reports from the districts have been received; and, what steps the Government are taking to put down intimidation and boycotting, and to enforce the Queen's writ?

Mr. Slagg

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I would wish to ask him, whether the district referred to in the Question has not, for a long series of years, been the scene of excessive rack-renting, extreme poverty, and many cruel evictions; and, whether the Government intend to take any steps to put an end to so intolerable a state of things?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of that Question. In answer to the Question on the Paper, I have to say that there has been a good deal of excitement in this district, and it has been the subject of report and inquiry on the spot. The means adopted by the Government with the view of preventing the Boycotting and intimidation are the same as those used in other parts of the country; and the necessity has been impressed on the local police of making every endeavour to render amenable any persons guilty of these practices. Due protection will be given to the officers of the law in the execution of their duties.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not a fact that a great many evictions have taken place in the district, and that the Inspector of the Local Government Board reported that men, women, and children were lying for days and nights together in the ditches under the rain?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must ask for Notice of the Question.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SKIBBEREEN UNION, CO. CORK—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN AND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Local Government Board have received a communication from a guardian of the Skibbereen Union, objecting to the recent elections of chairman, vice-chairman, and deputy vice-chairman, respectively, on the ground that the elections were irregularly carried out; and, whether the Local Government Board will order new elections for the above officers?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It appears that the voting at the first election was equal; and that by unanimous consent the election was postponed to a later date, when the then chairmen were chosen. Two Guardians have since complained of the course pursued; but the Local Government Board see no reason whatever to interfere.

MR. DEASY: Was not the election conducted contrary to the regulations of the Local Government Board?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No; I think not.

MR. DEASY said, he would ask another Question on the subject.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE HERRING FISHERY.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to a meeting of fishermen, fishbuyers, and boat owners held in the Kinsale Court House on Monday 20th instant, when it was unanimously resolved to ask the herring fishermen (who are mostly from Scotland) not to commence herring fishing until May 11th, on the ground that, if carried on earlier, it would materially injure the mackerel fishing; and, whether, in view of the large and representative character of the said meeting, and largeness of the interest involved, he will direct the Inspectors of Fisheries to hold an inquiry into the matter as soon as possible?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think it would be desirable to have an inquiry into this subject, and the Inspectors inform me they are quite ready to hold one. They point out, however, that a bye-law, fixing the 11th of May for the commencement of the herring fishing, even if it should be determined upon, could not come into operation for this season; and that the result of an inquiry held now could not bind the fishermen this year, though, perhaps, they might of themselves acquiesce in any arrangement that might be come to at the inquiry. I do not know that this is very likely; but I will leave it to the Inspectors themselves to fix a date, having regard to their other engagements.

NAVY—H.M.S. "AGAMEMNON."

ADMIRAL EGERTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What is the latest report of the steering qualities of Her Majesty's ship Agamemnon?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The last Report from Captain Long on the steering of the Agamemnon is satisfactory. It is stated that on the voyage from Colombo to Singapore the ship, as a rule, steered very steadily. In the Straits of Malacca the difficulties at first experienced had been so completely overcome, that the ship never deviated more than two degrees from her course. It is believed that, with more experience, the gallant captain of the Agamemnon will be able to still further improve the steerage of his ship.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked, whether the good and steady steering referred to in the Report mentioned was at full speed, or was limited only to eight or nine knots?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that the exact speed at which the vessel was steering was not stated in the Report; but he had given as succinctly as he could the general effect of the Report.

SIR JOHN HAY asked, if the hon. Gentleman would ascertain the speed at which the vessel steered well?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY replied in the affirmative.

MR. GORST asked, if the hon. Gentleman would instruct that in future Reports the speed would be stated?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Yes.

SOUTH AFRICA—AFFAIRS OF BECHUANALAND.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that Sir Charles Warren, Special Commissioner in Bechuanaland, has been blamed for asking President Krüger to enter into the question of the cattle stealing which has taken place in Bechuanaland from the Transvaal frontier since May last, without first consulting Sir Hercules Robinson, the High Commissioner; whether it has since been ascertained that Sir C. Warren, before addressing Mr. Krüger on the subject of the cattle stealing in question, had been urged by Sir H. Robinson to take that step; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will, by firm and conciliatory action, prevent any further conflict of authority in Bechuanaland?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I think, Sir, there is some public disadvantage in entering by way of Question and answer into small past misunderstandings between the two distinguished public servants who are now serving their country in South Africa. But I may shortly say, as to the point raised in the right hon. Member's Question, that Sir Charles Warren, construing a former communication from the High Commissioner as an instruction to make certain formal representations to the Transvaal Government, acted on that view, and sent a direct communication to President Krüger, at Pretoria, in reference to cattle stealing in Bechuanaland. It was then pointed out to him that the High Commissioner should be the channel by which communications should be made to the Transvaal Executive in all matters involving policy and political considerations. The Government hoped, by their action, that they have cleared up any difference between these two gentlemen on the matter. As to any conflict of authority in Bechuanaland, there simply has not been any, the only authority recognized there being British authority.

ARMY—THE BRIGADE OF GUARDS.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Brigade of Guards left with less than the usual complement of Subaltern Officers per Company; whether some who embarked as Company Officers at the time held Staff appointments; whether others have been so appointed since, while more have been invalided home; and, whether it is intended to send out reinforcements?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The Brigade of Guards embarked with its full strength of subaltern officers—namely, two per company. No officer who embarked as a company officer held a Staff appointment; one officer has been killed, and one was appointed to the Staff, but has since been invalided. The question of sending reinforcements is under consideration.

EGYPT (THE EXPEDITIONARY FORCE)—THE TROOPS AT KORTI.

MR. WARTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to keep the Troops now at Korti there during the Summer; if so, is it known what the degree of heat is there during the Summer; and, if he can form any estimate of the percentage of men who will probably die or be invalided through the heat during the Summer?

Sir Thomas Brassey

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There are no troops actually at Korti. It is not intended to keep troops in that neighbourhood during the summer. Under these circumstances, it is not necessary to form the estimate asked for by the hon. and learned Member.

EGYPT AND FRANCE—THE SEIZURE OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN"—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can now inform the House of the details of the settlement of the difficulties between the French and Egyptian Governments relative to the suppression of The Bosphore Egyptian?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am not in a position to make any addition to the statement I have already made on this subject.

CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE)—MR. W. JOHNSTON, INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Has Mr. William Johnston, Inspector of Fisheries, been called on to admit or deny that he wrote to the Orange Grand Master (Rev. R. R. Kane)— will the Government inquire if he is in a position to deny that he is the author of the following letter in The Belfast Evening Telegraph :—

"Expressing his readiness, if called upon, to contest one of the divisions of Belfast at the General Election ;"

"The 12th of July is being prepared for all over Ulster. In view of the approaching General Election it will be of unusual importance. On that occasion I hope to take my place with my Orange brethren. No more loyal addresses will be presented to the Princess and Princess of Wales than the Orange ones, and I hope to be able hereafter to give emphasis to them when I am Member for South Belfast ;"

and, do such declarations by a Civil Servant of his intention to seek a seat in Parliament constitute a breach of the Treasury Rule of November 12th 1884 (since made an Order in Council), which requires that any Civil Servant who, by an election address or "in any other manner, announces himself as a candidate," should resign his position under the Crown?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Johnston admits that he wrote a private letter to Mr. Kane to the effect quoted, and he also admits the authorship of the letter in The Evening Telegraph; but he explains that he intended the passage quoted from the letter to have reference to a future time, when, having resigned his office, he should again be able to take part in political affairs. He repeats that he had no intention of infringing the Treasury Minute; but it appears questionable, so far as I can see at present, whether he may not technically have done so.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked whether this case was not analogous to the case of Sir William Gurdon, who—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Who three times announced himself—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Who three times announced himself as an intending candidate for Norfolk, and is still allowed to retain his place?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That Question does not fairly arise out of the Question on the Paper.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to give Notice—

MR. SPEAKER: I rule that the Question is out of Order. If the hon. Member wishes to give Notice, he is at liberty to do so.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: That is what I intend to do. I beg to give Notice that I will ask the Prime Minister a Question on Monday.

MR. HEALY: As the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone) is responsible for the issue of this Order, I would ask him whether his special attention has been called to the case in which one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Fisheries expressed his intention to contest one of the divisions of Belfast at the General Election, and this matter is published in Belfast newspapers, and that he intended to give emphasis to his views on a certain state of things when Member for South Belfast; and whether, on the 12th of November, 1884, a Treasury Minute was issued, which was made an Order in Council, that—"If a Civil servant issued an election address, or otherwise announced himself as a candidate, he must resign his position ;"

and, whether the right hon. Gentleman will assist the Irish Government in coming to a conclusion on this matter?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was sorry to confess himself unacquainted with any facts connected with the Public Service; but really he was not competent to judge of the matters embraced in this Question. He was unable to make any addition to the answer given by his right hon. Friend.

MR. HEALY: I will put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman on the Paper, as he is the person who is responsible for this matter.

MR. SEXTON also gave Notice to ask, whether, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Johnston gave a public pledge that he would bridle his tongue, he recently condemned energetically in a public manner the "errors of the Church of Rome?"

ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS (IRELAND)

—THE CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN — MR. ERRINGTON'S MISSION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Foreign Secretary has caused representations to be made by Mr. George Errington, M.P. to the Sovereign Pontiff, with the object of preventing the appointment by His Holiness of the Very Reverend Dr. Walsh, Vicar Capitular of the Catholic See of Dublin, to be the Archbishop of that See?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am requested by Lord Granville to state that he has given no such instructions to Mr. Errington to favour or press the claims of any Prelate as successor to the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

MR. LEAMY: Will the noble Lord be good enough to say what Mr. Errington is doing at Rome?

[No reply.]

Subsequently—

MR. W. J. CORBET said: In reference to this matter, I would ask the noble Lord, whether he has seen the following passage in The Times of this day:—

"Our Correspondent in Rome informs us that if the Vatican proceed and persists in nominating to the Archiepiscopal See of Dublin Dr. Walsh, rather than Dr. Donnelly, who is patronized by the English Government, Mr. Errington, who is officially intrusted with the duty of settling with the Holy See ecclesiastical questions connected with England, will immediately leave Rome."

I wish, Sir, to ask whether Mr. Errington has been intrusted with any instructions on this subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have not seen the passage the hon. Member refers to. The Question must be put on the Paper.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Surely the noble Lord can answer the simple Question as to whether Mr. Errington has any official mission at Rome?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I explained last year—no, the year before last—the circumstances relating to Mr. Errington's visit to Rome. If the hon. Member will refer to the answer I gave then, I think it was on the 11th of June, of which I shall be very glad to send him a copy, he will be able to see what were the circumstances to which I have referred.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Does the noble Lord mean to say that, at any rate with regard to Mr. Errington's mission, the policy of Her Majesty's Government has for a period of 12 months undergone no change?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I stand entirely stand by the statement I then made.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—RECREATION GROUNDS.

MR. BRYCE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the Board have considered the desirability of making on the small piece of land which they propose to acquire, fronting the River Thames, in the Isle of Dogs, for the purposes of their contemplated steam ferries, a recreation ground available for the inhabitants of that district, having regard to the fact that there is a great want of open spaces available for the recreation of the poorer classes in that part of London, and also to the fact that a society is willing to bear the expense of laying out the ground as a place of recreation if the Board will allow it to remain unbuilt on?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: In reply to my hon. and learned Friend, I beg to state that the Board has considered the matter referred to in his Question; but, in the first place, the Bill which now stands referred to a Select Committee does not empower the Board to appropriate the land in question for the formation of a recreation ground; and, in the second place, the proposition to devote it to that purpose appears to assume that the Board will purchase the whole of the land up to the limits of deviation, which is extremely doubtful. Moreover, the area would be very small even if the Board's proposed powers were exercised to the utmost, and would only amount to a little over an acre, divided into two portions by the approach to the steamboat pier. Under these circumstances, the Board has not felt itself in a position to entertain the suggestion made to it by the society alluded to by my hon. and learned Friend; but I can assure him that any fresh representation on so important a subject shall be fully considered.

THE WESTERN PACIFIC—ISLAND OF COREA—OCCUPATION OF PORT HAMILTON:

MR. O'KELLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Russian Government has made any representations to Her Majesty's Government about the occupation of Port Hamilton; whether the Russian Government regards the occupation of Port Hamilton as a menace to the Russian settlement in Eastern Siberia; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the expediency of withdrawing from Port Hamilton in order to facilitate the restoration of friendly relations between Russia and England?

MR. GLADSTONE: No representation has been received from the Russian Government by Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—RUSSIAN OCCUPATION OF HERAT.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Russian Government have withdrawn from their undertaking not to occupy Herat?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Russian Government have not withdrawn from any engagement they have entered into with regard to the subject of this Question.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—MR. STEPHEN AND SIR PETER LUMSDEN'S DESPATCH.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When Mr. Stephen, who had been sent by Sir Peter Lumsden with despatches to the Foreign Secretary, was likely to arrive in this country?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that he was informed that he was expected in about three weeks from the date of starting. He was presumed to have started on Friday last.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, What day the Government propose to fix for taking the Report of Supply upon the Vote of Credit? In his powerful speech of the previous night, the Prime Minister appealed to the House not to allow any delay, and there was but one desire, to agree to that suggestion; but I hope we may be allowed a proper time for discussion on the Report. I therefore ask, if the right hon. Gentleman will consent, if possible, to the Report being taken on Thursday, after the Budget?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he thought that the request of the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly reasonable and convenient, and the Government would make arrangements accordingly.

DOMINION OF CANADA—THE INSURRECTION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY.

MR. INDERWICK asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government had received any information as to the reported fighting in Canada; and, whether there was any reason to believe that the rebel forces had been defeated with considerable loss?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that the Government had received two telegrams from the Governor General—one on Monday, which the Secretary of State had read in the House of Lords, and it virtually corroborated what the newspapers stated. That morning the Government had received another telegram, which was as follows:—

 “There has been no fighting since Friday.” Evidently that answered the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, as, according to the telegram, it was certain that there had not been a defeat of the rebels on Sunday. The telegrams confirmed the severity of the action, and increased the number of casualties. They further stated that the rebels had disappeared; but the General’s advance was delayed by the care of the wounded and by having to wait for supplies. The General intended to push on to Prince Albert as soon as possible.

MR. HEALY asked, if the hon. Gentleman would say whether any Papers would be laid on the Table, more especially with reference to the grievances of the half-breeds?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that it would be premature to say at present. The Government had no Papers on the subject in their possession.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN- ISTAN—REPORTED BATTLE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I will ask a Question of which I have given Notice to the Prime Minister—namely, Whether the Government have received any information as to the reported engagement between the Russians and the Afghans mentioned in this morning’s newspapers?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have received no confirmation of the statements in the newspapers, and we have, indeed, no information on the subject, excepting what we have gathered from them.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. BRODRICK gave Notice to ask, Whether the Government intended to include in the Financial Estimates this year the cost of Irish registration, in pursuance of the recent vote of the House?

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, whether the same Instructions to officials as were in the Registration of Voters (England) Bill could be inserted in the Irish Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), in reply, said, he would have a look at the Instructions and see what they were.

Mr. Evelyn Ashley

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDIS- TRIBUTION) BILL.—[BILL 134.]

CONSIDERATION. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, considered.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving the insertion of a new clause relating to Pembroke, said, that the effect of the Amendment was to adhere to the original provision of the Bill. Since the question of Pembrokeshire had been discussed, he had considered the matter; and the feeling which he had then expressed with regard to the Bill as it stood had not been removed by the further consideration which he had given to the subject. The proposal which had been made by the noble Viscount the Member for Carmarthen-shire (Viscount Emlyn), to turn one of the boroughs into the county, and keep another as it was, had been put forward by him chiefly on the grounds of distances and convenience. But the Bill, as it stood, equalized the population as between the county and the borough better than the noble Viscount’s proposal. The Haverfordwest boroughs were comparatively small, whereas Weston had a very large area. The boroughs of the county were completely mixed up; and, so far as geographical features went, there was a strong case in favour of the proposal in the Bill. The noble Viscount had argued in Committee that some of the boroughs of the proposed group were situated at a great distance from one another. No doubt the extreme distance of any one borough from another was in the case of Fishguard and Tenby, which were 24 miles apart; but in the case of boroughs in some of the other Welsh counties the distances were greater still, being in one case 32 miles, and in another 36. Under the circumstances of the case, he did not see his way to change the proposal of the Bill with regard to the grouping of these boroughs. According to promise, he had now placed on the Paper as a clause what had formerly appeared as a Note to the Schedule. The clause was to the effect that the law relating to the election for the boroughs of Pembroke should also include the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest. He would, therefore, move the second reading of the clause.

Clause :—

(Provision as to Pembroke.)

"The law relating to the Elections for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke shall apply as if the places comprised in the area of the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest were named in the Act of the Session of the second and third years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter forty-five, as places sharing in the election of a Member for Pembroke, and the borough shall be called Pembroke and Haverfordwest,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, that his argument against the change proposed by the Bill rested chiefly on this ground—that it violated the principle laid down by the Government with respect to grouped boroughs. What case did the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) make for breaking through a principle which he had declared to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom—namely, that there should be no grouping of boroughs? He took a scattered group of seven boroughs, one of which was purely agricultural, and because of the position of that one borough between two others, he argued that the principle of the Bill should be departed from. In the Pembroke district of boroughs were included towns of an electorate respectively of 16,300, 4,750, 3,812, and 717. Because of the position of the small town of 717 persons, the right hon. Gentleman claimed to apply a different rule to these boroughs than he applied to other parts of the country. If the small borough of Weston ought not to be in the group, let it be taken out; but there could be no doubt that Pembroke, having a population of over 25,000, was absolutely entitled, according to the principles of the Bill, to its own Representative. The Government had no right to try and equalize the population, because it happened to suit their purpose. There were numbers of cases where gross anomalies took place, and no attempt was made to equalize the population. There was no reason why the Haverfordwest boroughs should not be amalgamated with the county of Pembroke. The population of the latter, 57,000, was by no means excessive, as compared with many other counties. With regard to local feeling, he might say that while Pembroke did not desire to be connected with Haverfordwest, the latter was in favour of the proposal. Seeing that the people of Pembroke strongly objected to the proposal, he should certainly divide the House upon it.

LORD KENSINGTON, in supporting the insertion of the clause, said, he would ask whether the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Emllyn) possessed any evidence to show that the people of Pembroke were opposed to the Government proposals? Yesterday he (Lord Kensington) presented a Petition from the Corporation of Haverfordwest in their favour. He denied that there was any Party spirit whatever involved in the matter; and it was the desire of both political Parties in the borough that the arrangement proposed should be made.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he strongly supported the scheme in the Bill, which commended itself to his judgment, distinct from Party, as better than the proposal of the noble Viscount opposite the Member for Carmarthenshire (Viscount Emllyn). The noble Viscount objected to the provision now in question as a departure from the principle of the Bill. That was a mistake, for the principle of the Bill was to equalize electoral districts so far as could be done without undue interference with the existing system. The rule applied to England that disfranchised boroughs should be merged in the counties involved no principle, but was found a convenient rule to adopt so far as regarded England, where grouping of boroughs was unknown. In Wales all their boroughs were grouped, and it was but natural to join a disfranchised group to another in the same county when that was found to be a convenient arrangement. The county of Pembroke had already a population of 57,000, whilst the Pembroke boroughs had only about 30,000. It was, therefore, in accordance with the principle of the Bill to add Haverfordwest to the boroughs and not to the county.

MR. GORST said, the scheme of the Government in this matter was in shocking bad taste. The Welsh boroughs generally, and the case of Haverfordwest in particular, formed the great blot on the Bill. It was ridiculous to say that the Bill was one to equalize population; for if that was the principle of the Bill the principle was violated in every line, and it was only invoked in this particular case of Haverfordwest, which, being a Welsh town, it was no doubt convenient should be forced into the borough of Pembroke. A little trick was being played in the case of Haverfordwest. The great towns of Wales, such as Pembroke, were really not Welsh, but English towns; the people who lived in them were English; they were, in fact, a little England in Wales. What was done by the clause was to destroy this little English element, by importing into the Dockyard constituency a number of small Welsh agricultural villages. In this case, Haverfordwest was Welsh, and there was no reason why it should be merged into Pembroke, except that it was hoped thereby to insure the return of a Radical candidate. ["Oh, oh!"] Of course, it was no use talking. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Kensington) had his big battalion down on this occasion. After the experience of Friday, the Government Whips would be more careful, particularly on an occasion like the present. He repeated that the proposal was in shocking bad taste. It was an entire violation of the whole principle of the Bill to save Haverfordwest by adding it to the Pembroke group. It had no affinity with the Pembroke boroughs; and though the noble Lord opposite (Lord Kensington) had quoted local feeling in favour of the proposal, he would ask in what other instance had local feeling been allowed to prevail in the arrangements of this Bill? The Government had a shocking bad case, and he should certainly vote against it.

MR. W. DAVIES said, as Member for the county of Pembroke, he trusted he might be permitted to say a word on this subject. He was very much amused by the observation of the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken (Mr. Gorst) that Haverfordwest was a Welsh town. That showed what he knew about it. Haverfordwest was a purely English town. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed. Why, he was born in it—was educated in it—had resided in it; but he could not speak a word of Welsh. It was a very extensive town—it was a large town with a small population. He did know something about Haverfordwest and about the county of Pembroke, and a little more about them than the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Emlyn). It was so much on a par with Pembroke Dock and Denbigh that scarcely any distinction could be drawn between them, all being English places. If the noble Viscount had gone into the matter, he would have found that nearly the whole of Pembroke Dock was in favour of the scheme proposed by the Government. [Laughter.] That was true, because he had inquired into it. It had actually been proposed to him that a Petition should be presented to that House on the subject; but he had discountenanced the proposal, but strong representations had been made in favour of grouping these towns. The noble Viscount was attempting to convert Haverfordwest from town into county. Haverfordwest was one of the ancient boroughs of the Kingdom, and sent Members to Parliament before Wales sent any at all. Why, therefore, should it now be extinguished and merged in a county—a proceeding which its inhabitants strongly objected to? Moreover, if the proposal of the noble Viscount were adopted, between 200 and 300 electors of Haverfordwest would be disfranchised. [An hon. MEMBER: Why?] That showed that hon. Members opposite had not investigated the thing. At present, they voted for the borough as occupiers, and they also voted for the county as freeholders; but if the town was merged in the county they would only have their county vote. That ought to weigh with the House. The population of Pembrokeshire was now 57,000; why, therefore, should it be increased to 64,000? To increase it to that extent would be to add to the expense of standing for his county, although he had no doubt that it would also add to his majority. Upon that ground the increase would be most objectionable, and he ventured to hope that the Amendment would not be carried.

MR. WARTON, in opposing the insertion of the clause, said that there were two or three jobs in the Bill, but that this was the greatest. [Cries of "Divide!"] He could well understand the impatience of the Liberal Party. Hon. Members opposite were so ashamed of this job that they wanted to hurry it through without any discussion.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that it was perfectly true that he had received a letter from Haverfordwest, asking the reason for the vote he had given in respect of this matter on a former occasion; and as he intended to repeat that vote he desired to give his reason for doing so. There were two principles in the Bill which ought to be adhered to—one was that, as far as England and Wales were concerned, the grouping of towns was not allowed; and the other was that boroughs of less than 1,400 electors were to be merged in their counties. In his opinion, no satisfactory grounds had been shown for departing from those two recognized principles in the present case; and he should, therefore, vote against the proposal.

The House divided:—Ayes 206; Noes 117: Majority 89.—(Div. List, No. 133.)

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he hoped the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would not persist in adding to this borough two places, one of 1,100, and the other of only 15 population. He, therefore, moved an Amendment, with a view of excluding from the borough Fishguard and Narberth, to the effect that the municipal borough (and not the present Parliamentary borough) of Haverfordwest should be included in the new Parliamentary borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest.

Amendment proposed,

In line 2, to leave out the words "the places comprised in the area of the present Parliamentary," and insert the word "Municipal,"—(Viscount Emlyn,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not accept the Amendment, which would break up the town in a perfectly artificial fashion.

The House divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 108: Majority 88.—(Div. List, No. 134.)

Clause added.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out Clause 27, (dealing with the disqualification of voters for corrupt practices), and to insert the following clause:—

(Repeal of Acts in Eighth Schedule respecting corrupt practices.)

"The Acts mentioned in the First Part of the Eighth Schedule to this Act, whereby certain persons reported guilty of corrupt practices are declared not to have certain rights of voting, are hereby repealed to the extent in the third column of that Schedule mentioned," said, the House was, no doubt, aware of the object of the new clause which he now moved. When the House was in Committee on the Bill, and while discussing the clause, he thought that the general feeling of the Committee was that the penalty with respect to defaulting voters as having been guilty of corrupt practices in 1880 should be mitigated to seven years' disqualification. He understood the opinion of the House to be strongly expressed in favour of that mitigated penalty; and, therefore, the clause was amended in that respect. It, therefore, became necessary that the punishment inflicted on corrupt voters should be equalized, and the object of this clause was to deal with the voters disqualified by previous legislation. There were, he believed, 10 boroughs which had been disqualified, among them being Beverley, Bridgwater, Totnes, Reigate, Norwich, Great Yarmouth, Sligo, and Cashel. Inasmuch as it had been agreed that the voters who were disqualified on account of corrupt practices in 1880 were to suffer only seven years' disqualification, it was impossible to maintain an inequality of punishment in respect of the disqualified voters of those boroughs, and to allow the disqualifications to remain as they were. The disqualified voters in those boroughs had suffered disqualification for a period not less than 14 years, and some had gone considerably beyond that period. With the object, therefore, of imposing equal punishment on all disqualified voters, he now proposed this clause, with the object of bringing those voters to life again, and to allow them to vote at elections. The number of voters thus restored would be practically very small. Probably one-third of the persons who had originally been disqualified only remained to be registered. These being the circumstances of the case, he hoped the House would accept the new clause. If the clause were agreed to, it would be necessary to omit Clause 27, and he should move to do so at a later stage.

Clause (Repeal of Acts in Eighth Schedule respecting corrupt practices,)—(Mr. Attorney General,)—brought up, and read the first and second time.

Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

MR. BIRKBECK, who had two new clauses on the Paper for the removal of the disqualification of certain voters in Norwich and Great Yarmouth, said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, in moving the clause under notice as he had, had accepted the principle of the two new clauses which stood in his (Mr. Birkbeck's) name, and had been on the Notice Paper some days prior to the Attorney General's new clause. This Amendment on the part of the Government would be greatly appreciated by the disqualified voters of Norwich and Great Yarmouth. There would now be no necessity for his moving the new clauses which stood in his name, and he should consequently withdraw them.

MR. HEALY asked, with regard to the freemen of Dublin, by what means they could get again upon the Roll; and whether they would have to go through all the formalities which they would have to go through when coming on as new men? They were an extremely corrupt class, and were generally taken out of the workhouses, given a new suit of clothes, in order to go to the poll, and after having spent the sovereign which they got for the vote went back again to the workhouse. Under ordinary circumstances, the freemen of Dublin had to pay something like 10s. as a fee to the Town Clerk. He wished to know whether the freemen would be, by this clause, entitled to be put back in globo on the voters' lists? It would be a very unfortunate state of affairs if they were. Frightful corruption had been proved against them; and it had been proved in the case of Lord Ardilaun, formerly Sir Arthur Guinness, that whole oceans of beer, as well as money, had been spent in corrupting them. For the purpose of giving the Government an opportunity of considering the matter, he would move that this clause do not apply to the freemen of Dublin.

Amendment proposed,

To add at end of Clause the words, "Provided, That this clause do not apply to the freemen of the City of Dublin."—(Mr. Healy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would consider the matter. He would, however, point out that the object of the hon. and learned Member could be attained better by his moving the Amendment in a later part of the Bill.

MR. HEALY said, he would accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

MR. HEALY, in moving as an Amendment, in page 2, after Clause 8, to insert the following Clause:—

(Corporation or town commissioners may revise ward boundaries.)

"Within twelve months after the passing of this Act it shall be lawful for the corporation or town commissioners of any town, city, or borough in Ireland to rearrange the ward boundaries of such city, town, or borough, provided that in no case shall the number of wards in any constituency be increased or diminished," said, the clause was necessary in consequence of the manner in which the wards were cut up by the Boundary Commissioners. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some provision to enable the voters' lists to be properly prepared. The ward was the unit of municipal life, and the voters' lists were prepared by wards; and unless the boundaries of the wards were not co-terminous with the boundaries of the Parliamentary division, great confusion, trouble, and expense would be created. In both Dublin and Belfast the wards had been divided. He hoped the Government would accept the clause, or insert some equivalent proposition.

Clause (Corporation or town commissioners may revise ward boundaries,)—(Mr. Healy,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he agreed in substance with the desire of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy), but not with the mode in which he sought to give effect to it. It was a hardship that the municipalities in Ireland could not alter their wards without an Act of Parliament, as they did in England; but the present proposal was not germane to the Bill. Perhaps, however, some measure would be brought in—it might be in this Session—dealing with that subject.

MR. HEALY said, he was willing to withdraw his clause; but he would point out to the right hon. Baronet that unless the Government attended speedily to the matter it would be too late. He supposed the Revision Courts could sit a month earlier this year, and the Town Councils were now preparing the lists.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "end of."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words 'end of' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 27, to leave out the words "cease to be entitled to," in order to insert the word "not,"—(Mr. Warton,)

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON, in moving an Amendment giving the City of London four Members instead of two, said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill would now see his way to accepting the Amendment, when it would no longer interfere with the main principle of the Bill. There was one point upon which he wished to make some remarks—that was, the subject of the Livery vote in the City. It was not the case that the Livery vote gave a citizen of London two votes, as seemed to have been supposed. After the full discussion which the question of the City representation had received, he would not go into the matter at greater length, but would ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to waive the objection which he had on a former occasion taken to his proposal.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, to leave out the word "two," in order to insert the word "four,"—(Mr. Alderman Cotton,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'two' stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the question had been decided in a very large House; and, considering the way in which the Committee had decided it, he thought that it was not desirable that he should re-open on the present occasion the arguments which he had used before. The hon. Member had remarked that the question of the Livery vote ought not to have been made so much of, because it did not give two votes. Of course, it did not give two votes for the same constituency; but it increased the voting constituency. He must ask the House to re-affirm its former decision.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, he wished to protest, although he knew it would be unavailing, against the taking away of two Members from the City. He was aware that it was only a protest, because they all knew that all these matters had been settled before they had been brought under the notice of the House. They were even deprived of the Court of Appeal, which they might have found in the House of Lords, since the arrangements come to between the Leaders of the two Parties were binding there also. The defence made by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) on this point was utterly invalid; he had maintained that by giving up, or rather throwing over, the City of London, he had gained advantages for his Party which he would not otherwise have obtained. For his own part, he (Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence) protested against the mode in which this matter had been settled, and the manner in which the City had been treated. The citizens of London felt that they had been unjustly dealt with by the Bill, and that there had been a want of appreciation and a want of knowledge of the commerce, the trade, and the exceptional circumstances of the City. He should not be doing his duty unless he protested in the strongest possible manner against the conduct of the Leaders of the two sides in settling this question behind the backs of the City of London—it ought to have been left to the decision of both Houses of Parliament. A great deal had been made of the sleeping population in the City; but there was a day and night population of the City which was not a sleeping population. The arguments drawn from the Census population were of the most fallacious kind. The history of the City of London was a glorious history, and he was astonished that it should have been disregarded by the persons who had prepared the Bill. There was once a Cecil who had appealed to the City for assistance in the Plantation of Ulster, at a time when the Crown found it impossible to obtain Colonists on the proposals placed before the public. The City responded to that appeal; the flourishing Cities of Londonderry and Coleraine were evidences of the success of that arrangement. From that time to the present there had been the most intimate relations between the Cecils and the City of London. He regretted that a Cecil should now have joined in a scheme to deprive the City of half its Members. Those who had arranged the clause had shown their incompetence to deal with the matter.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, that although he felt bound to reiterate his opinion that taking away two Members from the City of London was a great blot on the Bill, he would ask permission to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. WARTON, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 3, leave out “borough,” and insert “boroughs.”

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 16, leave out “comprised,” and insert “or as regards the greater part thereof in extent comprised within the Metropolis, and.”

On the Motion of Mr. WARTON, page 2, line 18, at end, add “as a borough.”

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 23, at end of line, insert—

“And shall not include the places which are either therein specified and described as excluded, or are included by this Act in any other Parliamentary borough.”

Mr. Alderman W. Lawrence

MR. HEALY, in moving the following Amendment to Clause 8, which provides that boroughs in the Sixth Schedule should be divided into divisions:—

“Provided, That this section, so far as it applies to the city of Dublin, shall only remain in force until the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, and no longer,” said, he should be content to leave it to the future Lord Lieutenant to find out what the boundaries should be. They all knew that Dublin was jerrymandered in the interests of the Tory Party; and, of course, if under the jerrymandered scheme the Tories got one seat, no objection would be made. But if, at the General Election, the Nationalists were able to carry all the four seats, there could be no necessity for maintaining the present ridiculous and absurd boundaries.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 36, after the word “Schedule,” to insert the words “Provided, That this section, so far as it applies to the city of Dublin, shall only remain in force until the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, and no longer.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was sorry that he could not accept the Amendment any more than he could accept the one made at an earlier stage of the proceedings. It would place the alteration of the boundaries in the hands of a body of persons other than Parliament, and that could not be agreed to. The arrangement proposed by the Bill was, upon the whole, a satisfactory one, and ought not to be open to disturbance.

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR said, he must express his regret that the Amendment was not accepted.

MR. GIBSON said, he thought the boundaries of the City of Dublin were very fairly drawn; and in saying that he happened to have the advantage, which was not possessed by the two previous speakers, of being a Dublin man.

MR. HEALY: I live there too, and pay taxes there as well.

MR. GIBSON said, he was born in Dublin and knew the locality, and he was convinced the boundaries in the Bill were fair, reasonable, and convenient. The Amendment proposed to give to the Corporation of Dublin the power to upset the arrangements with regard to the boundaries of Dublin which Parliament in its wisdom had laid down; but he (Mr. Gibson) was sure that Parliament would never allow any power other than itself to interfere with the boundaries. Besides, it would be inconvenient in the highest degree to declare in an Act of Parliament that the arrangements were of a temporary character.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. WARTON moved, as an Amendment, to leave out Sub-section 3 of Clause 8, which provides that in the boroughs to be divided a man shall not vote in more than one division. The property qualification, he contended, ought not to be infringed.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 37, to leave out sub-section (3) of Clause 8.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in opposing the Amendment, said, it was contrary to the principle of the Bill. The sub-section did not apply to counties; and in the case of large towns he did not see why, for instance, a man with a number of shops in all the leading thoroughfares should have the right to vote in all the divisions. The clause in no way interfered with the property qualification which did not exist in boroughs.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the principle of one man one vote, as applied to the boroughs, ought to be extended to the counties. He could understand it if it were so extended.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not see why a man with the necessary qualification should not have votes in the various divisions of a large town; but, while he sympathized with the object of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton), as the matter had been practically settled by what had occurred previously, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press his Amendment.

MR. HICKS said, he was sorry that, for one, he could not accept the advice of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). He objected most strongly to the disfranchisement of property proposed by this provision—a disfranchisement totally at variance with the provisions of all previous alterations of the franchise; and he thought the House ought to go to a division on the question. He did not know whether this particular point was included within the terms of the celebrated agreement of which they had heard so much; but, if it was, he trusted that the right hon. Members on the Front Opposition Bench would for once have the courage of their convictions, and vote for that which in their hearts they must feel to be right.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HEALY, in moving to amend the clause by the insertion of the following words:—

"A person shall not be registered as entitled to vote and shall not vote in any Parliamentary borough who is registered as a voter in any county constituency continuous with such borough," said, he would point out that people living in Rathmines, and having places of business in Dublin, had a dual power of voting. The Boundary Commissioners had so jerrymandered the county and City of Dublin that these people would have power to vote in the South-Western Division of Dublin City, and had also a neat little paddock in the county to prance in. He found that the chief of that Commission (Mr. Piers White) had already been preconized as successor to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland when that Gentleman would become Attorney General, on the promotion of Mr. Naish to the Lord Chancellorship, so that his reward had followed quickly on his services to the Government in this respect.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 39, after the word "division," to insert the words "A person shall not be registered as entitled to vote and shall not vote in any Parliamentary borough who is registered as a voter in any county constituency continuous with such borough."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not assent to the proposition, which had been fully discussed on previous occasions. The hon. and learned Member had done, on the present occasion, what he did when this question was last before the House—he had treated it as if Dublin had a greater grievance than existed elsewhere. But the case of Dublin was precisely the same as the case of London and Glasgow.

MR. GRAY said, the argument of the right hon. Baronet amounted to this—that two wrongs made a right. But there was a special grievance, because of the artificial character of the boundaries of the City.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR supported the Amendment.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 107: Majority 90.—(Div. List, No. 135.)

MR. HEALY, in moving to amend the same clause by the insertion of the following words:—

“A person shall not be registered to vote and shall not vote in any borough where a university is situate who is registered as a voter for such university,” said, that his Amendment embodied the one man one vote principle, which Liberals professed in theory. Universities were, he thought, sufficiently represented already, without giving those resident in them votes outside those given for University Members. In Dublin they had 200 persons out of Trinity College on the Electoral Roll of the City as lodgers; and he doubted whether the same thing existed in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh. It was bad enough to have such voters on the Roll; but matters were made worse when the Commissioners put them into the South-Western or jerrymandered Division. In addition to the borough representation, those gentlemen at present had also the advantage of representation by the two Members on the Front Opposition Bench for Dublin University. He thought that two Members were representation enough for them. If the Government could not accept his Amendment, he contended that they, at least, should accept an Amendment to the effect that a person should not qualify as an elector outside of University premises. To allow him to so qualify was to inflict a great hardship on the permanent voters of Dublin.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 39, after the word “division,” to insert the words “A person shall not be registered to vote and shall not vote in any borough where a university is situate who is registered as a voter for such university.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would point out that the hon. and learned Member's speech covered a great deal more than his Amendment. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought it was unnecessary to repeat to the hon. and learned Member what he had already said on a previous occasion with respect to his individual opinion on the question of the double vote. As it had been found necessary, however, to concede something on this head for the purpose of carrying the measure through Parliament, the question of the double qualification had been agreed to as a matter of arrangement between the two Parties. He could not accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member. He did not believe that the double voting power was possessed by those who voted for University Members; but he would promise to look very closely into the matter.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the point raised by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) was that persons having votes for University Members within the walls of a University had also votes for Members of Parliament out of chambers in the University in the division in which those chambers were situate. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was confident of the existence of the double qualification. It was a monstrous injustice that a man should have a vote as a graduate of the University of Dublin, and should, at the same time, be at liberty to go outside the gates of the University to another polling booth, and record a vote for one of the Members for a division of the City. That was one of the greatest and most grievous absurdities in the whole Bill.

MR. BIGGAR supported the Amendment.

MR. PLUNKET said, that if the Dublin University students were deprived of the right to exercise the franchise in virtue of their occupation holdings, they would be the only persons in the community who were debarred their right of doing so.

MR. GRAY said, that the Amendment on the Paper raised a very important question as to whether students of a University were, owing to the accident of being within the walls of a College for two or three years, really the persons intended by Parliament to come within the designation of lodgers at all? However, the effect of the Amendment made the issue a very much narrower one. It was a question as to whether persons in a College or University should be entitled to two votes, one for the University, and another for the constituency in which the University happened to be situate? In the case of Dublin City, the question was whether the graduates should vote for the Members who represented that University, and also for other Members of the House. He would ask whether the lodger franchise had been ever intended to cover the case of students whose fees, &c. were paid by their parents while they were inmates of a College?

MR. THOMAS RUSSELL said, the difficulties suggested by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy) applied to the Scottish Universities as well as to the Dublin University; but the remedy was not to be found in the restriction proposed by the hon. Member. What they wanted to do was to abolish the University representation altogether.

The House divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 88: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 136.)

MR. HEALY moved an Amendment standing in his name on the Paper to the effect that, in cases where a candidate was stated to have already voted owing to the mischance that he had received voting papers for two districts, the Returning Officer should be allowed to ask the question—"Have you already voted for this division," and to administer the oath.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 39, after the word "division," to insert the words "and if by any neglect or accident the same person should be registered as a voter for more than one division, and the attention of the returning officer or his deputy is called to the fact on or before the day of polling, such returning officer or deputy shall administer to such voter on oath the question prescribed by section twelve, sub-section four, of this Act."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that this was a matter which should be settled before the Election. The matter had been very carefully considered by the Boundary Commissioners for England; and he thought that the hon. and learned Member had better not interfere in any way until the discussion on the English Registration Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY, in moving an Amendment to omit from the clause the subsection which provides that the polls in a divided borough shall take place on the same day, said, he would point out that no similar provision was made in regard to counties, and that to impose this obligation on Returning Officers was needlessly to increase the expense. He saw no reason why the same staff should not be employed where possible upon different days in the different divisions in the same boroughs, in order to lessen the expense.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2 line 40, to leave out from the word "at" to the word "borough," in line 42.—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could not accept the Amendment, because he believed, if it were agreed to, that it would lead to great inconvenience, especially in the large boroughs of England and Scotland—such, for instance, as Liverpool, with nine divisions. He thought the advantage in saving would be counteracted by the facility which it would give to organizations of a formidable kind to go round the town with money or other inducements to voters. He did not, however, attach much importance to either of these arguments; but he thought that a town would be considerably disturbed if different days were taken up in polling.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY, in moving an Amendment to the effect that nothing in Sub-section 4 of the clause, which enables the Returning Officer to fix the polls in a divided borough for the same day, should be taken to enlarge or extend the discretion vested in the Returning Officer by the Ballot Act of 1872 as to fixing the day of poll, said, he thought that in order to prevent any Returning Officer exceeding his powers the day should be fixed in accordance with the provisions of the Ballot Act of 1872.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 42, at end, insert "but nothing in this sub-section shall be taken to extend the discretion vested in him by the Ballot Act of 1872, as to fixing the day of poll."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that a difficulty of the kind suggested by the hon. and learned Member might arise in the case of some Returning Officers; and the Government would, therefore, accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 42, after the word "borough," to insert the words, "who shall not be entitled to charge for his expenses to all the candidates, in all the Divisions collectively, a greater sum than he would have been able to obtain if this Act had not passed, the expenses for each candidate to be ascertained by dividing the number of candidates for the borough, as a whole, into the amount now allowed by law."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he agreed that it would be necessary to pass a clause on the subject brought forward by the hon. and learned Member; but the proper place to do so would be in the Returning Officers' Expenses Bill. On the part of the Government, he would undertake to have the matter looked into.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Division of counties).

MR. HEALY said, he had been requested by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to move an Amendment in regard to the dividing of Irish counties into divisions. Except, perhaps, in the case of the Ulster counties and the county of Dublin, the Amendment, if carried, would make no great change. Why should a county like Longford be divided into divisions, when there was no increase whatever in the representation? No political effect could arise in the case of the counties referred to. Nothing would be gained but the casting of extra expense on the Parnellite Party, who would gain their seats all the same. It was only another instance of the error of applying English ideas to an Irish situation. Where counties returned an increased number of Members he could understand why the division was made, because a new political situation would be created; but why counties having the same complement of Members as of yore should be divided he could not understand. He regarded the single-Member constituency principle with aversion, and believed it would ultimately break down. But for that the National Party would have 90 seats instead of 80, and something like 17 or 18 seats in England. The single-Member principle applied to Ireland would give the Tory Party votes they would not otherwise gain, depriving the National Party of the majority they were entitled to. Thus, in Donegal the Tories would gain one seat, in Tyrone two, in Derry two, in Armagh two; whereas in all these cases, except Armagh, the Catholic National Party were in the majority. Then take the converse case—in Antrim, and any other instance, except Down, would the Nationalists gain thereby? He saw no reason for interfering with a constituency which the Bill did not benefit.

Mr. Healy

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 6, after the word "shall," to insert the words "except in the case of the county of Dublin and the counties in the province of Ulster."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. TREVELYAN, in opposing the Amendment, said, the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy) advocated a departure, in the case of only a part of Ireland, from the general principle upon which the Bill was framed as regarded all counties. It was impossible, in a matter of this sort, to have regard to local circumstances, or to the bearings which the division or the non-division of counties would have on any political Party, and he should be sorry to believe that in any part of the Kingdom there should continue to be no political stir whatever. An advantage of small constituencies was that it gave variety of representation, and 50,000 was a better number of constituents to represent than 100,000 in a double constituency, say, for instance, such as Newcastle-upon-Tyne. It admitted of exactly that mixture of political and personal relations between constituents and Members which produced the most healthy representation. The Bill applied the general principle all around, irrespective of local political circumstances. That principle had been argued over and over again, and it was impossible on this occasion to depart from it; indeed, he almost thought the Amendment was only moved as a final protest.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR, in supporting the Amendment, said, he disapproved entirely of the system of single-Member districts. He also objected to the general principle and description of the Bill just given. There was no arrangement of political life in America against which politicians protested more than the single-Member constituency. Through its operation a large number of eminent men were excluded from the National Councils, because they had no home in a constituency they might otherwise represent. The very fact of a man having personal connection with a locality was often the best reason why he was not returned. A prophet was not always regarded in his own country. The Bill, however, presented several exceptions to the rule, and the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to one, for instance, Newcastle, as a double constituency. Why not apply the exception to Ireland? To secure variety of representation he granted an advantage; but the advantage in Ireland gained by dividing the Ulster counties, would be purchased at the cost of giving the minority an excess of representation far beyond their fair claim.

MR. PLUNKET said, he felt himself in some confusion as to what was the object of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) when he placed the Amendment on the Paper, if it was not with the object of gaining a political advantage. At first, he thought the Amendment must be misprinted. The arguments by the hon. Members who had supported the Amendment were ingenious, and directed against the whole principle of single-Member constituencies; but the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork would apply this obnoxious principle to all Ireland except the Province of Ulster. The fact was, the only possible object was a most unblushing, audacious attempt as far as possible to extinguish the minority in the only place where that minority had a chance of being represented.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the principal point in the controversy was the question of convenience and reduction of the Returning Officer's expenses, and he should not think the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) could be fairly accused of political selfishness. There need not be a great anxiety for consistency in the Bill. No Bill ever passed that did not contain some anomalies. On the considerations he had mentioned, he supported the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in order to meet the case of certain Irish counties, and that of the alternative names of county divisions, he would move to amend the clause by the insertion of the following words:—

“And any name placed before the description of a division shall be the name of the division, and where the names of the divisions are in the alternative, the division may be designated by both or either of such names.”

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, to insert the words—

“And any name placed before the description of a division shall be the name of the division, and where the names of the divisions are in the alternative, the division may be designated by both or either of such names.”—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. WARTON, in proposing the omission from the Amendment of the words “and any name placed before the description of a division shall be the name of the division,” said, he would refer more especially to Birr and Tullamore, as names which could not stand alone.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words—

“And any name placed before the description of a division shall be the name of the division, and.”—(Mr Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had been no party to prolonging discussion on names, which he thought unimportant, and, while he was disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) as to the names mentioned, the objection to them would not, in his opinion, be met by the Amendment.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would point out that some confusion might arise by one authority using one name and another another in referring to these divisions. In that case, who was to be the authority to exercise the discretion given by the right hon. Gentleman in the selection of a name?

Question put, and agreed to.

Original Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply to the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners), said, the overseer would select the name. It might be possible to create uniformity when they came to the Schedules; but he should point out that it was the House in Committee, and not the Government, who had pushed forward this matter of alternative designations.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that different overseers might select different names, and that would lead to confusion. The Quarter Sessions might be a fit authority.

MR. WARTON proposed to amend the Amendment, by rendering it obligatory that where there were two names both should be used.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "may," and insert the word "shall," — (Mr. Warton,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Registration Bill was to come into operation within seven days. He was afraid that in connection with the retention of alternative names there might be difficulty with respect to the names under the Registration Bill, which might come into operation before this Bill.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he had already pressed the same view on the House. He should have preferred that there was no alternative name; but the Committee on the Bill had decided otherwise. The matter would, however, have to be reconsidered when the Schedules were reached, and he would meanwhile give attention to the subject.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, on the whole, he thought it might be the better course to get rid of the alternative names, especially as in some cases both the alternative names were taken from localities. Before that was done, however, the subject would require serious consideration.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, no doubt, as he had just said, the subject would have to be reconsidered on another occasion.

Original Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. GREGORY, Amendment amended, by adding the words "thereof for all purposes."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Qualification by occupation of premises in immediate succession in divided borough).

MR. HEALY, in moving an Amendment in the clause, the effect of which would be to make the law uniform for boroughs and counties with regard to qualification by successive occupation, said, he did not see why qualification by successive occupation should be confined to the boroughs alone.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 22, to leave out the words "situate within any division of a Parliamentary borough shall." — (Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'situate within any' stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the matter had been fully discussed on an Amendment of his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Firth), and he did not now wish to re-open the question. He thought the House would be more inclined to move in the direction of shortening the qualifying periods than of extending the application of the principle of qualification by successive occupation.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 22, to leave out the word "division," in order to insert the word "part,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke), Question proposed, "That the word 'division' stand part of the Bill."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 11 (Returning officers in new boroughs).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendments made:—In page 4, lines 12 to 27, leave out sub-sections (4.) and (5.); line 33, leave out from "case" to "the," in line 34; and in line 36, after "boroughs," insert—

"To the mayor of which the writ has before the passing of this Act been directed, or if it has not been directed to any such mayor, then to the mayor of that one of the municipal boroughs."

MR. HEALY, in moving the insertion of an Amendment, constituting in the boroughs of Newry and Galway the Chairman of Town Commissioners the Returning Officer instead of the Sheriff, said, he made this proposal on no political grounds whatever, but simply to uphold the dignity of the office of the Chairman of Town Commissioners. In Ireland there were very few boroughs now left. He believed that in Belfast and one or two other places, the Mayor was the Returning Officer; while in Cork, Kilkenny, and one or two other places, the Sheriff was the Returning Officer. He had also reason to believe that the Chairman of the Newry Town Commissioners was a Conservative, so that no one could imagine that his (Mr. Healy's) object in moving the adoption of the Amendment was in any sense a political one. Up to the time of James I. Newry had a Charter. James repealed all the old Charters, and gave Newry a new one; but when William III. came in he abolished all James's Charters. Only for that, Newry would now be a corporate town, and, of course, entitled to its Mayor, who would be the Returning Officer.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 44, to insert the words,—“In Ireland, in the boroughs of Newry and Galway, the chairman of town commissioners shall be the returning officer instead of the sheriff.”—(Mr. Healy).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had followed the case of the hon. and learned Member with regard to Newry, and although he knew very little about that place, he thought the case was a good one, and that there was something in what had been said. As to Galway, however, he could not follow the hon. and learned Gentleman so well, for that was a county of a town, and to pass over the Sheriff of a county of a town would be to create an anomaly. He must, therefore, oppose the Amendment.

MR. LEWIS said, he also opposed the Amendment, contending that the House was now asked to introduce a new thing in the history of elections, and to create a precedent. It was quite true the Chairman of the Town Commissioners answered all the purposes of the Mayor; but, after all, the Mayor was an officer of long standing, whose position and duties were well understood. He thought the House should be careful how they created precedents in these matters, and he hoped the Government would not consent to make an exception in the case of these boroughs. They recognized the Mayor and Sheriff as Returning Officers; but he knew of no case in England in which the Chairman of a Local Board was made the Returning Officer.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, as far as he knew, there was no instance of such a creation of a Returning Officer by legislation as was now proposed. In no case he knew of was the Chairman of a Local Board a Returning Officer. They were asked in this case to create new Returning Officers, and he must confess that his instinct was against it. On that account, he could not agree to the hon. and learned Member's proposal.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he supported the Amendment with regard to Newry. He believed that Newry was altogether in an anomalous position, as it was difficult to ascertain who was really the chief man in the borough.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the Returning Officer for Newry, under the Bill, would be the Sheriff of the County Down, who would have the same duties to perform for the whole of the divisions in the county. He was already the Returning Officer for the four divisions of the county, and also for the four divisions of the city of Belfast, and if the borough of Newry were added, there would, in fact, be only one Returning Officer for nine divisions, which he (Mr. O'Connor) considered to be a very anomalous position. It was, therefore, he contended, a case where a separate Returning Officer was required. He therefore asked the House to make a special provision for this case. He did not think the case of Galway was as strong as that of Newry, and they had a Sheriff there.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought the Sheriff of the County Down need not be frightened at having to act for nine constituencies, seeing that the High Sheriff of Lancashire would be Returning Officer for 23 constituencies.

MR. SEXTON said, he thought that the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) should be adopted if for no other reason than because it would establish uniformity in eight of the nine boroughs left in Ireland, in all of which they had a local urban Returning Officer. The local officer in authority for the time being would be the Returning Officer, and he wanted to know why Newry should be made an exception? The Chairman of the Town Commissioners was a most suitable officer for the position of Returning Officer; and he was sure the Conservative Town Commissioners of the town of Newry would not be very thankful to the Conservative Member for Derry (Mr. Lewis) when they found that he was the man who was particularly opposed to their obtaining this simple act of justice and convenience.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would point out that the Sheriff of County Down had always acted as Returning Officer for Newry.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the remedy appeared to be rather to give a Corporation to the town of Newry.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought it was obvious that Newry was entitled to have the Chairman of the Town Commissioners as the Returning Officer at elections. It was a very ancient town, for it was mentioned by Dean Swift, who said it was—“High Church, low steeple, Dirty streets, proud people.”

So that it was an important town in Dean Swift's time, and he really saw no reason why it should be treated in the exceptional manner proposed under the Bill. If it were the county town, the case might be different; but it was situated at the very extremity of the county; in fact, part of the town was in the county of Armagh, and the county town was a long way off, so that the Sheriff would have to travel a long way to perform his duties. The Chairman of the Town Commissioners was thoroughly competent to perform the duties, and he certainly ought to have the position of Returning Officer.

MR. HEALY said, he should like to have the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke) on the matter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that, no doubt, Newry would be the exception in Ireland; but if the Amendment was passed, it would be an exception also to the general rule in the United Kingdom, and consequently exceptions would also have to be made in other instances.

MR. LEAMY supported the Amendment, and asked if the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill could point out any reason for treating Newry in an exceptional manner? He thought the Conservatives of Newry would be very much surprised to find that the only Irish Member who opposed the Resolution was the hon. Member for Derry, and after all he was an Englishman.

MR. ARCHDALE said, he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). He thought it quite immaterial where the Returning Officer was located; but he looked with great suspicion upon anything brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan, because it was generally against the Irish Church.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 29; Noes 109: Majority 80.—(Div. List, No. 157.)

Other Amendments made.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 12 (As to boroughs divided into divisions).

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 3, after the word "may," to insert the words "in and for any one or more of such divisions."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 15, after the word "voter," to insert the words "except non-resident free-men in Dublin."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 5, line 23, to insert an Amendment, the object of which was to compel the townships of Pembroke and Blackrock to repay the Corporation of Dublin the expense incurred in the preparation of the lists of Parliamentary voters in those townships.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 23, after the word "series," to insert the words,—“For the preparation of the lists in the city of Dublin, the Commissioners of the townships of Pembroke and Blackrock shall repay to the Treasurer of the Corporation of Dublin the expense of making out the lists for such portion of these townships as are situate within the Parliamentary borough of Dublin.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON said, he would invite the right hon. Baronet to give his serious attention to this matter. It would be unfair to throw the expense on Dublin.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would admit that this was an anomaly, and he thought it would be properly dealt with in the Registration Bill.

MR. HEALY: Will you introduce a clause to that effect in the Registration Bill?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would do so.

MR. HEALY remarked that a Registration Bill was introduced, and yet the Government without pressure would not remedy this injustice to the ratepayers of the City of Dublin.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Another Amendment made.

Clause 15 (As to place of election).

MR. HEALY (for Mr. SMALL) moved, as an Amendment, in page 6, line 35, to leave out the words "county at large," in order to insert "division." He thought it unfair that the Sheriff, who in Ireland was almost always opposed to the popular Party, should have it in his power to appoint a place for nominating the candidates and counting of the votes which might not be in the division for which the election was held. Perhaps the best way of dealing with the matter would be to give any candidate power to serve the Sheriff with a notice requiring him to name a place within the division.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 35, to leave out the words "county at large," and insert the word "division,"—(Mr. Healy.)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'county at large' stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he must oppose the Amendment on the ground that in some county divisions in Ireland there were no towns containing adequate accommodation for the officers conducting nomination proceedings and those connected with the counting of votes.

MR. SEXTON said, he would ask the House to consider the importance of this question in the case of Ireland. Although there might not be a town in some of the divisions, he believed there were none in which there was not to be found a pretty considerable village which would be available. There was no division without a Petty Sessional Court or a police barrack. His hon. and learned Friend proposed that a candidate should have the power to compel the Returning Officer to conduct the nomination in some town or village in the very division which contained the constituency. It was not likely that a candidate would propose that the proceedings should take place in a town inconveniently situated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained that in many counties there were central places to which it would be specially easy to bring the ballot-boxes in consequence of the facilities of railway communication. It was reasonable that such a place should, in certain cases, be looked upon as the centre of more than one Division.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that in every division in Ireland sufficient accommodation could be found for the officials engaged in an election. At the same time, there were some Irish districts where the same facilities in the way of railway communication did not exist as in others. He would instance the cases of Cork, Donegal, Mayo, Sligo, and many other parts of Ireland, where great difficulty would in some cases be found in reaching the place selected, if something was not done to meet their requirements.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was afraid that if the Amendment were not agreed to, Sheriffs in Ireland might disregard the convenience of constituencies in fixing the places of nomination.

MR. LEWIS said, that while he generally approved of the objects of the Amendment, its scope was too large. He held that it was not desirable that a polling place should be outside the limits of the county, which was the locus of the election.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he would point out the disadvantages there would be in cases where a county town was adjoining the division, were such an Amendment enforced. A city adjoining a county could only be fixed as the polling-place in cases where the city was geographically, although not technically, within the county.

MR. GRAY said, that the assumptions of the Government had been made upon the understanding apparently that the Returning Officers would be desirous of holding elections at places which would best suit the majority of the electors. Now, he believed that there were some places in Ireland where the opposite course would be taken by Returning Officers, who would throw every obstacle in the way of the electors.

MR. ARCHDALE interposing, said, he felt bound to protest against these statements. He knew several Returning Officers who were quite incapable of such action.

MR. GRAY said, that the hon. Member must be very fortunate in his acquaintances. He (Mr. Gray) had, however, the misfortune to have had quite a contrary experience. He would ask the House to consider in the case of Cork County, in which there were seven divisions, the difficulty which might be cast in the way of the electors by an injudicious selection of a place by the Returning Officer.

MR. DEASY said, that some portions of Cork were 80 miles distant from the City of Cork, and there being great lack of railway communication, the poor people would be put to great expense and inconvenience if their case was not considered.

MR. ARCHDALE said, it was preposterous to imagine that any High Sheriff would bring voters from a distance of 80 miles. As regarded the High Sheriff of the county of Cork, there was no more honourable man in the county.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he hoped the Government would accept the Amendment. It would do away with a possible hardship.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, there was nothing more fatal to the cause of good government in Ireland than the opposition of the Government to the wishes of the Irish Representatives even on such small points. The great majority of the Returning Officers in Ireland were men—"Hear, hear!" He was glad to see that his remarks elicited applause; and he would be glad to extend his remarks for the benefit of those who applauded him. Perhaps, however, before he concluded them those who interrupted him would be the worse for their interruption.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must continue his speech without making any threat to hon. Members of this House.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he hoped the Speaker would save him from interruptions. The great majority of the Returning Officers in Ireland were men who, by their character and position, were distinctly opposed to the wishes and aspirations of the people. In the case of a bye-election in one division of a county, it would be absurd and unwise to carry the turmoil of the election into another division.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, it was possible that, for some reason unknown to him, the arrangements made under this clause might be expedient and convenient in the English counties. He only contended that they were not expedient in Ireland. In England there was no great dispute between Parties; but in Ireland there was a lasting dispute between two great Parties. The great objection, however, to the clause was that an election might take place in a division of a county which was in no way concerned in it. The passing of a clause like that as applied to Ireland could only produce inconvenience and dissatisfaction, and might also create mischief without being attended with any advantage whatever.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, there was a practical difficulty in the working of the clause in Ireland as it stood at present, and it would prove adverse to the true and free expression of the opinion of voters at elections. The hours of nomination as fixed were generally between 12 and 3, and if the nominators and assentors were brought 30 or 40 miles to the nomination in case there was any defect in the nomination paper a serious difficulty might arise. He suggested that it might be retained for the case of England, to the circumstances of which it might be better adapted, but that it was totally unsuitable for Ireland.

MR. KENNY said, he thought it was unfortunate that the President of the Local Government Board had not seen his way to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the county of Monaghan (Mr. Healy). He hoped, however, that the Government would reconsider the matter which had been placed before them. Every argument could be used in favour of the Amendment; and if the Government did not accept it, they would be obliged to press the matter to a division.

MR. MARUM said, that it would undoubtedly be a very great inconvenience in large counties, if the electors were to be compelled to travel great distances. He would urge upon the Government the necessity for considering the matter.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the Government would consider the matter, and confer with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy) on the subject.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY asked if there was any precedent for the result of an election being declared outside the constituency in which the contest took place?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that in cases where there was a large county town adjoining, it had been taken as being in the county for such purposes.

The House divided:—Ayes 164; Noes 35: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 138.)

MR. HEALY moved a further Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for the county of Wexford (Mr. Small), to substitute, in page 6, line 36, "division" for "county at large." He explained that the object of the Amendment was to provide that the place of election in the case of a county at large should be in such town situate in the division as the Local Authority having power to divide the division into polling districts, or Returning Officer, might from time to time determine as being most convenient for the purposes of the election. He regretted the strong opposition which had been manifested by the right hon. Baronet to every proposal put forward by the Irish Party. When they were discussing the boundaries, the right hon. Gentleman defended his action by the necessity of abiding by the decisions of the Boundary Commissioners; but now they had returned to the provisions of the Bill, the right hon. Baronet was quite as adamant. The experience he (Mr. Healy) had gained of the proceedings of that House convinced him that it was only by weariness and iteration that the Irish Members had any chance whatever of inducing the Government to make the slightest concession to their opinions. So far as he was concerned, he was determined not to allow it to be in the power of any High Sheriff in Ireland to inflict an unnecessary hardship upon the voter, and especially the poor voters, in regard to the election arrangements in the baronies. He had gone carefully into this matter, and the only ground adduced by the Government for adhering to the proposal in the Bill was the personal convenience of the Sheriff. Was the convenience of the voter to be set aside altogether? The Sheriff was a well-paid official, who received an exorbitant fee for everything he did. His convenience was to be carefully studied; whereas that of the voter, who discharged his duty without fee or reward, was not to be consulted in the slightest respect. He was to be subjected to the highest inconvenience, in order that a well-paid official should sus-tain none whatever. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the nomination should be held in one of the divided districts; but that was not a suggestion which could be accepted as satisfactory, and for this reason—that the candidate ought to have some voice in the matter. The candidate would know whether there was going to be a contest or not, and he ought to have the power of serving a notice upon the Sheriff requiring him to hold the election in any part of the division he thought proper. As a matter of fact, the Sub-Commissioners, under the Land Act, found themselves obliged to hold their Courts in some of the poorest and most out-of-the-way villages in Ireland; but they found no difficulty in discharging their duties. There were always little school-rooms which were available, in which they were able to hear counsel on both sides, and give their decisions. No difficulty had ever been experienced in these poor and remote areas in finding suitable buildings in which to carry on the work. And yet they were told that they were bound to study the convenience of a Sheriff, who might have to sit for an hour or two in order to receive nomination papers, and perhaps for five or six hours in casting up the votes. The contention of the Government was that the convenience of these officials was so important that it was impossible for them to spend two or three hours in such places as they might be able to find in the county of Mayo or Donegal, or some other out-of-the-way place. The result might be that, when it became necessary to count the votes, the ballot boxes might have to be brought from long distances, and, in a keenly-contested election, they might be besieged and some of them destroyed, and thus the whole election might be rendered void, in consequence of the failure to provide some central place in the division for conducting the elections. It would not be so much in the power of any political Party to tamper with the ballot boxes if the Sheriff were required to sit in a polling-booth in the centre of the division, surrounded by the agents of every Party, determined to see fair play in the counting of the voting papers. If the provision in the Bill were allowed to remain, the Sheriff would undoubtedly hold the election in the place most convenient, not to the county or to the candidate, but to himself, and he would not hesitate to put everybody else to unnecessary expense in bringing up scrutineers. That was a state of affairs to which he, for one, could not assent; and he must say that the Government, in the way in which they had acted in the matter, had exhibited an amount of mulishness which he had hardly anticipated after the extravagant compliments which had been showered upon the right hon. Baronet for his courtesy. As the old poet said—

[First Night.]

“ If she be not fair to me,
What care I how fair she be ? ”

He had noticed, notwithstanding the lavish way in which the right hon. Gentleman had been complimented for his courtesy, that whenever an opportunity was afforded for doing an act of real courtesy to the Irish Party, the right hon. Gentleman declined to take advantage of it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 36, to leave out the words “county at large,” and insert the word “division.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘county at large’ stand part of the Bill.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was afraid that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), having accused him of mulishness, would now accuse him of pusillanimity and weakness, for he was about to surrender at discretion.

MR. HEALY: I beg to withdraw “mulishness.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would consider what he could do in the matter, and he would move a Proviso at the end of the clause to provide that it should not apply to Scotland or Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, that, in asking leave to withdraw the Amendment, he must be permitted to say that this was another instance of the value of Parliamentary pressure.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN AYLMER moved an Amendment, in the same clause, after the word “borough,” to insert the words “or division as the case may be.” His object was to provide that the Returning Officer should have power to determine the most convenient place of election is the case of a Parliamentary borough or "division" of a borough.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had an Amendment to propose which would come before that of the hon. and gallant Member—namely, in line 41, to move the insertion of the words "Provided, That this sub-section shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland."

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 41, to insert the words "Provided, That this sub-section shall not apply to Scotland or Ireland."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DEASY asked what the effect would be in reference to Ireland and Scotland?

MR. EDWARD CLARKE suggested that it would be better for the right hon. Baronet to surrender the sub-section altogether. He had voted in the minority in the division which took place a short time ago, and he could not himself conceive any valid reason for taking the conduct of an election out of the division in which the Member was to be elected. He certainly knew of no division in which it would not be possible to provide a suitable building for conducting the election. It was not likely that any large number of persons would assemble.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Edward Clarke) was returning to a subject which had already been disposed of. This was simply a matter of convenience. The Government had received representations from several localities asking for this clause. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) would be aware that Exeter was a central place for the whole of Devonshire, and was convenient for counting the votes in the case of more divisions than one. The same might be said of Oxford, and several other counties; York, for instance, was very central, and most convenient on account of its railway communication. It was in consequence of the representations which had been made that the clause had been inserted.

MR. ACKERS said, he hoped the Government would not yield upon this point in regard to England as they had consented to do in the case of Ireland. Although it might be a proper mode of dealing with that part of the United Kingdom, there were a considerable number of English constituencies in regard to which it would be a grievance, if they were not able to conduct the business of the election in some places outside a particular county division to which the ballot boxes could be readily conveyed. He would instance Cheltenham, which, for all practical purposes, was the meeting place for the great Cotswold Division, although it was situated outside the division. He earnestly hoped that the convenience of the English constituencies would be consulted as well as those of Ireland.

MR. SEXTON asked whether, as the sub-section was not to apply to Ireland or Scotland, the Returning Officer would be obliged to perform his functions within the division?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE remarked, that, so far as the English constituencies were concerned, Exeter was a case in point. It was a county and a city in itself, and therefore was not included within any division of the county of Devon; but it was unquestionably the most convenient place for holding proceedings in connection with the county elections.

MR. HEALY inquired whether, in order to make the matter perfectly clear to the Sheriffs in Ireland, there would be any objection to add at the end of the clause words to provide that all election proceedings in connection with Ireland and Scotland should be conducted within the division affected?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, it would not be necessary to do that, as it was the law now, and must be the case.

Question put, and agreed to.

CAPTAIN AYLMER then moved, in line 44, after "borough," to insert "or division as the case may be." His object was to insure that the election proceedings in connection with the division of a Parliamentary borough should take place within the division. He thought that was even a more important object in boroughs than in counties. In counties it might be convenient sometimes that the election should take place outside the division; but in boroughs that would be very objectionable, especially in bye-elections, where, from the excited state of public feeling, or some other cause, it would be most undesirable to take persons into another part of the borough in order to hear the poll declared. He thought it would be better to confine the election altogether to the division of the borough to which it belonged.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 44, after the word "borough," to insert the words "or division as the case may be."—(Captain Aylmer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE opposed the Amendment, and remarked that, as a general rule, the convenience of the candidates would be consulted.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, that if his hon. and gallant Friend went to a division, he would vote with him. He thought it would be a most mischievous thing to take the election proceedings out of the limits of the district to which they naturally belonged. He saw no difficulty in the Returning Officer finding within the limits of the division some place in which to conduct the election proceedings.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 17 (Detached parts of parishes).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved an Amendment to substitute the 26th of March, 1885, for the 25th, as the date for determining the constitution of new or detached parts of parishes.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Effect of Schedules).

On the Motion of Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, the following Amendment made:—In page 8, line 23, leave out "and the notes thereto."

MR. WARTON moved an Amendment to leave out the clause, on the ground that it was unnecessary, mere surplusage, and probably a simple freak on the part of the draftsman. Originally, there were notes appended to one or two of the Schedules; but there were none now.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 22 be struck out of the Bill."—(Mr. Warton.)

tain Aylmer

Question proposed, "That Clause 22 stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the clause was not very material, and he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman might be allowed to have his way in the matter.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause struck out accordingly.

Clause 23 (Definitions in Schedules).

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 3, to leave out from beginning of line to "such," in line 13, and insert the words,—

"Where a parish, townland, or other place with a definite boundary, whether larger or smaller than a parish or townland, is situate in a county or borough divided into Parliamentary divisions, and such parish, townland, or other place is not, in the Schedules to this Act, included in any of the Parliamentary divisions of the county or borough in which it is situate, such parish or townland shall be considered as included in that one of those Parliamentary divisions which it adjoins, or if it adjoins more than one of such divisions, then in that one of the said divisions with which it has the longest common boundary.

Where a Parliamentary division of a county or borough is described in any Schedule to this Act as containing the whole of a sessional division, barony, or other area, with the exception of the portion comprised in another Parliamentary division of the same county or borough, and by reason of such description includes a parish, townland, or ward, or part of a ward, separated from the rest of the first-mentioned Parliamentary division by the said portion comprised in the other Parliamentary division, such parish, townland, ward, or part of a ward, shall, notwithstanding the said description, form part of the other Parliamentary division, as if it had been included in the said exception.

If any doubt arises as to the Parliamentary division of a county or borough in which any parish, townland, ward, or other place, whether larger or smaller than a parish, townland, or ward, is intended by the Schedules to this Act to be included,"—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out from the words "Where a Parliamentary division," in line 10, to the word "exception," in line 19."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and agreed to.

And the Question, "That the words,—

'Where a parish, townland, or other place with a definite boundary, whether larger or smaller than a parish or townland, is situate in a county or borough divided into Parliamentary divisions, and such parish, townland, or other place is not, in the Schedules to this Act, included in any of the Parliamentary divisions of the county or borough in which it is situate, such parish or townland shall be considered as included in that one of those Parliamentary divisions which it adjoins, or if it adjoins more than one of such divisions, then in that one of the said divisions with which it has the longest common boundary.

Where a Parliamentary division of a county or borough is described in any Schedule to this Act as containing the whole of a sessional division, barony, or other area, with the exception of the portion comprised in another Parliamentary division of the same county or borough, and by reason of such description includes a parish, townland, or ward, or part of a ward, separated from the rest of the first-mentioned Parliamentary division by the said portion comprised in the other Parliamentary division, such parish, townland, ward, or part of a ward, shall, notwithstanding the said description, form part of the other Parliamentary division, as if it had been included in the said exception.

If any doubt arises as to the Parliamentary division of a county or borough in which any parish, townland, ward, or other place, whether larger or smaller than a parish, townland, or ward, is intended by the Schedules to this Act to be included,' be there inserted,"

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 27 (Adaptation of certain enactments as to disqualification of voters for corrupt practices).

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Clause struck out of the Bill.

Clause 28 (Disqualification of certain voters for corrupt practices).

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said, the Amendment which he should endeavour to induce the Government to accept in this clause was to leave out the words "in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty." His object in moving the omission of those words was to prevent the infliction of what he considered would be a very great injustice on the Conservative portion of the electors in the city of Canterbury. The House would be aware that after the last General Election of 1880, an inquiry was instituted into the practices which took place at Canterbury during that Election, the result being that certain persons were scheduled as bribers and bribees, both in respect of the Election of 1880 and in respect of the Election of 1879. Now, he wished to point out that if the Bill remained as it was, without alteration, the persons scheduled for corrupt practices committed during the Election of 1879 would get off scot free, while those scheduled in respect of the Election of 1880 were disqualified for seven years. The effect of that would be very much in favour of the Liberal Party, by which the corrupt practices ascertained at the inquiry had been committed. The House would perceive that there were 140 persons scheduled in respect of the 1879 Election—all Liberals who, unless the Government agreed to adopt his Amendment, would be entitled to vote at the next Election. Under the circumstances, he trusted the Government would see their way to accepting his proposal, which would do an act of justice to the Conservative Party, and, at the same time, save him from the necessity of moving the rejection of the clause itself when the proper time arrived. Before he sat down, he might point out to the Government that no other constituency would be affected by the alteration which he proposed to make in the Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 14, to leave out the words "in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty."—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.) Question proposed, "That the words 'in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty,' stand part of the Bill."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he certainly did not feel any merciful consideration in dealing with persons guilty of corrupt practices at elections; but in this case there was a reason for not accepting the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Akers-Douglas), the effect of which would be to disqualify persons who had never yet been disqualified. He thought that, in dealing with political matters, it was safer, if it could be done, to apply precedents to every case as it arose. He had searched for every precedent bearing on the matter, and there was not one single instance of any punishment having been inflicted, except in respect of the offences committed at the last Election before the inquiry was held, which, in the present instance, would be the Election of 1880, and he thought the hon. Member for East Kent would be aware that such was the case. Now, at the inquiries at Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester, the Commissioners went back to the last Elections but one, and although they found that, in respect of those Elections, some persons had been guilty of corrupt practices, they did not include them in the Schedule, because the practice, as he had pointed out, had always been to deal with the corruption at the last Election only. He was aware that the case of the hon. Member was more acute than those to which he had referred, because the last Election but one at Canterbury only occurred a year before the last—that was to say, in 1879; but the principle laid down was equally applicable. If they went back beyond the Election inquired into, there was no reason why they should not go back six years, instead of one. He pointed out that the persons reported as guilty of corrupt practices at the Election of 1879 were really punished in the immediate Election under consideration; and it might be assumed that they were repentant. If this Amendment were adopted, it would be the introduction of a new principle entirely, and thinking it safer to adhere to the practice that had hitherto obtained, he certainly preferred the clause as it stood in the Bill; and, therefore, as far as he was concerned, he could not assent to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. RAIKES said, he was sorry to differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General on this question. The hon. and learned Gentleman had told them, and he thought it was his only argument against the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Akers-Douglas), that in these cases they could not depart from precedent. But an ounce of common sense might sometimes be worth a bushel of precedent; and he put it to the House whether there would not be at least an apparent injustice if, with respect to persons included in the same Report, they were to punish those guilty of corruption in 1880, and let go scot free those who were guilty of the same offence in 1879? Therefore, although he should be glad to accept precedent as a general guide, he thought the House might follow it too far. He hoped to hear that they were not to be guided strictly by the legal view that the Amendment was only directed to the case of those persons who were guilty of corrupt practices in 1879. It would meet as well the cases dealt with by any of the Commissioners who sat in 1880. If the Bill remained unaltered, this case would be left in glaring contrast with other cases. All the persons scheduled in 1880 would be punished under this clause, and all those who committed corrupt practices at an earlier date would escape punishment altogether, because the seven years' disqualification did not touch their case.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he could not agree with one of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Raikes). The objection of his hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General) to the admission of this Amendment did not rest entirely upon precedent. He ventured to suggest that there was a very sound reason for making a distinction between the members of this constituency guilty of corrupt practices in 1880, and those guilty of the offence in 1879—namely, that between the present time and the latter year, an Election had intervened, and the electors had shown that they were capable of passing through a subsequent Election without being guilty of corrupt practices. He apprehended that it was not merely punishment that they desired to inflict, they desired to see constituencies purified; and, therefore, he thought that the persons scheduled in respect of 1879 having passed purely through an intervening Election, might be trusted to act purely again.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that some attention ought to be paid to the circumstances which incapacitated a person from voting during seven years. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had said that if they had regard to 1880, the point was clear, because that was the date of the last Election; but if they went behind the last Election, they might go back to 1874. But in this case it was only to 1879.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Seven years from the date of the Report in the clause.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Exactly; the Report being in 1880. The other Report—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): The two Reports were in 1880, and the Amendment refers to persons reported in 1880, but guilty in 1879.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the hon. and learned Gentleman said a little while ago that if they went back to 1879, they might just as well go back to 1874. But they would preclude themselves from doing that by taking the period of seven years as the time for which the disqualification was to exist. If they went back to 1874, and stipulated that persons who were then convicted or scheduled should be disqualified, they would only be disqualified for seven years; and, therefore, that time would now have expired.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): But the right hon. Baronet will see that the words used are "seven years from the date of the Report."

MR. WARTON said, they must take the Amendment as a whole, and if they did that, no one knew better than the hon. and learned Attorney General that it had no reference to the Reports made in 1880 only. If they looked at the clause as moralists, what did they find? What was the preamble of the clause? That—

"Whereas Commissioners appointed by Her Majesty in pursuance of Addresses from both Houses of Parliament in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty reported that at parliamentary elections for the borough named in the second part of the Eighth Schedule to this Act the persons named in the schedules to the said reports had been guilty of corrupt practices, be it therefore enacted."

What was the result of this glorious preamble? That they would punish some guilty persons and not others. The clause was so framed as to prevent the seven years' punishment being applied to Liberals who were corrupt in 1879. It was exceedingly unfair not to treat one party as they treated the other.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, in the Amendment he was about to move he ventured to again ask the House to prevent a person who had been found guilty of bribing from sitting in the House for the space of seven years. He was led to take that course partly by the fact that in Committee his Amendment was only defeated by a majority of 13, and that he had good reason to believe that had the Committee known what the particular scope of his Amendment was, and what the limited character of the punishment inflicted was, there would have been a majority, instead of a minority, in favour of his proposal. He had been told by many hon. Members that they were under the impression he had proposed to prevent a guilty person from ever sitting in the House; that they did not know he was following on the lines of an Amendment which had been accepted by the House. Furthermore, it was notorious that the Amendment he proposed was supported strongly by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and, therefore, he had reason to believe that he did appeal to a sense of morality and justice. It appeared to him quite illogical that the Bill should contain clauses which declared that certain individuals should not have the power to vote in certain constituencies in which they never had or ever would have a vote. If this Bill went out to the public at large containing a penalty on the lower classes of society, while it allowed the opulent classes to go scot free, a most unfavourable impression would be created. In the interest of common justice and public morality, it was essential that the Amendment he suggested should be adopted. It had been said that the Amendment would act as a precedent, and that there was no precedent for the action he proposed. He had been told also that this would be a retrospective Act. Allow him to observe that retrospective action had been adopted by the Committee with regard to voters. If the malpractices of voters had been recognized by existing Statutes, it would not have been necessary for his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to introduce disqualifications; the fact that certain voters were not disqualified by previous Statutes was the reason why they were disqualified by the clauses of the Bill. As regarded the general principle, he thought it was high time the House should show it was prepared to mete out equal justice to persons who committed an offence, as well as to persons who became the victims of the offence. He had no wish, on the present occasion, to dwell upon the malpractices of particular individuals; neither did he know—he had not been at the pains of investigating, for he was not at all concerned in the question—whether this just action on the part of the House would inflict more injury on the individuals who nominally belonged to the Party he belonged to, or to the other Party. He held that the persons against whom his Amendment was directed had been guilty of a great offence against the Constitution; that they had been exposed and declared guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour against Parliament; and that the time had come when this House should vindicate public morality in the matter. When he moved the Amendment in Committee, the malpractices of one or two persons were fully dwelt upon on both sides of the House. He did not, he repeated, wish to deal with those particular cases. He only wanted to appeal to what he thought was the sense of justice in the House towards persons who had been guilty of Parliamentary malpractices. He appealed to the House to determine, in the exercise of righteous judgment, that such offences should no longer go unpunished; he appealed to the House to punish such offences in the only way in which they could be punished—namely, by the exclusion of the guilty persons from a seat in the future Parliament.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, after line 25, after the word “borough,” to insert the words,—“(c.) Of being a candidate, or of being elected to, and sitting in, the House of Commons, for the space of seven years next after the presentation of the said reports respectively, and, if he shall be elected, his election shall be void.”—(Mr. Thorold Rogers.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he felt that the arguments and motives of his hon. Friend (Mr. Thorold Rogers) would appeal very strongly to a great many Members of the House. But however much they might wish to remedy a particular evil by severe measures, the House would agree with him (the Attorney General) that it was undesirable to inflict a punishment at the expense of a principle of much greater importance than that of seeing even a guilty person receive his just reward. His hon. Friend dwelt in Committee very strongly upon a particular case. The hon. Gentleman pointed out what the effect would be if the person in the case alluded to obtained a seat in the House. He (the Attorney General) said nothing about the argument the hon. Gentleman used in respect of a particular offender who had, he (the Attorney General) quite admitted, received virtually no punishment at all. He asked the House not to be led away by the faults of one or more particular persons, and say—“We will, in order to punish them, do that which on reflection we ought not to support.” In this matter they were not dealing with one person, but with 8,970, for that was the number of persons scheduled. If this clause were added to the Bill, it would affect all those persons, and it would inflict this ex post facto penalty upon all of them. Since the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, Parliament had accepted, without any exception, one punishment as the proper punishment to impose upon persons who had been reported. In 1880, when these offences were committed, no other punishment was known. In 1883, when the Corrupt Practices Act was passed, Parliament thought it necessary to increase the previous punishment, by imposing on the person who had been guilty the very penalty his hon. Friend sought to impose now. But what did they do then? They refused to impose the penalty, unless before the punishment was inflicted the person was allowed to be heard in his own defence. In 1883 they went further and provided a second safeguard—namely, that not only should the man be summoned, and have the right to cross-examine witnesses, but he should also have the right to go, by way of appeal, to the Court of Assize. It was now proposed to inflict punishment upon a man who might never be heard—that was, in 1885, punishment was proposed without the safeguards that were thought necessary in 1883. A still further important principle remained. The persons who committed these offences in 1880 knew what Parliament always regarded as the punishment, and now, five years after the offences had been committed, it was proposed to impose by Statute this statutory penalty upon the offenders. The principle involved in the Amendment was such that he asked the House to hesitate before they accepted it. If once by legislating after an offence had been committed, they imposed a penalty upon the offender, they would, in his opinion, form a precedent of the most dangerous character. The matter was entirely in the hands of the House; but he hoped they would not sanction the retrospective legislation which was now proposed.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, that before the House divided, he would like to add a few words in support of the Amendment. He supported it on a previous occasion, and he hoped the House would accept it. He was extremely sorry to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General ask the House to accept what seemed to be quite an artificial statement of a principle, and so keep up an anomaly which was disgraceful to the House. By this section of the Bill they were dealing with those persons who were scheduled as guilty of bribery in 1880, and if this Amendment were rejected, the effect would be that they said by this Statute that certain persons were unfit to be allowed to vote for Members of Parliament, yet they were fit to sit as Members of Parliament. That really was making a farce of the whole thing. It was all very well to say that it had been the habit of Parliament in past times to impose a particular penalty. He did not know that Parliament contemplated before what it unhappily was forced to contemplate now—namely, the probability of persons who had committed these offences succeeding in making their way within the walls of the House of Commons. If Parliament had contemplated such a state of things before, he did not think it would have hesitated to protect itself by giving the punishment the area and effect proposed by this Amendment. It seemed to him that the objections to it were somewhat technical in their character. Whatever the Party effect of the Amendment might be, he did not care one jot; but he did care for a certain principle which the House desired to assert, not only against poor men, who had some of them suffered in other ways and in other penalties for the offences they had committed, but also against those men who were far worse than they, being the instruments and means of corruption.

MR. MONK said, that if the House had adopted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), he certainly should not have stood up to move the rejection of the clause; but the House was generally so very fair and just towards all persons whose cases were brought before it, that he must ask for its attention for one moment, while he pointed out—though he could not do it more forcibly than it had been done by the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke)—the injustice done to the unfortunate householder who was corrupted, while the House allowed those who had corrupted him to go scot free. There was a penalty of disfranchisement for seven years against all voters who had been scheduled. He (Mr. Monk) had challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in Committee—a challenge which was not accepted—to state to the House whether it was not the case that on several Election Commissions the Commissioners had made very imperfect inquiries concerning the corruption which had taken place. As soon as these gentlemen had discovered what the amount of money was that had been expended, they had thought it not worth their while to spend their time in discovering the names of those who had taken bribes, and the consequence was that, in some cases, they admitted that at least 1,000 or more voters had taken payment for their votes who had not been scheduled, as they had not been called before them for examination. In other cases, every person who had received a bribe had been scheduled. The result was that, in the first class of cases to which he referred, the thousands of persons who had been bribed would go free through not having been scheduled; whereas, in the other class of cases, thousands of persons would be disfranchised for seven years under this clause. He would put it to the House whether it did not show something like a vindictive act on the part of Parliament to inflict this penalty on these unfortunate voters, while it allowed those who had found the money and paid the voters to go free? The question had been raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), who had moved an Amendment. He (Mr. Monk), for his own part, had accepted the Amendment at that time, because the penalty under it was much less severe than that first inserted in the Bill. It had been first proposed to disfranchise those voters for life; but, when he saw the leniency which had just been shown by Members on both sides of the House towards those who had been guilty of corruption and had been scheduled by the Commissioners, and who were notwithstanding eligible for a seat in that House, he trusted the House would now extend the same leniency towards those unfortunate voters whom it was proposed to punish by the Bill. He begged to move the omission of the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the House would recollect that they had discussed this matter very fully in Committee, he having, at the time, been prepared to leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Committee. Having passed the most lenient sentence that had ever been passed by any Legislature on corrupt electors—having reduced the period of disfranchisement in the Bill from life to seven years from the date of the Report of the Commissioners—the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to go further, and declare that there should be no punishment at all. The effect of the Amendment would be to say that the scheduled voters should receive no punishment at all; and of these persons, he believed there were no fewer than 2,400 in Gloucester. The hon. Member asked immunity from punishment for these persons, who were almost as guilty as the persons who had given the bribes and received punishment. Did the hon. Member mean to say that while they allowed the persons who were bribed to go without punishment, they should impose this penalty on the persons who bribed?

MR. MONK said, he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent him. He had alluded to the vote the House had just passed, giving immunity to those scheduled as bribers, and who were to be allowed to come forward as candidates for seats in that House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the House, under circumstances of hope for the future, had declared that it would make the disfranchisement of persons bribed seven years instead of for life; and they were now asked to go further and tell the new constituencies—constituencies in some places taking the old borough voters into the counties—for the first time, that bribery was no offence at all, and was not to be punished. They might make the punishment in the future as light as it had been in the past; but would they not be incurring a grave danger if they told the new electors that this Parliament, which had passed an Act for the prevention of corrupt practices, was of opinion that no punishment for the offence in question should be given at all? He thought that the seven years' disability—the penalty fixed by the clause—was a lenient one.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, he felt great disappointment at the alternative moods of severity and indulgence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. He regretted the decision the House had come to in the last division, and he was of opinion that there was great inconvenience in their now proceeding to attach a penalty of seven years' disfranchisement upon the ordinary person bribed—which was the only penalty which could be attached to him—whilst they refused to attach any penalty to the other class—namely, the bribers. He could not help thinking that when they considered that the persons guilty of paying bribes generally belonged to the class who sought admission into the House, the public outside would comment rather severely upon the different measures of justice they meted out to those who sat with themselves and the wretched people who accepted the bribes that those bribers offered to them. To say to a man who went into a town with money in his pocket, and used that money at an election for the purpose of bribery—to say to him—"Because you have been guilty of bribery, you shall not have a vote, but you shall be eligible for election," was really no punishment at all. The proper penalty to mete out to the man who bribed was to deprive him of any political advantage which he might get in connection with it. That the House had refused to do; and he (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) should not like to stand before any assembly and say that he would punish those who had taken bribes by disfranchisement for seven years without punishing the persons who bribed. If they were to let bygones be bygones in the case of the rich bribers, they should do the same in the case of the poor voters who had accepted bribes.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Monk) was taking a very singular course in desiring to inflict a greater penalty than that contained in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers). The House did not accept that Amendment, although there was a great deal to be said for the severer penalty on the briber than on the bribed. They inflicted in this clause exactly the same punishment upon the briber as the bribed. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) said that it was no punishment at all—that, as everybody knew, the men who gave the bribes were often strangers, and contrived to avoid detection; whereas those who received the bribes were poor voters who were more readily got at. What his hon. Friend really wanted was to inflict a greater punishment upon the briber than the bribed; and as he had been disappointed in obtaining that, he chose to turn round and say that he would not punish anybody at all. Was that a very wise course? He could quite understand that his hon. Friend was disappointed at the result of the last division; but because the House refused to go to a greater length of severity, he turned suddenly round and said—"Because we cannot do that, we must say to all the constituencies—'Neither the briber nor the bribed shall have any punishment at all.'"

He could sympathize with his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) with the compassion he must feel for a number of these unfortunate people. He could quite understand that, but he could not understand the severer virtue of his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, who could not have the same inducement for entertaining a similar feeling. This was, no doubt, a moderate penalty, but it was a penalty applied to the briber and the bribed alike; and he hoped the House would not, on account of the last division, give these offenders a clean bill of health and allow them to enjoy absolute immunity.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said, he should support the Motion of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). He had always voted in favour of the remission of these penalties, and his object in moving his Amendment was to carry out the principle that what was sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. The House had not accepted his Amendment, and had he been successful he would still have supported the omission of the clause. He thought that these unfortunate people had already been sufficiently punished, and he should have been glad to see all the electors placed on the same footing and able to vote at the next Election. He had been anxious, in his Amendment, to amend the clause by simply putting the penalty upon the scheduled persons from the time of the commission of the offence, and not from the date of the Report of the Commission. If the hon. Member for Gloucester went to a division he should certainly support him.

MR. GILES said, he had also supported the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), in the earlier stage of the Bill, to strike out Clause 3. He had done so on the ground that, as this Bill was a new departure, there should be no retrospective punishment. Surely the Act of 1883 provided ample punishment enough for anything that might happen in the future, and it ought to be sufficient to keep everybody straight—candidate as well as voter. He therefore hoped that the House would accept the Amendment, and wipe out the stigma which the Report of the Commissioners some years ago had inflicted upon a certain class of voters.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he would like to say that it was not in consequence of the defeat of the previous Amendment that he should vote in support of leaving out the clause. The choice was between inflicting no punishment at all, or of inflicting it as it was laid down in this clause. If it were passed as it stood it would certainly be a discreditable clause; because, notwithstanding the two divisions which had been taken against it, it established inequalities in the application of punishment. It purported to punish persons for seven years who had been found guilty of corruption. Those who had committed the same offence within the seven years were excluded, while those who were reported by the Commission of 1880 were included. There was also a second inequality, because the House did not venture to apply the same penalty to some 10 or 11 persons who had personal influence on both sides of the House as their victims got. It was all very well to say that all were equally treated, but that was only a phrase; because those who had been equally guilty since the Report of the Commission of 1880 received no punishment whatever under the Bill. If, then, they could not have fair and equal administration of punishment, they ought to say that, starting from the Corrupt Practices Act of 1882, there should be a clear slate.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that he had voted against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers); but he should vote in favour of the Amendment which had been moved by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). It was not because he had any sympathy with bribery; but he failed to see that anything could be said in favour of a law which only reached a small portion of those who had been found guilty of the offence. He would certainly be in favour of a stringent Bribery Law if he thought it would be applied impartially to the bribers as well as the bribed. Anybody who had paid any attention to the Bribery Law of this country must be aware that it only reached a few scandalous examples, and that more by luck and accident than anything else; while it left unpunished a large number of men who were just as flagrantly guilty, but had had the good luck not to have determined opponents who insisted upon putting the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act in force against them. There was really a good deal of cant and humbug about the method of dealing with this question. He wished that, for a few minutes, the House could be transformed into a Palace of Truth, in order that hon. Members, including some of the occupants of the Treasury Bench, might relate their electoral experiences. If such a phenomenon were ever likely to occur, he should wish that two of the first Gentlemen subjected to the influence of it should be the hon.

and learned Attorney General and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to Order. If the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) meant to impute that he (the Attorney General) had been guilty of bribery, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would have the candour to say so directly. All he would say was that he had neither directly nor indirectly sanctioned or allowed corrupt practices on his behalf.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that what he had stated was that he should be glad if all the Members of that House were to relate their electoral experiences, and that among the first to do so might be the Attorney General and the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member intends, either directly or indirectly, to impute any conduct of the kind to the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), he is clearly out of Order, and he must withdraw the imputation.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I certainly had no knowledge of any practices of the kind.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would at once withdraw the expression. He was only connecting his statement with a general remark that he would be in favour of a stringent Bribery Law if he thought it would be impartially administered, and that it would reach the bribers as well as the bribed. One of the reasons why he was in favour of allowing bygones to be bygones was that in Ireland there were a large number of persons who had been allowed to reach the highest positions in the country, who, it was perfectly notorious, had obtained their seats in the House of Commons by gross and extensive bribery. He presumed that the Speaker would rule him out of Order if he were to make any statement with regard to any existing Members of the Irish Judicial Bench, and therefore he would not do so; but he could name three eminent Judges in Ireland, one of whom was no longer on the Judicial Bench, who had gained their seats by notorious and open bribery. Judge Keogh, for instance, became Member for Athlone by open, extensive, and flagrant bribery; and yet he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had been present at an election inquiry in Dublin, in which that same individual delivered a most edifying homily against the wickedness of electoral corruption. He had been so much struck by the unblushing hypocrisy manifested on that occasion that he determined to make a protest against it if ever he had the opportunity. For these reasons he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), and he should continue to vote in the same direction, until he saw a stringent Bribery Law established which would punish all offenders equally, whether high or low.

MR. BRYCE said, he had voted for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), and he regretted the decision which the House had arrived at. He should regret it still more if it were made the excuse for the perpetration of another folly and another injustice. He could not support the argument used by some hon. Members, and especially by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley)—namely, that because they had not done complete justice, they should do a piece of injustice; and because the House had had not punished, as it ought to have punished, the briber, therefore they ought not to punish the bribed. The hon. Member for Southampton talked of “these poor people,” meaning those who had been scheduled for corruption; but those who received bribes were the most degraded class of the electors, and were persons entitled to no sympathy or indulgence from the House, and, as far as in them lay, had done everything they could to degrade and demoralize our electoral system; and if the House was particularly bound to select any moment for showing its condemnation of corrupt practices, it was a moment like this when they were largely extending the franchise.

Further Consideration of Bill adjourned till To-morrow.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [27th April] reported.

First Resolution postponed.

Second Resolution agreed to.

Third Resolution read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Resolution be read a second time.”

MR. SEXTON said, that amongst the questions raised on this Vote in Committee there was one which he had stated that he should have to refer to again on the Report. On examining the details of the Vote, he had been surprised to find that, while a residence for the senior Clerk of the House was provided, the second Clerk was without that accommodation. It appeared to him that the second Clerk of the House required such accommodation as much as the senior Clerk, inasmuch as he had quite as long hours and as much work to get through; indeed, as far as his experience went, he had rather more. It had been pointed out that one officer of the House of Lords had 16 rooms at his disposal. For those reasons, he asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury if he could hold out any hope that the gentleman he alluded to would be furnished with a residence?

MR. HIBBERT said, that unfortunately there was but too little space for the Business that had to be performed in respect of the House of Commons. With respect to the question raised to-night on that Vote by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), he had stated in Committee that the accommodation that had been referred to in the case of Clerks of the House would be a matter to be considered by those who had to deal with those questions. He wished, in reply to a question put to him yesterday, on the subject of the accommodation required by Members and their secretaries, the latter having been turned out of the Tea Room, in consequence of the new arrangements made by Mr. Speaker at the commencement of the Session, to state that he was desired by Mr. Speaker to say that he was desirous of providing, if possible, accommodation of the kind asked for, and that he was in communication with the authorities of the House of Lords with the object of obtaining suitable rooms to be used for the purpose indicated. Mr. Speaker would also consider whether tables and other appliances for writing should not be placed in the Central Lobby as requested, or in some other convenient position.

MR. SEXTON said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that Members would be generally obliged by the steps that had been taken.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had drawn the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury to a matter that he hoped would not be lost sight of—namely, the difficulty of intercommunication between the different parts of the House, which was a source of considerable inconvenience to Members. He had stated before that it was easier to learn in a newspaper office in Fleet Street what was going on in the House of Commons than in the Smoking Room, or any other department of the House. He had learned privately and with great satisfaction that some steps had been taken in regard to that matter, and he trusted that the inconvenience referred to would be as soon as possible removed. There was another point to which he would ask the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury, by whom he hoped it would be brought before the authorities of the House. He believed his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had mentioned it on one occasion; and he would now ask the hon. Gentleman whether, in the accommodation now being provided for writing purposes for Members, he would endeavour to see his way to placing typewriters at their disposal? Now, many hon. Members were obliged to do a great deal of writing, and some of them were in the habit of using those machines, and the habit made it rather laborious to write in the usual way. He understood that when this subject was brought forward on a previous occasion, a promise had been given by the Secretary to the Treasury that it should be considered. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would take the matter seriously into consideration, because there were five or six Members of the House of Commons who had a very large amount of writing to get through, for whom these type-writers would effect a considerable saving of time.

MR. HIBBERT: The matter shall be brought before the proper authorities.

INDUSTRIES (IRELAND).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question, "That the Select Committee on Industries (Ireland) do consist of Twenty-four Members."—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

Question again proposed.

MR. SHEIL said, it would not be necessary for him to detain the House at any length in stating the object of the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper, because the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had already stated the reason which could be adduced against the proposed construction of this Committee. But perhaps he might be allowed to point out that the real and main objection to the Committee was, that the number of its Members which represented the Irish Party on those Benches was not in proportion to the remainder of the Committee. He might also say that the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot), who moved the appointment of the Committee, was entitled to the thanks of hon. Gentlemen on those Benches for the great care and interest taken by him in Irish matters; it was owing to the hon. Baronet that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been appointed, with a number of other Members representing the Irish Party, to sit on that Committee. He understood that the Government would not agree to the number of Members representing that Party exceeding six, which, in his opinion, was insufficient for effective representation of their views on the subject of inquiry. He rose, therefore, to say that if the Government were not prepared to agree to that number being increased, it would be the duty of himself and those with whom he was associated to oppose the appointment of the Committee on the proposed basis. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-four," in order to insert the words "Twenty-five,"—(Mr. Sheil,)—instead thereof.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had rather understood the other night that the feeling on the part of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was that the Committee was not to go on, and that his objection was based on the constitution of the Committee rather than the number of its Members. However that might be, he (Sir William Harcourt) was unable to agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Sheil). It seemed to him that the Committee was very fairly constituted—in other words, he could not accept the argument that one particular section of Irish Members should represent an undue proportion of the number of Members of that Committee. It was necessary, in the construction of a Committee, to consider the resources of Ireland generally; they should have regard to information on the subject from whatever quarter it might come, and not in connection with any particular section of the House. Therefore, he thought the constitution of the Committee must remain as proposed. Without desiring to show the least disrespect to any particular section of the Representatives of Ireland, he said that, in a matter of this kind, the Government ought to have a general regard to the Representatives of the country.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, notwithstanding what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he would make an appeal to the generosity of the Government to allow the Committee to be appointed in a form that would be satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen on those Benches; and, with that object in view, he asked the Government to allow another Member of the Nationalist Party to serve upon it. The number of the Committee proposed by the Government was 24, of whom the proportion of the Nationalist Party was six. He urged upon the right hon. Gentleman that there was no political question involved in the matter, and they wanted to enter upon the work with reference only to the prosperity of Ireland; and certainly he thought that even if the Government consented to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath, the 18 Members of the Committee who were not of the Nationalist Party would be well able, in respect of numbers, to prevent any Members of the Nationalist Party turning the Committee into a piece of political machinery. There was the strongest interest felt in this matter, which persons of all political opinions regarded as a step in the direction of increasing the prosperity and welfare of Ireland, and it was most desirable that the labours of the Committee should proceed; because, although they might not get through their work this year, as he had pointed out on the last occasion when this matter was before the House, they had three months before them in which a great deal might be done. There was a large body of evidence to be taken, and to avoid delay he strongly urged upon the Government to accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Sheil). He repeated that the greatest concern was felt in this matter. He had received letters from all parts of the country, beseeching him not to give way, to show his courage and perseverance, not to allow the opposition to dishearten him, to go on with what he had undertaken, to appeal to the Government, and to throw upon them the whole responsibility, if they declined, for the sake of adding another Member to the Committee, to allow it to go to work. If they did that, he said it would go forth to the country and Ireland that they had not any sincere desire to assist, promote, or encourage those who had for their object the material prosperity of the Irish people.

DR. LYONS said, he would also appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to assent to the Amendment. He asked him not, for the sake of a single additional Member who could not really alter the constitution of the Committee, to jeopardize the attainment of the object in view. They wanted a Committee capable of getting through a great deal of work; and he would point out that the Gentleman whom it was desired to add to the Committee was one of the most hard-working men in the House; he knew that he was a man willing effectively to do any amount of work in connection with this inquiry. The matter was almost settled, and he would urge the right hon. Gentleman not to risk the loss of their object by resisting the proposal of the hon. Member for Meath, which would cause in Ireland a very great amount of disappointment. He had received letters which showed that the most intense regret would be felt if the Committee fell through. If this one name were added, the Committee would probably be in a position to go to work in a very short time.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had not met the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Sheil) in at all a satisfactory way. He was obliged to say that the Government had placed every obstacle possible in the way of this Committee, with the result that the settlement of it had been postponed from time to time, and week after week. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Why did you move the adjournment?] It was not he who moved the adjournment of the debate. The Committee was appointed on the 10th of March, and the adjournment was moved for the first time by an Irish Member on Friday last, the 24th of April, so that the Government had very nearly six weeks' delay to account for. That time had been wasted by the Government; and the effect of it would be that the Committee, if it went on at all, would be driven off to a time when it would have very little chance of going to work. He wished to say that the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) who introduced this matter had recommended himself to the affection and confidence of the Irish people by his exertions on their behalf; and he was sure that those exertions would always be remembered by them with feelings of gratitude. But the hon. Baronet had that night renewed his exertions on their behalf, and had, moreover, truly expressed the feeling of the people of Ireland, when he declared, with reference to the attitude taken up by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the whole responsibility in this matter rested upon Her Majesty's Government. There was not a single claim that the Irish Members had made that had not been strongly resisted by the Government. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), first of all, asked the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor) when this Committee was going to be appointed. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not attach any bad motive to the noble Lord; but whether the noble Lord's actions were deliberate and intentional or not, the fact remained that the Committee was postponed day after day, in spite of the questions upon the subject which were almost daily addressed from the Irish Benches. Then they came to the composition of the Committee. This was a Committee which was for the sole examination of the industrial resources of Ireland. Surely it was a Committee which should consist exclusively of Irish Members; or, at all events, it was a Committee in which, unquestionably, the large predominating influence should be Irish. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt) objected to the Members of the Irish Party claiming an undue share of representation upon the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had denied their right to speak as the Representatives of the majority of the Irish people. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did not think the right hon. Gentleman would do that after the month of next November. He thought that a General Election would be quite sufficient to prove even to the right hon. Gentleman that the Members of the Party led by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) did represent the overwhelming majority of the Irish people. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought that the Committee should largely consist of Members drawn from the Irish Party. It was quite evident that the right hon. Gentleman would much rather prefer that Ireland should be deprived of the benefit of this Committee, than that the Representatives of the Irish people should have their due share of the Members of the Committee. The hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) must not be daunted by the attitude taken up by the Government. The Irish Members heartily echoed the frank and incontestible statement of the hon. Baronet, that all responsibility for the failure of this Committee would lie in the hands of the Government.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, he wished to say a few words on the subject of the delay which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had said occurred in the constitution of this Committee. The nomination of a Committee of this importance necessarily occupied a considerable time. Hon. Members had to be seen personally, and asked if they would serve. That there was some delay he freely admitted; but he maintained that there was no more delay than occurred in the nomination of every Committee of this kind. He was anxious to secure a thoroughly representative Committee, and he used his best endeavours to secure that end. It must be borne in mind that the nomination of the Committee was on the Paper for the 30th March, and that since that time the delay had not been occasioned by Members of the Government, but by Members of the Irish Party themselves. He hoped hon. Members would be good enough to remember that only last night the main argument of the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) against this Committee was that there was not sufficient time this year to deal with the subject. The hon. Gentleman did not rely on the question of the constitution of the Committee. As regarded the addition of this name, hon. Members would also remember that, to meet their views, the Government did agree to add another Member of their Party, and also, in accordance with the wishes of the Members of the Irish Party, the Committee was strengthened by the addition of two right hon. Gentlemen—one from each of the Front Benches. As a matter of fact, the Committee was constituted as far as possible to meet the views of hon. Members; and he thought that anybody, looking at the Committee, would confess that its constitution was extremely fair, and that the Party to which hon. Members opposite belonged was very fully represented. The Government had raised no objection to the appointment of the Committee; but, on the contrary, had done their best to secure its appointment. He did not think that any blame whatever attached to the Government in the matter.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he was sure that no one who had had to deal with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Richard Grosvenor) would blame him in any way. The hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) and himself (Captain Aylmer) had found the noble Lord most courteous in his dealings in this matter. But the noble Lord could not say that the Government were not to blame. The Government had done their best all through to kill this Committee. Four years ago the Prime Minister refused to grant a Committee of this kind, although he (Captain Aylmer) got up a Petition, signed by three-fourths of the Irish Members, in favour of an inquiry such as it was now proposed to hold by this Committee. The Government had only assented to the appointment of the Committee now because it gave the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) an opportunity of saying there was no time in which to make the investigation. He (Captain Aylmer) knew it never would be passed this Session, and that it never was the intention of the Government that it should pass. If the Government had intended that a Committee of this kind should be appointed, they would have appointed one when they were asked in writing, four years ago, by three-fourths of the Irish Members.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he wished to supplement the information given by the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor). When this Committee was being nominated, the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) consulted the Party to which he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) belonged, and the hon. Baronet's own suggestion was that seven Members of the Irish Party should be appointed upon the Committee. To that proposal the Party assented; and to save the Government the trouble of making the selection, a list of seven Members of the Party was sent to the noble Lord (Lord Richard Grosvenor).

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR : The hon. Gentleman is not quite accurate. A list of six Members was supplied to me.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that certainly seven was the number suggested by the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot); and he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had supposed that a list of seven names was sent to the noble Lord. When the nomination of the Committee, however, appeared on the Paper, they found a totally different Committee from that which they were prepared to find. There were only four of their Party, and these were swamped by a large number of Members from all parts of House. He did not object to the appointment of English Members on the Committee. There were many English Members whose assistance the Irish Party would be glad to have, because they knew that those Gentlemen would come on the Committee with a serious intention of promoting its object. But everyone would see that the Irish Members were now merely swamped by hon. Members who cared nothing whatever about Irish industries. Let him remind the noble Lord of a precedent of only two or three years' standing. It would be in the recollection of the noble Lord that two or three years ago a Committee was appointed, under the Chairmanship of the junior Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), to deal with a question mainly connected with Irish interests. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman nominated a Committee consisting almost exclusively of Irish Members; and the hon. Gentleman expressed a hope that that would be the beginning of such a practice in the House. The practice, however, had not been followed since; and there was a striking deviation from this principle in the case of this very Committee, which was concerned exclusively with the interests of the Irish people.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, it was a most extraordinary thing that the Government would not accept the extra name which the Irish Members desired to have placed on this Committee. He thought it would be generally admitted that the Committee was one which concerned Ireland alone, and that, therefore, the wishes of the Irish Members on the matter should be respected. If the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt), who now represented the Government, was as anxious as the Irish Members that this Committee should be appointed, and do some good work, he would not object to the name which they proposed to have placed on the Committee. Certainly, the number of Members from Ireland whose names were already upon the Committee did not appear to him to be at all sufficient for the requirements of the case; and, after mature deliberation, he and his hon. Friends had arrived at the conclusion that the appointment of six Members of their Party would be much more calculated to insure the success of the objects for which the Committee was formed than five Members would be. If the right hon. Gentleman killed this Committee, because he would not allow this extra name to be put upon it, his action would be viewed in Ireland with a great deal of disapprobation; and certainly the verdict of the Irish people would be that the Government were not in earnest in their desire to promote this Committee, or else they would not have endangered its existence by refusing to allow this one other name to be put upon it. He could not understand why the Government should refuse to assent to this extra name; surely it could not be a matter which concerned them very much. On the other hand, it was a matter which concerned Ireland and the people he and his hon. Friends represented very much indeed. Therefore, they appealed to the Government to give them six Members upon the Committee instead of five Members.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said, he wished to support the appeal which had been made by hon. Members opposite—namely, that the Government should assent to this very modest and very just proposition. He did not think the Secretary of State for the Home Department could really have looked into the matter himself, or else he would have seen the reasonableness of the position and by hon. Members opposite. It was proposed that this Committee should consist of twenty-five Members, and all that the Irish Members asked was that they should have six Members upon it. The hon. Members opposite might not be numerically strong in the House; but, undoubtedly, they had a very large body of the people behind them in Ireland; and he thought that anybody who considered the facts would admit that the request of those hon. Gentlemen was a very moderate one. He thought that this was just one of the instances in which the Government did themselves very much harm. It was quite clear that however much the Government might be anxious to obtain this Committee, it would be said that by the original delay which took place, and by their refusal to grant the addition of this one Member, they did not desire the Committee should be appointed at all; and he could not help expressing the opinion that this would be said with some justice. Unless a Committee of this sort was entirely representative of all sections of the people, he agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that its appointment would serve no good purpose. He thought there was time, even this Session, for a certain amount of good work to be done; or, at all events, for the foundation to be laid for a future Committee in some future Session of Parliament; and, therefore, he appealed to the Government to make this simple concession, which would smooth the way for the appointment of the Committee, and which would show that they really desired that the Committee should be held, but which, if they refused, would do them a great deal of harm in Ireland.

MR. SEXTON said, it seemed that the Government had made up their minds that they would not say any more on this subject.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We cannot say any more.

MR. SEXTON said, that the suggestion of the Government was that the Committee should consist of twenty-four Members, and out of that number twelve should be English Members. If a similar Committee were appointed on a corresponding English subject, how many of its Members would be Irishmen? They had an example lately, when the Committee, on the Registration (Occupation Voters) Bill was appointed. There was not a solitary Irish Member on that Committee. Where the subject was English, Irish Members usually did not press for representation, unless the matter to be taken in hand had some bearing or other on the interests of their country. Even then they were satisfied with a nominal representation. There were twelve Irish Members nominally on this Committee; but the Government proposed that only five should belong to the Party led by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell.) The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) called that a section of the Irish Party. They considered themselves to be the only Irish Party in the House. The other Members for Ireland were the obedient followers of the two English Parties in the House. They had no separate existence; they had no soul, no conscience, nor line of action of their own. That being the case, he declined to recognize them as representative; and if the House waited until next January, when hon. Members came back to Parliament, those who said that the Irish Party were a "section" would see whether they were so or not. He could tell the right hon. Gentleman that the return of the Irish Party to that House, not as a section, or as a faction, but as the acknowledged and overwhelming majority of the people of Ireland, was a much more certain thing than the return of the right hon. Gentleman's Government, or the return of the right hon. Gentleman himself. What were the Government afraid of? What horrible possibilities did they see in the addition of this one Member? The Committee would consist of twenty-five Members, only six of whom would belong to the Irish Party. Did not the right hon. Gentleman know perfectly well that, in connection with any proposal brought before the Committee, he could rely upon the solid vote of nineteen? What, then, was the right hon. Gentleman afraid of? The hon. Member for the City of Cork was naturally unwilling to enter upon laborious and long proceedings in this Committee with only four of his Colleagues, and was of opinion that five was the least number he could accept. The hon. Member believed that without six Members of his Party they could not hope to elicit the proper kind of evidence. He (Mr. Sexton) could come to no other conclusion, from the obstinate resistance of the Government on this question of one Member, infinitesimal to them, but of the greatest importance to Ireland, than that, whatever the professions of the Government might be, they were desirous in their hearts that the Committee should not be appointed. Let the House consider the delay which had occurred. The Committee was assented to by the Government last year. Since then, more than half a-year had elapsed. If the Government had allowed the Irish Members to have the representation they desired, the Committee would have been appointed. Even if they had allowed the Irish Members to have six Members, it would have been appointed any time within the last six weeks; but day after day had passed away, and the appointment of the Committee had been staved off, and now the House found itself asked to enter upon a grave and weighty inquisition on a most important question in what he might call the last hours of a dying Parliament. What could be done between now and the end of the Session? It was true that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had objected to the number of Representatives allowed him; but the delay had been so great that another objection had arisen. There were only twenty-four Members proposed; but what assurance had the House that these Members would come back to Parliament in the General Election? He might not err on the score of rashness if he said that at least half of them might not return. Was the hon. Member for the City of Dublin, with all his chances of life, and with all the vicissitudes of politics upon him—was he ready to commit himself to an inquiry of this kind, when the Tories might come with their shears and cut the web of his intentions? Suppose the House rose in July or August, and Parliament died immediately, the Committee could not ask Parliament to re-appoint it; and the result would be that the whole thing would have to be taken again de novo next year, and in the absence of a number of men who had lost their seats, and would not be able to give the new Committee the advantage of the study and investigation they had given to the question. The Committee would then be burdened with a number of hon. Members who had not had an opportunity of considering the question. He thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork had come to a right conclusion, when he asserted that more harm than good would result from a hasty consideration of this subject. He believed the investigation would be much better begun in the favouring atmosphere of a reformed Parliament, and under circumstances which would render the right hon. Gentleman opposite politically more genial and arithmetically less rigorous.

MR. MOLLOY said, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) could not reply to the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Sexton); and, in order to give him an opportunity of doing so, the best thing that could be done would be to move the adjournment of the debate. The right hon. Gentleman would then be able to state, on behalf of the Government, whether he intended to accede to the demand of the Irish Party.

COLONEL NOLAN: Do not move it.

MR. MOLLOY said, he was anxious to put an end to a debate which seemed to be useless, and which was keeping them out of bed for no reason.

COLONEL NOLAN: Do not move it.

MR. MOLLOY: I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Molloy.)

MR. LEAMY said, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Molloy) would withdraw that Motion. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) had stated that the Government had already spoken; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) was present, and he would be able to give them the answer they wanted. He (Mr. Leamy) would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman what harm it could do anyone to give this additional Member? Could he find a satisfactory answer to that? It was an extraordinary thing to say that the Committee should be refused because the Irish Members wanted to have this extra name added to it. What objection could there be to this proposal, and would the Government tell them why it was they would not accept it? If it were accepted, the Committee might be at once formed, and could proceed to business in a day or two.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that of course he could not refuse the invitation of the hon. Member who had moved the adjournment (Mr. Molloy). He did not know what further explanation there was to give—he did not know whether the hon. Gentleman had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) or some other hon. Gentleman who had spoken opposite; but he had said that his distinct view was that the Gentlemen who belonged to the Party that sat on these Benches were the only Gentlemen who represented Ireland, and who ought to represent Ireland on the Committee. [MR. SEXTON: The only Irish Party.] That was their view; he did not know whether it was the view of his hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Sydney Buxton); he did not think that hon. Member would accept the statement. It was exactly because this Motion was made from that point of view that the Government could not assent to it. The Government were dealing with the present Parliament; they had not powers of prediction as to the future Parliament; they were dealing with the present; and it would not be decent for them to accept, as the foundation of the appointment of a Committee on Irish Industries, the proposition that a number of Gentlemen, whom he had no doubt were very influential as Irish Representatives, were the sole Representatives of Ireland in respect to those industries. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough would reconsider the observations he had addressed to the Government in the light of that statement. They must consider the constitution of the Committee, he did not say in reference to a "section" of a Party—he would not use that word, and if he had used it he had not intended it in any disparaging sense. The Government were obliged to consider the matter not from the point of view of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but as a whole. They had come to an agreement, and this was really the foundation of the whole thing; they were anxious that the Committee should be appointed, and they had come to an agreement with the hon. Baronet who proposed the Committee (Sir Eardley Wilmot) and the hon. Member who, in these matters, acted as the Representative of hon. Members opposite, as to the basis of the Committee, and the Government were prepared last Friday to pass it through. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), however, got up and opposed the appointment to some extent on the grounds of its constitution, but mainly on the ground that it would have no good result, but, on the contrary, would be rather injurious. Everyone who remembered the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork would remember that that was the position he took up. The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had repeated that argument with great emphasis, and had said that to appoint a Committee at the fag end of a Parliament would be a useless and injurious operation. In the face of that, what was the use of hon. Members endeavouring to force upon the Government the responsibility for the Committee having fallen through? The hon. Member for the City of Cork had moved the adjournment of the debate the other night—he had not proposed to add another Member, or to take any course of that kind. The hon. Member had told the House that he thought the Committee would do no good, and that had led to its being postponed to Tuesday. On Tuesday this proposal was made, which was, in fact, a departure from and an overthrowing of an agreement which had been come to by all the Parties on the subject. It would be utterly impossible to do the Business of the House if, when Committees were appointed by regular agreement between all the Parties, they should be thrown over at the pleasure of one Party, as this Committee had been, by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, first in his Motion for Adjournment, and now in this Motion for an alteration of the constitution of the Committee. It was from no desire on the part of the Government to prevent the constitution and appointment of this Committee, but rather for the purpose of standing by the agreement all Parties had come to, that the Government resisted the proposal of hon. Members opposite. The whole history of the attitude of the Government showed that their desire had been to abide by the agreement arrived at between their own Representatives, the right hon. Baronet who had moved the Committee, and the Representatives of hon. Members opposite. If that agreement had been carried out the Committee would have been appointed last Friday; and he (Sir William Harcourt) could not, on the part of the Government, accept any responsibility for any failure which might have resulted from a departure from the original agreement.

MR. MARUM said, he did not think the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) had addressed to the House were at all sound. A Member returned to this House by any constituency was the Representative of that constituency only; he was presumed by the law to be simply a Member of Parliament; and therefore it was not open to a Minister of the Crown to say that the addition of a Member like the hon. Member for Ennis was objectionable, for the reason that he represented a particular Party in the House. So far as that statement was concerned the right hon. Gentleman ought to withdraw it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was not the author of that argument; the hon. Member is distinctly proposed as a Member of the Party opposite. He is not proposed by me, but by his political Friends.

MR. MARUM said, he thought, however, that there had been a precedent set that night which was very inconvenient. On previous occasions the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had brought forward questions of this kind; and, after a great deal of argument and delay, concessions were obtained from the Government. As concession was, therefore, to be expected in the end, it was to be regretted that the Government had not expedited matters by acquiescing in the proposal made, or by coming to some arrangement as to this Committee. He could assure the Government that the falling through of the Committee would be a very serious matter. The name of the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was revered in Ireland for the manner in which he had brought forward this question, the question being one which had very closely and earnestly engaged the attention of the Irish people. He (Mr. Marum) did not desire to detain the House any length of time, and he would, therefore, merely urge upon the right hon. Gentleman opposite not to allow the Committee to fall through. If he did, upon the Government must rest the responsibility. The matter had been before the Irish people for some time, and they should not be told now that the whole thing was a sham.

MR. O'SHEA said, he hoped the Government would think twice before they allowed the Irish people to suppose that they had, by reason of an arrangement of the Whips, thrown over such a Committee as this. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) that if the Committee fell through it would be considered in Ireland, whatever the real reason might be, that the Government were opposed to an inquiry into this very important subject. What on earth could it matter whether there was an additional Member on one side or on the other on a question which would really be a test question to the Irish people as to the feeling of the Government towards Ireland on this question of Irish industries? He thought the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) should get up and say that he accepted the proposal of the Irish Members. He trusted the Government would not take such a suicidal step as to allow the Committee to fall through.

MR. WOODALL said, he thought that the House generally sympathized with the appointment of this Committee, and believed in the possibility of great good to Ireland resulting from it. Indeed, he was sure that all of them must have been conscious that hopes had been encouraged and much interest stimulated in the question already. Well, he was sorry that the Government did not see their way to assenting to the proposal to add another Member. On the other hand, he could not feel that the whole responsibility for the lapse of the Committee would rest on the Government if it fell through that night. He hoped he might be permitted to appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider whether they were not accepting very grave responsibility in allowing a matter of this kind to fall through, after the negotiations which had taken place, on such a small point as the addition of another Member. He had already served upon a Commission which had inquired very fully, and had presented to the House a mass of evidence and information bearing upon the subject. He was desirous to see it proceed, as he was confident it would bring about important results in developing the industries of the Sister Country, which had been so long neglected; and he earnestly hoped that the Committee would be appointed, and would set to work to collect material which any other Committee appointed by the next Parliament would be able to take in hand and make valuable use of. Though many Members appointed on the Committee might have no connection with Ireland, they would be Gentlemen engaged in the various industries of this country, the influence of which they would like to carry to Ireland. He, therefore, begged most earnestly—whilst, on the one hand, expressing his surprise that they could not arrange this difficulty by adding another Member to the Committee—to urge hon. Members opposite not to accept the responsibility of defeating the appointment of the Committee for the mere sake of getting added to it another Member to represent their political views. Political questions really should not arise in an inquiry of this kind.

MR. MOLLOY intimated that he had no wish to press the Motion for the adjournment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. STEVENSON said, he would join in the appeal to the Government to allow this additional Member to be appointed to the Committee. He thought it desirable that the Committee should be appointed, and for that purpose that it should be constituted in such a way as to satisfy the desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He should certainly vote for the nomination of an additional Member.

Original Question put, "That the words 'Twenty-four' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 6; Noes 24: Majority 18.—(Div. List, No. 141.)

And it appearing on the Report of the Division that 40 Members were not present, House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN — RUSSIAN ADVANCE — OCCUPATION OF MARUCHAK.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information which he can communicate to the House with regard to the movements of the Russians on the Afghan Frontier?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is a telegram from Tirpul, dated April 23, which was received at the Foreign Office on April 26, in which Sir Peter Lumsden mentions a Report having been received by the Governor of Herat, and forwarded by him, that the Russians had advanced 30 miles south of Pul-i-Khisti and occupied Maruchak; and in a telegram dated the 25th, and received to-day, Sir Peter Lumsden, among other things, alludes incidentally to the "recent occupation of Maruchak" by the Russians.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL.—[BILL 134.]

CONSIDERATION. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

MR. RITCHIE, in moving, in page 13, line 22, column 2, after the word "Petersfield," to insert the word "Pontefract," said, he made the proposal for the purpose of finding an additional Member for Westminster. He thought that if an additional Member was to be given to Westminster he ought not to be taken from the Tower Hamlets, but from such a borough as Pontefract, which barely came up to the limit of population.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 22, column 2, after the word "Petersfield," to insert the word "Pontefract."
—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Pontefract' be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that the Committee had decided not to interfere with the 15,000 limit, and it would be unfortunate to pick out one borough in the way proposed by the hon. Member.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL hoped that, as the right hon. Baronet had attached so great importance to the decision of the Committee not to interfere with the limit of 15,000, he would attach the same importance to the other decisions of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LEWIS said, he rose to move the insertion of "Warwick" in the Schedule of boroughs to be disfranchised. He did not intend to press the Amendment, but simply moved it by way of renewing his protest against the course adopted by the Government in making this borough the single exception to the 15,000 rule.

Amendment, proposed, in page 13, column 2, after line 40, insert "Warwick."—(Mr. Lewis.)

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—

In page 14, column 1, lines 3 to 8, leave out,—

Ayr (District of Burghs)	Ayr and Argyll.
Elgin (District of Burghs)	Elgin, Banff, and Aberdeen.
Falkirk (District of Burghs)	Stirling, Linlithgow, and Lanark.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule 2 (Boroughs to lose one Member) agreed to.

Schedule 3 (Boroughs to have additional Members).

MR. RITCHIE said, he moved to insert "The Tower Hamlets, 7," in order to restore the borough to the position it originally occupied in the Bill. He did not in the least challenge the right of Westminster to have four Members; but what he did object to was the proposal to take away one Member from the Tower Hamlets in order to give it to Westminster. Even with seven Members the borough would be considerably under-represented compared with some of the large boroughs in the Provinces. Birmingham, with a population of 400,000, was to have seven Members; but the Tower Hamlets, with 439,000, was only to have six. Further, it having originally been intended to give the Tower Hamlets seven Members it would be an invidious thing to take one away.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BRYCE said, that the Amendment which he had proposed, to give the Tower Hamlets seven Members, was really a re-enactment of the original proposal of the Bill, put on the basis of the suggestion of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), that the old London boroughs, or some of them, should not be cut up into new boroughs, but only into divisions, the name of the old borough being retained. His proposal differed from that put on the Paper by his hon. Colleague only in its keeping Poplar and Bow in the old borough of the Tower Hamlets. This was the decided wish of the people of Poplar and Bow, who valued their connection with the old borough, and desired to form a part of it. The average for London, excluding the City, was one Member to every 65,000; including the City, one Member to every 63,000. If the Tower Hamlets received only six Members it would have one Member to every 73,000; if it had seven Members it would have exactly the average—one Member to every 63,000. The Tower Hamlets was amply entitled to its due share of representation on other other grounds as well as that of numerical equality. It was inhabited by an enormous population of poor people, who had much to hope from legislative reform, and whose voice ought to be adequately heard in the National Councils. It included an immense variety of industries, both manufacturing and commercial. Speaking from his own experience of the last five years, he could assure the House that the task of representing these interests, and endeavouring to state the needs and express the wishes of this vast population (nearly 500,000) would not be a light one even for seven Members. He earnestly hoped the Government would assent to the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the Opposition having objected to the proposed re-arrangement in Westminster, under which four Members were to be given to it, the Government felt released from their undertaking with regard to it. He thought there was a strong case for giving the Tower Hamlets seven Members, and the Government would be prepared to accept the Amendment unless the Members of the Front Opposition Bench withdrew their opposition to the proposed boundaries of Westminster.

MR. FIRTH remarked, that the Tower Hamlets would not be an over-represented constituency even with seven Members. He hoped, however, the proposals of the Boundary Commissioners with respect to Westminster would be adhered to.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to draw attention to the extraordinary inconvenience which had arisen in consequence of the negotiations which had been entered into between the two Front Benches in reference to this Bill. The agreement which had been arrived at between those Benches should not be pushed too far; and, in his opinion, the time had now arrived when the House of Commons should take the matter out of the hands of the two Parties and into its own control. The question of the apportionment of Members among the different constituencies should be decided, not by the terms of a bargain, but according to right and justice. He asked the House to decide this question of the right of the Tower Hamlets to a seventh Member wholly irrespective of the claim of Westminster to a fourth Member, which ought to be considered independently. The proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) came to this—that if the Leaders of the Opposition, whoever they might be, were willing to adhere to the decision of the House when in Committee, the Government would be willing to accept the decision of the Commissioners as regarded Westminster, and they would adhere to the arrangement come to; and upon that was to depend the rights of the Tower Hamlets and Westminster; but would that House agree to be bound by what had been done? There appeared to be a consensus of opinion in that House that the Tower Hamlets should have a seventh Member; but in arriving at that conclusion he trusted that the House would regard itself as perfectly free to deal with the case of Westminster upon its merits, and not be fettered or cramped by any arrangement come to by the Leaders on both sides.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that he was as anxious as the noble Lord that when the House came to consider the case of Westminster they should regard themselves as having a perfect right to exercise their freedom of judgment in the matter. As the House was aware, at the end of the Autumn Session communications were entered into between the Representatives—he would not venture to call them Leaders in the presence of the noble Lord—of both sides of the House, with the view of securing the introduction of a Redistribution Bill which should be drawn upon lines which were fairly satisfactory to all Parties in that House. After several conferences and a full explanation had been given on the subject, the Representatives of the Opposition agreed to the introduction of the Bill in the form in which it came before the House. It was also arranged that the boundaries of many of the new constituencies should be settled by the Boundary Commissioners, and that the decisions of the latter were to be—he would not say sacred, but left undisturbed, except by mutual consent, and were to have very high authority. It was arranged that Westminster was to have four Members; but when the scheme came to be examined the inhabitants of Westminster were of opinion that they should practically have only three and not four Members. It was then suggested that Westminster should obtain an additional Member from the Tower Hamlets. He was not, however, disposed to offer any objection to the present proposal to retain the seventh Member for the Tower Hamlets; but that would not preclude the case of Westminster being discussed upon its merits when it came before the House.

MR. GORST said, he felt bound to protest against the hands of the House being tied in reference to this subject by any agreement that those who sat upon the Front Benches might have entered into. The noble Lord had appealed to the sense of the House on that occasion; but had the noble Lord been present throughout all the discussions upon this Bill, he would have found that there was no sense of the House with regard to it at all. Therefore, without asking the House to listen to him, he begged to appeal to the Government, and to ask them to keep their minds open with regard to the claim of Westminster, and not to prejudge the case by what was about to be done in the present instance.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would remind the House that there was no fund of free Members upon which they could draw; and that if the seventh Member were given to the Tower Hamlets it might be difficult to obtain the fourth for Westminster. If the House would revert to the old arrangement of three Members for Westminster, he was willing to accept the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that his objection had been to the boundary of Westminster as fixed by the Boundary Commissioners.

MR. RAIKES said, he hoped that the House would not regard itself as bound by any arrangement which had been entered into between the two Front Benches. He thought that the Tower Hamlets, when joined to Poplar, were entitled to a seventh Member.

MR. LEWIS observed that the House was in a position of great difficulty in having to discuss this question with the Speaker in the Chair.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE rose to move that the number of Members allotted to Westminster should be reduced from four to three. Now that the House had unanimously decided to give seven Members to the Tower Hamlets, there was no possibility of getting another Member from any other part of London, and it was impossible to make the number for Westminster up to four. It was therefore necessary to revert to the original proposition to give only three Members to Westminster. He admitted that with only three Members Westminster would be slightly under-represented. On the other hand, with four Members it would be over-represented.

Amendment proposed,

In page 15, line 42, after the word "Westminster," to leave out the word "four," in order to insert the word "three,"—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'four' stand part of the Bill."

LORD ALGERNON PERCY said, he hoped the House would not consent to upset the decision deliberately arrived at in Committee, when it was arranged that Westminster was to have four Members. Nothing was then heard of taking away one Member from the Tower Hamlets in order to give an additional Member to those provided in the Bill for Westminster.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE was understood to say that he had distinctly stated in Committee on the Bill that it was possible, in the final result, that the additional Member for Westminster would have to be taken from the East End of London. The Opposition Front Bench had been consulted on the subject.

LORD ALGERNON PERCY said, if the House was now of opinion that Westminster should have four Members, there was nothing to prevent the House from restoring the number originally proposed in the Bill. The Bill was drawn on the basis of the representation of population, and its principle was, as far as was practicable, to give a Member, at least in the Metropolis, to every 50,000 inhabitants. Westminster had a population of 229,784, so that with three Members that proportion of population would not be preserved. St. Pancras was far more liberally treated by the Bill, notwithstanding its ratable value was only £1,506,616, compared with the £3,816,000 of Westminster. The fact that three Members only were given to Westminster had caused a great deal of discussion and dissatisfaction both in the House and the newspapers. Where the fourth Member was to come from was an entirely secondary question, and stood apart from the justice of the matter. The objection made to the division of Westminster was that they unnecessarily interfered with the ancient boundaries and parishes, and he contended that the Commissioners acted contrary to their Instructions. Their scheme was objected to by every single person who appeared before the Commissioners, and by all the public bodies within the borough, with the exception of the representatives of one particular political organization and the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, and he had since received a letter in explanation of the action of the latter body. The practical effect of the attitude of the right hon. Baronet in regard to the acknowledged injustice done to Westminster was this. He said—"Westminster has been unjustly treated. I will remedy the injustice; but if you do not choose to accept a particular division, contrary to every principle, and objected to by all the inhabitants, I will go back to the original injustice I did you." The Postmaster General said that the Government would now return to the original proposition with regard to Westminster; but the original proposition was to divide Westminster into three boroughs, and in those three boroughs the Liberty of the Rolls was included. Now the Liberty of the Rolls was excluded. He trusted, however, the House would do justice in this matter by restoring to Westminster the four Members to which upon every consideration of justice and equity it was entitled.

Sir Stafford Northcote

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the Commissioners could not put into their scheme a place that was not within the City of Westminster, and the Liberty of the Rolls was not in Westminster. In the original plan the borough of the Strand was created, and did not belong to the City of Westminster at all; but the desire of the House was to reconstitute the old City of Westminster, and it was reconstituted. If, however, the noble Lord wished to revert to the proposal of the original Bill, he was willing to do so. But he repeated that the Commissioners were unable to put something into the City of Westminster which was not in it, and the Liberty of the Rolls was never part of the City of Westminster. He denied that he had acknowledged, on a former occasion, that injustice had been done to the City of Westminster in giving it only three Members. What he did say was that he thought a fair case had been made out for giving it four Members, and that was the utmost limit to which he could go. The whole of the large towns, as the Committee was aware, were under-represented. There were at least 150 cases of injustice of that kind which could be made out. Westminster, as compared with the central portions of the East End, had a good case if they took the Census of 1881; but its grievance was not exceptional as compared with the other parts of the Metropolis. Kensington and Chelsea, for instance, had 251,000 inhabitants, and it was proposed to give them only three Members; while Westminster had only 229,000 inhabitants, and it was proposed to give it three Members also. Then, if they went behind the Census of 1881, it would be found that Westminster was a decreasing constituency.

MR. ECROYD said, that in discussing the case of Wigan they were not allowed to go behind the Census of 1881.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the noble Lord had made an attack on the Boundary Commissioners; but it was not the case that the arrangements they proposed were objected to by all the inhabitants. The Government referred the matter to two gentlemen, one a Conservative and the other a Liberal, and they, acting in concert and without seeing or hearing anyone, decided that the Instructions to the Boundary Commissioners would not justify them in creating divided districts of the sort contained in the first draft scheme.

MR. RITCHIE said, that the question they had to consider was whether Westminster was entitled to three or four Members; how it was to be divided would be considered at a subsequent stage of the Bill. As a Metropolitan Member he was as ready to stand up for one part of the Metropolis as for another. As it had been admitted by the Government that Westminster was entitled to four Members, they ought to abide by the admission. He entirely dissented from the statement of the Postmaster General that if a fourth Member was to be given to Westminster it should be at the expense of some other part of the Metropolis, and he protested against the assumption that because a Member was not to be taken from any other part of the Metropolis, Westminster was to be under-represented. The average representation was one Member to 55,000 people. Even with an additional Member given to Westminster the average in that borough would be one Member to 57,000. The present average of representation in the large towns was one Member to 62,000; but in Westminster the average was one Member to 77,000, the average of all London being one Member to 65,000 inhabitants. These figures would show the justice of the demand that Westminster should have four Members. He considered that to take away the fourth Member from Westminster would be doing an injustice to the whole of the Metropolis. He appealed to the entire House to uphold the arrangement which was agreed to by the Government when the Bill was in Committee to give Westminster an additional Member.

MR. RYLANDS said, he happened to be interested in this question, because he was an elector of the City of Westminster. He quite agreed that the real question before them was not what should be the boundaries of the divisions, but whether the City should have three or four Members. The question of justice did not enter into this matter at all, as the Bill was brought forward on the grounds of expediency and compromise; therefore he felt obliged to dismiss from his mind the calculations as to population which had been given to justify the arrangement that Westminster should have four Members. They ought, he thought, to consider where the fourth Member was to come from. He had the very greatest objection to any further increase in the number of Members of that House; and unless it was decided from what part of London or the country a seat was to be taken he could not vote for Westminster having more than three Members. The proposal to give four seats was supported strictly on the condition that an arrangement would be made between the two Front Benches by which an additional Member was to be provided. It seemed that that arrangement had not been carried out, and, as far as he was concerned, he should support the Government.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he ventured to interfere in the debate because he had some connection with Westminster, having been placed in a position of some importance by a society of working men in that borough, which he might say had nothing whatever to do with electoral wire-pulling. The hon. Member who had just sat down had certainly not contributed much information to the discussion. He had certainly informed the House that he was a voter in Westminster, and that he had perfect confidence in the Conservative Party. He hoped, as he was an elector, that on the next occasion when he had an opportunity of exercising his vote he would not forget to give it to the Party in which he felt so much confidence. The question as to where the fourth Member was to come from was, no doubt, an important one, but it was not the point before the House. What they were discussing was whether Westminster should have three or four Members, and that question should be considered apart from any other. The fourth Member might be taken from several places, and he was not at all clear whether Burnley ought not to give up a seat. In bringing the Amendment before the House, the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had made a very short and abrupt speech, and had not adduced any reason why the arrangement entered into by the Government should be departed from beyond the fact that because the Tower Hamlets wanted another Member, Westminster should be prepared to lose one. But justice should be done to Westminster, and to all other places, irrespective of such considerations. The boundaries of the divisions were not now under consideration, and what might have taken place with regard to that matter since the Bill was in Committee ought not to influence the House of Commons in deciding the question whether Westminster should have three or four seats. The President of the Local Government Board had made a very fair speech on the whole subject, and he gathered from the general tone of that speech that the right hon. Baronet was in favour of giving the fourth Member if the other differences and disputes could be arranged. Those other differences and disputes were of a petty, contemptible character, and ought not to be taken into consideration at all. He asked the House to adhere to the decision arrived at by the Government in Committee, and then to consider the divisions as laid down by Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford. If the divisions were bad, they might be altered; but if good, then let the House adopt them. Westminster was a very ancient borough—it was full of historical associations and landmarks; it had a great population, and was entitled in whatever way its claims were viewed to more than three Representatives in Parliament.

MR. INDERWICK said, he occupied a position in one of the political associations of Westminster similar to that held by the noble Lord who had just spoken in connection with another association in the borough, and he wished to state that those who were associated with him were in no way divided upon the question of principle that, according to the population of Westminster, the City was entitled to four Members.

MR. CUBITT said, he thought that in dealing with this subject political feeling should not be taken into account. There was a great deal to be said with regard to the unfortunate divisions which the Boundary Commissioners had made in Westminster. They were greatly indebted to the Commissioners for the important work done by them, for, on the whole, they had performed their difficult duties with great fairness and ability; but still when there was a serious objection to divisions formed by them, such as existed in the case of the Westminster divisions, it was the duty of Members interested in the matter to bring it under the notice of the Government. He hoped the President of the Local Government Board would not further oppose the proposal to give four Members to Westminster, and that he would leave it to the wisdom of the House to decide where the fourth Member should be taken from.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government had been asked whether they had not changed their opinions upon this subject. He was bound to say that if the House went to a division the Government would consider this as a matter of importance. They had not changed their opinions with regard to it. The noble Lord opposite begged the Government not to reverse the decision of the Committee. The Government could hardly be said to be in that position. What were the decisions of the Committee upon the point? They were two—one was to keep the old City of Westminster, and the other to reduce the number of Members for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. RITCHIE: There was no such decision.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, his right hon. Friend was quite right. They had not passed the point in the Bill; but words relating to the component parts of the Tower Hamlets were struck out in order to pave the way for a reduction in the representation of that part of the Metropolis.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that in consequence of the apparent wish of the Committee to increase the number of Members for Westminster his right hon. Friend made a statement of a very definite nature, and all the parts of that statement hung together. It was proposed by his right hon. Friend to increase the number of Members for Westminster, to take a Member from the Tower Hamlets, and to refer the question of boundaries to Sir John Lambert and Sir Francis Sandford for their authoritative decision. Nothing could be detached from that statement without making the whole of it fall together. Could anyone in the House say that the Government had gone out of its way to reverse the decision to take a Member from the Tower Hamlets? He had never seen a question on which so great a unanimity was exercised by the House as the desire to leave the Tower Hamlets with its seven Members. The House itself had reversed the intentions of the Committee to take a Member away from that borough, and by doing so it had destroyed the keystone of his right hon. Friend's plan for giving Westminster a fourth Member. He might say, incidentally, that one very strong reason why the Government were prepared to acquiesce in the evident wish of the House to retain the seven Members for the Tower Hamlets was the unwillingness declared by the noble Lord the Member for Westminster (Lord Algernon Percy) and by persons outside the House to take the boundaries which the Commissioners had determined upon. That was a point on which the Government could not give way. The one mainstay of the discussions in the House had been the determination of the Government, backed up by the Members, to abide by the decisions of the Commissioners, and not to alter them at the request of any political Party. These were the circumstances under which the Government were obliged to refuse their assent to the proposal to give Westminster another Member. It was no use for any hon. Member to say that they were not to consider the question as to where the seat was to be taken from; they must consider it. The Government could see no other place than the Tower Hamlets; the House had shown its determination not to take a Member from that borough, and the Government had no alternative except to ask the House not to vote the fourth Member.

MR. LEWIS said, he did not think that the question of giving another Member to Westminster was dependent upon the question of taking a Member from the Tower Hamlets. Sheffield, with a population of 284,000, was to have five Members, while Westminster, with 229,000, was only to have three Members. Again, the favoured borough of Wolverhampton had 164,000 population, or 65,000 less than the City of Westminster, and yet it was to have three Members. The unfairness shown towards Westminster was the more marked when it was remembered that in two of the three cases in which the Government had broken through the rules laid down by the Prime Minister himself—the cases of Wolverhampton and Haverfordwest—both of those constituencies happened to be represented by Members of the Government. It was impossible to extract from the Government any reason for the infringement of their own principle; and it would be difficult for them to convince the electors of Westminster that they ought to be treated worse than the electors of Wolverhampton. The Government had the courage to increase the Members of the House by 12, but apparently they had not the courage to increase them by 13. They could, however, do justice to Westminster, without increasing the numbers of the House, by simply doing full justice, and nothing more than justice, to Wolverhampton.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he rose to make a further appeal to the sense of justice of the Government on behalf of Westminster. As the House had unanimously rejected the diminution of the representation proposed for the Tower Hamlets, why, he asked, should they not go to Wolverhampton or Sheffield for the fourth Member wanted for Westminster? By placing Wolverhampton on the same level as other boroughs they might give Westminster the representation to which it was entitled both by its population and its wealth. There must, he thought, be some motive on the part of the Government for their refusal to deal fairly with Westminster; and probably they feared that if that City received four Members it would not return supporters of the present Ministry.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thought that the principle laid down by the Prime Minister in regard to distance from the seat of the Legislature ought to be recognized in some degree in connection with those matters. Manchester was to have one Member for every 70,000 of its population, and Liverpool one for every 66,000. If Westminster—the very seat of the Legislature—received four Members, it would have one Member for every 57,000 of its population—an undue proportion relatively to the numbers assigned to other places. He considered that London was immensely indebted to the President of the Local Government Board for the greatly increased number of Members which it would obtain under the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he could not help feeling that the position in which they were placed in regard to that Amendment was illustrative of the difficulty of the position in which the House was placed. It was as if they had ordered their dinner and were disputing who was to pay for it. The House had decided to retain seven Members for the Tower Hamlets, and now the question was whether Westminster should have four Members, or whether the Government must revert to the original proposal they made, that it should have three Members. When the matter came on in Committee appeals were made to the Government to give four Members to Westminster, and they said that they would be willing to do so provided that on the Report another Member for Westminster could be obtained from some other constituency, and they thought that other Member might be taken from the East End of London. A strong and very general feeling had been expressed in the House in favour of retaining the larger number for the Tower Hamlets. What, then, was the position of the House with regard to Westminster? Having decided that the number of Members for the Tower Hamlets should not be reduced, and having before them a proposal which involved giving an additional Member to Westminster above what was given according to the basis upon which the Bill was founded, it was a question whether they should retain a fourth Member for Westminster without seeing how the number was to be made up. There was, no doubt, a strong case for giving four Members to Westminster, if the Government could see their way to providing an additional Member; but it was necessary that they should do that, and under the circumstances he did not see that the Government could do anything but revert to their original proposal.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he was glad that the Government had put their foot down, and had reverted to their original scheme. It was impossible to settle this question on arithmetical lines. The secret of the hardness of the measure as affecting large constituencies, including many besides Westminster, was to be found in the tender dealing of the House with small constituencies of between 15,000 and 20,000 inhabitants. It seemed to him that some Members of the Opposition were now seeking to obtain particular advantages for particular places. He was glad to hear that the Leader of the Opposition had supported the decision of the Government, and he believed the House generally wished the conditions of the agreement to be honourably observed and distinctly adhered to.

MR. RAIKES said, he must express his surprise at hearing such sentiments coming from an hon. Member who represented a borough which would be considerably over-represented when compared with Westminster. For his own part, he thought that there seemed to be some confusion as to what might be open to the Government to do. There was a difference between what the Government might consider their duty and what the duty of the House might be. The Government might have come to the conclusion that they had been wrong in the course which they had taken; but he thought that the House had some right to look for a better explanation for their change of attitude than anything they had yet heard. He had listened attentively to the speeches made on behalf of the Government, and especially that of the Postmaster General, to hear the real reasons which had actuated the Government in this matter. He could not see that, because the Government had changed their views with regard to the Tower Hamlets, the House was therefore to be asked to change its views with respect to Westminster. Although they had heard a good deal from the Treasury Bench and from the Front Opposition Bench as to excuses for the attitude of the Government, they had not heard one particle of argument in favour of the proposal before the House. Westminster was a place of immense antiquity, as far as that House was concerned, and its rateable value was enormously in excess of that of towns which were represented to the extent which had been proposed for Westminster. They were left without the slightest ground to enable them to see why the Government had changed their minds, and yet because the Government had changed their minds with regard to one place the House was to change its mind with regard to another. The Schedules were still open, and there were plenty of places which could contribute the Member asked for; but, because the Government had made up their minds to find this Member in the case of the Tower Hamlets, Westminster was to be deprived of its proper representation. He hoped that the House would not take into consideration any of those arrangements out-of-doors of which they had heard so much. The arrangement which it was now sought to set aside had met with the full approval of the Committee. When the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill had spoken upon this point, the Leader of the Opposition had got up and congratulated him upon having arrived at such a satisfactory conclusion; there had not been one dissentient voice, and the proposal had been agreed to nemine contradicente. Now they were asked to give this up because the Government found that there was a certain amount of difficulty with the Boundary Commissioners. It appeared to him that either the Boundary Commissioners or the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition were always made responsible for any difficulty. He had the greatest respect for the Boundary Commissioners, who had done their work with great impartiality and skill; but he would run the risk of displeasing them rather than see an injustice done to an important constituency. He hoped that it was not too late for the Government to consider their decision, and that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, whose fairness they had not found wanting, would even now see his way to consider whether he might find some other victim to offer on the altar of justice rather than Westminster, because anyone would see that the present proposal involved an injustice to that constituency and an infringement of the principles upon which the Bill was founded.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that it was not denied that a great injustice would be done to Westminster by reducing the number of its Members from four to three. It was the mere accident of the Tower Hamlets coming before Westminster in the Schedule which led to this proposal. It was said that injustice would be done to the Tower Hamlets if the number of its Members was reduced from seven to six. But if the scheme of the Government had not been broken into by the previous decision of the House, this question with regard to Westminster would not have been raised. When the Bill was in Committee, the President of the Local Government Board put the case of Westminster on its merits, and the question where the fourth Member was to come from was a secondary matter. But now it was proposed that this secondary point should override the consideration of the justice of the case. He thought this was a question which they ought to carry to a division.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he also must protest against the action of the Government in regard to this matter. The House was bound to consider the case upon its merits, and Westminster was entitled to four Members, as the Government had at first decided. He held that if the additional Member provisionally assigned to Westminster could not be found in London, it was the duty of the Government to look elsewhere for one.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS reminded the House that he had on the former occasion entered a distinct caveat against taking a Member from the Tower Hamlets in order to give four to Westminster. The question of where the other Member was to come from was for after consideration, and as it was admitted that Westminster was entitled to four Members that number ought to be assigned to the constituency. If he was not mistaken, the question as to the Tower Hamlets was decided on the distinct understanding that the case of Westminster should be considered on its merits.

MR. WARTON said, he was of opinion that on the ground both of population and of wealth Westminster was clearly entitled to four Members, and he suggested that the extra Member should be taken from Wolverhampton.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON expressed a hope that the House would ratify the decision at which it arrived a few days ago. He should be compelled to vote against the Government if they insisted upon carrying the Amendment to a division. Even under this Bill, London was very much under-represented, and if they gave one more Member to the Metropolis it could be nothing but an advantage.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he entirely supported the view advanced by the hon. Member for Andover. There was perfect unanimity among the inhabitants of Westminster that adequate representation should be given to that constituency. Why, he asked, should Westminster be subjected to a disability because it contributed so largely to the Revenue? There was no constituency on which taxation fell more heavily than it did upon Westminster. It did not appear to him to be their duty to say how justice should be done. That was a point for the Government to decide. He admitted that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had shown the greatest desire to do justice to the claims of the various constituencies throughout the United Kingdom. But he contended that Westminster had a population which, according to all the principles laid down in the Bill, entitled it to four Members, and he trusted the Government would recognize its claim. He was no party to any attempt to obtain a representation of one set of views. If they reduced the number of Members of the House, he should be willing that the representation of Westminster should be reduced, and he should not be sorry to see that change, for he believed there were too many Members for such a deliberative Assembly. But Westminster had a right to claim her proper share of representation.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that there was a unanimous opinion that Westminster was entitled to four Members, and it would be a dangerous precedent, after the decision of the Committee, if they now departed from a proposal solemnly made and solemnly accepted. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had signally failed to show why he had changed his mind in regard to this matter.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 171: Majority 80.—(Div. List, No. 142.)

Question, "That the word 'three' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he rose to move an Amendment the object of which was to remove the hamlet of Penge from the Schedule as part of the new borough of Camberwell and to transfer it to the borough of Lewisham. The Bill as originally drawn made Penge a part of the borough of Lewisham, but in Committee Penge was transferred to Camberwell. The inhabitants of Camberwell were much opposed to the change for many reasons. The addition would make the borough a most unwieldly shape, its length being as much as five and a-half miles. Moreover, Penge was entirely separated from Camberwell by the hills upon which the Crystal Palace stood. The matter had been strongly taken up by various bodies in Camberwell, and he would urge the House, for the sake of convenience to all political Parties, to revert to the original arrangement. He believed that every change made in the Bill since it had been laid on the Table had been a mistake, and he should be glad to see them all reversed by a single vote if that could be done.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 10, to leave out the words "and the Hamlet of Penge." — (Mr. Edward Clarke.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he was perfectly impartial on this question and had received a great number of communications on both sides. It was true that Camberwell had a strong case against having Penge added to it; but Lewisham had just as strong a one. There was as much difficulty of connection between Lewisham and Penge as between Penge and Camberwell. The original principle of the Bill was in the Metropolis to take parochial and local government districts as boundaries. Penge was put in Lewisham because it was under the jurisdiction of the Lewisham District Board of Works. On the other hand, it was said that, although Penge was within the district of the Lewisham Board of Works, it was an altogether separate district, and was in the county of Surrey, while Lewisham was in Kent. Penge was an outlying hamlet of the parish of Battersea, which was a long way from it. There was one consideration which weighed with him in favour of the Amendment now in the Bill, and that was that the present arrangement made the population of these boroughs more equal. If Penge were added to Lewisham it would make the population of the latter place very high. There was a strong local opinion in Lewisham against the addition of Penge, while the opinion of the Penge people was in favour of their transfer to Camberwell. For these reasons he was inclined to support the Amendment made in Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule 4 (New boroughs).

MR. DAVENPORT said, he begged to propose an Amendment, the effect of which would be to include in the new borough of Hanley all such parts of the present borough of Stoke-upon-Trent as lay to the north of Hanley. As the Schedule stood, the Local Government district of Tunstall was excluded from the borough of Hanley.

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule 4, page 16, line 52, to leave out the words "and is not included in the Local Government District of Tunstall." — (Mr. Davenport.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he had intended to make the change proposed by the hon. Member, but he found that opinion in Hanley and Tunstall was so strong against it that he had abandoned his intention.

[Second Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, after line 16, insert as a separate paragraph,—“Royal University of Ireland. Two Members.”—(Dr. Lyons.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to Order. No doubt, it was a fact that some ancient Universities by prescription were boroughs; but he would like to know whether it was in Order to move this clause here under a Schedule dealing with new boroughs?

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the Amendment was out of Order, as the Royal University was not a borough.

DR. LYONS said, that there was no place in the Bill where Universities were considered, and he had, therefore, placed the name of the Royal University down as an independent constituency. He was told by the Clerk at the Table that he was in Order. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not press a verbal objection to his proposal.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that even if the name of the Royal University were placed in the Schedule it would require a clause in the Bill to give any effect to the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 5 (Contents and boundaries of boroughs with altered boundaries).

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he rose to propose that the borough of Warwick should bear the name of “Warwick—Leamington.” For the last 10 or 20 years Leamington had increased enormously in proportion to Warwick, and he did not think that Warwick would be at all the worse for having its younger neighbour next to it in the title which he proposed. The people of Leamington attached a great deal of importance to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, line 23, after “Warwick,” insert “Leamington.”—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that Leamington was the more important part of the borough, and, therefore, there was some ground for adopting the double name; but he should prefer the word “and” between the two words.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Words “and Leamington” inserted accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

In page 20, line 34, after the word “Pembroke,” to insert the words “and Haverfordwest.”—(Mr. Warton.)

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and negatived.

Other Amendments made.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 6 (New boroughs).

Amendment proposed,

In Schedule 6, page 28, after line 13, to insert the words,— “Finsbury.

Three Divisions. One Member for each Division.

Names and Contents of Divisions.

No. 1. The Holborn Division.	No. 2. The Central Division.
------------------------------	------------------------------

So much of the Holborn district as comprises the parishes of—

St. Andrew, Holborn, above Bars and St. George the Martyr, and Saffron Hill, Hatton Garden, Ely Place, and Ely Rents.

The St. Giles' District:

Gray's Inn, Furnival's Inn, Staple Inn, Lincoln's Inn, and Liberty of the Rolls.

—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

The parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell.

No. 3. The East Division.

The parishes of—
St. Luke, Middlesex,
St. Sepulchre, Middlesex, Charter House, and Glasshouse Yard.”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. TOMLINSON moved to omit the district of Saffron Hill, Hatton Garden, Ely Place, and Ely Rents from the Holborn Division, to include it in the district of St. Luke's. The alteration would to some extent redress the discrepancy between the number of population of the two divisions.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words “Saffron Hill, Hatton Garden, Ely Place, and Ely Rents.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he feared that the Government would jeopardize the arrangement which had been come to if he accepted the Amendment at so late a stage of the Bill.

MR. LEWIS supported the Amendment, remarking that the division from which it was proposed to take the district in question contained now 60 per cent more population than the division to which it was now sought to attach it.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he was opposed to the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment made.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to propose an Amendment, the effect of which would be to secure the return of an Irish National Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool. He thought the right hon. Baronet would be willing to accept the Amendment, and he would appeal to the House to take the matters into its own hands out of the hands of the Leaders on both sides, who formed the so-called compact, and, if he made out a good case, to decide in favour of his proposal. He made two alternative proposals. He wished to make a change in two of the divisions of Liverpool—namely, the Exchange Division and the Abercrombie Division. There was a small triangular piece of the Exchange Division which he wished to have included in the Abercrombie Division, as well as the large block of Lime Street, which projected into the Abercrombie Division. The alternative proposal was that the small triangular portion should still remain in the Exchange Division, and that the only portion transferred should be the block bounded by the London Road and extending into the Abercrombie Division. There was a considerable and unjustifiable difference between the population of the Abercrombie Division and that of the Exchange Division, and if his proposal were accepted, this disparity would be very considerably modified. The changes he proposed would also make the divisions more in accordance with the principle of the Bill, which was that persons of similar pursuits should, as far as possible, be thrown into the same divisions. The Exchange Division was a working-class division, and the Abercrombie Division was a commercial division, and the Exchange itself had actually been thrown out of the commercial division into the working-class division. He had a conversation with the Liberal Member for Liverpool, who would be in favour of transferring the Exchange and one or two streets round it into the commercial division. But it would be obviously too small a change, and if a change were at all desirable it should take the larger form which he had proposed. He thought it always best to discuss proposals of this kind in a perfectly candid spirit, and he confessed that one of his reasons for proposing the change was that it would give the Irish population of Liverpool a better chance of carrying another of the divisions of the City. The Scotland Ward Division, it was generally admitted, would be a division in which an Irish National candidate would be almost certain of beating all comers, and if his proposal were carried, two out of the nine Members of Liverpool would be Irish National Members. He hoped that the time was long since past when such a prospect as this would be found alarming or irrational. Every responsible and intelligent politician in the House knew that there must be next Parliament in this House an overwhelming majority of Irish Representatives pledged to National principles, and supposing that there were 80, what possible harm could it be to have the number increased to 81 by an Irish National Member sitting for an English constituency? Numerically it would make no difference, but morally and politically it would make the greatest difference, and he ventured to say would be productive of the greatest benefit to the future relations between England and Ireland and between the Irish and English people in England. Every additional opportunity legitimately afforded to Irishmen for the expression of their sentiments in that House was an encouragement to them to urge their claims and to seek redress of their grievances by peaceful and Constitutional methods. He hoped that even at this late stage of the Bill the Conservative Leader would give the benefit of his support to the proposal. He thought he might say that the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would not oppose the proposal if the Leader of the Opposition would rise in his place and say he had no objection to it; and he would strongly impress upon the Leader of the Opposition that he should present to the Irish people in England, forming 2,000,000 of its population, the agreeable and statesmanlike prospect of having their claims as strongly advocated by Conservatives as by Liberals in that House. As it was, even allowing the boundaries to remain as at present, the Irish population of the Exchange Division would have a very large controlling force in the return of a Member for that division. No Member could be returned who had not the support of the Irish population, and they would have the Liberal and Conservative candidate both fishing for the Irish vote, after the manner of a Dutch auction. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 31, column 2, line 43, after the words "Lime Street Ward," to insert the words "excepting that portion bounded by a line drawn from Moss Street through London Road and William Brown Street down to the junction between Byrom Street and Old Haymarket."—
(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WHITLEY, while admitting that the hon. Member for Galway had stated his case very fairly and moderately, yet expressed his hope that the Government would not accede to that Amendment, which involved a very serious alteration of the Bill. The Boundary Commissioners had very fully considered those matters on the spot; members of every Party in Liverpool, including the Irish Nationalists, had attended before them, and their decisions had met with the approval of the inhabitants at large, with very few exceptions. It would, therefore, be a strong thing now to upset all those decisions. This Amendment, moreover, would not only disturb two particular divisions, but would also have a very considerable effect on the other divisions of the city. Under these circumstances he hoped the House would pause before they accepted a proposal which would meet with the disapproval of the inhabitants of Liverpool generally. As the divisions stood the Irish Party were as fully represented as their numbers warranted, and to alter the boundaries so as to give the Irish Party an overwhelming majority in one of the wards would be prejudicial to the interests of Liverpool, and would meet with the condemnation of nine-tenths of the inhabitants of the city.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed that when the Bill was in Committee he had promised to consider this matter, if any agreement could be arrived at. When, however, he had begun to make inquiries, he had found that there was no general agreement of political Parties in Liverpool in favour of the proposal. The speech of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had been moderate, and put the case from his point of view very clearly, and he was sure it was appreciated. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could not speak with any local knowledge of Liverpool, and he had no knowledge of the changes which would be effected by the hon. Gentleman's proposal. As far as he could make out, one of his proposals would increase the population of one of the divisions, and the other would slightly diminish it. He could not agree with the hon. Member as to details; his lack of local knowledge would not justify him in attempting to do so. He, however, believed, that the scheme of the Commissioners had met with general favour in Liverpool, and he thought that the Government would not be justified in altering it.

MR. HEALY was sorry to hear that the only reason of the Government for opposing this Amendment was based upon the opposition of the Conservative Party in Liverpool. The Liberal Party there were not opposed to it; their principal organ The Daily Post being in favour of it. So far as he could gather, the right hon. Baronet had no objection himself to the proposal. He regretted very much that the Conservative Party desired to reduce the representation of 2,000,000 of the Irish population to one Member, when the Protestant minority of a little over 1,000,000 in the Northern corner of Ireland was represented by no less than 20 Members. He could not say that this was very fair play which the Catholics of England were receiving at the hands of the Conservative Party after they had jerrymandered the seats in Ulster. The Irish population were fully one-third of the population of Liverpool, which would be represented by nine Members in that House. It was not a very unreasonable request that they made of the Government to accord the Catholics of Liverpool two Members. The Conservative Party were the advocates of denominational education, and under ordinary circumstances the Catholic population would be at one with them upon religious questions. He, therefore, regretted very much to see that the hon. Member who had acted as spokesman for the Conservative Party should have prevented the Catholics of Great Britain from obtaining an additional Member. He reminded the Conservatives that the English Catholic nobility had always been attached to the Conservative Party, and were some of the most bitter opponents of Ireland. The single-Member system had worked the Irish Party enormous harm. He hoped the Conservative Party would not contribute to the further estrangement of the Irish and Catholic population by following the Conservative Member for Liverpool into the Lobby.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he should have been very glad if the general concurrence of the House had enabled the Government to give way and consent to the change proposed in the divisions of Liverpool. For his part, he thought it was much to be regretted that a certain number of Roman Catholic Members were not returned by English constituencies; and he should be glad to see any reasonable arrangement of constituencies made by which that object could be effected. At the same time, he thought that hon. Members had somewhat exaggerated the numbers of the Irish Roman Catholic population of England in placing it at 2,000,000. The last Census showed the number of Irish-born persons living in England to be 562,000.

MR. HEALY: But what about their descendants?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE did not think that, even making allowance for them, the figures could be anything like 2,000,000. Moreover, the Irish Roman Catholics were spread over the whole of the country, and, except in the case of a few towns, were in nothing like large numbers anywhere. The proportion of the Irish to the English in any district was therefore very small. Moreover, hon. Members had understated very much the Protestant population of Ireland in placing it only at 1,000,000. It should be recollected also that it bore a very different proportion to the Roman Catholic in Ireland to that in which the Roman Catholic stood to the Protestant in England. Throughout Ireland the Protestants formed about a fourth of the population, and in Ulster were in a majority. It was impossible to state exactly what electoral power the Irish Roman Catholics would have in England; but in some constituencies they would undoubtedly have considerable influence.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that the House had nothing whatever to do with the question of whether Catholics should or should not be returned for particular portions of the constituency, but simply as to whether the Boundary Commissioners, looking at the Instructions placed before them, were right in the divisions which they had suggested for Liverpool. The way in which the hon. Member for Galway had brought forward the Motion did him great credit; but from his knowledge of Liverpool he considered the Commissioners had come to a very sensible, natural, and rational division. He believed the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), who had just spoken, represented correctly the feeling of his constituents when he said nine-tenths of the inhabitants were averse to the proposed change. The question was not a Party one, and he should be surprised if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Samuel Smith) did not confirm that statement.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH said, he had taken some pains to ascertain the feeling of the inhabitants of Liverpool on the subject, and he concurred with the remark of his Colleague that the feeling was almost unanimous against making any changes in the divisions of the city proposed by the Boundary Commissioners.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: When the hon. Member speaks of the feeling being unanimous, he does not, of course, include the Irish, who form one-third of the population.

[Second Night.]

MR. SAMUEL SMITH said, no representations had reached him, and he had friendly relations with a large portion of the Irish population of Liverpool, and hoped that those friendly relations would continue. So far as he could see, the proposed change would require a practical reconstitution of the whole Parliamentary borough. The Amendment would necessitate the division of several wards; whereas the scheme of the Boundary Commissioners coincided with the existing wards, and it would cause great confusion to break up the wards in the manner in which the hon. Member recommended. Even if the Amendment were adopted, it would not give the Irish population a majority in this division. As the wards were constituted in the Bill, the Irish would number about one-fourth of the electors, and if a change were made as proposed the Irish electors would not exceed one-third. The Irish Party would not be in the position to return a Member under any circumstances. It had been charged against the Protestant population that they were not willing to permit Catholics in England to have representation; but he would remind the hon. Member for Monaghan that within the last day or two the first steps had been taken for choosing Liberal candidates for Liverpool, and he believed there was every probability of an Irish Catholic being asked to contest the Exchange Ward. So far as he was concerned, he was entirely in favour of the just representation of Catholics in England.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was, no doubt, thoughtful of the Liberal Party managers to run a Catholic Liberal in a district in which he hoped to catch some Catholic votes. Even apart from Irish Nationalist considerations, but on the broadest ground of English common sense, this complaint should be attended to. But, apparently, the bigotry and prejudice of the English race, and that curious mixture of qualities which made them incapable of understanding any other race in the world, made the Government refuse this concession.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he regretted that the question had resolved itself into a religious one, and that an understanding upon the subject had not been arrived at by the Front Opposition Bench and the Government. He objected to pressure being brought to bear upon English Members by a separation being brought about between the English and the Irish elements in the great constituencies. He denied that there was any desire on the part of Conservatives to deprive any section of the community of a fair share of representation; but as the question was a particular one, dealing with the peculiarities of one special constituency, and not one of general principle, he felt bound, in case of a division, to give his support to the Government.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was a remarkable fact that both the Members of the Government who had spoken admitted that the Irish Members were right on the merits of the case; but still they were determined, acting on underground influences, to refuse the proposal, and, to suit the exigencies of Party, they refused to do justice to the Irishmen of Liverpool. It was, no doubt, a clever dodge for the Liberal managers to put up a Catholic Liberal in Liverpool; but he thought in doing so they were overshooting the mark. Such a man would be either a political renegade or an anti-Irishman, and the Irishmen of Liverpool would have nothing to do with him.

It being now a quarter before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Further Proceeding on Consideration of the Bill, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that he desired to make a statement to the House with reference to the course of Business. He had already informed the House, and the Attorney General had likewise done so, that the Registration Bills were extremely pressing. They were even more pressing for the moment than the Redistribution Bill, and they must make some progress with regard to them, because of the necessity to proceed with the voting lists. The duties imposed on the officers in consequence of the delay which had taken place were very great. Therefore, on Friday, it was proposed to go forward with the Irish Registration Bill, the Scotch Bill being placed second. They had intended to place all the three Bills for Friday; but serious and very natural objections had been taken to setting down the English measure for that day.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the House would remember, with reference to the question of transferring the cost of preparing the voters' lists from local rates to Imperial taxation, that after the vote which was given the other night the Prime Minister stated that the Government must take time to consider what course they should pursue, and he wished to ask whether that point would be again brought up during the progress of the Irish Registration Bill through Committee?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think the point would be raised in Committee on the Irish Bill. He thought it would first come before the House in Committee on the English Bill, if raised by opponents of the present system, or it would come up on the Report of the Irish Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Then the Government do not intend to move any Amendment which would have the effect of reversing the decision arrived at the other evening?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am not aware of any such intention on the part of the Solicitor General for Ireland, or of the Irish authorities; and I think that if they had had any such intention, I should have heard of it.

MR. PARSELL asked that instructions similar to those in the English Bill might be inserted in the Irish Registration Bill; also, if it would be convenient for the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to be in the House on Friday, in order to assist the Irish officials during the discussion of the Irish Bill? He was sure if the right hon. Baronet could find time to be in the House, the result would be better progress and much greater harmony.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE was understood to say that it would not be in Order for him to discuss that question.

COLONEL NOLAN wished to know when the English Bill would come on?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That must depend to some extent on the progress made with the Irish Bill.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR: I beg to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice—Whether there is any truth in the report of the occupation of Maruchak by the Russians, and also of a further advance towards Herat?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, Sir Peter Lumsden, on the 23rd of April telegraphed—

“Just received from Governor of Herat intelligence that Russians have advanced a post 30 miles south of Pul-i-Khisti to Maruchak, on the Murghab.”

On the 25th Sir Peter Lumsden merely alludes to the recent occupation of Maruchak. Her Majesty's Government are averse to giving publicity to mere reports; but the matter was so important that an answer was given yesterday in the House of Commons with regard to the information which had thus been received, and on which we had thought it right to make inquiries at St. Petersburg. The Russian Ambassador informed me that his Government knew nothing of the Russian advance to Maruchak. Sir Edward Thornton, to whom I had addressed inquiries, replied on the 29th that the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs said that he could state positively that no Russian troops had advanced to Maruchak. Sir Peter Lumsden, in a telegram which arrived late yesterday evening, said that an Afghan express just in declared the report of a Russian occupation of Maruchak to be quite unfounded.

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF AUSTRALASIA
BILL.—(No. 69.)
(The Earl of Derby.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill."—(The Earl of Derby.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, the House would remember the general substance of the discussion which took place the other evening on this Bill, and that the question at issue turned upon the adhesion of certain Australian Colonies to the 31st clause of the Bill; but since the second reading a very important Paper had been laid on the Table of the House. He had been criticized in a public paper for having said that the Colony of New South Wales had expressed its adhesion to this 31st clause, and had refused to enter the Union unless it were retained. The exact position was that neither New South Wales nor New Zealand had expressed any formal opinion on the subject. He thought that it was understood that if that clause did not remain a portion of the Bill there was no probability that either of those Colonies would come in. There was another very important point in the matter. His statement the other night was that there were four Colonies—Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania—in favour of the omission of that clause, and that two Colonies—New South Wales and New Zealand—were in favour of its retention. But from the Paper to which he had alluded he gathered that South Australia had expressed an opinion in favour of the retention of the clause. On the 17th of April a telegram arrived from the Governor of South Australia in which he said the Government there were satisfied with the Amendments agreed upon, one of which Amendments was the insertion of this particular clause. That was a very important matter, because, in the first place, it would be noticed that instead of there being four Colonies adverse to the clause and two favourable to it, there were three in favour and three adverse to it; and, secondly, in the 30th clause of the Bill it was expressly provided that the consent of four Colonies should be required in order to make a Confederation, and the result would be that no confederation under the Bill might take place, which was greatly to be deplored. The precise position of the Australian Colonies was that Victoria, Queensland, and Tasmania were all in favour of the omission of this clause, and New South Wales and New Zealand required to give the matter more consideration, and, in fact, declined to express any formal opinion. There was, he thought, on all sides of the House a desire to encourage to the utmost and to facilitate the union and federation of the Colonies, believing it to be highly desirable in all respects; but, on the other hand, the difficulties which appeared were many, the delicacy of the position was very great, and it required great delicacy of touch in order to carry the matter through successfully. Therefore, while he had endeavoured to correct his statement of the other night so as to bring it in accordance with the exact and precise state of the case, he still adhered to the opinion that it was, on the whole, best to retain the 31st clause in the Bill, as leading to the consummation they all desired—namely, the adoption of this Federation.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, it was quite true that Victoria, Queensland, and Tasmania were against the retention of the clause, that South Australia and West Australia accepted the Bill as it stood, and that New South Wales and New Zealand had not yet expressed any definite opinion.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee.

Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

INFANTS BILL.—(No. 78.)

(The Lord FitzGerald.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

On Motion, "That the Bill do pass!"

LORD NORTON said, he rose to move an Amendment on Sub-section 2 of Clause 3, which gave a mother power to appoint provisionally, by deed or will a guardian or guardians to act jointly with the father after her death. He proposed to insert the following Proviso:—

"But no such provisional appointment of guardians to act with the infant's father shall take effect unless confirmed by the Court upon evidence sufficient in its judgment to prove that the father is unfit to be the sole guardian."

As the clause stood, a mother might appoint guardians to act with the father, unless the sanction of the Court should be refused. He thought it better, conversely, that such appointment should be invalid unless confirmed by the Court. Every father should not be obliged to void a formal appointment by proving himself fit to be sole guardian. The hostile guardian should be made to show cause for his appointment at all.

Amendment moved,

In line 25, to leave out from] "infant" to the end of the sub-section, and insert, "But no such provisional appointment of guardians to act with the infant's father shall take effect unless confirmed by the Court upon evidence sufficient in its judgment to prove that the father is unfit to be the sole guardian."—
(The Lord Norton.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, he hoped their Lordships would not accept the Amendment, as it involved an essential inroad on the principle of the Bill, which was based on what was for "the welfare of the infant." The Amendment sought to substitute "the moral unfitness of the father." A dying mother anxious for the welfare of her children would naturally wish to nominate a guardian to act with the father if she knew that the latter was not a fit person to whom alone to intrust the welfare of his offspring. If the Amendment were agreed to, a guardian so nominated would not be able to act unless a Judge should be satisfied that the father was absolutely unfit to fulfil his paternal duties, and this condition precedent might fail to be established in cases where it would yet be of the greatest importance for the welfare of the children that the mother's guardian should be accepted as the father's coadjutor. It might be greatly for the welfare of the infant that the father should not be the sole guardian without imputing to him any moral delinquency.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he should support the Amendment. If it were inserted in the clause the principle would be recognized that the father was the person primarily responsible for the welfare of his children, and that he had a right to be their sole guardian unless proved before a Court of competent jurisdiction to be unfitted to exercise the right. If this principle were not established in the Bill, a guardian nominated by the mother would in almost every case be confirmed in his position by the Courts of Law if appeal was made to them, for Judges would be loth to disregard the wishes expressed by a mother on her death-bed. The dual control of father and guardian which the clause contemplated would work well in very few cases indeed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that if this sub-section of the clause had been omitted an important class of cases would have been left wholly unprovided for. He was bound to admit that the present Amendment would not have that result; but the reason why it was better to provide for that class of cases in the manner proposed by the clause might be stated very shortly. In the first place, it was not plain how the Court would deal with the word "unfit," and whether it might not lay on the person making the application a burden greater than ought to be done. Secondly, and connected with the same idea, there might be circumstances not of the gross character to which reference had been made, and not necessarily involving moral unfitness on the part of the father, which might make it highly desirable and almost necessary for the welfare of the infant that a guardian should be associated with him. Suppose there was a father not a profligate or drunkard, but impecunious, hiding here and there to avoid his creditors, and unable out of his own means to provide for his children. In the present state of the law with regard to the property of married women that case was much more likely to occur than before. The mother might have to provide out of her own means for the maintenance of the children, and at her death might dispose of those means for that purpose and desire to appoint a guardian to act with the father. He was not at all sure that the Court would say that such a case came under the meaning of the word "unfit." But he was quite sure that the Court would say that it was desirable that the guardian, if a fit and proper person had been appointed by the mother, should in such a case be associated with the father.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he felt that in discussing this question they were likely to fall into a fallacy if they were to imagine that it was possible in the majority of cases for the guardian to act with the father. He would be appointed against what the father conceived to be his rights, and would be received as an invader in the house. The children would be subjected to what had been called, with reference to political events, "dual control," and to all the evils attributed to that form of government. On every point the two influences would struggle. If there was a question of religion they would have the father teaching Protestantism and the guardian Roman Catholicism, or vice versa, or the father teaching Low Church doctrines and the guardian High Church doctrines, with the effect not that the child would take its choice, but that he would learn to disbelieve both. Again, with regard to morals. One view of life would be presented by the father, another by the guardian, and the child would not adhere to one or the other, but would take the negative result, and treat the question of morals as unimportant. The noble and learned Lord told the House that "unfitness" was a thing very difficult of proof, and, therefore, the father was to be ousted of his rights, not upon proof, but upon suspicion. Then his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack spoke of the uncertainty of construction to which words would be exposed. That was true. The Court often applied to words a very different construction from what might have been intended by their author. Lord Cairns passed one of the most important measures with respect to real property which had been passed for many years. That measure was brought before the Court in a case which had attracted general attention, and Lord Cairns told him that the decision at which the Court had arrived in that very carefully-drafted Act of Parliament was the reverse of what was intended. When the noble and learned Earl told the House that the interpretation of the word "unfit" would occasion very great difficulty, would not the interpretation of the word "desirable" also be difficult? He was old-fashioned enough to believe that by the law of Nature and the law of God the father was the person who ought to have the care of his child, and that to disestablish the father altogether of his rights and to say that the Judge should act solely with reference to his own view of the welfare of the infant would be to disregard rights held sacred from the beginning of our polity, and resting on far deeper foundations than most of those which we deemed firmly established. He hoped that the Amendment, which had been drawn in a spirit of compromise, would be accepted by the House.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendment moved,

In subsection (2.), line 25, to leave out from ("death") to ("infant") in line 26, and insert ("if it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the father is for any reason unfitted to be the sole guardian of his children.")—(The Lord Inchiquin.)

On question, That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 53; Not-Contents 69: Majority 16.

Clause 5 (Court may make orders as to custody).

EARL BEAUCHAMP thought that Clause 5 ought to be carefully considered, as it gave the Court an unlimited power respecting the management of children, even in the lifetime of the father. As the clause stood, a quarrelsome or vindictive wife might take proceedings against her husband with respect to the children, and heavy costs might be incurred. How were those costs to be borne? The clause would be productive of much mischief and tend to promote matrimonial differences, unless it were safeguarded as Lord Cairns had proposed to safeguard it. He would, therefore, move as an Amendment the introduction of words limiting the operation of the clause to cases when the husband and wife were separated either by decree of the Court or by deed. Their Lordships had divided on this question last week; but he would take the sense of the House again on the subject.

Moved to insert at beginning of clause ("Where the father or mother of any infant are living separate under a separation by deed or decree of the court, or otherwise.")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, he objected to the Amendment on principle. It was not necessary that there should be a quarrel between husband and wife for the intervention of the Court to be invoked. There might be reasonable differences of opinion, not inconsistent with amicable relations between the parties, which could only be satisfactorily settled by the Court. The Amendment was not only contrary to the spirit of the law of the Church, but was also against the policy of the law, which did not encourage, and, indeed, for a long time did not recognize, separation of husband and wife; and it was a hard thing to impose as a condition precedent to the grant of relief in such cases to a wife that she should leave her home and children.

LORD BRAMWELL said, he was surprised at the arguments of his noble and learned Friend. The clause was a mischievous one as it stood. There might be nothing wrong in the husband's conduct; yet, because his wife entertained different views from him as to the bringing up of the children, or had a trifling difference with him, which good sense and good temper would have got over, a permanent quarrel was to be established between them, and the man was to be subjected to the annoyance and expense of legal proceedings. There was no justification for interfering with the present law. No doubt, there were Petitions in favour of this clause; but, as he had often said, it was the discontented who petitioned, and though those who were satisfied with the existing law might be the overwhelming majority, they were not heard of. He had asked the opinion of a learned Judge who had thought and written as much about our laws as any man, and his learned friend said—"If two men ride on one horse one must ride in front." He declared that rather than pass the clause in its present form he would hand over to the mother the whole government of the house and children. He did not intend to say anything uncivil of women, or to suggest that they were particularly prone to mischief; but undoubtedly this clause would give a wife great power of worrying her husband. He might not only have to pay his own costs in proceedings which she instituted, but probably the costs of his wife, for counsel and solicitors were in divorce proceedings regarded as "necessaries," for which the husband was liable. This would really add another to the terrors of matrimony.

LORD BRABOURNE said, that it was his duty to make an earnest appeal to their Lordships not to accept this Amendment, which those who promoted this measure considered well-nigh fatal to it. Of this the House might be assured, since he (Lord Brabourne) had received many letters and communications to that effect from different parts of the country. He would respectfully entreat their Lordships not to consider the question now before them as if it was one affecting only or principally the class to which they themselves belonged. In that class the clause might, indeed, not be required, and the Amendment might be innocuous. But in the poorer ranks of life such cases as the following sometimes had to his knowledge occurred. A husband would leave his wife either to get work elsewhere, or to go on what was known as "a drunken spree." During his absence the wife supported the children by her hard-won earnings. Then the husband would return, and it was more than doubtful whether the couple could in a legal point of view be held to have been living "separately." As the law now stood, the husband could use the threat of removing the children from the custody of the mother to some place or person disapproved by her, as a means of extorting from her money to squander upon himself. By this clause as it stood, the wife could in such a case apply to the Court for an order as to the custody of the children. The Amendment of the noble Earl would enact that before she could so apply she must separate from her husband. But she might not wish to do this, and might still cherish a hope to reclaim him. He (Lord Brabourne) would leave the two noble and learned Lords who had spoken to discuss the question of costs. To his mind, there was a higher question involved; here was a remedy which it was admitted on all sides that the wife should have, and he protested against its being made a precedent condition that she should separate from her husband. It was all very well to talk of a "dual control;" but all the legislation of late years upon these subjects had been in the direction of elevating the status of the woman, and giving her some share in the direction of her children and household; and having presented many Petitions from wives and mothers who took a deep interest in this question, on their behalf and in their names he earnestly asked the House to reject the Amendment.

LORD DENMAN, in moving, as an Amendment, after Clause 5, to insert the following new clause:—

“In case of the conduct of any father making it wrong for him to have the custody of his infant children or child, and if his wife, their mother, should have a separate household, she, by the order of the Probate and Divorce Court or other court of the High Court of Justice, or of the nearest county court, shall have all the rights which other householders possess, or may in future possess, at every election of Members of Parliament and at all other elections,” said, he could not expect their Lordships to admit a disfranchising clause in the Bill; but as on December 4, 1884, he alluded to the case of “The King v. Greenhill,” 1836, referred to by his lamented Predecessor on July 28, 1839, he wished to show that some married women ought to have votes.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of The Lord FITZGERALD, the following new Clause was inserted:—

“In England and Ireland the High Court of Justice, in any division thereof, and in Scotland either division of the Court of Session, may, in their discretion, on being satisfied that it is for the welfare of the infant, remove from his office any testamentary guardian, or any guardian appointed or acting by virtue of this Act, and may also, if they shall deem it to be for the welfare of the infant, appoint another guardian in place of the guardian so removed.”

Amendment moved,

After Clause 10, to insert as a new clause— (“Nothing in this Act shall prejudice the sole authority of the father, as now recognized by law, in the matter of the religious education of his children.”)—(The Lord Bray.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, he hoped the noble Lord would not press the Amendment, as he thought it would be introducing into the measure a dangerous element. It was a well-settled principle, and he hoped it would not be shaken, that the children should be brought up in the religion of their father. There was nothing at all in the Bill to derogate from that, and he thought the Amendment entirely unnecessary.

Lord Brabourne

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, if the framers of the Bill had no intention of altering the existing state of the law, why should they hesitate to affirm it by this Amendment? The tendency of the Bill appeared to be of an opposite nature, and to leave it to a County Court to decide what was most for the welfare of a child; and this might include the religious bringing up of a child.

On Question? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 7; Not-Contents 56: Majority 49.

Clause disagreed to.

Motion, “That the Bill do pass,” agreed to; Bill passed accordingly, and sent to the Commons.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL

(NO. 92.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 2 (Procuring woman to be a common prostitute or to enter a brothel).

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE moved an Amendment to the clause, so as to make the offence of procuration punishable under the clause in all cases. As the provision stood, the offence was limited to cases in which the woman or girl, with respect to whom the crime should be committed, was under 21 years of age.

Amendment moved, in page 1, lines 10 and 11, to leave out (“under twenty-one years of age.”)—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

Amendment agreed to; words left out accordingly.

LORD ABERDARE moved to insert the following clause after Clause 5:—

“Where, in case of any charge under this Act, any girl under 15 years appears to have solicited the offence, such solicitation shall be deemed an offence, and on conviction thereof the Court may require such girl to find securities for good behaviour, or sentence her to be sent to a certified reformatory school or such other certified institution as may hereafter be provided for the reception of such juvenile offenders.”

It had, he said, as their Lordships knew, been proved before a Select Committee that there had been cases in which girls had been enticed abroad for immoral purposes. It had been also proved that a considerable amount of juvenile immorality existed in this country, for the cure of which some provision ought to be made. But there were none of their Lordships prepared for the revelations made before the Committee. A short paragraph of their Report stated that the evidence proved beyond doubt that juvenile prostitution, upon an enormous scale, was increasing in England, and especially in London. It also said that the Committee were unable adequately to express their sense of the magnitude, both in a moral and physical point of view, of the evils thus brought to light. The object of his Amendment was to suggest the application to those miserable children of that system of reformatory treatment which had obtained such success in the case of juvenile thieves. He thought the proper way of dealing with this subject would be by a Bill; but he was anxious to take this opportunity of bringing it before the House, if only by way of suggestion. He hoped his noble Friend would give an assurance that the question should be dealt with. Such an assurance would be satisfactory to the House and to the country.

Amendment moved,

After Clause 5, insert as a new clause:—
“Where, in case of any charge under this Act, or any charge of indecent assault, any girl under the age of fifteen years appears to have solicited an offence under this Act, or an indecent assault, such solicitation shall be deemed an offence, and, on conviction thereof, the court may require such girl to find securities for good behaviour, or sentence her to be sent to a certified home within the meaning of this Act.”—
(The Lord Aberdare.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, that the noble Lord himself did not consider the clause was drawn in such a shape that the Government could consent to its insertion in the Bill. He need not, therefore, enter into any criticism of its wording. He would only say that his noble Friend had called attention to a most grave subject, with regard to which a very important recommendation had been made by a Committee of their Lordships' House. There was nothing in this Bill to carry out that recommendation. It was not thought advisable to introduce into so short a Bill a matter for which such elaborate and complicated provisions would be required, as the establishment of these homes would involve. But he would bring to the notice of the Secretary of State what had been said by his noble Friend,

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—
THE EXPEDITION UP THE NILE.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether he could give the House any information with respect to the present transport arrangements for conveying clothing and stores to the troops on the Nile? His noble Friend, he was sure, felt that the comfort and welfare of the troops on the Nile was a matter well worthy of his attention. He had heard from sources on which he could rely that the troops were in a very bad state as regarded their clothing. In some cases the clothing was all but falling off the backs of the men, and the troops were in an equally bad condition with regard to boots. Officers seemed to suffer alike with the men. So far as he was aware, no fresh clothing had reached them yet; and he should like to know what prospect there was of the troops getting the necessary stores? No doubt the transport difficulties were very great, for he was quite aware of the great loss of camels which the Army in the Soudan had sustained. In the march from Gubat to Korti the loss of camels was enormous, and it would appear that there had been no margin left for casualties in this respect. He had heard that the stores of clothing had not got beyond Assouan, and he should be glad to be informed that his information was incorrect. He hoped his noble Friend would be able to say what the present and future transport arrangements were, and whether the troops were to wait for the rising of the Nile before they obtained fresh clothing. He might be told that all these matters were left to the General commanding, but the War Office was ultimately responsible; and they should know accurately and be able to impart such information, where the stores actually were, and what prospect there was of these stores reaching the regiments. Large sums of money had been subscribed in this country for the purchase of stores; but these would be useless if they did not reach their destination. If the health of the troops was to be secured, there should not only be sent out comforts of every description, but books and newspapers were invaluable to men who were cooped up all day in straw huts, and who, after the excitement of a campaign, were so liable to sickness. It was stated that four weeks ago our men were entirely destitute of clothing and other necessities.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was not at all surprised that the noble Lord should have asked this Question; and he could assure him that anything which conduced either to the good health or to the comfort of the troops in the Soudan occupied the serious and earnest attention of the authorities who had to supply their needs. With regard to transport, the position was this. They knew generally that certain means existed of conveying various articles to the troops; but those means were entirely in the hands of the General who commanded the lines of communication and the commanding officers. They, and they alone, determined what were the particular articles which were most in demand; and the orders of those officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the most pressing demands of the troops, must regulate what articles were sent out. The noble Lord was quite wrong in stating that the clothing had not got beyond Assouan. The stores of clothing and boots in Egypt were enormous, and there had been for a long time considerable stores at Wady Halfa. In the last detailed Report he observed that a steamer was now plying above Dongola, and had started more than four weeks ago with a large supply of clothing and necessities required by the troops; and a distinguished officer, who had recently returned from the upper regions of the Nile, had informed him that at the time he left the General in command of the communications had stopped all supplies except those required for pressing needs, and those were forwarded without delay. He trusted that by this time the clothes and boots had reached the men who required them. He might mention that since the time referred to by the noble Lord some of the troops had descended the Nile, and had, no doubt, met the supplies half way. He could assure him that the difficulties of transport were very great indeed, and that the greatest efforts had been made to keep up the lines of communication by steamers and boats, and where these were not available by camels. Everything that could possibly be done had been done to keep the troops supplied with what was necessary for their health and comfort.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE COLONY— CAPE TOWN AND SIMON'S BAY RAILWAY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government has undertaken or intends to undertake the completion of the railroad between Cape Town and Simon's Bay and the Cape of Good Hope? The value of this railway, he submitted, had been pointed out by various Military Authorities; and it was entirely upon military, and not upon commercial, grounds the undertaking should be completed. The communications by sea from Simon's Bay to Table Bay were very long. If the line of railroad were completed it would be possible to establish barracks half-way, and the troops could be moved backwards and forwards, and it would be a good line of defence. He understood that the Government proposed to expend £90,000 upon the fortifications at Simon's Bay; but the works of defence there would be absolutely useless unless they had the means of conveying troops to Simon's Bay by railway. The only assistance asked in the matter was a sum of £50,000 for the construction of six miles of railway. He hoped the noble Earl would take the question seriously into consideration, as from the best information he could obtain our defences were in a most imperfect condition.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that he had gone closely into the question of the defences of these two places, both with good maps and also by having personally ridden over the ground; and he had come to the conclusion that it was absolutely impossible to separate the defences of Simon's Bay from those of Table Bay. The two must be considered as part of one defence, and it was absolutely necessary that the railway should be completed. He was glad to find that his opinion was corroborated by that of the noble and gallant Lord Lord Napier of Magdala).

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he did not think the noble Lord would expect him to enter into controversy on the subject. He believed the noble Lord's statement of facts was quite accurate, and he was very willing to defer to the high authority of the noble and gallant Lord opposite. There was no doubt that it was very desirable to connect these two places. But the question was—who was to make the railway, and who was to bear the expense? Within the last few days he had received a communication from the Agent General of the Cape Colony conveying a proposal on the part of the Government of that Colony, which he intended immediately to refer to a small Departmental Committee appointed by the Colonial and War Offices and the Admiralty. The subject would be at once taken into consideration. He had not seen the details of the proposal, and could not, therefore, express an opinion upon it; but he was quite sure that whatever decision was arrived at that communication would not be lost sight of.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that it was extremely difficult to discuss these questions openly, because so many military considerations were involved. He quite agreed with the noble and gallant Lord behind him as to the great necessity of completing this railway. He was glad that the Colonial Secretary had undertaken to examine the subject; but he was disposed to regret that it was to be referred to a Departmental Committee, and that reference would involve a loss of precious time. No further facts could be ascertained, and there did not seem to be two opinions on the subject. The railway ought to have been taken in hand long ago; and he, with other noble Lords, had on several occasions urged the importance of this and other similar undertakings at a time when they might have been prosecuted more effectively, and at a less expense than was possible now. He urged with all the force in his power that there should be no unnecessary delay on the part of the Government in taking action in the matter.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH wished to add that means should be taken for the conveyance of torpedoes from one port to the other.

House adjourned at a quarter past

Third Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Provisional Order * [124], and passed.

PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL
ORDERS (POOR LAW) (No. 4)
BILL.—[BILL 116.]

(Mr. George Russell, Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Question [23rd April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL said, it would be recollected by the House in reference to this matter that there was considerable opposition on the other side of the House the last time the Bill was under consideration. The Local Government Board had carefully considered the question with regard to that part of the Bill relating to the parish of St. Benedict, Cambridge; and they did not feel disposed in view of the opposition that had arisen to press their original suggestion. At the same time, in regard to the Amendment given Notice of by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer), it did not appear that a compromise would be arranged county inspectors' offices in contravention of the circular; whether thirty constables were examined at the end of last November, with a view to the pointment of the most suitable to clerks to county inspectors; who examined and valued the papers of the candidates; were the candidates informed of the result of the examination; how the fact explained that every one of competing constables since appointed clerk to a county inspector is a Protestant; and, whether, notwithstanding the circular of the 12th of October, continuing sergeant clerks, the Protestant constable clerks who since attained the rank of sergeant are permitted still to hold the clerkships?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN:

The Inspector General informs me he found it necessary to make the order referred to for disciplinary and other reasons. Exceptions were made in some cases where the duties were of great importance; and of eight sergeants retained in these circumstances six Roman Catholics. In consequence of the order seven sergeants had to revert to ordinary duty. Five of these were Roman Catholics and two were Protestants. Of these seven, two Roman Catholics and two Protestants have been since re-appointed to vacancies, Sergeant Bratton is one of these. The examination referred to was most carefully conducted, and the candidates who were unsuccessful were so informed. The men who took the first two places were Roman Catholics and received the first appointments. Out of eight pointments made three were Roman Catholics. Two assistant clerks, a Protestant and a Roman Catholic, have attained the rank of sergeant since the issue of the order, and both have been required to revert to ordinary duty. I give these details with the view of showing the absolute want of foundation for the allegations of partiality on the score of religion; but I must also point out the undesirability of a question of this kind in reference to a disciplinary force in which promotions are made on the ground of merit alone.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — AMALGAMATION OF NEWPORT AND WESTPORT POOR LAW UNIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ther it be true that the purchase-money for two acres additional land to Holywood Cemetery, and the cost of enclosing it by a wall and gate, was paid out of that rate; whether it be true that, after the Board of Guardians had paid £428 16s. 3d. for that purpose, the Local Government Board in November of the same year handed over the cemetery to the Holywood Town Commissioners as the Burial Board, without securing the repayment of any part of the aforesaid money; whether it be true that, although the county Antrim is separated from the said cemetery by Belfast Lough and the borough of Belfast, and can derive no benefit from it, that the ratepayers have been compelled to pay about £250 of the entire cost of extensions; and, whether the Local Government Board will direct their auditor to inquire into and make a report on this subject?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : The circumstances detailed in this Question have been the subject of a correspondence which appears to disclose a case for a further inquiry, and the Local Government Board will proceed to make it.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SUB-CONSTABLE M'CORMICK.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a sub-constable of police named M'Cormick, now on duty in Magherafelt, was removed from Coleraine and reduced from the rank of sergeant for a criminal offence; whether M'Cormick was criminally prosecuted for the foregoing offence; whether other misconduct is alleged against him; and, what course will be taken in his case?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : Constable M'Cormick was never removed or reduced in rank for a criminal offence, nor was he ever charged with such an offence. He was once guilty of conduct which was held to amount to a constructive assault, for which he was removed from charge and seriously cautioned.

NAVY (SHIPS, &c.)—MANUFACTURE OF GUNS.

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any action has been taken to carry out the recommendation of the Committee on the building and repairing of Her Majesty's ships, viz., that the entire responsibility of the manufacture of guns for the Navy should rest with the Admiralty, and be quite separate from the War Department; and, whether the only reasons for not carrying out those recommendations are questions of book-keeping between the two Departments?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY : No action has yet been taken. Many important questions, in addition to that of book-keeping, must be considered before any change is made. We shall not certainly lose sight of the recommendations of the Committee.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—WANDSWORTH POLICE COURT.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the magistrates sitting in the Wandsworth Police Court, Mr. Paget and Mr. Shiel, have written to him to say that, in their opinion, the existing state of the Court is "a disgrace to the Metropolis, and calculated to bring the administration of the Law into contempt;" and, whether he can now state the nature of the arrangements which have been made for the removal of the Court to more commodious premises?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the Treasury had sanctioned the expenditure of certain sums on the Police Court in question; and he had requested the First Commissioner of Works to take the matter in hand, and see what was best to be done.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—ASSISTANT CLERKS TO COUNTY INSPECTORS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a circular was issued on the 12th of October last by the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, putting an end to the arrangement by which the offices of assistant clerks to county inspectors were occupied by sergeants of the force; whether all the sergeants deprived of office by the circular, except one, Sergeant Bratton, were Catholics; and whether Sergeant Bratton has since been appointed Chief Clerk at Athlone; whether there were any Catholics, and, if so, how many, among the sergeants, about ten in number, who have been retained in the county inspectors' offices in contravention of the circular; whether thirty-six constables were examined at the dépôt last November, with a view to the appointment of the most suitable to be clerks to county inspectors; who examined and valued the papers of the candidates; were the candidates informed of the result of the examination; how is the fact explained that every one of the competing constables since appointed clerk to a county inspector is a Protestant; and, whether, notwithstanding the circular of the 12th of October, discontinuing sergeant clerks, the Protestant constable clerks who since attained the rank of sergeant are permitted still to hold the clerkships?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Inspector General informs me that he found it necessary to make the order referred to for disciplinary and other reasons. Exceptions were made in some cases where the duties were of greater importance; and of eight sergeants retained in these circumstances six are Roman Catholics. In consequence of the order seven sergeants had to revert to ordinary duty. Five of these were Roman Catholics and two were Protestants. Of these seven, two Roman Catholics and two Protestants have been since re-appointed to vacancies, and Sergeant Bratton is one of these. The examination referred to was most carefully conducted, and the candidates who were unsuccessful were so informed. The men who took the first two places were Roman Catholics and received the first appointments. Out of eight appointments made three were Roman Catholics. Two assistant clerks, a Protestant and a Roman Catholic, have attained the rank of sergeant since the issue of the order, and both have been required to revert to ordinary duty. I give these details with the view of showing the absolute want of foundation for the allegations of partiality on the score of religion; but I must again point out the undesirability of Questions of this kind in reference to a disciplined force in which promotions are made on the ground of merit alone.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—AMALGAMATION OF NEWPORT AND WESTPORT POOR LAW UNIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to a project to amalgamate the Newport with the Westport Poor Law Union, What effect has been produced upon the Local Government Board by a unanimous resolution of the Westport Board, adopted on the 19th ultimo, condemning the project of amalgamation, pointing out that it would almost double the average rate of the Westport Union; that there would be a distance of over forty miles between some of the districts in the new Union and the Workhouse, and that it would be impossible to collect the rates, and scarcely possible even to procure collectors; whether the Local Government have considered and framed any alternative schemes of amalgamation or alteration of Unions by which the needs of the poor may be more adequately met, and the pressure of the poor rate be more equally distributed than by the scheme projected; what steps have been taken to ascertain the opinions of the ratepayers and others affected; and, whether, having regard to the pressure of the general question of Union amalgamation in Ireland, the Local Government Board will suspend any scheme confined to individual Unions until the general question has been considered?

Mr. Sexton

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have the resolution of the Westport Guardians at present under consideration, and hope soon to address them on the subject. I am not aware of any alternative schemes being under consideration. Opportunity was given of expressing their views to all parties interested at the inquiry which was held, of which notice was given to all the Unions adjoining Newport. There is no general question of amalgamation of Unions in Ireland under consideration that would make it advisable to suspend action in any particular case.

LAW AND POLICE—WANDERING LUNATICS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department. If his attention has been called to several cases recently reported, in which workhouse authorities refused to receive, even temporarily and pending inquiry, wandering insane persons for whom reception orders were duly made by police magistrates; whether, in consequence of such refusal, these unfortunate lunatics had to be kept for a considerable time in the police cells, where no proper accommodation exists, at great inconvenience to the police and serious risk to themselves; whether the Lunacy Commissioners have taken any notice of these cases, or offered any suggestion as to the best method of dealing with them; and, whether he will give peremptory orders in the proper quarter to arrange for the immediate reception of insane persons presented under the order of a police magistrate, until they can be examined and their cases properly dealt with?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had answered a Question on that subject put to him the other day; and he had then stated that, in his opinion, the proper place for these unfortunate persons was neither a police cell nor a prison, but in a workhouse. But great difficulties had been raised by workhouse authorities in regard to the subject; and he, therefore, would propose in the Lunacy Bill now before the House of Lords to introduce some clause to clear up the matter.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SALARIES OF TEACHERS IN WORKHOUSES.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to workhouse teachers, What is the average salary of workhouse teachers in Ireland; what is the value of the weekly rations allowed them; what has been the average increase of salary to workhouse teachers during the past ten years; what compensation, if any, has been given to workhouse teachers for gratuities withdrawn by the Commissioners of National Education upon the passing of the Act of 1875; what is the average length of service of a workhouse teacher; is the whole of a workhouse teacher's time devoted to the care of the children in charge and to the discharge of other workhouse duties; and, is it true that, for several years past, the salaries of workhouse teachers have been paid from the Consolidated Fund and not from Poor Rates?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not had time to obtain the information asked for.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—UNION HALL PIER, CO. CORK.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the pier at Union Hall, county Cork, will be commenced?

MR. HIBBERT: This pier is one of those included in the complete scheme of the Fishery Piers and Harbours Commissioners which has just been sanctioned. The necessary formal steps and the preparation of contract drawings will be proceeded with as soon as possible; but some little time must necessarily elapse before the actual commencement of the work.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CRIMINAL LUNATIC ASYLUM, DUBLIN—ESCAPE OF PATIENTS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it true that the residents in the neighbourhood of the Criminal Lunatic Asylum near Dublin lately memorialised the Government on the subject of the escape of patients, stating that they were afraid to live in the locality in consequence; whether a considerable force of constabulary has consequently been placed on duty there day and night; whether escapes have multiplied under the present management; and, whether he will lay the report of the inquiry held into the matter in January last upon the Table?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There has no such remonstrance been received from the residents in the neighbourhood of the Asylum. Constabulary have been employed to guard the Asylum during certain structural alterations, with the view of securing the safe custody of the inmates. Some escapes, unfortunately, occurred before the police were sent; but none have happened since. A Departmental Committee has recently made a Report on the Asylum; but Reports of this character are always regarded as confidential.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC REGULATION ACT—RAILWAY RATES.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, since the Railway Commission has full powers to deal with preferential rates to Foreign goods, the Board of Trade will exercise the powers imposed by the 3rd section of the Traffic Act, 1854, and instruct the Attorney General to take proceedings before the Railway Commissioners to enforce the provisions of the Traffic Act?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN The section referred to by the hon. Member merely authorizes the Board of Trade to certify to the Attorney General in case of a violation or contravention of the Act of 1854, and upon this certificate it is lawful for the Attorney General to apply to the Court. The Act of 1854 has, however, been amended by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873. The Act of 1873 permits a complaint of a contravention of Section 2 of the Act of 1854 to be made, not only by a person aggrieved, but by any person appointed by the Board of Trade, or by a Municipal or Public Corporation, if furnished with a certificate from the Board of Trade. Local Authorities have availed themselves of this power; and it appears to me that any allegation of preferential rates would be more properly and more effectually brought under the notice of the Commissioners by such Local Authority than by the Board of Trade.

ARMY—BILLETING AT DOWNPATRICK.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that the Catholic clergy of Downpatrick strongly object to the arrangement by which one hundred and ninety men, recruits of the 5th battalion Royal Irish Rifles, now billeted upon the licensed vintners of the town, are lodged in a number of houses, some of them not certified lodging houses, and as to the sufficiency of the sleeping accommodation of which there is considerable doubt; whether there is a number of unoccupied houses in the town, one of them large enough to accommodate eighty men; whether the Government lately paid £1,000 for the tenant right of a piece of land adjacent to the town, to be occupied by the whole battalion when it assembles; and, whether for economy, and for other reasons, the Government, instead of continuing to pay 4*d.* a-night for each man, will make use for their accommodation of the ground it has bought, or of the unoccupied houses?

MR. BRAND: I have made inquiries of the General Officer Commanding at Belfast, with the following result:—No complaints have been made by the Catholic clergy. The billeting arrangements are satisfactory. There is not sufficient accommodation in unoccupied houses in Downpatrick for 190 men, nor is there any single unoccupied house which would accommodate 80 men. There is a camping ground at Downpatrick, and after to-day it will be used. It is not customary to encamp troops at an earlier date than the 1st of May.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— MONAGHAN LICENSING SESSIONS.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it is the case that, at the late Quarter Sessions in Monaghan, a man named Murray applied for a transfer of a licence, which was refused by the County Court Judge, and the house shut up; whether, notwithstanding such refusal, the magistrates at the following Petty Sessions granted a protection order for the same house to a man named Rafferty, although it was proved at the Quarter Sessions that Rafferty had sold to Murray; and, whether the Petty Sessions Court has the legal right to reopen a public-house, closed by order of the Quarter Sessions Court; and what steps the Government propose to take in the matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I am informed that the reason for the refusal mentioned in the first paragraph was, that Rafferty had not himself got a licence, and, therefore, had no right to sell drink. Rafferty, however, had bought the licensed house for a man named M'Nally, and Rafferty should have been the person to have applied at the Quarter Sessions. Rafferty has since obtained under Section 12 of the Licensing Act of 1874 a protection order, and an application for a transfer can be made in proper form and the mistake rectified. There are no special circumstances, and I do not think any illegality has been committed.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any of the recommendations of the Select Committee which inquired last Session into the ventilation of the House have been carried out; and, whether he proposes to move the re-appointment of the Committee, in accordance with the suggestion made in their Report?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: According to the recommendation of the Select Committee, the Local Authority has closed the ventilation gratings of the sewer in the roadway to the west of Westminster Hall. In accordance also with the suggestion of the Committee, the President of the Local Government Board directed Major Tulloch to inspect and report on the sewerage arrangements of the Houses of Parliament. Major Tulloch, who probably had not sufficient time at his disposal to make an exhaustive examination, advised that certain alterations should be made. The expediency of these proposals was doubted by the officers responsible for the drainage system; and a protracted and complete examination, accompanied by numerous and careful experiments on the movement of the air in the main sewer, under the personal superintendence of Mr. Prim, has confirmed the doubt. Sir Robert Rawlinson, the Chief Engineering Inspector of the Local Government Board, has, on behalf of his Board, made an additional Report, which does not bear out the opinions expressed by Major Tulloch. A complete Report, containing a detailed account of all the experimental data which have been obtained, will very shortly be completed. I may add that, so far as the drainage system of the Houses of Parliament is concerned, the results of the inquiries are extremely re-assuring. It does not at present appear that there is any reason for the re-appointment of the Select Committee.

CENTRAL ASIA—AFGHANISTAN—ENGAGEMENTS WITH THE AMEER.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the pledge was first given, to the present Ameer of Afghanistan, that Her Majesty's Government would be responsible for the integrity of Afghan territory, whether such a policy was supported both by the late and the present Government; and, in what document or documents any such pledge is to be found?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The engagement to the Ameer was as follows:—

“Your Highness has requested that the views and intentions of the British Government with regard to the position of the ruler at Cabul in relation to foreign Powers should be placed on record for your Highness's information. The Viceroy and Governor General in Council authorizes me to declare to you that since the British Government admit no right of interference by foreign Powers within Afghanistan, and since both Russia and Persia are pledged to abstain from all interference with the affairs of Afghanistan, it is plain that your Highness can have no political relations with any foreign Power except with the British Government. If any foreign Power should attempt to interfere in Afghanistan, and if such interference should lead to unprovoked aggression on the dominions of your Highness, in that event the British Government would be prepared to aid you to such extent and in such manner as may appear to the British Government necessary in repelling it; provided that your Highness follows unreservedly the advice of the British Government in regard to your external relations.”

This engagement was given in a letter from Sir Lepel Griffin to Abdurrahman Khan on the 1st of August, 1880, and was renewed in the same terms in two letters from the Viceroy to the Ameer of the 22nd of February and 16th of June, 1883. The first of these letters is printed in Afghanistan, No. 1, of 1881, page 40; the two latter in Central Asia, No. 1, 1884, pages 72 and 85. As regards the policy of the late Government, on which I would rather not express an opinion in answer to a Question, particulars will be found in the various Papers presented to Parliament on the subject of Afghanistan while they were in Office.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Have the Government got the Ameer's answer?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The answer of the Ameer was contained in the same Paper as the first three letters.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Had the Ameer at that time been recognized by the whole of Afghanistan?

MR. J. K. CROSS: He had been recognized by the British Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to ask, whether Sir Lepel Griffin's letter of June 14, 1880, did not contain the following passage, with these reservations:—

“The British Government are willing you should establish one Afghanistan, including Herat, the possession of which cannot be guaranteed to you, though the Government are not disposed to hinder any measures you may take to obtain possession of it.”

MR. J. K. CROSS: I think it would be convenient if my hon. Friend will give Notice of a Question of that kind.

FISHERIES (IRELAND)—THE SHANNON SALMON FISHERY.

MR. TOMLINSON (for Colonel KING-HARMAN) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will give a Return of the number of fixed and movable engines for the capture of salmon in the tidal portions of the River Shannon, each description of net separately; the locality in which those nets are fished; the names of the owners of same; and the amount of licence paid for each class of net or engine; and, of the number of fixed engines that were in existence in the lower waters (tidal) prior to the Act of 1863; how many of those engines were abolished by that Act; and the number of same that have subsequently been reinstated by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN was understood to say that he had written to the hon. and gallant Member on the subject.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—POST-MASTER OF MOUNTFIELD POST OFFICE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, Whether sub-constable Thomas Donnelly stationed at Carrickmore, county Tyrone, has purchased a farm in the locality and applied for the mastership of Mountfield Post Office, he being still a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the nomination for this office does not rest with me, but with the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury. I can inform the hon. Member that the noble Lord has not yet made any appointment to the office, and, I believe, does not contemplate giving it to the officer to whom the hon. Member refers.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—CARMEEN DIVISION, COOTEHILL UNION—THE INQUIRY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the clerk of Cootehill Union made the following statement in his letter to the Local Government Board, No. 14,583—84, in answer to the allegations made against him by Mr. Owen M'Cabe, candidate, and Rev.

F. M'Kenna, P.P. his nominator, paragraph 11;

"This property" (Carmeen) "is held in trust by the persons named" (Most Rev. Dr. Donnelly, &c) "who lodged separate statements of claim on a valuation of £119, on which I allowed four votes, &c.;"

if it is a fact that the clerk confirmed the above statement, with 25 others, by solemn oath at the subsequent inquiry, July 8th, 1884, before Mr. Armstrong, Local Government Board Inspector; if it is a fact that the clerk did not allow any property votes on the said property of Carmeen, for which the Rev. F. M'Kenna, P.P. Latton, was proxy, and at whose residence the voting paper was left, inasmuch as the clerk alleged, at the counting of votes, that the property voting papers of the townland of Latton were missing, and could not be produced; that the clerk swore at the inquiry, 8th July, he could not find the property voting papers of the townland of Latton at the counting of votes, and of course did not allow them; that the fact that the clerk did not allow any property votes for Carmeen is notorious, having occurred in the board room in the presence of all interested, and sworn to at a public inquiry, and is in the knowledge of the Local Government Board; and, if it is a fact that Mr. Owen M'Cabe and Rev. F. M'Kenna, P.P. have again and again directed in a special manner the attention of the Local Government Board to the contradictory swearing of the clerk in this matter?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The matter referred to in this Question has already been the subject of a Question asked by the hon. Member for Louth. I must refer the hon. Member to an answer given on the 24th of April 1884.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS OF THE SOUDAN)—THE MILITARY SITUATION.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, since the cessation of active hostilities, any communications have been received from Lord Wolseley or Sir Evelyn Baring as to the extent of the influence or power of the Mahdi in the Soudan, and more particularly in the part of the country north of Korti; and if so, whether there is any objection to laying them upon the Table of the House; and, whether, as further offensive operations are not at present contemplated, there is now any objection to at once removing so many of the troops at or about Suakin as are not required for the protection of that place and its immediate neighbourhood into some healthier and more convenient quarters, where they would be equally available for active service elsewhere in case of need?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Since the Government decided to review their policy with regard to the Soudan, we have been in communication both with Sir Evelyn Baring and with Lord Wolseley upon the whole subject; and some of the despatches and telegrams received from them can certainly be said to touch upon the subject referred to in the first part of the Question. These communications, however, cannot be said to be complete, and some of them are of an extremely confidential character. I doubt very much whether it is possible at present to lay on the Table Papers which would add materially to the information in possession of the House. I shall, of course, from time to time revise the Correspondence which has taken place, with a view to seeing whether further information can be laid on the Table. With regard to the latter part of the Question, Lord Wolseley has just left Cairo for Suakin, with a view to report upon the military situation there. Until we have received that Report it will not be possible to say what number of troops may be removed from that place. Although I have no reason for thinking that the health of the troops is endangered, it is probable that some portion of them will be removed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT: May I ask what steps the Government propose to take to protect the friendly tribes in the neighbourhood of Suakin and the friendly tribes on the Nile, particularly in the neighbourhood of Dongola?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: These questions are both included in the subjects on which we are in communication with Lord Wolseley. Until we have received further Reports upon them, and until we have arrived at a more definite conclusion as to the whole policy in the Soudan, I do not think an answer can be given to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member.

MR. O'DONNELL: Does the Government understand that the presence of a British Army is necessary for the protection of the friendly tribes; and if it is necessary will a British Army be retained there?

[No reply.]

THE PAPAL SEE—DIPLOMATIC COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE VATICAN—

MR. ERRINGTON.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, With reference to the following statement in The Times of the 28th April:—

“Our Correspondent in Rome informs us that, if the Vatican proceed, and persists in nominating Dr. Walsh rather than Dr. Donnelly, who is patronised by the English Government, Mr. Errington, who is officially intrusted with the duty of settling with the Holy See ecclesiastical questions connected with England, will immediately leave Rome;”

whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the instructions of Government to Mr. Errington; and, whether his withdrawal from Rome would be followed by the declaration usual in such cases?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No instructions have been given to Mr. Errington, so it is not in my power to lay them on the Table of the House.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the noble Lord, having regard to the assurances given by the Prime Minister, and by the noble Lord himself in 1883, that a record would be made from time to time, and kept in the Foreign Office, of Mr. Errington's proceedings, whether there is any objection to laying on the Table the record of 1883 of Mr. Errington's visit to Rome? Also whether the present visit is the subject of official record; and whether any Member of Her Majesty's Government is in communication with Mr. Errington in respect to the vacant Archbishopric of Dublin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The understanding given in 1883 was that a record would be kept for the information of successive Secretaries of State. I stated, in reply to a Question on June 11, 1883—

“No Department of the Foreign Office will be charged with making and keeping the record of any correspondence with Mr. Errington. The record of it will eventually be placed in the archives of the Office for the information of successive Secretaries of State."—(3 Hansard, [280] 219.)

MR. SEXTON: Would there be any objection to laying that record, or any portion of it, on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes, Sir. I have no power at all to undertake to lay any portion of these communications upon the Table of the House.

MR. SEXTON: Is the present visit of Mr. Errington to Rome the subject of a similar record?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the hon. Member desires to ask me any further Questions, he had much better place them on the Paper. He can see from my answer that no department of the Foreign Office is charged with keeping this record; and as I only represent the Foreign Office in the House, I am not in a position to reply to the Question of the hon. Member, at least now.

MR. SEXTON: I shall ask to-morrow whether the visit of Mr. Errington to Rome is being made the subject of a record?

MR. HEALY: Might I ask the noble Lord whether it is the intention of the Government to continue Mr. Errington as Ambassador to Rome after the next General Election?

MERCHANT SHIPPING—SALE OF THE "KINFAUNS CASTLE" TO RUSSIA.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the steamship Kinfauns Castle is now the property of the Russian Government, and is being fitted out for warlike purposes; and, if so, whether he will inform the House from whose and to what name the said ship was transferred, and the date of the transaction?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not aware whether or not the Kinfauns Castle is actually the property of the Russian Government; but she was purchased on behalf of the Russian Volunteer Fleet Society. Nor am I able to say whether she is being fitted out for warlike purposes. I am informed that before she left England she was fitted up for the accommodation of a large number of men, to carry emigrants to the Amoor and tea from China to Odessa. The Kinfauns Castle belonged to the Castle

Mail Company, and the negotiations for the sale began in November, 1883, and were concluded shortly afterwards. The registered managing owner at the time of the sale was Sir Donald Currie, who transferred her on behalf of the Castle Company. No record is kept of the names of purchasers in the case of vessels sold to a foreign flag. She left this country early in 1884.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — KILKENNY FEMALE PRISON.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the dissatisfaction existing amongst the magistracy and general public of Kilkenny county and city by reason of the absence of a female prison in Kilkenny, during the last three years, whereby females remanded or committed for perhaps trivial offences or defaults, in the north portion of the county, are sent, under police escort, some sixteen miles by road, possibly in inclement weather, and twenty miles per rail, to the gaol of Tullamore, in King's County, and likewise females in the south, under similar circumstances, are sent to Waterford Gaol, a distance of some thirty miles; and, whether the Government is prepared to recommend to the prison authorities the advisability of re-establishing a prison for females in the city of Kilkenny?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Government have received no complaints of the abolition of the prison, which followed upon the closing of Spike Island. In view of the strong recommendation of the recent Royal Commission that the prisons in Ireland should be further concentrated, I should say there is little prospect of a female prison being re-established at Kilkenny; but the future status of the prison in that City forms part of the general question which is now under consideration.

PARLIAMENT—ADMISSION OF STRANGERS TO THE HOUSE—THE NEW REGULATIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether steps will be taken to supplement the staff of this House to supply the place of the Committee Clerk now appointed to assist the Speaker's Secretary in carrying out the new Regulations for the admission of strangers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, I have to say that I am one of the Commissioners for the regulation of the salaries, emoluments, and retiring allowances of the officers of the House, and that if Mr. Speaker should bring before us any proposal as to the staff of the House it shall have my most careful attention. It is not for me to initiate proposals of this character.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

MR. CAUSTON asked the junior Member for Leeds, now that the Committee on plans for the restoration of Westminster Hall has agreed to its Report, If he will comply with the request recently made to him, that, in order to enable Members to judge of the effect of the West side of Westminster Hall were the works to be carried out there to be limited to restoring the buttresses and flying buttresses, he will, before the House is asked to decide upon the question of restoration, give instructions to have the painted screens in the two central bays removed, and the flying buttress flanking them temporarily finished in similar style to the pinnacles now exposed to view; whether ample time will be given to honourable Members to consider the Evidence and Report of the Committee before the House is called upon to decide the matter; and, whether he will undertake that the discussion in Committee shall come on at a convenient hour and after full notice?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: There will be no objection to leaving one of the canvas pinnacles after removing the painted screens in the central bays, so that hon. Members may see the effect of the proposal of my hon. Friend. It would be useless to make an imitation flying buttress, as the masonry of the original flying buttresses themselves will not be altered. Ample time will be given to hon. Members to consider the evidence after it is published. The discussion will be taken in Committee of Supply on the Vote for the Houses of Parliament, which, being in Class I., will have precedence and will be taken first.

TRAMWAYS AND PUBLIC COMPANIES
(IRELAND) ACT, 1883—THE MIGRA-TION CLAUSE.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government has any information as to the reasons of the failure of the Migration Clause of the Tramways Act; if Government has granted any sums of money, and, if so, how much, and to whom, for the purposes of the Migration Clause; how has this money been employed; and, if the failure is due to defective legislation, whether Government will take any steps to remove this cause of failure?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have no information on this subject. The Act does not place the initiative in the hands of the Government, and, as I said before, we have received no application for grants.

POST OFFICE—FOLKESTONE POST OFFICE.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Postmaster General, Whether the contract for building a new Post Office at Folkestone has been given to a contractor at Bristol; whether he will lay upon the Table the names of the various contractors tendering, with the amounts of their tenders; and, if he will also state whether the contract is for a "lump sum," or may involve "extras?"

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The contractors are Messrs. Howell and Son, of Bristol and London. Tenders were invited in the usual way by advertisement, and 18 were received. Following the usual course, the lowest tender was accepted. The Department does not deem it advisable to lay on the Table the names of the unsuccessful contractors, with the amounts of their tenders; but I shall be glad to give them to the hon. Baronet. The contract is for a lump sum; but it is quite impossible to say whether any extras will arise.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-ISTAN—REPORTED ENGAGEMENT.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the reported engagement between the Russians and Afghans; and, whether the Afghan forces still hold Bala, Murghab, and Khushk?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; we have no information as to the reported engagement. The Afghans still hold Bala, Murghab, and Khushk.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE NEW SOUTH WALES CONTINGENT.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is true that the New South Wales Ministry had no legal authority to send a contingent of armed men to carry on hostile operations in that part of the Ottoman Empire called the Soudan?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No doubt the Act establishing the Colonial Forces in question did not contain any provision for their employment in foreign countries; but the New South Wales Government did not hesitate to take the responsibility involved in promptly despatching the Contingent to the Soudan, and then applied without delay to the Legislature to confirm their action, which it did fully and readily. I should like to quote, as part of my answer, the striking words of Mr. Dalley, the acting Colonial Secretary of New South Wales, who replied as follows to strictures made on the Administration, for their initiatory and independent action:—

“We prefer, thank God, slight constitutional improprieties to the abandonment of duty, the neglect of great opportunities, and we prefer the glory of giving a noble example.”

MR. O'DONNELL: Will the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies inform the House what is the international position of armed men, so raised without Constitutional authority, employed against any foreign Government?

MR. MACFARLANE: Have the Australian Contingent volunteered for service in India if required?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes, Sir; they have.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked whether the despatch of troops from New South Wales was not subjected to adverse criticism in the Assembly; and, how many Members declared by their votes that it was unwise and unjust? [Cries of “Do not answer!”]

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I am unable, without Notice, to answer that Question.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND)—THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he would be disposed to convene a meeting of Scotch Members for the purpose of ascertaining their views as to the question of placing education in Scotland under the charge of a Secretary for Scotland, so that, if opinions appear to be sharply divided, or decidedly adverse to the proposal, the Secretary for Scotland Bill may be liberated to further and more rapid progress through Parliament?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), who replied to the Question, said, they should be glad to learn from the hon. Members from Scotland whether there was any prevalent desire for such a meeting.

POOR LAW—PRESCOT (LANCASHIRE) UNION—MR. DUNN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Has he seen the report that it is proposed by certain guardians in the Prescott (Lancashire) Union to give the appointment of rate collector to Mr. John Kitchen, on condition that he allow Mr. Dunn, who has been recently dismissed for embezzlement, £50 a-year out of his salary; and, whether he approves of such an arrangement; and, if not, whether he will use his influence to discourage that or any similar arrangement?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The only information which at present we have received from the Guardians with regard to the officer referred to is that Mr. Dunn has resigned. We will make inquiry of the Guardians on the subject.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. BRODRICK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention to include, in the financial proposals of the year, any charge for the cost of the Registration of Voters in Ireland, in accordance with the vote given in a Committee of the whole House on Friday last; and, whether such charge will also provide for the cost of the Registration of Voters in Great Britain?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that it would be altogether premature that I should state now what course we propose to take in consequence of the division in the Committee on the Irish Registration Bill. We proceed with the Committee to-morrow.

CORPORATION OF LONDON TOWER BRIDGE BILL.

Mr. BRODRICK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the promoters of the Corporation of London Tower Bridge Bill have yet submitted any, and what, revised plans; and, whether they have yet applied for and obtained sanction for the interference with the precincts of the Tower of London, as shown by the deposited plan and section, to which exception was taken by the War Office?

Mr. BRAND: The Corporation have submitted revised plans, which have so far removed the objection previously taken in the matter of interference with the Tower precincts that the War Office has withdrawn dissent on the understanding that the designs are submitted for its approval and that of the First Commissioner of Works.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT)— DEFECTIVE CARTRIDGES.

Captain AYLMER asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, What was the date of the receipt of Lord Wolseley's report on the Martini-Henry rifle cartridges; and, whether, previous to such report, any unfavourable reports on the Boxer cartridge had been received by the Department from officers commanding troops in the field; and, if so, from whom and when?

Mr. BRAND said, that two communications had been received from Lord Wolseley, one of which was received on the 21st. He had not had time to search the records for such Reports as had been sent in to the War Office since the introduction of the Boxer cartridge; but, in any case, such Reports were confidential.

Lord EUSTACE OECIL inquired whether there was any objection to lay the Reports upon the Table?

Mr. BRAND said, that he was not able to comply with the request.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE BARBAVILLA PRISONERS.

Mr. CALLAN asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, in view of the Notice of Motion standing first on the Notice Paper for Tuesday next, to call attention to the continued unjust incarceration of the prisoners in connection with the Barbavilla, &c. cases in Ireland, he will supply the Crown printed report of the trial of the Barbavilla case in the Library for the convenience of Members?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), who was very inaudible, was understood to state that there was no Crown printed Reports of the trials in the Barbavilla cases. There was a manuscript Report of the first trial; but the evidence at the trial on which the conviction was obtained was not, in many respects, the same.

Mr. CALLAN asked, whether the manuscript would be placed in the Library for the convenience of Members?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): No, Sir; I will not place it there.

CENTRAL ASIA—AFGHANISTAN—EN- GAGEMENTS WITH THE AMEER.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, By what instruments or other records our obligations to the Ameer of Afghanistan are, in the view of Her Majesty's Government, defined; whether these obligations have been modified during the recent conferences at Rawul Pindi; and, whether the Ameer's own wishes would operate as a release from all or any of them?

Mr. GLADSTONE: In answer to an earlier Question, my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State has already read to the House what is in point of fact the principal, I may say the only, documentary evidence in our possession that is producible. It explains sufficiently the basis of the relations between the Ameer of Afghanistan and the British Government. But I think it may be well to add that these relations, although not previously expressed in documentary evidence now at our command, yet are to be inferred, to a certain extent, from the transactions that have taken place. There is a Return before the House, published some considerable time ago, in 1882, which gives an account of the aid supplied to the Ameers of Afghanistan at different periods; there is some to Dost Mahomed in 1856 and 1857; and to Shere Ali in 1868-9 were given various items of arms and ammunition, and 12 lakhs of rupees. In 1870 there was a further provision of arms and ammunition, and a further grant of money. In 1872 a further provision of arms and ammunition was given; and in 1873 both arms and ammunition and money. Of course, my hon. Friend will perceive that these were not isolated and accidental acts, but that they were acts expressive of a certain policy and of certain obligations voluntarily undertaken by the British-Indian Government. With regard to the second part of the Question, no modification whatever has taken place in these obligations. With regard to the third part of the Question, the Ameer is on the footing of an ally, though a protected ally; and naturally my hon. Friend will understand that the Ameer's own wishes would form a very material element in the consideration of any question that might arise.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked, whether there was any truth in the statement in The Indian Statesman to the effect that the Ameer had been compelled to come to the Conference at Rawul Pindi by threats that if he refused to do so Ayoub Khan would be put in his place?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; certainly not. That statement is new to me. It is so entirely at variance with all my knowledge and my firm and unhesitating belief that I cannot for a moment scruple to ask the hon. Gentleman to consider it as a statement made in error.

MR. JOHN MORLEY asked, whether these earlier gifts to the Ameer were not accompanied by an express warning that they involved no obligations on our part with respect to them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I should not like to make a declaration reaching so far back as these transactions; but certainly they were expressive of a policy—a conditional policy, it is true, but a policy which would have a binding effect on a great State.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR inquired whether, in the undertaking, there was not an express reservation with regard to Herat, which the British Government declined to secure or guarantee to the Ameer.

MR. GLADSTONE: That passage, I believe, was read to the House.

CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE)—MR. W. JOHNSTON, INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, if his attention has been called to the public letter written by Mr. Wm. Johnston, Inspector of Fisheries, to the Orange Grand Master, which appeared in The Belfast News Letter—

is he aware that this official admits the authorship of the following letter in The Belfast Evening Telegraph—

"The 12th of July is being prepared for all over Ulster. In view of the approaching General Election it will be of unusual importance. On that occasion I hope to take my place with my Orange brethren. No more loyal addresses will be presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales than the Orange ones, and I hope to be able hereafter to give emphasis to them when I am Member for South Belfast;"

will he explain on what principle the Government consider that such declarations by a Civil Servant of his intention to seek a seat in Parliament do not constitute a breach of the Treasury Rule of November 12th 1884 (since made an Order in Council), which requires that any Civil Servant who, by an election address or "in any other manner, announces himself as a candidate," should resign his position under the Crown; is it the fact that Mr. Johnston, who threatens next 12th July "to take my place with my Orange brethren," is the same official whose repeated political speeches compelled the Irish Executive to exact from him a promise in writing that he would never again interfere in politics while a public servant; and, what course the Government will take under all the circumstances of this case?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I cannot assist the hon. and learned Member very much with regard to this matter. The Question seems to have been put to me under a very natural misapprehension. As the hon. Member is aware, it is the duty of the Treasury departmentally to take cognizance of matters with regard to the Public Service, and to promote proper regulations with respect to it. One of the matters which came under the notice of the Treasury was with reference to the candidature for seats in Parliament of gentlemen in any Public Office. This matter was considered, and an Order in Council was made on the subject which remained binding on the conduct of the different Departments of the State. The Treasury had, however, no right to interfere in a matter of this kind with the discretion of other Departments.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly state to whom the Question should be addressed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must certainly put the responsibility upon my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman).

MR. HEALY: I will then address the Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Question which appears in the name of the hon. and learned Member looks like one which I answered before. The circumstances of the case are engaging the attention of the Irish Government.

MR. HEALY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will answer this passage—[Cries of "Oh!" and "Order!"] I must ask hon. Members to have a little patience. I would ask, is it a fact that Mr. Johnston is the same official whose repeated political speeches compelled the Irish Executive to exact from him a promise in writing that he would never again interfere in politics while a public servant?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Johnston's written undertaking, as well as the whole matter of his alleged candidature, is being examined into and considered by the Irish Government.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— THE DEFENCE OF KHARTOUM— GENERAL GORDON.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the long and heroic defence of Khartoum by its inhabitants under General Gordon, he will lay before Parliament the evidence on which he grounded the statement made by him—

"We have no reason to suppose that any very considerable body ever attached themselves to him, and we have no reason to suppose that the general population of Khartoum—though I have no doubt that some of his immediate adherents may—have suffered in consequence of what has taken place ;"

and, whether he can also give any evidence in disproof of the repeated statements of survivors of the garrison and others, to the effect that thousands of the loyal inhabitants of Khartoum were massacred by the Mahdi's forces, and that the women and children who survived were sold into slavery?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think this Question refers exclusively to a matter which, when I made a speech on the subject, I described as matter of argument and opinion. I have stated my opinion, and the hon. Member can state his; but it appears to me that to enter into the subject in reply to a Question would really be to introduce purely debatable matter into this department of our Business.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that as the right hon. Gentleman, as First Minister of the Crown, had made a statement of this sort considerably derogating from the services of General Gordon, he would ask him whether he would lay on the Table of the House Papers in support of his statement?

MR. GLADSTONE: I entirely differ from the hon. Gentleman as to the preamble of his Question; and as to his request I cannot comply with it.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—SIR PETER LUMSDEN.

MR. O'KELLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in The Indian Statesman of the 7th April 1885, which states—and, whether Her Majesty's Government have asked Sir Peter Lumsden for any explanation of the alleged intrigues of the Mission with the Turkoman tribes, against the Russian Government in Central Asia?

"The prospects of a peaceful settlement with Russia would be hopeful, but for the prostitution of Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission to open intrigue, by lavish bribery with the tribes ;"

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not aware there have been any intrigues of any sort between Sir Peter Lumsden and the Turkomans; and, that being so, the Question has no bearing.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-ISTAN—RUSSIAN ADVANCE—OCCU-PATION OF MARUCHAK.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE inquired, Whether Her Majesty's Government had any further intelligence to communicate to the House with reference to the negotiations with Russia?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is only this declaration which it is my duty to make, that the supposition of an advance of the Russian Forces to Maruchak is erroneous. We have a telegram from Sir Peter Lumsden, dated 27th April, in which he uses these words—"Afghan express just in. Declares report of Russian occupation of Maruchak quite unfounded."

SUPPLY — THE VOTE OF CREDIT—PERSONAL EXPLANATION (MR.
GLADSTONE).

MR. GLADSTONE: With the permission of the House, I wish to make a personal explanation which I hope may not be without convenience to the House. It has reference to words which fell from me on Monday night. It was part of my duty on Monday night, as I believe, and as I think it will be generally felt, in relation to the demands made upon us for information upon the subject under discussion, to refer to precedents afforded by former Votes of Credit. It had been my full intention to refer to these precedents in a manner purely defensive and formal, and raising no subject of contention; but I was led by circumstances, to which I need not refer, to introduce into a portion of my speech some references which were of a highly polemical and controversial character with regard to the proceedings under the Vote of Credit of 1878. What I wish to say in the frankest manner is, first of all, that it was a suggestion to me from the course of the debate, and from circumstances which had happened at the moment—it was no part of my intention with which I had determined upon the statement I was to make to the House. It was what is called an unpremeditated suggestion, upon which I acted on the spur of the moment. I wish further to say that I very much regret it. I look back upon the whole of the circumstances, upon the patriotic and forbearing conduct of all sections of the House upon that occasion, to which I attach the highest value, and I feel that these words of mine might have had a tendency to cause a descent from the higher ground of the matters which we have had under consideration to a lower ground, and might have had a tendency—nay, had a tendency, I will say, to revive a controversy which is bygone, which belongs to the last Parliament, which none of us would desire to revive, and the revival of which in connection with the higher subject is undoubtedly not for the public advantage. I wish to make this statement in the frankest manner, and without waiting for any criticism on that portion of my speech; but I may just add only this one word—that it may be my duty possibly to print in a corrected form that speech, and, if I do so, I shall certainly append to it this expression.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am sure, however irregular it may be for me to say a word after what has fallen from the Prime Minister, the House will pardon me expressing my own great satisfaction and the feeling of others near me at the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken of what occurred the other night. It is obvious that the words which fell from the right hon. Gentleman were unpremeditated to a certain extent, and certainly they were words which were very much to be regretted. I can only say that we should have felt it to be our duty decidedly to challenge the statement of facts and the inferences drawn by the right hon. Gentleman; but with regard to the introduction of such matter into the discussion we did feel that it was painful to us, who were anxious to support the Government in the main, that we should have had matter of that sort introduced, and I am gratified to find that the right hon. Gentleman has of his own accord, spontaneously and without waiting for any challenge from us, expressed his regret for having introduced words not necessary to his argument, and inconsistent with the spirit of his speech.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

In reply to Mr. BROADHURST,

MR. GLADSTONE said: It is not intended to proceed with the Seats Bill on Friday. It has become a matter of urgency to make progress with the Registration Bills, and it is intended to take the Irish Bill to-morrow as the first Order.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked if the Seats Bill would be proceeded with on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: It will depend on the progress made and the degree of urgency as to the Registration Bill whether the Seats Bill will be taken on Monday.

EGYPT—SEIZURE OF THE “BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN.”

MR. O'DONNELL asked the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he could give the details of the settlement with regard to The Bosphore Egyptien incident; and whether it was true that the office of that paper was to be reopened, and that the Egyptian Government had apologized for their proceedings?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have already stated that the incident is practically closed; but the arrangement has not yet assumed the final form which would enable me to make any official statement to the House. But the Papers will be laid on the Table.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS), in rising to move the 1st Resolution, said: Sir Arthur Otway, I will commence by asking the Committee to forgive me if, on this occasion, I do not give them as many figures in comparison of details as it has been generally the custom of my Predecessors to give. I shall have a long Statement to make to the Committee, and I would, therefore, as far as I can, shorten those parts of it which hon. Members will be able to obtain for themselves from the Papers which are now in their hands.

I will first carry back the Committee to the Statement which I made on the 17th

November last, when I asked the House to give us additional Ways and Means in connection with the military operations which had been undertaken in the Soudan. I gave, on that occasion, the result up to that time of the Budget Estimates of Revenue and Expenditure, including certain additional Estimates connected with the Civil Service voted after the Budget, but excluding special War Votes; and I stated that the surplus, so corrected, might be taken at £106,000. But I said that the House had also passed a Vote of Credit for £300,000, and had later voted £1,324,000, in the shape of additional Naval and Military Estimates for the Soudan Expedition, and £725,000 for the Bechuanaland Expedition, so that, altogether, there had been an approved expenditure of £2,349,000 beyond the Budget Estimate. Allowing for some improvement in the Revenue, I calculated the deficit roughly at £2,000,000; which we proposed to meet by an additional Income Tax of 1*d.* in the pound, producing £1,200,000 in the last financial year, and £720,000 in the present financial year.

I was pressed, on that occasion, on two points. I was asked, in the first place, whether £2,349,000 would, in my opinion, probably suffice for the expenditure in connection with the Nile Expedition and Bechuanaland, and I was also asked for further information as to the probable improvement in the Revenue for 1884-5. With reference to the first, I stated that there had been very extravagant rumours in the Press as to the expenditure then going on; but I estimated that the amount named by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) and by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey), and voted by this House, would be sufficient. As to the second question, I stated that I must decline to name any particular figure, but that I thought we might look for a reasonable and a fair improvement.

And now, Sir Arthur Otway, the Committee will be glad to know what is the outcome of the Revenue and the Expenditure for 1884-5. In the first place, the expenditure on the Nile Expedition and in Bechuanaland has not exceeded, but has fallen short of, the Vote taken last year. On the other hand, two circumstances have largely disturbed my anticipations. Three months after I spoke Khartoum was betrayed, and the Expedition to Suakin was in consequence ordered. That was one source of very large expenditure, affecting the Estimate I had made in November; and the other disturbing cause was the great delay in settling Egyptian finance, and in the consequent issue of the loan out of which a large amount of money due to the English Treasury would be paid. This, we had in November no reason to doubt, would come into the Exchequer during the course of the last financial year. The amount so due was, in all, no less than £544,000, and consisted of £340,000 for the Army of Occupation, and £200,000, a-year's interest on the Suez Canal shares. On the other hand, as against these disappointments, the Revenue has come in much better than we could have expected; and this, I may say, is mainly due to the energy and efficiency of the officers of the Inland Revenue Department, but partly to the fact that before the end of the financial year large payments were made at the Custom Houses in anticipation that increased rates of duty would be imposed on certain articles. The actual deficit for the year 1884-5, the detail of which I shall give in a few minutes, was £1,050,000; and if we add to this the amount of the estimated Revenue paid in anticipation of increased duties, say about £300,000, we may take the corrected deficit of last year at £1,350,000. But the sum due from Egypt, the payment of which has been postponed to this year, was £544,000, and the actual expenditure in connection with the Suakin Expedition was £964,000, giving a total of £1,508,000. Therefore, but for the betrayal of Khartoum and the consequent Expedition to Suakin, and for the delay in the payment of the money due from Egypt, my nominal surplus for the year would have been £458,000, and the real surplus, allowing for the £300,000 paid in anticipation of increased duties, would have been £158,000. The Committee will, of course, recognize that I could not possibly, in the month of November, have based any Estimate upon the betrayal of Khartoum, which did not occur until the following January, or upon the postponement of the Egyptian payments, which we then fully expected to receive before the end of March; and that, therefore, it would have been absolutely impossible for me to have asked then, on these accounts, for additional taxation in Committee of Ways and Means. It will be, I repeat, satisfactory to the Committee to see that, but for the unforeseen circumstances to which I have alluded, we should have had in 1884-5 a nominal surplus of £458,000, and a real surplus of £158,000.

From these general considerations I will now pass to the salient features of the Expenditure and the Revenue of 1884-5. In comparing both with those of 1883-4 there is one item which I must carefully eliminate—namely, the Indian Home Charges, which we now, wisely I think, omit from both sides of the account, I will take, first, the permanent charge for the Debt, which was £28,884,000; being somewhat less than that of 1883-4 by £90,000, but the same as my Estimate. The interest on local loans was £465,000; less than that of 1883-4 by £13,000, and less than my Estimate by £60,000. The interest on the Exchequer Bonds connected with the Suez Canal share purchase was £200,000, the same as that of last year and the same as my Estimate; and the other charges on the Consolidated Fund were £1,479,000; less than those of 1883-4 by £111,000, and less than my Estimate by £16,000. On the items which I have named nothing calls for observation except in relation to the Debt charge, as to which I will give the Committee some information further on in my Statement.

The Supply Services give the following results. The Army expenditure, including the Vote of Credit for the relief of General Gordon and all Supplementary charges, amounted to £18,955,000, exceeding the Budget Estimate by £3,024,000 and the expenditure of 1883-4 by £3,045,000. Of the total, £292,500 was voted to make good the Egyptian contribution, so that the net actual excess over the 1883-4 charges was £2,753,000. The Navy cost £11,427,000, being more than the Budget Estimate by £615,000, and more than the expenditure of 1883-4 by £698,000. Of the total, £52,000 was due to the necessary Vote to make good the part of the Egyptian contribution credited to Naval Votes, making the actual Navy charge £646,000 in excess of that in 1883-4. The grant to India for the Afghan War was £250,000.

which was the same as the Budget Estimate, but less than that of the previous year by £750,000. The Civil Service expenditure was £17,562,000; more than the Budget Estimate by £318,000, and more than the expenditure of 1883-4 by £380,000. Of this increase of £318,000 over the Budget Estimate, almost the whole, or £282,000, was due to additional expenditure, under Class IV., for educational purposes. The Customs and Inland Revenue expenditure amounted to £2,745,000, being more than the Budget Estimate by £11,000, and less than the expenditure of 1883-4 by £27,000. The Post Office expenditure was £4,666,000, being more than the actual expenditure of the year before by £159,000. The expenditure on the Telegraph Service was £1,731,000, being more than the expenditure of 1883-4 by £24,000. The expenditure on the Packet Service was £729,000, being more than the actual expenditure of the previous year by £8,000. Thus the total Expenditure for the last year, 1884-5, was £89,093,000, being more than the Budget Estimate, which was £85,292,000, by £3,801,000, and exceeding the Expenditure of the previous year—which was £85,770,000—by £3,323,000.

Now, I pass to the Revenue of last year. The Customs produced £20,321,000; but of this, as I have said before, some £300,000 was due to acceleration of payment in consequence of anticipations of fresh duties being imposed, leaving the real Revenue about £20,021,000. The Excise produced £26,600,000, the two together producing £46,621,000. My Estimate for those two heads of receipt was £46,628,000, the Receipt for the previous year having been £46,653,000, including, however, an additional amount for Railway Duty to the extent of £355,000. As in previous years, I will now give the Receipts of those two Departments, eliminating from each the amount received for spirits, and then the amount of the Spirit Duties under the two Departments taken together. The amount of the Customs' receipts, corrected as to anticipated payments and less the amount of the Spirit Duty, was £15,713,000, my Estimate having been £15,650,000, and the produce of the previous year having been £15,440,000. The Excise also, eliminating Spirits, produced £12,613,000, my Estimate having been £12,478,000, and the produce of the previous year, including the additional Railway Duty of £355,000, having been £12,825,000. Under the head of Spirits, the duties collected during the past year by the two Departments amounted to £18,295,000, the Budget Estimate having been £18,500,000, and the produce of the previous year having been £18,436,000. I may, therefore, fairly sum up the general result of these figures, in connection with the Customs and Excise receipts, as follows. They show a slow and continued falling-off in the duties from spirits, and, I may add, a slight fall in those derived from wine; they show a continued slow rise in the other chief duties; and, as I am bound to state, for the credit of the gentlemen concerned, they show a great accuracy in the forecast of the Revenue Departments. I may add, in passing, that they also show a specially satisfactory progress under two heads, those of tea and tobacco, both of which are, in a large degree, indicative of the progressive well-being of the nation.

I now go from these great branches of Revenue to the Receipt from Stamps. Stamps produced £11,925,000, being more than the Budget Estimate—which was £11,490,000—by £435,000, and more than the amount they produced in 1883-4—which was £11,620,000—by £305,000. This increase is due to the special steps taken last year to bring in outstanding amounts due for Legacy and Succession Duties, a successful effort having been made to reduce these outstanding amounts to the extent of about £400,000. The Land Tax produced £1,065,000, and House Duty £1,885,000, the amount of the latter tax rising very slowly, as it has been doing for some time. The Income Tax at 6*d.* in the pound produced £12,000,000, my Estimate having been £11,250,000, which it exceeded, therefore by £750,000. The amount of the receipt from this tax at 5*d.*, with some remains of the 6½*d.* tax, was in the previous year £10,718,000. The causes of this great increase in the production of this tax are very easy to explain. In the first place, a larger amount than we expected had been left over from the previous year 1883-4, so that the original Estimate formed from previous experience turned out to be too low to the extent of nearly £200,000; and, in the second place, we have got more than we expected out of the additional 1*d.* imposed in the month of November; the Act itself not having passed, in fact, until the month of December. We had at that time to guide us only one precedent of an addition to the Income Tax so late in the year; and that was the additional 1*d.* imposed by the late Mr. Ward Hunt in 1867-8, which produced far less than he expected. Fortunately, however, the Inland Revenue Department were able to overcome the greater part of the difficulties which, having only this one precedent before them, they anticipated. But the principal cause of the great increase over my Estimate was the activity of the Department, not that they got in a larger amount, but that they got it in earlier. I may add to this that a good many collections have lately fallen in. Now, I will ask the House to put together the Receipts from taxation which I have just enumerated. They will find that the total is £73,796,000. My Estimate had been £72,303,000, and the Receipts of the previous year were £71,886,000.

Now, Sir, I pass to the Revenue which is not in the nature of taxation.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: What about the Beer Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): My hon. and gallant Friend will hear more of that before I have done. The Post Office produced £7,905,000. That is £5,000 more than the Estimate, and £175,000 more than the Receipt of the preceding year. The Telegraph Service produced £1,760,000, or £40,000 less than the Estimate, and £15,000 more than it produced last year. The Crown Lands produced £380,000, which was the same as the Estimate, and the same as the Receipt of last year. The Miscellaneous Revenue was £3,175,000, or £5,000 more than the Estimate, and £68,000 below the Receipt of last year. I have corrected, as I said I would, the item of Miscellaneous Revenue by omitting the Receipt for Indian Home Charges. There is one branch of the Non-Tax Revenue on which I wish to make a remark — namely, the interest on advances, which produced £1,027,000, or less than the Estimate by £153,000, and less than the Receipt of the previous year by £169,000. Most of the items making up this total were slightly better, and the decrease was due entirely to one of them — namely, the non-payment by the Egyptian Government of the interest on the Suez Canal Loan, amounting to £199,000. The total Receipts not connected with taxation amounted to £14,247,000, which was somewhat under the Estimate, and very nearly the Receipt of the previous year, £14,294,000. Adding this to the Receipt from Taxes, we have for the year 1884-5 a total Revenue of £88,043,110, and a total Expenditure of £89,092,883, showing a deficit of £1,049,773, or, practically, £1,050,000.

At this point of the Financial Statement it is usual for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give the Committee some information on the subject of the National Debt. In the last two years, there have been two very important operations in connection with the Debt. In 1883-4 we converted a large amount of Funded Debt into Terminable Annuities, and in 1884-5 we converted a large amount of Three per Cent Funded Debt into Two-and-Three-quarters and Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock. The details of these conversions have been already laid upon the Table. On the 31st of March, 1880, the Funded Debt stood at £710,476,000; on the 31st of March, 1884, it stood at £640,631,060; and it has been reduced this year to £640,182,000. The Funded Debt has therefore been reduced since March, 1880, by £70,294,000, and during the last year by £449,000. But the conversion which was made last year into Two-and-a-Half and Two-and-Three-Quarters per Cents nominally increased the capital of the Funded Debt; and the Committee, therefore, may be curious to know what the reduction in the Funded Debt would have been if the Three per Cents were valued at par, the Two-and-Three-Quarters per Cents at two per cent less than par, and the Two-and-a-Half per Cents at 8 per cent less than par. On that basis, the reduction of the Funded Debt since 1880 would be £72,712,244, and last year it would be £2,080,587; and it should be remembered that this calculation includes the conversion some years ago of £7,750,000 Exchequer Bonds into £8,600,000 Consols and Two-and-a-Half per Cent Stock.

But we have not only to do with the Funded Debt. We have to compare the Unfunded Debt and the Terminable Annuities, and also to take into comparison the loans we have made and the state of our balances. During last year the Unfunded Debt was reduced by £77,000. The value of Terminable Annuities, calculated on the principle proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), of taking them in Consols at par, is £5,514,000 less than it was last year. To this must be added the actual reduction in the Funded Debt of £449,000, and a small diminution of other liabilities to the extent of £26,000, making altogether £6,066,000. On the other hand, we must deduct the diminution in the balances, which were less by £639,000, and the diminution in the amount of the loans recoverable, estimated at £480,000, making together £1,119,000. The net diminution of the Debt last year therefore amounted to £4,947,000; or, if it were corrected with respect to Two-and-Three-Quarters and Two-and-a-Half Stock, in the way which I have just described, the diminution of the Debt last year would have been £6,579,000, and the diminution in the five years from March, 1880, to March, 1885, would have been £32,404,000.

Here, perhaps, I may say, in passing, that we have now paid off the whole of the War Charges bequeathed to us by the late Government—namely, £7,850,000, and all but £250,000 of the £5,000,000 which we ourselves recommended should be granted to India on account of the Afghan War; the two sums together amounting to £12,600,000 in the five years, or rather more than £2,500,000 a-year.

And now, Sir, I will pass from the year 1884-5, and the movement of the Debt in that year, to the present year, 1885-6. I will take first the estimated Expenditure, comparing it with the Estimates of last year, and giving the result. The permanent charge of Debt we put down at £28,037,000—less than the Budget Estimate of last year by £847,000. Of that sum £800,000 is due to the falling in of what are called the Russo-Turkish and Afghan War Annuities, constructed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) in 1880, and £47,000 is due to the saving from the conversion into the Two-and-a-Half and Two-and-Three-Quarters per Cents. The interest on local loans we estimate at £552,000, and the interest on the Suez Canal Bonds at £200,000. The other charges on the Consolidated Fund we take at £1,760,000—greater than last year's Estimate by £265,000, and greater than last year's Expenditure by £281,000. This increase is partly due to a charge appearing this year, as in some former years, of £110,000 for the localization of the Military Forces, but mainly to the charge of £150,000 in aid of Indian Non-Effective Charges. I promised the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) that I would, on this occasion, give to the Committee as clear an explanation as I could of the nature of that transaction, the details of which are explained in a Treasury Minute. This £150,000, then, is the first payment of the Annuity which I shall ask to create in order to make good the deficiency on account of the Indian Non-Effective Service. I have laid Papers on the Table which explain the arrangement between the Imperial and Indian Governments for the adjustment of the Indian share of Army pensions paid out of Army Votes. From these Papers it will be seen that, though the Imperial Government did not intend to pay out of British taxes any part of the charge of the Indian Army, yet, in effect, they did so; and that up to 1870 the payments made by India were quite insufficient to meet the charge of Indian Army pensions on Army Votes. In 1870 a juster principle of charge, as between the two Governments, was adopted; but it was, unfortunately, agreed that the Indian share of Army pensions should be capitalized year by year. The arrangements were made, I think, without sufficient actuarial assistance. As the capitalized sums far exceeded the charge in the year of the pensions capitalized, the sums received from India should, of course, have been carried to a fund out of which only so much should have been paid to the Exchequer as represented the charge of Indian pensions paid out of Army Votes. Even had this been done, the Non-Effective Account would not have been solvent, as the rate of interest upon which the calculation rested was too high, and because, from one cause or other, the payments by India were always in arrear. But no fund was created. The sums received from India were paid over to the Exchequer direct, and thus current Budgets profited at the expense of Budgets to come. In 1881 my right hon. Friend, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Frederick Cavendish, then Secretary to the Treasury, put a stop to this unsound system, which had obtained since 1870. The War Office actuaries have investigated the position of the account, and their Reports clear up what has become a very complicated transaction. In effect, they show that to make the account solvent we ought to have had, on the 31st of March, 1884, somewhat more than £4,000,000, which we had not got. After careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that it will be better to put a stop to capitalization altogether, and to ask India only to pay, year by year, her share of Army pensions granted since the 1st of April, 1884. This, however, would create a very heavy charge on the Army Estimates in this and succeeding years, for which neither we nor our Successors are responsible; and I propose, accordingly, to create a fund in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners to transfer to them all capitalization moneys in our hands or receivable from India, and also to pay them yearly a sum of £150,000 from the Consolidated Fund. The National Debt Commissioners would pay each year, out of the funds in aid of Army Estimates, the exact sum which the actuaries report to be the charge on Army Estimates in the year, of Indian pensions granted between the 1st of April, 1870, and the 31st of March, 1884. This arrangement would be renewed from time to time. I propose shortly to bring in a Bill making the necessary arrangements to carry out this operation.

The Consolidated Fund Charges altogether are estimated at £30,549,000, which is less than the Expenditure of last year by £479,000.

I now come to the Estimates for the voted Services. The Estimate for the Army is £17,751,000; which is greater than the original Estimate for last year by £1,820,000, although it is less than final Expenditure, including the Vote of Credit and the Supplementary Estimates, by £1,205,000. In these Estimates is included a special item, not of annual occurrence, of £500,000 for the Bechuanaland Expedition. On the other hand, as I have already explained, last year's Estimates included a payment of £292,500, due to the non-receipt of the Egyptian contribution to the expenses of the Army of Occupation. The Navy Estimates amount to £12,386,000, which sum is greater than last year's original Estimate by £1,575,000, and greater than the actual Expenditure by £959,000. To be quite accurate, there are two small corrections to be allowed for of about £50,000 each; one for Bechuanaland this year, and the other in the Egyptian contribution last year, and the two just balance each other. The Afghan War grant will be this year £250,000, which is the same as last year's Estimate and grant; and I congratulate the Committee upon this being the last instalment we shall have to pay. The Miscellaneous Civil Service Estimates amount to £17,687,000; the Budget Estimate last year having been £17,244,000, and the actual Expenditure £17,562,000. This increase, like that of last year, is due to the Educational Estimates in Class IV., which are more by £391,000 than last year's Budget Estimate, and £109,000 more than the actual Expenditure. The other classes of the Civil Service Estimates pretty fairly balance each other. The Customs and Inland Revenue Services will cost £2,801,000; the Post Office, £4,855,000, or £189,000 more than last year's actual Expenditure, which was £4,666,000; and the Telegraph Service, £1,840,000, or £109,000 more than last year's Expenditure, which was £1,731,000. The Packet Services will cost £754,000, a trifle over the amount last year. Adding together all the voted Services, we get a total of £58,323,000; which, when compared with £54,188,000, the Budget Estimate of last year, shows an increase of £4,135,000; or an increase of £258,000 over the actual Expenditure, £58,065,000. To sum up, the total estimated Expenditure of 1885-6, exclusive of the recent Vote of Credit, is £88,872,000. This is more than the Budget Estimate of last year, £85,292,000, by £3,580,000; and less than the total Expenditure of last year, £89,093,000, by £221,000.

I now pass from the Expenditure to the Revenue; and here I think I ought to explain the basis of my forecast, with special reference to the probable state of trade and agriculture, which we have, of course, to consider, when estimating what the Revenue may be. I said, last year, that I had to deal with very conflicting considerations. Trade, I said, was depressed, the profits on land received by both owners and farmers were low, and Railway Receipts were falling. On the other hand, food was cheap, pauperism was decreasing, and the amount produced by each 1*d.* of the Income Tax was still slowly increasing. This year I do not think it will be possible to give quite so satisfactory an account. It is quite true that the profits from land and from trade are pretty nearly stationary; I do not think they can be said to be worse. [Cries of "Worse!"] I do not think so, judging from the information to which I have access, and which is collected with great care. It is also true that bread is still cheaper than it was last year, and that the produce of a 1*d.* Income Tax is still increasing. But the most remarkable fact in illustration of the prosperity of the country is that the Savings Banks' Deposits are steadily increasing. The Post Office and the other Savings Banks' Balances have increased by more than £3,000,000 during the last 12 months, and that increase is going on down to the present time. The account for the last month, compared with that for the preceding month, shows an increase of £250,000, which is just at the rate of £3,000,000 per annum. This is a most remarkable fact in connection with the progress of the country. On the other hand, pauperism appears to me to be beginning to increase; and there is an increasing desire to emigrate by no means confined to Ireland. I am sorry to say that I do not agree with Prince Bismarck in concluding that this is evidence of the prosperity of the country. Since last year there has been a still more serious fall in Railway Receipts; and these are, to my mind, an unfailing barometer of the condition of the country. Having, then, last year, framed my Estimate on evidence of a not altogether unfavourable state of matters, as affecting both the consumer and the payer of Income Tax, and that Estimate having been entirely justified, this year I shall not take quite so hopeful a view. I shall estimate on the basis of a moderately decreased consumption, a slight fall in the average of wages, and a stationary income for the middle and higher classes. That is the foundation upon which the figures I am about to give to the Committee are based.

I will proceed now, Sir, one by one, to the Estimates of Revenue. In the first place, I divide, as I did last year, and the year before, Customs and Excise under three heads—Customs, exclusive of spirits; Excise, exclusive of spirits; and spirits by themselves. Customs without spirits we take at £15,800,000, as against £16,013,000 last year. This diminution, I ought to say, is occasioned by the Revenue of this year having been, as I have described, largely anticipated by payments in March and February, made in apprehension of increases of duty under the present Budget. Excise, without spirits, we take at £12,450,000, as against £12,613,000 last year. Spirits we take at £18,100,000, as against £18,295,000. Dividing the Customs and Excise Receipts from spirits pro forma, the figures will be, Customs, £20,000,000, as against an actual receipt last year of £20,321,000; Excise, £26,350,000, as against an actual receipt last year of £26,600,000. Stamps we estimate at £11,200,000, as against £11,925,000. I have already explained what it was that swelled the Receipts last year, of which we shall not have the benefit to any great extent this year. There is, besides, a steady falling-off in the Stamp Revenues other than the Death Duties. We take Land Tax at £1,050,000, against £1,065,000; House Tax at £1,880,000, against £1,885,000; and the Income Tax we estimate will produce at 5*d.* £10,000,000, against £12,000,000 at 6*d.* I take the Income Tax at 5*d.*, because since 1880 that has been the uniform rate, except when it has been disturbed for a special purpose, as it was twice for War Credits, and once to enable the Malt Tax to be converted into Beer Duty. We expect the Post Office to yield £8,000,000, against £7,905,000 last year; telegraphs, £1,760,000, against the same sum last year; Crown Lands, £380,000, the same as last year; and the interest on advances, £1,360,000, against £1,027,000. The last increase is due to a corresponding decrease last year, caused by the non-receipt of the Suez Canal interest. Two years' payment will be received this year, the second, under the recent Convention, at 4½, instead of 5 per cent. Miscellaneous Receipts we take at £3,200,000, against £3,175,000. The total Revenue for 1885-6, based on a 5*d.* Income Tax, will be £85,180,000, against £88,043,000 last year, with a 6*d.* Income Tax.

Before comparing this Estimate of Income with the Expenditure, it is important to observe whether there is anything exceptional to note on either side of the account. In the first place, we have to note that we shall have this year, either as interest on Suez Canal shares, or as Army contribution from Egypt, £544,000 belonging to last year; and this double payment will not accrue in future years. We are also the better by £92,000 than we shall be in future as to Debt charges. In these respects, in future years, we shall be worse off by £636,000. On the other hand, this is the last year of the Afghan Grant, amounting to £250,000; and the Army Estimates contain a temporary charge of £500,000 for the Bechuanaland Expedition. These items, two on each side of the account, about balance. But I must also point out to the Committee that in the Army Estimates of this year there is no provision for the defence of our commercial harbours, or for the improvement of the seaward defences of our great military ports. As to these, statements were made in both Houses on the 2nd of December last; by Lord Northbrook in the House of Lords, and by my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty (Sir Thomas Brassey) in this House; and they pledged the Government to full consideration of the Reports on these subjects, and to probable proposals for large expenditure in future years. This must be borne in mind when we consider what the future normal military expenditure, not including War Credits, is likely to be.

There is also one deduction from this year's Revenue to which we are pledged. I have included in the Estimate of Revenue the receipts for telegrams at the present rate. On the 1st of August, 6d. telegrams will come into operation. If the Bill which we have introduced passes in its present form, the loss for the current year will be £40,000. If addresses are to be free the loss will be vastly more. I allow for the loss of £40,000; and, deducting this amount, the Revenue, with a 5d. Income Tax, we estimate for the present year at £85,140,000, and the Expenditure at £88,872,000, showing a deficit of £3,732,000. To this sum we have to add, first, a reasonable allowance for Supplementary Estimates, which I take at £200,000; and, secondly, the Vote of Credit for £11,000,000 adopted by the Committee on Monday last, making a total deficit of £14,932,000.

Before passing to the proposals which we have to make with a view to meeting this deficit, I will refer to one matter which may interest the Committee, I mean the net revenue of the Post Office during the last four years, disturbed as it has necessarily been by the initiation of the Parcel Post, and the preparations for 6d. telegrams. I do not include in the comparison I am about to make the expenditure out of other than regular Post Office Votes; as, for instance, that for buildings and stationery, which, I may say, is about balanced by extra receipts; although I include for 1882 the Inland Revenue expenditure on postal and telegraph stamps, which since then has been defrayed by the Post Office itself. I will now give the Committee the figures. In 1882-3 the aggregate Receipt of the Post Office was £9,010,000; the Expenditure, including that for stamps, was £6,176,000; so that there was a profit to the taxpayer of £2,834,000. In 1883-4 the Receipt was £9,475,000, and the Expenditure, £6,935,000, showing a profit of £2,540,000. In 1884-5 the Receipt was £9,665,000, and the Expenditure £7,126,000, showing a profit of £2,539,000. According to the Estimates which are now before the Committee for 1885-6, the Receipt is put at £9,720,000, and the Expenditure at £7,448,000, or a net profit of £2,272,000, £560,000 less than in 1882-3. Of course, the Committee will be aware that a very large amount of this Expenditure is and was in the nature of capital Expenditure in preparation for the Parcel Post, and still more in preparation for the establishment of 6d. telegrams. [Mr. W. H. SMYTH: Exclusive of works and stationery?] Yes: excluding works and stationery on one side and extra receipts on the other.

I revert from this digression, which I hope the Committee will consider not devoid of interest, to the deficit of £14,932,000. It will be, no doubt, a matter of interest to the Committee to consider how this is to be met. It is, I believe, the largest deficit which has been placed before the House of Commons since the Crimean War; and, whatever we do to meet it, we must make a great demand on the patriotism of the people. Now, there have been two governing considerations present to me when I discussed and decided with my Colleagues how we are to meet the whole or part of this deficit. In the first place, it appeared to me that it would be overstrained adherence to a sound general rule that we should raise, in a year like the present, taxes for the whole of the deficit, and not have recourse to what is popularly called the "Sinking Fund." By the Sinking Fund, I mean the sums set aside annually, in time of peace, for the steady reduction of Debt mainly raised and required for war; and, in my humble judgment, when war or active preparations for war on a large scale come upon us the raison d'être for the normal addition to the Sinking Fund is very much weakened. The second proposition which I maintain, and would submit to the Committee, is that the whole of the additional taxation which we have to raise on such occasions ought not to fall upon property. Among the benefits which were conferred on the community by the teaching of my late lamented Friend, Mr. Fawcett, none, I think, was more valuable than the stress which, in spite of its apparent unpopularity, he laid on this principle. Only a fraction of the present electorate pay, and a much smaller fraction of the future electorate will pay, any tax upon property, in the shape either of Income Tax or of House Tax, which is limited to houses of £20 value, and does not extend to Ireland, or of Land Tax, or of what are known as Death Duties. If, therefore, the whole of the additional Expenditure caused by war, or preparations for war, is met by taxes on property, those who will really control the military policy of the country will bear no charge for military operations. Now, on this subject, my own declarations, as well as the declarations of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, have been unambiguous. On the 21st of November last year, when I proposed to add 1*d.* to the Income Tax for the Expedition to Khartoum, I was challenged as to the unfairness of relying solely on charges upon property for expenditure of that character; and my reply was that, three or four months before the end of the financial year, it was impossible to obtain the Revenue which might be required by putting a temporary tax on articles of consumption; but I said that "it was not right to go to the Income Tax alone, except in such cases of emergency towards the end of the year;" and I quoted the language, much more emphatic than mine, used by my right hon. Friend in former years. But I do not base the proposal I have now to make either on my own arguments, or on those of my right hon. Friend, or on those of the late Mr. Fawcett; but I have carefully analyzed, with great pains, and I think with accuracy, the Revenue raised from articles of consumption and from property respectively during the last quarter of a century, and I will give to the Committee very briefly the result of that inquiry. I shall compare, then, the Revenue from articles of consumption, including tobacco and liquor licences on one hand, with the Income Tax, the Land Tax, the House Tax, the Death Duties, and establishment licences, on the other hand, at four different periods. I take as the first that of 1858-9, after the Crimean War, when our Expenditure was relatively low. I take as the next that of 1868-9, the closing year of Lord Beaconsfield's first Government, when it happened that the Income Tax was just at the same rate as now; and I take as the third the year 1875-6, a year in Lord Beaconsfield's second Government, when wages were high and consumption was high. Then I compare the results of those years with our Revenue from these sources, according to the Estimates for the present year. Now, the comparison, I admit, may not be quite perfect, because I have to omit the rest of the Stamp Revenue, which it is impossible to distribute with anything like accuracy between property and trade; but the figures which I give to the Committee I am able to guarantee. In 1858-9 the Revenue from articles of consumption was £39,800,000, while the taxes on property and establishment licences produced £13,200,000. In 1868-9 articles of consumption paid £41,000,000, while the taxes on property amounted to £16,500,000. In 1875-6 articles of consumption paid £45,400,000; taxes on property produced £13,200,000. The Estimates for 1885-6, as I have stated them, show, without any additional taxes, a Revenue from articles of consumption of £44,300,000, while taxes on property, with the Income Tax at 5*d.*, would produce £20,700,000. From this comparison it will be seen that, while the taxes on articles of consumption produce only 11 per cent more than in 1858-9, 8 per cent more than in 1868-9, and 2½ per cent less than in 1875-6, the taxes on property, taking the Income Tax at 5*d.* only, produce 57 per cent more than in 1858-9, 26 per cent more than in 1868-9, and 57 per cent more than in 1875-6. But I will make a further comparison—I hope the figures will not weary the Committee—I will make a further comparison between the Revenue from articles of consumption as estimated now and as actually received in 1875-6, dividing it between the duties and receipts in connection with fermented and spirituous liquors and the duties on other articles of consumption. Of the £45,400,000 received in 1875-6, £33,500,000 was Revenue from liquor; but of the £44,300,000 estimated now for 1885-6 only £29,800,000 is from liquor, the receipts from other articles having risen from £11,900,000 to £14,500,000. I have drawn from these facts two conclusions, which I will state with all modesty to the Committee. The first is that, during the last 30 years, there has been a gradual and moderate relief of the consumer as compared with the owner of property; that this policy should, in my opinion, be steadily persevered in; but that when a large addition is to be made to taxation, it should not be allowed to fall entirely on property. The second conclusion which I have come to is that, having regard to the change in the incidence of indirect taxation during the last 10 years, liquor, rather than other articles of consumption, should be subjected to a moderate increase of taxation.

Before, then, stating to the Committee the proposals which I intend to make as to the taxation of property and articles of consumption, I will say, in the first instance, what I do now propose to do. I do not propose any, strictly speaking, new tax; and in that respect I am afraid I shall disappoint many thousands of ingenious persons who have written to me on the subject within the last few months. There may or may not be in this country an "ignorant impatience of taxation;" but certainly there exists an amazing fertility of invention in regard to new taxes, especially when those new taxes do not fall on the inventors. I have received hundreds of proposals to tax cats, and soda water, and photographs, and bicycles, and advertisements, and even Christian names. Certainly, these would not have gone far to make good the deficit in the Revenue. But other proposals have been made to me which would, no doubt, give a much larger Revenue. I have been requested to ask Parliament to re-impose the Duty on Sugar; to increase the Tea Duty, which is already 48 per cent on the value of the article; I have also been asked to put a tax on all coal raised, and even to tax gas, and petroleum, and other oils. Well, Sir, I shall propose none of these taxes. I will have nothing to do, except in the last emergencies of war, and, indeed, hardly then, with the imposition of taxes upon raw materials, or on the necessities of life, or on the means of providing warmth and light, or with any duties of a protective character; and, therefore, I am limited to a much smaller number of alternatives, which I will explain later to the Committee.

What I do propose, then, in the first instance, is a tax upon property. I propose to raise the Income Tax, which, according to the Budget of last year, was 5*d.* in the pound, or which, under the Supplementary Budget of November, was 6*d.*, to the amount of 8*d.* in the pound. That is to say, I ask for 3*d.* more Income Tax than under the Budget of last year, and 2*d.* more than the actual payment for that year.

Now, it should be borne in mind that the Income Tax, so increased, will be much less than it was when the military charges, about a quarter of a century ago, were increased to anything like the extent to which it is now proposed to increase them. The Committee will remember what led to the necessity for larger armaments and increased taxation in the year 1859-60. In that year the Army and Navy Estimates were increased by £5,200,000, and the Income Tax was raised to 9*d.*, or 1*d.* more than I propose to raise it now. In the following year, 1860-1, when the Army and Navy Expenditure included £3,000,000 for the China War, the Income Tax was raised to 10*d.* in the pound, and a 9*d.* rate was continued both in 1861-2 and 1862-3. Remembering, therefore, what was deemed necessary at that time, I do not think that the Committee will consider me extravagant if, under the present circumstances, I propose an Income Tax of 8*d.* That rate of Income Tax is estimated to produce, over and above the 5*d.* rate, the sum of £5,400,000.

I may say here, as a matter of some interest, that in connection with this increase of the Income Tax we have made arrangements, with the full consent of the City Commission, which is so well represented by my right hon. Friend opposite the Member for the City (Mr. Hubbard), and by my hon. Friend who sits behind me, the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow), from whom we receive so much assistance, to reduce the poundage paid to assessors and collectors, which would be extravagant at the present scale if the Income Tax is to be raised. This reduction will only affect the larger rate of remuneration. In connection also with the Income Tax, I wish now to fulfil a pledge which I gave last year to the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), and other Members of this House, that I would inquire very carefully into the incidence of Schedule B on the British farmers. I have carefully studied the difference between the charge paid by the farmers in England and that paid by the Scotch and Irish farmers. With an 8*d.* Income Tax, for instance, the English farmers would pay on 4*d.*, and the Scotch and Irish farmers on 3*d.* I am bound to say that this can only be justified as a rough-and-ready arrangement, although one not altogether inequitable. But though this provision cannot be justified on strictly mathematical principles, it is, at the same time, one very difficult to change; and I do not propose in the present year to make any change. But I have a suggestion to throw out to farmers, which I should be very glad if they would consider before the next Budget is prepared, and it is this—that instead of being charged Income Tax on an arbitrary amount having relation to their rent, why should they not pay, like every other business man, upon their net profits? Every other person carrying on a trade pays upon his net profits. Why should not farmers do the same? I know it is said that farmers are so ignorant and unbusiness-like that they do not keep books, and do not know what the net profits of their businesses are. I deny, however, that the farmers, as a class, are either ignorant or unbusinesslike; and as to keeping books, I can only say that, under the new Bankruptcy Act of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, if a farmer gets unfortunately into the Bankruptcy Court, he will get into serious trouble if he pleads that he had not kept accounts. In the present Budget, as I have said, I propose no change in this matter; but I hope that farmers will consider my suggestion, and will not discard it merely because it is a change. I will give one reason which may have weight with them. If a farmer pays under Schedule D, he will be able to appeal, not only as now to the Local Commissioners, where he will probably meet his squire and his banker, but to the Special Commissioners, who go on circuit through the different districts of the country, and who are absolutely unconnected with the locality. That, I believe, would be a great advantage to farmers, besides the obvious benefit of paying, like other people, according to their profits.

I now pass, Sir, from the Income Tax to my next proposal. I propose to put into operation—although it will produce but a small sum this year—the final reform of what are popularly called “the Death Duties.” There are two branches of the proposal which I am about to make, the one assimilating the incidence of the tax on real to that on personal property, and the other imposing an equivalent duty upon corporate property. I will first deal with the proposed changes in the taxation of real and personal property, passing from one person to another in consequence of death. As the Committee is aware, there are now four taxes which are imposed on property devolving by death—namely, (1) Probate Duty, called in Scotland “Inventory Duty;” (2) Account Duty, imposed as a defence to the Probate Duty; (3) Legacy Duty; (4) Succession Duty. Successions to personal property, including leasehold property under will or intestacy, and personal property passing under voluntary deeds, are liable to two of these taxes—Probate or Account Duty, and Legacy or Succession Duty; whereas personal property, passing by marriage settlement and successions to real property, are liable to one only—namely, Succession Duty. The Resolutions I am about to lay before the Committee will, if adopted, remedy this anomalous state of things by imposing an actual Probate or Account Duty, or an equivalent tax on all property passing on death by will or by settlement. An actual Probate or Account Duty will be imposed on all property other than charges by way of annuity on real estate and real estate itself. These two classes of estates will be charged with increased Legacy or Succession Duty, as the case may be. The new tax will not in any way be retrospective, and it will only be imposed on successions by death which may occur after this date. The Resolutions will be three in number. The first will, in the shape of Probate or Account Duty, include—firstly, property locally situate abroad belonging to a person domiciled in the United Kingdom; secondly, all charges on real estate, other than charges by way of annuity; thirdly, real estate directed to be sold, all these being, under the existing law, now exempt from Probate Duty. The 1 per cent Legacy and Succession Duty on properties where this new Probate and Account Duty is paid will be abolished, so as to assimilate the practice with the Act of 1881, which has been most successful in its operation. The 2nd Resolution imposes, in the shape of Succession Duty, as an equivalent of the Probate Duty, a rate of 3 per cent on all properties which are now exempt from Probate or Account Duty, and do not come within the scope of the 3rd Resolution. In this equivalent rate the Succession Duty of 1 per cent is absorbed. Provision is also made that leaseholds under wills or intestacies, which already pay Probate Duty, are not to be charged with the additional tax. Reversionary rights already sold are not to be charged to the new tax. There is a further provision that, in the case of personal property settled on a husband or wife for life, with remainder to children, the duty is to be paid at once and for all. The 3rd and last Resolution imposes, in the shape of Legacy Duty, as an equivalent of Probate Duty, a rate of 3 per cent on all legacies charged by way of annuity on real property. In this equivalent rate the 1 per cent Legacy Duty is also absorbed. The scope of this last Resolution will be very limited, as it only applies to legacies by way of annuity charged on real property. When effect shall have been given to the Resolutions which I have now explained, an equal tax will have been imposed, as far as possible, on all successions to property by death, whether the property be real or personal; but it is impossible that it can be paid in the same manner. Probate and Account Duties are now payable by law within six months from the date of death; but, practically, it is found by experience that Probate Duty is paid much within the time allowed by the law, for it is the interest of the executor or trustee to take out probate as soon as possible, for without it he is not entitled to touch any of the personal property of the deceased. I propose to shorten the period of payment of Account Duty to three months, which will not create any difficulty. Legacy Duty is due when the legacy, or share of residue, is paid to, or retained for, the use of the legatee. This I do not mean to alter, nor the Succession Duty in the case of personal property, which is to be paid exactly in the same way as Legacy Duty. But in the case of real property the tax is now payable by eight half-yearly instalments, the first of which is due 12 months after the successor becomes entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of his succession. For these eight half-yearly instalments I propose to substitute four annual payments. In future, real property to be enjoyed by a person absolutely, or as tenant in tail, will be taxed upon the capital value, and not only on the life interest; but this tax will only have to be paid, as well as the tax on charges on real estate by way of annuity, in four annual instalments. Before passing from this part of the subject, I would again observe that in the matter of Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties there has hitherto been one law for real estate and another for personal estate. Personal estate has been subject to Probate Duty—real estate has been exempt from it. Personal estate has been subject to Legacy and Succession Duties, with reference to its full market value. Real estate has been taxable with reference only to its value for the successor's life, although he may have been in a position to sell it and put in his pocket the full market value of the estate. This inequality will be adjusted, and real estate will no longer bear what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has called

"a very small and disproportionate share of these taxes."

The financial effect of the scheme I have thus briefly laid before the Committee will, it is estimated, be, in the present financial year, a sum not exceeding £200,000; in the second, £400,000; in the third, £550,000; in the fourth, £700,000; and, finally, £850,000. Against that gain I should set off a loss, not very considerable, to arise from the relief from the ad valorem duty of 5s. per cent upon settlements which are dispositions conferring successions. As I have already explained, this additional Revenue will be derived partly from personal estate not now paying Probate Duty, and partly from real estate, also now exempt from Probate Duty; and when it is remembered that Parliament in 1853, in passing the Succession Duty Act, sanctioned the raising of a sum of £2,000,000, whereas no greater sum than £850,000 has ever been realized from that source, I feel confident that the burdens I am now seeking to impose on real property will, at any rate, be considered as reasonable and moderate.

I now pass to the second branch of this subject—namely, the tax which I propose that Corporations should pay as an equivalent for the Death Duties. Having, by the scheme laid before the Committee, succeeded, I hope, in equalizing the burdens arising from successions upon death in real and personal estate, I will allude briefly to a class of property which enjoys the same privileges and the same protection under the law, but is exempted—and, I think, unjustly exempted—from many of the duties arising on death. Corporations are immortal; but this immortality should not relieve them from a tax falling on others who do not enjoy this advantage. The subject is one involving a great principle, rather than one which will bring in much Revenue into the Exchequer, for although I believe it will be the wish of the Committee that property held in mortmain should not altogether escape a tax on succession by death, yet I am sure that it is not my wish, or their wish, indiscriminately to lay a tax on all property vested in Corporations, irrespective of the purposes for which the property, or the income arising from it, may be applied, the time within which the property was acquired, or the nature and character of the Corporation itself. The Resolution which I shall lay upon the Table of the House, therefore, proposes altogether to exempt religious bodies and charities, and is framed with the intention of not taxing societies in respect of incomes derived from the donations and contributions of living persons. Further, it is proposed to exempt property belonging to Corporations for trading purposes, which is represented by shares already liable to Death Duties as the property of individuals, and property which shall be legally applied exclusively for the benefit of the public at large, or belonging to any friendly society, or which has been acquired within the last 30 years. The Resolution lays down that there should be imposed upon the income of the Corporations, as defined in it, a duty of 5 per cent per annum, to be charged and paid upon an account to be rendered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at the close of the first half of each financial year, subject to the exemptions to which I have already alluded, and others set forth in detail in the Resolution, with which I will not now trouble the Committee. It must be remembered that if a Corporation could be supposed to die, the property passing to its successor would pay on a duty of 13 per cent; but it would be unfair to suppose that the higher rate of succession to a stranger would always be incurred, and therefore I only propose to impose an annual tax of 5 per cent, my object being, as I said before, not so much to swell my receipts as to establish a principle at once fair and equitable. I need not say that I have very carefully considered the important Mortmain Return prepared on the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth); but, though it is true that corporate property is in the aggregate large, when you come to proceed upon principle in dealing with exemptions you find that a great proportion of that property must be treated as exempt, and I do not venture to put the estimate of the yield of the tax for the year at a higher amount than £150,000.

The duties which I have described fall under the head of Stamp Revenue; but, before passing from it, I will refer to a slight additional source of Revenue in connection with stamps. Bonds and foreign securities payable to bearer only pay now a Stamp Duty of 2s. 6d. per cent on issue or first negotiation, and are then free from all transfer duty; whereas registered Stocks and Shares pay duty every time they change hands, the latter 10s. per cent. We propose to lessen this difference by imposing the original stamp of 10s. per cent on all the securities I have named, transferable to bearer. This will produce about £100,000 per annum.

I now pass to articles of consumption. The Committee will have gathered, from my earlier remarks, that I propose to deal with fermented and spirituous liquors. As to spirits, we have satisfied ourselves that they may now well bear an increased duty. It is more than 20 years since the present rates were fixed, and experience shows that we need not be deterred from raising them by the fear of smuggling or of illicit distillation. We propose, then, to raise the duty upon home-made spirits from 10s. to 12s., and upon foreign and Colonial spirits from 10s. 4d. to 12s. 4d. a-gallon. This we calculate will produce during the present year, under the head of Customs and Excise, about £900,000. Of course, this is based upon some reduction in consumption. At the present time the consumption is about 36,000,000 gallons, producing above £18,000,000 a-year. If the higher duty produces only £900,000 more, a simple sum in arithmetic will show that the consumption will have fallen below 32,000,000 gallons. It is no business of mine, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to say whether that is to be regretted or not.

I pass to the article of beer. Beer now pays 6s. 3d. per barrel of 36 gallons, or a little over 2d. per gallon. Roughly speaking, that is about 20 per cent on the value of the article free of duty. If the duty on spirits is to be raised—of which, in proportion to the population, there is probably more drunk in Scotland and Ireland than in England—I could not be a party to such a proposal, unless a fair increase were made in the duty upon beer, of which, if I remember aright, fully 11-12ths are drunk in Great Britain as compared with Ireland. Now, Sir, by increasing the duty on beer from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 3d. per barrel of 36 gallons, we hope to get during the year £750,000, or about 9 per cent more than the present Revenue. The additional £900,000 gained upon spirits is only about 5 per cent of the existing receipts; but the increased rate of duty is slightly more in the case of spirits.

I now pass to the Wine Duties. The duty upon wine, which has remained the same, with but slight change, since 1860, was fixed not solely with reference to fiscal considerations. It had been nearly 6s. a-gallon, when it was reduced to 1s., or, on stronger wines, to 2s. 6d. per gallon, in connection with the Commercial Treaty with France. Since then the Wine Duties have been more than once used as weapons to obtain Commercial Treaties with wine-growing countries. But, irrespectively of this consideration, the Committee should observe, as to the relative incidence of duty upon beer and wine, that wine pays somewhat a larger percentage on its value than even beer. The Wine Duties are, on the average, about 25 per cent on the value of that article; the Beer Duty is barely 20 per cent. We do not propose to alter the Wine Duties generally; but I have an important proposal to bring before the Committee with regard to the Wine Duties, to give effect to the Declaration with Spain of the 21st of December last, which has been laid before Parliament in the Paper "Commercial, No. 2," of the present Session, as to which several questions have been asked from various parts of the House. The Committee is aware that, in 1877, the Spanish Government withheld from British trade the benefit of certain reductions then made in the Spanish Customs Tariff, on the ground that the Wine Duties in the United Kingdom were really differential against Spain. This action of the Spanish Government led to a long correspondence, and also to the appointment of a Committee of this House, in 1879, to report on the Wine Duties. They recommended "a duty of 1s., with a limit of strength to be determined by the Executive," and that the alcoholic test should be maintained; and they pronounced an opinion that an ad valorem scale of duties would be impracticable. No useful purpose would be served by entering upon the long controversies which ensued; but, in offering Great Britain most-favoured-nation treatment in 1883, the Spanish Government went beyond the offer made in previous years, and Her Majesty's Government felt themselves fully justified fied in agreeing to raise the limit of the 1s. duty from 26 to 30 degrees. It is of importance to trade that the arrangement between the two Governments shall take effect as soon as possible. The Spanish Government will be informed, as soon as the necessary measure authorizing this change has been passed by this House; and a date, of which public announcement will be made, will be fixed for the simultaneous application of the terms of the Declaration of the 21st of December, 1884. Our thanks are due to the several Spanish Ministers who have taken part in these prolonged negotiations, in which success has ultimately attended the labours of Sir Robert Morier, who has shown great ability and energy in overcoming serious difficulties. I must no less acknowledge the loyalty of the present Spanish Ministers in taking over in their substance the engagements entered into by their Predecessors, and the friendly and straightforward manner in which they have defended the Declaration before the Cortes. I may say that negotiations for a complete Commercial Treaty with Spain will commence in the autumn, in order that engagements which may require legislative sanction may be submitted to the Cortes and to Parliament in the ensuing Session. I may say that we do not anticipate any diminution in the Revenue from wine, for whatever loss may be expected on wines between 26 degrees and 30 degrees of strength will be made good by the increased consumption due to the higher Spirit Duty and the diminished use of spirits.

I may here mention two small changes which we propose in connection with indirect taxation. We were pressed last year by hon. Gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House to allow private brewers' licences to be taken out for a half-year only. I think that a concession in this respect may be properly made, and I propose to allow a private brewer's licence to be taken out for a half-year for 4s., where the charge for the whole year is 6s., and for 6s., where the charge for the whole year is 9s. The half-years will end in March and September respectively. I do not believe that there will be any loss of Revenue from the change.

The other change relates to Patent Medicines. The Committee are aware that a Bill has been introduced by the Lord President into the House of Lords which will meet some of the complaints in connection with the sale of patent medicines. We also propose that foreign medicines be treated, in respect of the Patent Medicine Tax, precisely as British medicines—that is to say, they will only be regarded as dutiable if they are held out as Proprietary or as specifics. Further, the stamp will be altered, so as to show clearly and make it plain that there is no Government guarantee of the medicine. The Revenue will not be materially affected by these alterations.

The additional taxes which I have enumerated account for £7,500,000 out of a deficit of £14,932,000, leaving a sum of £7,432,000 to be provided for. The Committee, I think, will have conjectured, from what I said in the early part of my Statement, how I propose to meet this remaining deficit—that is to say, out of the sum annually applied to the reduction of Debt. Popularly, as I have already said, that sum is called the "Sinking Fund;" but this is not a strictly accurate description, and I will state the exact facts to the Committee. The sums devoted by law to the reduction of Debt are so applied under several old Acts, as well as under the Act of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), passed in 1876, and under the Act which I asked Parliament to pass in 1883. They consist of virtually four classes. The first is so much of outstanding Terminable Annuities of all kinds as represents capital, and this amounted last year to about £5,600,000. The second is the difference between the sum of £28,000,000, as settled by the Act of 1876, and the charges on it, which are mainly for interest on Funded and Unfunded Debts and Terminable Annuities. That is called the "New Sinking Fund," and it amounted last year to above £500,000. The third class consists of the amount of Stock cancelled on grants of Life Annuities, compositions of Land Tax, and small transactions of that kind, and that amounted last year to nearly £1,500,000. The fourth sum applicable to the reduction of Debt is the surplus of the Income of each year over the Expenditure, which is called the Old Sinking Fund. Altogether, then, in 1885-6 the sums applied to the reduction of Funded and Unfunded Debt will amount to something under £7,600,000. But of these four sources, the only payments we propose to intercept are those under what I call No. 1—namely, that part of the outstanding Terminable Annuities which represents capital. Of course, the Old Sinking Fund, No. 4, has disappeared this year, as there will be no balance of Income over Expenditure, and it would be impracticable to interfere with the reduction of Debt in connection with Life Annuities and similar operations. Nor do we propose to touch the New Sinking Fund. All, then, that we propose now is, to intercept this year the principal of the Terminable Annuities created in 1883, extending for a year the operation of the Act; and the difference between this sum of something over £4,600,000 and the £7,412,000 will be borrowed temporarily, so far as may be necessary, in Unfunded Debt. This addition to the Unfunded Debt will not, as I have explained, exceed the diminution in the Funded; but we propose in 1886-7 to pay it off out of the capital of the Terminable Annuities, in the same way as we propose to apply for the same purpose £4,600,000 this year. We also propose to take power to meet the deficit of last year by borrowing in Unfunded Debt, if it should be found necessary. I am aware that this part of my Statement is highly technical, and almost impossible fully to elucidate at the end of a long speech; but I propose to lay on the Table a Treasury Minute which will explain the operations more fully.

I will now recapitulate the figures which I have laid before the Committee. The net deficit for the year, calculating the Income Tax at 5*d.* in the pound, is £14,932,000. We propose to intercept the action of the Sinking Fund during this year, so as to produce something over £4,600,000. By raising the Income Tax to 8*d.* we get £5,400,000. The Death Duties will produce £200,000. We calculate that the duties to be imposed on Corporate Property will yield £150,000; the increase in the Spirit Duties £900,000, and the increase in the Beer Duty £750,000. The minor charges will produce £100,000, making a total of £12,100,000, and leaving a deficit of about £2,800,000 to be met by a similar Sinking Fund operation during the coming year.

I am very much obliged to the Committee for having listened with so much attention to the long Statement which it has been my duty to address to them, and I hope I have made myself perfectly clear. I have now to ask the House to pass the necessary Resolutions, so that the increases of duty may take place to-morrow morning, although, as the Committee is well aware, such increases are always subject to repayment should the proposals of the Government not be adopted. As regards the altered Death Duties, the tax on corporate property, and the additional stamp on securities to bearer, those, of course, will not be put in operation until after the Act is passed; but with regard to the Resolutions relating to the Customs, Excise, and Income Tax, it is necessary that they should take effect at once. In conclusion, I may say that, if it will suit the convenience of the House, I do not propose to take the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill until this day fortnight, so that there may be ample opportunity for considering the proposals of the Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Eight Pence;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Houses chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Four Pence;
In Scotland and Ireland respectively,
the Duty of Three Pence;

Subject to the provisions contained in sections one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and in section eight of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sec.
I only rise at this moment in order to express the thanks of the Committee to the right hon. Gentleman for the clearness of his Statement, and to assure him that we have listened to it with interest—I may say to parts of it with painful interest—but with a full sense of the difficulty of his task and the manner in which he has dealt with it. I quite agree with him that in regard to the somewhat complicated arrangements with respect to the payment of Debt, it would be better for us to wait until we have the Paper before us relating to the scheme which he has put forward. With regard to the other matters, I do not think it necessary or desirable that the Committee should at this moment enter into any discussion on their merits. The course which is proposed with respect to the Customs and Excise Duties is, I think, the usual course, and the one which I think to be quite right. I would wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman—no doubt it was included in his Statement, although I cannot call it to mind—what will be the duty on foreign beer? I suppose the addition to the duty on imported beer would be the same as upon beer brewed in this country. I think, under the circumstances, we shall do well to put off to a later day the discussion of the Budget as a whole, because there are several points in it which will require time for our careful consideration.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he rose to call the attention of the Committee to the great injustice done by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Scotland and Ireland by the proposed imposition of an additional tax upon spirits. He would point out that at the present time whisky paid a duty of 10s. a gallon of proof spirit, whilst the alcohol which was drunk in the form of beer only paid one-sixth part of that sum. When they considered that spirits were necessary as the national drink of Scotland and Ireland, and that they had to pay six times the duty paid on beer, which was the national drink of England, he thought the Committee would see that the vast injustice already existing would be greatly aggravated by the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. For his own part, he was surprised that any Chancellor of the Exchequer should venture to increase that injustice. Again, when they considered that wine was to remain at the present rate of duty, which was not above one-half, in respect of the alcohol it contained, of the duty on spirits, it would be seen that that was really a tax upon the poor man operating for the benefit of the rich. French wine paid on the average, according to its alcoholic strength, only 4s. a gallon of proof spirit, and Spanish wine paid only 6s.; and with regard to those there was to be no increased duty at all. But in the case of the national drink of Scotland and Ireland there was to be an increase of 20 per cent, although, at the present moment, it had to pay six times as much as beer. He must protest against that injustice on behalf of the people of Scotland and Ireland, and he held that it was the duty of every Scotch and Irish Member to resist the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, who, he said, should get his increased Revenue by doubling the tax upon beer; and then, under that arrangement, it would only pay one-third of what was paid on whisky in Scotland and Ireland.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that when he heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that he would not be a party to increasing the duty upon spirits unless there were also an increase of duty on beer, he was in hope that the right hon. Gentleman was about to do complete justice in the matter of the taxation of alcohol. He regretted very much that the right hon. Gentleman had not taken that opportunity of affixing his name to a change that would be at once philosophical and just. Alcohol was undoubtedly a very proper subject on which to raise Revenue; but assuredly the only just and rational mode of dealing with it for that purpose was to tax it wherever it was to be found. There could be no reason whatever why those who in one part of the country found it convenient, principally in consequence of large breweries being established in their neighbourhood, to take their alcohol in the form of beer, should be taxed at a lower rate than those who, not having the same convenience, were obliged to content themselves with taking their alcohol in the shape of spirits. He could not imagine why that subject had always been shirked by Chancellors of the Exchequer. His right hon. Friend had certainly proposed to increase the alcoholic duty on beer; but he had also increased the alcoholic duty on spirits to an extent which would produce to the Revenue something like £900,000, whereas the increased duty on beer was reckoned only to produce £700,000. That was not redressing the injustice which existed; on the contrary, he said it was rather an aggravation of it. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, could not expect that those proposals would be satisfactory. There was another point on which he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in connection with this subject—he appealed to him as to whether, in the spirit of justice, he did not think that the articles of luxury paid for by the rich should be taxed at a higher rate than the articles of necessity paid for by the poor? He believed that there was a great deal of nonsense in all that was said about the Wine Duties. Wine was really an article of consumption amongst the higher classes; they were drunk by the higher classes from the smallest claret to the most expensive champagne; they did not form part of the diet of the lower class, although they were supposed to do so. Therefore, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not make a distinction in the Wine Duties, and impose a higher rate of duty upon bottled wine? Wines which came into this country in casks were wines of a lower order; they contained less alcohol, and were cheap, and they might possibly be consumed by the lower class, by which he meant those who had small incomes, and were obliged to economize. But, in the name of justice, he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, like other Members of the House, dined well—when they were not occupied at the House—why he could not place a higher duty on claret and champagne? That wine, and the higher class of clarets, were all imported in bottles; the duty upon them could be easily raised; it would be a just duty, and he was certain it would be a popular one throughout the country, because it would show that the right hon. Gentleman had regard to the circumstances of those who could not pay for the wines in question. With regard to the duty on Spanish wines and their alcoholic strength, he did not believe that there were any wines which contained 30 per cent of alcohol. The plea put forward by the Spaniards for the introduction of their wines into this country was that they had a higher percentage of alcohol, and that they were now unfairly weighted as compared with French wines. He had no doubt that the Chancellor of the Exchequer believed that he would let in the natural wines of Spain, as had been the case with the French wines; but he would point out that they were strengthened wines, and there was no reason why they should be introduced on the ground that they were the natural productions of Spain, and that they were not fairly treated unless the alcoholic scale of duty was raised. He rejoiced very much that the right hon. Gentleman had recognized the principle which some Members of that House had tried to induce him to see before. It seemed to him an extraordinary proposal that large masses of Debt should be paid off with money borrowed at 2½ and 3 per cent, which possibly had to be provided at a cost of 5 or 10 per cent. The money raised last year had undoubtedly pressed very hardly upon those who raised it. It had pressed on the agricultural party, especially the poorer classes in Ireland and Scotland, who were very badly off in these times of slack trade and wretched harvests. He ventured to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the great skill with which he had jumped over that formidable obstacle; and he had only to express the hope that he would go a step further and introduce a philosophical method of taxing alcoholic drinks that would do justice to all parties concerned.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he felt that it was undesirable on those occasions to go at length into the various points of the Budget. He should not be satisfied, however, if he were not to rise and express the satisfaction with which he had listened to the eloquent Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had called it an eloquent Statement; but he used the term in the sense that it was both clear and convincing. He was gratified to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that in an emergency such as that which now pressed upon the country they ought to divide the burden of the extraordinary expenditure between the present generation and those who were to come afterwards. They ought not to save the present generation entirely by placing the whole of the burden on posterity; and, therefore, he regarded the allocation of the deficit of £15,000,000, between Debt and Taxation, as a wise and moderate proposal on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. Although he did not bind himself to the exact details of the new system, as set forth by the right hon. Gentleman, he thought that, for the most part, they were likely to be beneficial. His right hon. Friend no doubt felt, when he was proposing the addition of 3*d.* in the pound to the Income Tax, that it must be a severe blow to him (Mr. Hubbard), who believed that the Income Tax, as it was now administered, was a wicked tax, and that it was within the power of the Government to make it a righteous tax whenever they chose to do so. Schedule B was nothing in the world but another form of Schedule D. Farming was as much a trade as any other, although it was specially dealt with on the assumption that farmers did not keep books; that it was impossible for them to make a Return of their incomes; and that, therefore, they must be charged in a certain ratio to the rent they paid for their land. He was quite willing that that mode of assessment also should be retained; but he was satisfied that there were ways in which Schedule D might be modified, and an alleviation extended to farmers. With regard to the Death Taxes, he had been very much struck with the way in which his right hon. Friend proposed to deal with Corporation funds. He thought he was quite right in laying upon them a charge by way of a substitute for Legacy Duty, which, as Corporations never died, they had never paid. The Income Tax, properly understood, was the tax of the country; it reached all classes of the people, and he was happy to find that gradually everything was working round to the adjustment he had advocated for many years. The rates to be levied as a substitute for the Succession Duties would, no doubt, be properly adjusted by the Government. He did not rise to make a long speech, but chiefly to express his satisfaction at the general tenour of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, there was one point with regard to the increase of the Income Tax on which he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say a few words to the Committee.

The Committee were aware that there were several Stocks on which the dividends were payable to-morrow morning; and the dividends would, in the ordinary course, be paid with a reduction of 6*d.* only. The bankers had received a Circular from the Inland Revenue Office requesting them to make certain arrangements to insure the payment of the increased amount. He presumed there was no question as to the legality of the proceeding; but still it would be satisfactory to everyone if his right hon. Friend would say something to the Committee upon the matter. He need hardly say that the bankers had every wish to facilitate the collection of Revenue, and that he had no doubt they would be justified in acting on the request of the Inland Revenue Board. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman proposed a tax on corporate property equivalent, or partly so, to the Income Tax. The right hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, find a good deal of opposition to the proposal; but, nevertheless, it was one founded on justice. He (Sir John Lubbock) also desired to make a few observations with respect to the Post Office. He understood there was a net Revenue from the Post Office of £2,273,000. Now, there were items connected with the Post Office which went into Class I. of the Estimates, and he was not quite clear whether they were included in the sum he had mentioned. It was very desirable they should know what was received from the Post Office, because he was afraid some people went away with a very exaggerated idea of the profits derived from that Institution. He was afraid it was not possible for Her Majesty's Government to raise the whole amount of the necessary Expenditure of the year without infringing upon the Sinking Fund; at the same time, he must express great regret that now, possibly at the very beginning of a struggle, they would not only have to do away, practically, with the whole of the Sinking Fund, but have to borrow about £2,800,000 in addition. It might be necessary, under the circumstances, to do that; but he had heard that part of the Statement of his right hon. Friend with great regret.

MR. O'SULLIVAN regretted to say that after carefully weighing all the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Budget proposals appeared to him to be somewhat unfair. He quite agreed with the propriety of increasing the Income Tax from 6*d.* to 8*d.* in order to meet the present deficit. There was no fairer tax imposed by the House, if properly adjusted, and there was no tax that he paid more cheerfully than he did the Income Tax. The reason of that was, that no man was called upon to pay the tax who had not got an income. But of indirect taxation the poor man was required, as a rule, to pay more than his fair share. According to the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, about three-fourths of the Revenue of the whole country was derived from the taxation on consumable articles, and only one-fourth was raised by taxation on property. Surely the right hon. Gentleman would not say that that was a fair state of things. Notwithstanding the fact that three-fourths of the Revenue was produced by the taxation on consumable articles, the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to add considerably to the duties paid on those articles. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) believed he was right in saying that 19-20ths of the indirect taxation of the country was contributed by the working classes, or, in other words, that a man with £10,000 a-year did not pay in taxes more than 5 per cent upon his income; while the working man with £50 a-year, especially if he drank or smoked even moderately, paid about 10 per cent of his income in taxation. Was it fair, under such circumstances, that the right hon. Gentleman should increase the charge upon the working people of the three countries? The right hon. Gentleman proposed to put an increased duty of 2*s.* a-gallon upon spirits. Why should he put 2*s.* a-gallon on the drink which formed the almost universal beverage of the Scotch and Irish people, and only 1*s.* on 36 gallons of beer, which was the drink of Englishmen? If they examined the alcoholic strength of the different beverages, what was the result? It was well known by those who had studied the question that a barrel of good beer—a barrel of 36 gallons—contained about five gallons of alcohol. The duty, therefore, upon the five gallons of alcohol was 1*s.*, or a fraction less than 2½*d.* per gallon. He appealed to any impartial person if it was fair that beer should be taxed so lightly and spirits so heavily? Again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had estimated that the new tax upon spirits would yield about £900,000, and that the tax upon beer would bring in about £750,000. Had it occurred to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman that the £750,000 would be paid by 20,000,000 of the population, while the payment of the £900,000 would be confined to about 1,000,000 people? ["Why?"] For the simple reason that beer was drunk by a very much larger population. Of course, Revenue must be raised in some way or other; but he thought it was the duty of the Government to put taxation on the people who could bear it best. In his opinion, there were several things which ought to be taxed before either beer or spirits. Why, for instance, should not ground rents be taxed? As he pointed out last year, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in his Budget, ground rents were altogether exempt from taxation. He maintained that ground rents were amongst the first things that should be taxed, and for the very reason that they were earned without any outlay or effort on the part of the proprietors, and in very many instances they amounted to as much as 20 times their value, owing to the buildings erected by the industrial classes upon the land. It had been roughly calculated that the ground rents of the Kingdom produced £30,000,000 annually. It would not be unfair or unjust to put a tax of, at least, 10 per cent upon those rents. If that were done, £3,000,000 would be gained by the Exchequer; and that, with the £5,500,000 produced by the extra Income Tax, would be actually more than the Government required. He maintained, also, that clubs should be taxed. Clubs, as a rule, were luxuries, though in many places they were merely drinking saloons and betting houses. It was a monstrous state of things that clubs were allowed to go untaxed. £500,000 might very easily be raised annually by such means. The next suggestion he had to make was one which, no doubt, would excite some laughter, for it was that a tax should be imposed upon every unmarried man over 30 years of age. Surely bachelors were very well able to bear taxation. He put it to the sense of justice in the House if a man with £500 a-year and a wife and children and servants to support was as well able to pay 6*d.* in the pound Income Tax as a bachelor, who had no one but himself to support? A tax upon bachelors would be as fair, as just, and as honest a tax as could be imposed by the House. Of course, he could not make any accurate calculation as to what the tax would yield; but he took it that the taxpaying bachelors formed, at least, one-fourth of the whole taxpayers of the country, and, therefore, 1*d.* in the pound ought to produce £500,000. Furthermore, he thought that the wine drinkers should pay more taxation than they were now required to do. Was it not a monstrous thing that in a time of emergency like the present, in a time when money was greatly required, the Chancellor of the Exchequer refrained from raising the duty upon such luxuries as champagne, old clarets, crusted ports, and the best sherries? He put it to the right hon. Gentleman if it was just to the working men? Working men, as a rule, drank nothing but beer and spirits; but the wealthier classes indulged in champagne, ports, sherries, and Madeira, and in a time like this not an extra 1*d.* was put upon the latter wines. Such an increased duty ought to be put on high-class wines and on cigars, which would bring in, at least, £500,000. There was another matter to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might very well turn his attention with a view to the saving of Expenditure, and that was the amalgamation of the Inland Revenue and Customs Offices. He did not know what saving there would be if such an amalgamation were effected; but it was a monstrous state of things that there were two sets of Commissioners, two sets of Chairmen, two sets of solicitors, two sets of officials in every big town of the three countries, for the purpose of carrying on pretty much the same business. Now, perhaps the Committee would permit him to make a few comparisons of the duties which were paid on articles consumed by the poor, and the duties on articles consumed by the wealthy classes. In the first instance, let him take the case of gin, which was about the lowest class of spirits. What were the facts? On that article, which was largely consumed by the poorer classes, and the value of which was about 20*s.* to 24*s.* per dozen, a duty of 15*s.* per dozen was charged; while upon champagnes and old clarets, which were worth from £3 to £5 per dozen, and which were drunk by the upper classes, a duty of only 2*s.* per dozen was charged. Was that a state of things which ought to exist for another day? The people who drank claret were well able to pay 15*s.* a-dozen. Then he found that whisky, the value of which was about 30*s.* a-dozen, paid an average duty of about 18*s.* per dozen, or three-fifths of its value. Madeira and old ports and sherries were worth from £3 to £4 per dozen; but they were only required to pay a duty of 5*s.* per dozen. Upon common tobacco the duty amounted to from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* 10*d.* per lb., while upon the very finest cigars imported, which were worth more than 10 times the value of the tobacco of the poorer classes, the charge was only from 5*s.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* a-box. He appealed to the Committee—was that not one-sided legislation? What would be said outside when it was found that the wealthy classes who made the laws taxed the poor in that way? It was impossible to expect the working people to be content when increased duties were put upon the articles which they chiefly consumed, and no extra charge was made upon the articles of luxuries which only came within the reach of the rich. There was no actual reduction of the duty upon the drink of the rich; but he understood that it was proposed to raise the limit of the 1*s.* duty on alcohol in wines from 26 to 30 degrees. The result would be that a gallon of alcohol in first-class wines would pay less than 4*s.*, while spirits would pay 12*s.* a-gallon. He might make other comparisons to show the injustice and unfairness of the decision arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he had no desire to weary the Committee. He trusted, however, that Scotch and Irish Members of the House would, when the proper time came, vote against the proposal to increase the duty on spirits by 2*s.* a-gallon, as a protest against the disproportionate duties levied upon the beverage of the Scotch and Irish peoples and the beverage of the English people.

MR. DODDS said, there was only one portion of the important and satisfactory Statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon which he desired to offer a few words to the Committee, and it was that portion in which the right hon. Gentleman dealt with the Death Duties. It would be in the recollection of many hon. Members of the Committee that the subject was one upon which he (Mr. Dodds) had ventured to address the House on many occasions, and that the result of the discussion which took place in 1879, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of the subsequent discussions, was that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1881 took up the subject, and dealt with it to a very important extent. The right hon. Gentleman then said that he (Mr. Dodds) had only dealt with the fringe of the subject; but, at all events, the changes introduced in 1881 had been found of great value to the Revenue, and of the greatest convenience to the public at large. It was, therefore, with the greatest satisfaction that, after waiting some years in the hope that further steps would be taken, he heard the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer say he was about to initiate a final reform of the Death Duties. No more important question could occupy the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he (Mr. Dodds) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would find that that was an opportune moment for levying certain Death Duties not levied before. As far as he could follow the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his very clear Statement, he thought he would be able to agree with the right hon. Gentleman in almost every proposition he made with regard to the Death Duties. It would be wasting the time of the Committee were he to go into the matter in detail at the present time; when they had the Resolutions in their hands they would be able to deal with the matter more fully and more effectively. If there appeared to be any necessity for it, he would have, on a subsequent occasion, to trouble the Committee with such observations as long professional experience enabled him to make on the subject. His chief object in rising now was to express his satisfaction at the Budget Statement generally, and to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the Committee a little more information, when he rose to reply, with regard to the important subject of the taxation of corporate property. It was with great pleasure he heard the right hon. Gentleman say he proposed to deal with corporate property, and he found that his pleasure at the statement was shared by hon. Members generally. The point on which he desired more information was as to the extent of the proposed exemption of what he termed religious houses. His own county was very largely concerned in the matter—indeed, every county in the Kingdom was interested more or less in it. In the county of Durham there were from 50,000 to 100,000 acres of land, including a very large extent of coal and other minerals, held by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The income derived from this was enormous, and it would, indeed, be a great disappointment to everyone in the county if that property were to be exempted from taxation; it would be felt to be a great hardship if owners of land were called upon to pay the proposed new tax, whilst the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were exempted from it. That was the point on which he desired additional information.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY complimented the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the generally clear way in which he had introduced his Budget, and upon the cordial reception which most of his proposals had received. There was only one point on which he (Sir Gabriel Goldney) was not quite clear, and that was as to the duties which the right hon. Gentleman proposed upon real property, as compared with personalty. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, in his reply, would show what effect his proposals would have upon landed property.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that, in the first place, he begged to thank most heartily the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the very clear and lucid manner in which he had placed this matter before the Committee. They knew that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had a great opportunity. The opportunities of Chancellors of the Exchequer only occurred in connection with a large surplus or a great deficit. It was only on those two occasions that Chancellors of the Exchequer were enabled to make great changes in taxation.

When expenditure and income were nearly balanced, those right hon. Gentlemen did not like to make any changes in taxation. The opportunity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer this year had been a great deficiency. With regard to the Death Duties, as they were called—namely, the duties on the transfer of property by death—the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), who had taken some interest in this matter, had alluded to his having brought it before the House some years ago. Before that time he (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) himself had had an opportunity of bringing it before the House; and the point to which he had especially directed the attention of Chancellors of the Exchequer had been the injustice and inequality which existed between the treatment of real property and that of personal property. He had drawn attention to the fact that while leasehold property paid Probate Duty and Succession Duty, real property only paid Succession Duty; so that in the case of a man who had two houses, one freehold and the other leasehold, dying, and leaving a house to each of his two sons, the son inheriting the freehold house would only have to pay Succession Duty on his life interest, whilst the other son, for a house which might be in the same street, of equal value to the first, would have to pay Probate Duty on the full amount of the value, irrespective of what age he might be when he came into possession of the property, and also to pay Succession Duty on his life interest. That injustice had lasted for a very long time. They knew how urgently the matter had been referred to by the Prime Minister in his speeches in Mid Lothian—how warmly he had spoken of the injustice of those Legacy Duties and the Probate Duties under the last Administration, and of no remedy having been attempted. He (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) had attempted to bring the subject forward; but pressure of Business had prevented a full discussion being taken on the question. He was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had risen to the occasion, and had declared that in future there should be no difference made between real property and personal property, and that both should contribute their fair share to the taxation of the country. The right hon.

Gentleman had stated the manner in which this was to be done; and he (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) was inclined to think that the mode he suggested would be a great improvement upon the existing law. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to deal with it as he had already done with respect to the 1 per cent duty on real property. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for having brought the matter before the Committee, and must say that he thought it would be received with approbation by the country as remedying a great injustice. He also agreed with the right hon. Gentleman as to the taxation he proposed to impose upon corporate property. It was a great mistake to suppose that Corporations themselves were not perfectly ready to pay the tax. What were the facts revealed in the Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Livery Companies of the City of London? One charge brought against the Livery Companies was that they paid no Succession Duty. But that was not the fault of the Companies. The Companies were never asked to pay it; and, of course, they could not be expected to come forward voluntarily and offer to do so. Many of the Companies, however, according to that Report of the Commissioners, had stated that it would only be fair and just for them to pay that duty. But how had that statement of the Companies been treated by the Commissioners in their Report? It was not every Company that had expressed that opinion; but then it was not every Company that had property on which to pay Succession Duty. The Commissioners said that some Companies had appeared willing to pay, and they went on to state that though the Companies had notified their readiness to pay, they—the Commissioners—did not think that it came within their functions to recognize it in their Report. Now those Companies would be called on to pay the duty which had been spoken of in lieu of Succession Duty. He was not prepared to say that the amount to be paid in lieu of Succession Duty—that the amount mentioned was a fair amount; but that point would come up for consideration at some future time. It was impossible at present to say whether it was fair and just. As to exemptions, that was a great question, and it would be a very important matter to consider in the taxation of Corporations. He (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) anticipated that in future there would be grave discussion as to what Corporations should be exempted. There would be questions asked, no doubt, on that point, when the Budget Bill was brought before them. He must say that there was one thing that struck him in regard to a Resolution proposed in reference to the Spirit and Beer Duties. He was glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not put an extra duty upon tea, coffee, sugar, soda water, apollinaris, or any of the teetotal drinks; but at the same time he was sure that the mass of the people of this country would feel that if alcoholic drinks were to be taxed higher than they were at present the whole of them should be affected by the change. There was no reason, if they were to raise the duty on spirits and beer—and he would not go into the question of the national drinks of England, Ireland, and Scotland—but his point was that if they were going to charge an extra tax on their national beverages they ought not to refrain from putting a tax upon wine, which was the beverage of the rich. He thought that omission to put an equal tax upon wine was the weak point of the Budget. He had no doubt that complaints would come from all quarters of the country as to that omission, and assuredly the Government would have to remedy it. It would never do to leave the upper classes of the community unaffected by that increased taxation, whilst the consumers of beer in England and of spirits in Ireland and Scotland were burdened by it. Unless some change were made, he felt convinced that a furor of feeling through the country such as the Government little expected would be created. The poor man, every time he drank a pot of beer, would know that he was paying something more for it than he had done hitherto, and he would know perfectly well that the rich man who drank his glass of wine was paying exactly the same for it as he had done in the past. The poor man would consequently feel aggrieved, whatever the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might say to explain away the apparent injustice. The present condition of the working classes should be taken into account by the right hon. Gentleman.

He should bear in mind that while he was proposing to put this additional taxation upon the labouring man who took his glass of beer, that that man's wages were not rising, and that his work was not sure. He (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) admitted that the incomes of the poor were not taxed, and that it was necessary that every class of the community should bear its share of the burden of Imperial taxation. He was not going into the question as to the relative amount of taxation upon the poor and upon the rich, and he would not commit himself with regard to the desirability of imposing a tax upon beer or spirits; but he was of opinion that an increase put upon spirits would lead to a great deal of illicit distillation, particularly in Ireland. Nothing would disabuse the minds of the wage-earning classes in England, who very seldom got anything better to drink than beer, of the idea that they were suffering under an injustice in having the tax upon their beverage increased; and it must be borne in mind that beer to the working classes was a necessity, and not so much a luxury. The hard-working man, who perhaps got very little during the day but his beer and bread and cheese, might possibly be taxed fairly enough; but it would be with considerable bitterness of feeling that he would reflect upon the fact that the tax upon the wine of the squire, and of the landlord and of his employer, was not raised, but, as a matter of fact, was lowered; because in the future that class of people would be able to obtain wine at a higher alcoholic strength than they did now for the same price. That subject was much more serious than the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think; and he (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) was sure that it would be brought home to him and to the Government in a way they had not the slightest suspicion of. He was afraid that the Budget would be one which would create a large amount of dissatisfaction amongst the masses. He would not go into the questions which arose upon the Budget beyond those affected by that night's Resolution. He would repeat—because he did not think it could be too much impressed upon the right hon. Gentleman—that the working classes ought not to be treated in this exceptional manner; because it would be treating them exceptionally to tax their beer and spirits, whilst the wine of the rich man was left alone.

MR. CLARE READ said, that he did not doubt that the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) was a great authority on whisky; but he (Mr. Read) did not think that the hon. Member was an equal authority on the question of beer. The hon. Gentleman had told them that a barrel of beer contained five gallons of proof spirit. He (Mr. Read) did not think the hon. Member could ever have drunk much beer, or he would not say that. But hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that the people of England did not drink spirits. Well, he only wished they drank more beer and less spirits, because if they did that he believed they would be a healthier people. But the hon. Member seemed to think that the Spirit Duties would fall upon 1,000,000 people, while the Beer Duties would fall upon some 15,000,000 or 16,000,000—he seemed to think, in fact, that the people of England did not drink spirits. That was perfectly absurd. It seemed to him (Mr. Read) that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated both countries very much alike—both the country that produced beer and the country that produced spirits; for it must be in the recollection of the Committee that this question of the Malt Tax had often been considered in that House, sometimes with an idea of its entire repeal, but that, instead of that, they had constantly seen additions made to it. In 1840 the duty on malt was 20*s.* 8*d.* Then there was £5 per cent put upon it in that year, which raised it to 21*s.* 8*d.* In 1862 there was a further tax on brewers' licences, when the Hop Duty was repealed, and the tax was brought up to 22*s.* 8*d.* Then in 1880, when the present Prime Minister was going to confer such a great advantage upon the agricultural interest by transferring the tax from malt to beer—which he (Mr. Read) considered was a good thing in itself; but, at the same time, the right hon. Gentleman took care to recoup the Revenue for any possible loss by raising the tax on beer, so that a quarter of malt paid something like 24*s.* Now, by the present addition with which they were threatened by the right hon. Gentleman, the tax on malt would be raised to 26*s.* or 27*s.*, which was almost 100 per cent on the present price of barley.

Then they came to the question of private brewers; and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the small concession he had made. He believed that a 4*s.* licence for six months would be appreciated by the agricultural labourers in the Eastern Counties, who brewed beer only in the hot months, for haysel and for harvest. All private brewers had been treated very badly by recent legislation. They had certain advantages before the transfer of the tax from malt to beer. They did not pay any licence. They could use what they liked for brewing, and did not require to give notice to the Excise. Now, however, they received visits from the Excise, and had to give notice whenever they brewed. Hitherto the licences had been charged upon them to the extent of some 10 or 12 per cent more than it was when they had to pay the old Malt Duty; but by the present increase the charges would be something like 15 per cent. He concurred in a great deal that had been said by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Alderman Lawrence), and he thought that it was quite unfair upon producers in this country and upon the consumers of beer that they should have their beverages taxed higher than ever, and that there should be no extra tax imposed upon wine, which was the produce of other countries; and he did not doubt that when the poor man quaffed his pot of beer, he would not only think of the lenient manner in which the rich, who were generally supposed to indulge in champagne, were treated, but he would also think of the Aldermen and other gentlemen in a similar station of life, who, perhaps, drank a little more. He (Mr. Read) was sorry that, whatever agricultural question was mooted in that House, some hon. Members always endeavoured to raise some feeling of antagonism between England and Ireland. He was sorry there was any dispute between the countries. It must be remembered that nine-tenths of the beer was brewed from barley grown in the United Kingdom, whilst the higher luxury of wine was produced entirely abroad. Those who happened to grow barley made no complaint that there was no tax on cider; but there was a great deal of what were called non-intoxicating beverages which contained a considerable amount of alcohol, and he did object to those beverages being excluded from taxation. Those things ought to contribute something to the Exchequer. But with regard to private brewers' licences, he must say that it was a lamentable fact that private brewing seemed to be dying out in the country. He regretted it, because he did believe that nothing conduced so much to the temperance of the agricultural labourers as the home-brewed beer which they could make in their own cottages. He saw that in 1882 there were 32,000 of those brewers. In 1883 they were reduced to 29,000; and in 1884, notwithstanding the increase of the limit to 9s., there were only 27,000 who took out licences. Therefore, it appeared to him that private brewing was doomed to be extinguished in this country. The proposed imposition would assuredly affect it. He could not say that he ought to thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the result of his long and arduous study of Schedule B of the Income Tax. The right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to say that he would undertake to investigate the whole subject, and he told them that his desire was that farmers should pay the tax as all other traders did. But farmers were not traders; they were more than that—they were manufacturers; they were more than manufacturers—they were producers. Therefore, it could not be expected of them that they could keep anything like accurate accounts on their farms in the same way that accurate accounts could be kept in a shop. That difficulty of keeping accounts in connection with a farm was pooh-poohed in many quarters, and it was said that farmers might keep accounts as correctly as traders. To hon. Gentlemen who said that he would simply reply—"Try to do it yourselves." The hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. D. Davies) amused the House last year upon this very point by telling them that he at one time had interested himself in farming, and had endeavoured to keep accounts. He had told them that, in spite of the greatest care and attention which he had devoted to the matter, he had been obliged to give up all hope of being able to keep accurate accounts in the end. A farmer's account depended not upon the amount of money he had in his pocket or at his bankers, but on the amount of stock he had on his farm; and he could not by any possibility arrive at the profits his farm had made unless he had a thorough, complete, and accurate valuation of everything upon his farm. Not only that, but it was necessary to have an accurate knowledge of the state of the farm, because it was necessary to put a great deal more into it in one year than in another; and the fluctuation in the price of stock was so great that, though one year, when he might possibly have a balance at his banker's, he might stand at a loss, in the succeeding year, when he had a very small or possibly no balance at all at his bankers, the increase in value of his stock and of his corn might give him a profit. Therefore, it was not an easy thing, even for gentlemen who had plenty of leisure and ability, and who knew how to keep accurate accounts—it was not such an easy thing for them to furnish those accounts in connection with farming. A Norfolk gentleman, whose brother generally sat opposite to him in that House, farmed his own estate admirably. That gentleman had been good enough to show him his accounts the other day. He had employed a well-known valuer to make a valuation of his stock and crops. He had found out that the way that profit was made was this—that there was an annual increase in the value and amount of stock, and therefore he showed a very fair balance indeed; but he (Mr. Read) would like to know, when there had been a decrease of something like 20 or 25 per cent in the value of stock during the last 18 months, how would that gentleman's account appear, and who was to say whether he had made a loss or whether he had made a gain? He could assure hon. Gentlemen that, however willing the farmers might be to keep accounts, they would not be able to do so. They did not keep accounts, and even if they did, when their figures came before the Income Tax Commissioners they would be most unreliable. What he (Mr. Read) had said last year had not been touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with regard to the reason why farmers had been asked to pay under Schedule B on tithes as well as on their rent. That they should do so was never contemplated by the Act of 1842. In 1842 not half the tithes were commuted. What did he find in the Instructions in the Act that were given as to assessing Schedule B? Why, in No. 10 of those Instructions it said that when any landlord should be subject to any covenant or agreement to pay any parochial rate or any composition on tithes, then the annual value should be estimated exclusive of such rates and of such composition on tithes—showing most distinctly that tithes and rates were to be considered to be outgoings, and that a tenant should only be expected to pay on the rent that he paid to the landlord. It was not until some years after that Act that, in consequence of a Circular from the Inland Revenue, tithes and rent were put together, and the farmer was made to pay under Schedule B on half the amount of those two imposts. He should be very glad indeed if the original intention had been resorted to, for then the farmers would have nothing to complain of. He contended that in the original Act the proposition was fair and just—he would almost say generous; but in the altered circumstances of agriculture and the reduced profits which farmers made, the Income Tax, especially when they were made to pay it on the tithes, had been a far greater burden of late, and was one which he was sure could not be mitigated, however they might desire it, by paying on their supposed profits. He believed that if the arable farms of England were to produce accurate and complete accounts for the last seven or eight years, it would be found that, instead of having to pay the amount of Income Tax that they had been called upon to pay, they would not have been charged 1*d.* He had not exactly understood the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the proposed imposition on the Scotch and Irish farmers. He had said that in England they should pay on the half, which would be 4*d.*, and that Ireland and Scotland should pay on one-third, which would be 3*d.* He was not aware that 3*d.* was—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I did not say that.

MR. CLARE READ said, that he knew the right hon. Gentleman's explanation, and if he were an Irish or a Scotch farmer he should object to it. However, he would leave the Irish and Scotch farmers to fight the matter out for themselves. Then they came to the other question of the imposition of full Legacy Duty on real property. As he was not the owner of much land, it did not affect him; but he did hold it to be a monstrous injustice that, if they were going to put an increased burden on the land, they did not at the same time revise the system which imposed almost the whole of the local burdens in the country upon the owners of land and houses. They should bring in the general wealth of the country in order to relieve that local taxation, if they were going to impose that additional weight and burden upon the land of England.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had listened with great attention to the able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there was no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman had dealt with the fact that there was a deficit of £15,000,000 as pleasantly as possible. On the other hand, as had been said by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. O'Sullivan), taxation pressed unduly on the poorer classes; and he was bound to say that he thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown a great want of courage in dealing with the duties on alcoholic liquors. One would have thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in dealing with them, would have done something to diminish the inequalities which existed in respect of the duties charged; but, instead of that, he had done what would have the effect of increasing them. The impression he had formed whilst the right hon. Gentleman was delivering his speech was that he was going to put the increase of duty upon beer, and not upon spirits. It might be a question whether they should have an additional tax placed upon them, whereas the case with regard to beer was quite different. Beer was notoriously the national drink in England, and the inequality with regard to it was so monstrous that it had seemed to him impossible that the right hon. Gentleman should not have done something to remedy it, and that he would have raised a great part of the money required by placing additional taxation upon that article of consumption. It might be questioned whether, as the hon. Member for Limerick had said, there were five gallons of spirit in a barrel of beer; but whether it contained five or six gallons of spirit, it was clear that infinitely less taxation was paid on the alcohol contained in beer as compared with the alcohol contained in spirits. Therefore he had been astonished when he heard the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer state to the Committee that he was about to place 20 per cent additional duty on spirits, and only 15 or 16 per cent upon beer. That appeared to him to be so gross and monstrous a wrong that he could not but express his surprise at the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. It might be that spirits would bear an additional duty if it could be collected without the increase of smuggling, and he, for one, would not object to that; but he did say that they, as Scotchmen and Irishmen, and all who, like the worthy Alderman (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) who had spoken that evening, wished to see fair play, should insist that there should be something approaching to equality—not an exaggeration of the inequality which now existed. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not find that the worthy Alderman, although he took up another point, was the only one who thought that the right hon. Gentleman would not get through his Budget arrangements without immense dissatisfaction being shown towards his proposals by people of every class, especially in Scotland and Ireland, for the reason he had already stated—namely, that not only had he done nothing to diminish the existing disproportion, but that he had exaggerated the difference of duty between spirits and beer, and also as between spirits and beer together and wine. Thanks to the beneficent finance of the right hon. Gentleman who was now Prime Minister, those who liked claret and similar foreign wines had the privilege of drinking them at a small cost. He drank claret himself; but what did the Chancellor of the Exchequer now propose? He proposed to admit port and sherry at the same duty of 1s. He (Sir George Campbell) believed that, under the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman, whisky would be exported, used in the manufacture of port and sherry, and then brought back again into this country. That, he thought, constituted a grievous inequality; and the worthy Alderman

had, in his opinion, done good service in drawing to it the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. With regard to the Income Tax, he would not go at length into the question of that tax, but would say that as it was now becoming a permanent and increasing impost on the country, he agreed with a much higher authority on the subject than himself—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard)—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must redress its inequalities, and make a distinction between property and income in the application of the tax. He denied that that was now a tax upon property, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who might be said to have made the subject his study for a long time past, would keep up his opposition until there was a distinction made between the income derived from property and the income derived from labour. With regard to the matters dealt with subsequently in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he confessed that, having regard to the very great events before them, it might not be possible to do that which all but Chancellors of the Exchequer were bound to do—namely, honestly to pay their way. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to give the Committee figures to show that the National Debt was only to be reduced by £6,000,000 per annum—he understood that he proposed to raise £7,500,000 by stopping the action of the Sinking Fund. [Dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman had certainly proposed to raise one-half of the deficit of £15,000,000 by taxation, and the remainder by other means. He wished to point out that, in his opinion, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was not so liberal as it appeared to be, because he (Sir George Campbell) held strongly that the cost of a war such as the Soudan War, which Her Majesty's Government had maintained, and which they now admitted to be a disastrous war, which would not advantage posterity, but would be the source of difficulties to future generations, should be paid for by this generation. If the right hon. Gentleman would take the advice he would venture to offer, and put 2s. or 3s. additional taxation upon beer, he might get all the money he wanted by a mode of taxation which the country was well able to bear. He agreed that there was too much taxation placed upon the poor and too little on the rich, and that their policy should be greatly to reduce the burdens on the poor and greatly to increase the burdens on the rich—seeing that, in his opinion, justice was not done in that respect, he contended that the Government were bound to put something more upon the rich and something less upon the poor. Still he thought that they ought to make the poor feel the burden of war; that the labouring classes ought not to get off scot free, and that they should learn the lesson that when the country plunged into war they would have to bear their share of the cost. For those reasons he looked on the tax upon beer as a politic tax, and as one of the best means by which the poorer classes might be made to feel the evils of war.

MR. SALT said, the Budget put before the Committee might be regarded either in reference to its details or in reference to its general features. It was a Budget of great interest and importance; and although he did not intend to trouble the Committee with many observations upon it, or to put the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the trouble of answering at that time any questions he might raise, he wished to point out to him that his statement presented many points of detail which at the proper time would require ample scrutiny and consideration. The right hon. Gentleman had proposed an alteration in the Death Duties. That was a very difficult question, and such as would require time for consideration, and when the time arrived it would be necessary to discuss it with reference to a considerable number of details. When they spoke of making duties on personal property and real property alike, it might be a good thing to do so; but it should be borne in mind that there was a great difference between the character of personal property and the character of real property. The two classes of property had each their special and distinct qualities, and these they should bear in mind when they proposed taxes which would bear heavily upon them. Then with regard to the taxation of corporate property, all he would say was that it did not seem to him to be a very easy thing to carry out, when, as the right hon. Gentleman himself had acknowledged, it must be accompanied by a vast number of exemptions; and he was not sure whether, for the sake of the small sum which the right hon. Gentleman expected to gain by it, it was worth his while to make such a proposal. There was nothing so difficult with regard to taxation as exemption; if they exempted one man some other person would expect exemption too, and it was very difficult indeed to draw a line. He thought it would be found especially difficult to draw a line with regard to corporate property, and to say where exemption was to cease and taxation to begin. Then with regard to the Sinking Fund; when the proposals with regard to the Sinking Fund came before the House, they would be in a better position to understand clearly what the right hon. Gentleman proposed than they were now. Therefore, he would not say more at that moment except that it was a most remarkable thing that a little more than 12 months after the Government had established a system of Terminable Annuities, which the House was told to regard as a matter for congratulation as a means of paying off the National Debt—a little more than 12 months after that place had echoed with sounds of congratulation, they were told that the whole thing was to be suspended for one or two years, and, perhaps, if circumstances turned out badly, for an indefinite period. There were two other points raised by his right hon. Friend as addenda to the other subjects dealt with in the Budget Speech. His right hon. Friend spoke about the settlement of Indian Charges. That, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, was an intricate matter of finance; and he would observe that when the time came to discuss it on the Bill which it was proposed to introduce, something, at any rate, should be said with regard to the Treasury Minute relating to the appropriation of a considerable amount of money which he believed had arisen from outstanding balances. He did not wish to trouble the Committee by going into the question then; but he thought it looked as if further explanation were needed, because a balance appeared to have been appropriated for certain purposes which had neither been contemplated nor sanctioned by Parliament. Then with regard to the farmers' Income Tax, whether they could ascertain what was the real income of farmers throughout the country was not an easy question. He was himself frequently in the habit of talking with farmers of every class—from the men who farmed five, six, 10, or 30 acres to those who farmed 200, 300, or 1,000 acres. Of course, the smaller farmers were much more numerous than the large farmers, and he believed that it was extremely rare for those of the former class to keep an accurate account of their business. He would go further and say—and he believed his hon. Friend (Mr. Clare Read) would bear him out—that if a man entered on a farm in a certain condition it would be impossible to ascertain what the profits were before a period of four or five years had elapsed; in that respect the business of a farmer was not like some businesses in which the books could be made up and the profits ascertained at the end of the year; it was almost impossible for a farmer to make out the actual sum spent and the actual amount of profit. And with regard to asking them to pay Income Tax on the actual profits, all he would say was that the result would probably be not very satisfactory—namely, that no Income Tax could be claimed from them at all. So much with regard to this view of the Income Tax. He did not wish to trouble the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with any questions on the subject of the Income Tax that day. He regretted that so much detail had been introduced into the Budget Statement of the right hon. Gentleman. They were in the presence of a deficit of £15,000,000, and possibly in presence of an enormous expenditure of scores and hundreds of millions; and what Gentlemen on those Benches wished to know was how the financial difficulty of the position was to be met. To go into the small details was, perhaps, of little importance on that occasion. As had been said, they must regard the Budget on broad and general principles. He must say that a Budget of this character, coming after five years of finance carried on by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, was most disappointing and most distressing. In 1880, if anyone, however much opposed to Her Majesty's Government, had told them that a Budget like that could by any possibility be produced in that House, the person who made the statement would have been regarded as a wild dreamer. He would speak for himself alone; he felt bound not to add, by a single word or expression, to the cares and anxieties which pressed so heavily on the right hon. Gentleman. It was possible that foreign affairs might turn in such a direction that a great financial strain might be put upon the country, and therefore he repeated that he would be the last to add to the difficulties with which the right hon. Gentleman had to deal; but it was upon that consideration, and upon that only, that he abstained from treating the Budget of this year as he believed it really deserved to be treated. So long as the interests of the country required it, he, for his own part, should put those interests far beyond any Party feeling or considerations, and give to the right hon. Gentleman, so far as the interests of the country might need it, his loyal support.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, he should wish to say a few words on one point connected with the Budget which, in his opinion, was deserving of consideration. He was one of those who thought it most desirable that all classes of alcoholic drinks should be taxed as far as it was possible to tax them without running the risk of promoting smuggling. But he hoped that in carrying out that policy they would act fairly towards all those concerned in the matter. Although he was not present in the House when the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) spoke on this question, he understood that the hon. Gentleman had stated that he did not believe that any wine contained a stronger percentage of alcohol than 30 degrees, if so much. Now, their Colonies had been for many years past labouring under a serious disadvantage in respect to the question of Wine Duties which they felt very acutely. He was not aware whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had directed his attention to the question; but he might mention that in the time of the late Government he had had the honour of being a member of one or two deputations which waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day (Sir Stafford Northcote), who stated that in consequence of the position of affairs, and especially with regard to Spain, he could not see his way to make any alteration in the duty upon Colonial wine. He (Mr. M'Arthur) was glad to see from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening that the standard for Spanish wines had been raised to 30 degrees. But he understood that some of the Australian wines had a standard of 32, and if the standard for Spanish wines, as had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman, had been fixed at 30 degrees, it would be brought very nearly up to the Australian standard. He thought, especially at the present time when their Australian Colonies had manifested so much sympathy and had shown their desire to assist this country in every way, that it would be very unfortunate if, as he had just said, they were to bring up the standard for Spanish wines very nearly to the Australian standard, and leave their Australian Colonies as it were out in the cold. Therefore, he drew the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to that point, and in doing so he ventured to express a hope that he would consider it with the object of making it possible for the Australian Colonies to introduce their wines on the same terms as other countries. The Australian Colonists were very large wine producers, and it would certainly be a great injustice if they were to exclude or handicap their wines; it would be injurious to them, and undoubtedly produce on their minds a bad impression. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take that matter into consideration, and so reduce the standard for Australian wines as to allow them to come into this country on as favourable terms as the wines of other countries.

MR. CROPPER said, there were two points he desired to refer to in connection with the Budget Statement of the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, he had been disappointed on listening to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find that the rule which related to the farmers' Income Tax was not to be altered. He could not see any reason for a distinction being made with regard to the Income Tax as between English and Scotch farmers. In other times, when the Irish farmers and the Scotch farmers had less chance than they had now, there might have been some reason for a distinction being made; but at the present time he could see no reason for it. It might be, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought, that the English farmers kept accounts; but, for his part, he had a very great doubt on the subject, except with regard to those who farmed on a large scale. As one of the Income Tax Commissioners, he was inclined to think that farmers were of that class which kept no accounts. When they knew that, at the present time, there was great distress and depression in the agricultural interest, it appeared very hard to the English farmers that their competitors should be placed in a position in which they were more lightly taxed than themselves. He hoped that before the debates on the Budget were over, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would deal with that question in a more fair and equitable manner than that in which it had been dealt with hitherto. Further, he wished to say that he, in common with many persons in the country, desired to see some alteration in the Wine Duties. He did not think that, whereas the tax on spirits and beer was to be increased, the duty on wine should practically remain the same. He thoroughly appreciated the excellent remarks which had been made by the hon. Member who preceded him, and he strongly desired that the Australian Colonies should be placed on the best footing possible in respect of the importation of their wines into this country. When they considered that a bottle of champagne, which cost 6s. or 7s., only paid 6d. duty, it appeared strange that those who could afford to pay for that luxury were not to pay increased taxation, while the man who drank beer had to pay an increased duty to the Government. He trusted that in the debate which would follow means would be pointed out of adopting his suggestion. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to adopt it, he would add greatly to the popularity of his Budget and draw to his side all classes of the people.

MR. BIDDELL said, there were one or two points on which he wished to offer a few observations. He thought that the proposals with regard to the Income Tax would meet with general approval, because the payers of that impost had really expected a much larger increase than was suggested. Much had been said as to the taxation of real property, and he regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not met one hardship which was felt by the owners of such property. Under the present arrangements no deductions were allowed for repairs. On the generality of farms the cost of repairs amounted to 10 or 15 per cent of the rent, and it was felt by real property owners to be very hard that they were not allowed, when making their returns, to deduct the sum expended upon repairs. He regretted also that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not dealt with the inequality in the assessment of Scotch and English farms, for the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted that the English farmer was taxed to the extent of 25 per cent more than the Scotch farmer. The agricultural interest had taken great pains to call attention to that inequality; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had always declined to deal with the subject on the ground that it was one of considerable difficulty. He (Mr. Biddell) failed to see the difficulty. With regard to farmers being rated on their absolute profits, he thought there was much more difficulty than the Chancellor of the Exchequer imagined. He (Mr. Biddell) was convinced that no farmer could make a correct balance sheet without engaging a professional man to value everything on the farm. That would lead to great expense, and would in reality be perfectly impracticable. As to the relative taxation upon beer and spirits, he well remembered the great authority on finance, the Prime Minister, saying that it had always been the object of the Government in taxing spirits heavily to check the consumption and at the same time reap as much Revenue from that source as was possible. He (Mr. Biddell) was convinced that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) over-estimated the alcoholic strength of beer. If the hon. Gentleman would come to Suffolk, he would soon be convinced that there was not a vast amount of alcohol in the beer consumed there. The calculation of the Government was that a bushel of malt made 18 gallons of beer. If that was so, the beer could not be very alcoholic. The Prime Minister had at various times increased the Malt or Beer Duties.

Mr. Biddell

The Malt Duty used to be 20s. a-quarter; under this Budget, the duty was equivalent to 29s. a-quarter. At the same time there had practically been a reduction in the Wine Duties, for better wines would in future come in under a lower duty. He approved of the taxation of cider, for he did not see the equity of the taxing the drink of the Eastern Counties while that of the Western Counties went untaxed. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had increased by 1½d. or 2d. the Tea Duties, the Chinaman only would have suffered from the diminished consumption, whereas the increase on spirits and beer would injuriously affect the farmers of the country in the diminished demand for barley. The right hon. Gentleman also said he would not tax any raw materials. In that he was pretty right; but he (Mr. Biddell) would like to see Customs duty put upon manufactured materials coming into this country. If a 10 per cent duty, for instance, were to be imposed upon such goods, trade would be stimulated and much of this increased taxation would be avoided. He was glad of the change in private brewers' licences, but he thought the licence paid by cottagers might well have been reduced to 2s. yearly. It would have made very little difference in the Budget, but it would have done much to promote private brewing. He agreed with the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Carr Read) that where they found private brewing they found temperance and less temptation to frequent the public-house. It was most gratifying to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the deposits in the Savings Banks were increasing. He (Mr. Biddell) attributed the fact to the greater prudence and foresight of the working classes rather than to their general prosperity. He quite approved of the increase of the Property Tax, and of the staying of the reduction of the National Debt; but he thought that the minor parts of the Budget might be considerably improved.

Mr. FIRTH said, there were one or two points in the Budget to which he wished to direct the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As to one of them—namely, the proposed charge upon corporate property—he would make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. Two or three years ago, he obtained a Return, to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded that night, of all land in mortmain. That was a Return of the utmost value, but in its present form it was perfectly valueless. Its size was so great that the cost of printing it was considerable—too great for the Treasury to undertake. At all events, that was the opinion of that economist the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), when he occupied the position of Secretary to the Treasury; but those days of economy, in more respects than one, were gone. He (Mr. Firth) should suggest that the printing of that Return was a matter of the truest economy, especially now that the Government had recognized the great principle that property of the kind dealt with by the Return ought to be taxed. Having moved for the Return, he watched its preparation very carefully, and when it was completed he looked upon it as a very remarkable production. He was anxious that more light should be given to it, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to order, in the public interest, the printing of the evidence obtained with regard to lands held in mortmain. The right hon. Gentleman expected that a 5 per cent duty upon that property would yield £150,000. In his (Mr. Firth's) opinion, the right hon. Gentleman would find he would get very much more than he estimated. He ventured to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he might very usefully consider the form in which the Return should be made. At the beginning of the century there were under the control of Corporate Bodies considerable masses of property which had now disappeared altogether, and, therefore, he trusted that the form of Return which the Corporate Bodies would be asked to make would be such as would show the property from which the income was derived as well as the income itself. After proposing to exempt from the tax property acquired within the last 30 years, he would like to know how the right hon. Gentleman arrived at the conclusion that 5 per cent would be a just rate to charge? Those were points on which he should like some expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. and worthy Alderman the Member for the City (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) had suggested that the City Companies were extremely anxious to be taxed. His

(Mr. Firth's) impression was that they were extremely anxious to be let alone. According to a report in The Times a few weeks ago, a few of the Companies had considered the question amongst themselves. Some of the larger Companies, assuming for the nonce unusual virtue, expressed a willingness to be taxed for the purpose of Succession Duties. He did not wish to misinterpret them, but he apprehended they supposed that if they accepted such a guileless resolution no one would suggest they should be taxed, and that they would be left to pursue their courses perfectly irrespective of any relation to the duties they had to the public at large. He was glad to see they would find themselves mistaken in their resolution, and that they would find themselves mistaken in the result. There was another suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which he wished to call attention, and that was with respect to the telegraphs. He (Mr. Firth) found that the Telegraph Service did not pay. It scarcely paid its own expenses, and he presumed it could not pay any proper interest upon the enormous and extravagant and unjustifiable amount expended in the purchase of the telegraphs from the Telegraph Companies. He thought that, apart from the improvement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to make in reducing the telegraph charges, he ought to consider the advisability of improving telephonic communication. The great electric problem of holding telegraphic and telephonic communications on the same wire had been solved, and he thought it was due to the public that a great Department like the Post Office should offer telephonic as well as telegraphic facilities. Those were the only matters to which he ventured to allude; they were matters to which he had given some attention, and as to which he should be glad to have an expression of opinion from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. GREGORY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been placed in a very difficult position, but he had discharged his duty with judgment and ability. There were, however, one or two points on which further information was required. He could not see why the right hon. Gentleman should draw a distinction between English and Irish farmers with reference to the Income Tax. If the two classes were put upon the same footing it would give a good deal of satisfaction to the farmers of this country; it might reconcile them to the increased taxation, and really it would make very little difference to the Exchequer. He was quite in accord with the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the imposition of duties on spirits, for he thought it was a very fair and reasonable imposition to make. But, now, there was another question with which, perhaps, he had some acquaintance—namely, the question of taxation of real property. The new proposals in that respect involved some very serious consideration. He did not quite follow the purport of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions on the subject, or the manner of their operation. It was, no doubt, a very intricate and difficult subject, and therefore he (Mr. Gregory) might be excused for saying he wished to reserve full freedom of action when those proposals subsequently came to be dealt with. He confessed he did not understand how the right hon. Gentleman would assess his duties in the case of successive limitations. The same devise might extend to various successions to the same property, and he would like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman whether a new Probate Duty—for that was what it came to—would accrue with respect to each of those devolutions of the property; and, if so, whether in cases of a collateral devise the Legacy Duty would also attach to such devise? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Childers) dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but he (Mr. Gregory) did not see anything in the Resolutions to prevent such an operation. He wished, however, to reserve that point for future consideration and discussion. When they considered proposals for new taxes they must look at them in all their incidents. This was, he understood, in cases of direct descent to supersede and in other cases to be an addition to the Succession Duty. Was it to be on the same footing as the Succession Duty? If so, it might operate with the greatest hardship. In respect of the question of the descent of the title to property, there was a provision in the Succession Duty Act which had had an effect which even the framers of the Act never contemplated. For instance, by the construction put upon the words "predecessor in title," there had been imposed on certain successors to a title a charge of 10 per cent, whereas if the property had been personal property the charge would only have been 1 per cent. Such questions as those they should have carefully to consider, and it was for the purpose of showing the necessity of considering them that he had made those observations. The right hon. Gentleman had said he had received, owing to the exertions of the officials of the Department, considerably more Revenue than might have been expected. They had no doubt exerted themselves to the greatest extent to whip up the Revenue, and, perhaps, in doing so, they had acted somewhat harshly and had created a certain amount of discontent. It was not desirable that they should create any unnecessary discontent in the collection of taxation. He did not say that in that case anything the officials had done was unnecessary or uncalled for by their instructions; but he ventured to point out that, for the purposes of the Income Tax, Returns might be allowed to stand for a period of three years, instead of having to be made out every year. He did not think such a practice would lessen the Revenue, and it would, undoubtedly, give great satisfaction to the country. There was also another point which arose from the proposals for new taxation, particularly upon that of real property. It was the rule that time did not turn against the claims of the Crown. This frequently operated with the greatest hardship and, he might add, injustice. He knew at that moment a case where a claim had been made upon a property 40 years ago, and in which not only the duty but 40 years' interest was charged, and that he thought a principle which the House of Commons could hardly continue to sanction. He certainly thought it was time to relieve the public from an imposition of that kind, and for the House to take the matter into its serious consideration. When they proposed a heavy taxation, though the country would readily bear it, the method of its imposition should be tempered with moderation. And it was in vain that they struggled to facilitate the transfer of land if they left the claims of the Crown upon it in their present position.

No one would be safe in taking an estate under the proposal now made until the duties were cleared off.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that he had pressed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer from time to time the subject of the taxation of lands held in mortmain, and he was, therefore, very glad that the right hon. Gentleman had abandoned the resolution he had formed last year not to deal with the subject except in connection with local government. He could not, however, join with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) in his congratulations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman did not show much valour. If he had understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly, he proposed to exempt all lands of a religious and charitable character. What lands held in mortmain in this country by Corporations were not of that character? The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had just addressed the Committee, and he was Treasurer of one of the London hospitals. That hon. Member was, therefore, conversant with the affairs of those Institutions. There were also the lands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the lands of the Charity Commissioners, the estates of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge—all those lands would be exempted by the proposal made that night. The value of land held in mortmain in this country was not less than £12,000,000 a-year; and if the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were carried out as they ought to be the income derived from a tax of that sort should produce not less than £600,000 a-year. It seemed to him that it would be a great hardship upon the landed gentry, and that they would have room for serious complaint, if those great landed Corporations were exempted from taxation, while they, the private landowners, were subjected to taxation and to all local burdens. Such exemption, in the case of religious and charitable institutions, had been spoken of by the Prime Minister as a grant. When the time came he hoped he should be supported by the Representatives of the landed interest in the House—when he made a further objection against the limited proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that night.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he thought that the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) a little while ago showed an interesting characteristic in the history of the Parliamentary Return for which the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved. Coming as it did from an economist, it was one of the most interesting stories the House had heard for a long time. It appeared that the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved for a Return of lands held in mortmain, which his Friends in the Government had promised to give. When the Return was produced it was found to be two feet thick. It was too bulky to be carried about, and it was put on a chair, and occasionally visited by the hon. and learned Member, to see if it was quite safe. The hon. and learned Member now confessed to the Committee that the Return was of no value whatever.

MR. FIRTH: My hon. and learned Friend altogether misunderstands what I said. What I said was that it was of no utility—that is to say, that it could not be used in itself. Its intrinsic value is enormous, but its bulky nature renders it impossible to use it. You cannot get at it.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, that his hon. and learned Friend had followed up the statement by saying that the cost of printing it would have been so enormous that even his extravagant Friends on the Treasury Bench would not incur that cost. He did not know whether his hon. and learned Friend had yet offered to repay to them and to the public the cost of that useless set of documents. One part of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech showed that he recognized the importance of the occasion, for he had said, parenthetically, that the age of economy was past. That was about the only authority they had heard from the Ministerial side of the House which had done any justice to the importance of the present occasion. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had good reason to complain that people had been squabbling about the amount of alcohol there was in so many gallons of beer or of spirits, and the details of a particular tax, failing to realize that this night was one of the most important nights ever known to the financial history of the House of Commons. It was a most important epoch, for, for the first time in the history of the country, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come down and proposed Estimates exceeding £100,000,000. The effect of the alteration made in the keeping of public accounts in 1880 was to strike out from those accounts a sum of £100,000 in connection with extra receipts, so that if the Estimates were altered, as they ought to be altered, the result would be that now, at a time when they were at peace with the whole of Europe—he said at a time of peace, because he looked upon the war in the Soudan as only one of those wars which had been the habitual evils of this country since 1880—they had Estimates presented to them of over £100,000,000. With regard to what were called special preparations, no one knew better than Her Majesty's Government that by those preparations they were only filling up, under the pressure of immediate public emergency, the lapses of past years. They knew perfectly well that they were only now restoring to their proper condition of strength those defensive resources of the country which ought to have been kept up to a proper strength for some years past. It was most remarkable, when they had a deficit of £15,000,000—it was put at a figure just below £15,000,000—namely, some £14,952,000—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should come down and throw over all the old canons of financial action which had been propounded by him during the time he had held his present Office. No one could have sat in the House without remarking the contrast between the speech the right hon. Gentleman had delivered that night and that he had made last year. A year ago he had come down and made a polemical and controversial Budget. He had made the Budget the means of a Party attack, and in that Party attack he had denounced the Conservatives because they had not borne out of the Income of the year the Expenditure of the year. He had denounced them for having left a legacy of debt to their Successors, and for having suspended the operation of the Sinking Fund; but now the right hon. Gentleman, for £7,500,000 out of the £15,000,000 he required, had to resort to the very practice he had denounced so emphatically. The right hon. Gentleman was about to suspend the operation of the Sinking Fund, and to ask for a temporary loan which, if circumstances were unfavourable, would become a permanent loan, and would be left as a legacy to his Successors. The Committee, he thought, should recognize the importance of the position the right hon. Gentleman had occupied that night, and it was a pity that this conversation should go on without the right hon. Gentleman being congratulated upon the fact of his having, at all events, marked a new epoch in their financial history.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that he so far agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down as to think that the discussion had run too much into detail. In regard to increased Expenditure, and the imputations which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, he wished to point out that there had been some Members on that (the Ministerial) side of the House who had been quite willing to act as a check on the extravagance of, and even to fight counter to, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government he belonged to. But, unfortunately, the spirit of economy which had been manifested by those few Radical Members had not met with the support of the Party opposite. He must confess that the strictures of the hon. and learned Gentleman came with a very indifferent grace at a time when they were called upon to pay for the extravagance in which they had been indulging, seeing that the Party opposite had contributed so largely to that extravagance. The only complaint which had come from the other side of the House, from time to time, in regard to the Estimates, was that the figures were not large enough, that the schemes propounded were not great enough, and that they would be more happy if enlarged burdens were placed upon the people of the country. He (Mr. Illingworth) ventured to join in the expression of opinion which had fallen from all parts of the Committee as to the able statement they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that night. He (Mr. Illingworth) thought that in his scheme the right hon. Gentleman had combined both courage and caution. It was true that he had had a great deficit to deal with; but it was due to him to say that he had really met that deficit in the main out of the taxation of the year. ["No, no!"] Yes, he (Mr. Illingworth) maintained that in the main the Expenditure of the year was to be met by its taxation. It was true the Sinking Fund was to be suspended; but notwithstanding the Expenditure which had been incurred, it was all to be met from the Income of the year. He was very glad indeed that the right hon. Gentleman had determined upon suspending the Sinking Fund. On previous occasions, hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House and on the other side had doubted the policy of that hard-and-fast line for the reduction of the National Debt. The present was a time when the country—all classes of the country—were joining in a chorus of complaint as to the poverty which was universal amongst them—at such a time it did seem to him altogether pedantic to adhere to a hard-and-fast line with regard to the reduction of the Debt. It was impossible at such a time to keep up the reduction at the same level as could be done without the burden being felt when the country was in a prosperous condition. The hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), who did not now happen to be in his place, had replied to some observations made by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) to the effect that the great majority of the taxpayers of the country who were in business had had lately to borrow money to carry on their businesses at the rate of 5, or 6, or even more per cent. The hon. Baronet had said that the only thing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did with the capital which he extracted from their pockets was to relieve them from a burden of 3 or 2½ per cent. Therefore, he (Mr. Illingworth), for his own part, hoped the time was distant when they would revert to that system of paying a fixed sum every year for the reduction of the National Debt. But the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. E. Clarke) had gone on to say that this enormous Estimate of £100,000,000 was produced at a time when they were at peace with all the world. He (Mr. Illingworth) could not admit that they were at peace with all the world. They had been carrying on a war in Egypt and the Soudan——

MR. EDWARD CLARKE: I said at peace with the Great Powers of Europe. I mentioned that we were engaged in a war in the Soudan, which was only one of those wars which we had been habitually engaged in since 1880.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to make a geographical distinction in this question of wars; but that distinction was of no practical value in the discussion in which they were engaged. He (Mr. Illingworth) supposed that a war, whether in the Soudan or in Europe, had to be paid for. [Mr. EDWARD CLARKE: Hear, hear!] Well, he was very glad that the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and other hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House who, for the other 364 days in the year were urging on expenditure, had now put on the white sheet, if it was only for one night in the year, and turned round upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to complain of the heaviness of the expenses which the people of the country were called upon to pay. This war in Egypt and the Soudan had been a most costly business. As had been pointed out by the hon. Gentlemen who had preceded him, it had not been a very fruitful business; but that was the characteristic of most wars, and all that he could say was that if wars were made cheap their very cheapness would add another horror to them. He was thankful that when they were indulging in those wars, they were now and then called upon to face the question of raising the money wherewith to meet the expenditure that was entailed. He was disposed to think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had laid the burden fairly across the shoulders of all classes of the people. A very small point had been raised—so small a detail as to be scarcely worth noting—on this Budget, and that was the inequality that prevailed between the burden imposed upon the farmers of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He was bound to say that the alternative that the right hon. Gentleman offered the farmer for the present system of assessments was not likely, in his (the right hon. Gentleman's) day at least, to be realized. He believed that, taking the great majority of the farmers, not only did they not make up accounts in that correct and scientific form that would stand the test of the Income Tax Commissioners, but he believed that it was impossible for them so to make up accounts. The trade of farmers was a fluctuating one—the nature of their business made it almost impossible for them to do so. But, on the other hand, if that were so, the question they had to ask, when the scheme was put forward for the modification of the present system was, was the present system an equitable one? It might be that there was no cause for the distinction which existed between the Scotch and Irish farmers on the one side, and the English farmers on the other. If the distinction were in the proportion of 3*d.* to 4*d.*, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them it was, then he would say raise the amount paid by the Irish and Scotch farmers. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, he made the suggestion on the strength of this fact, that the charge was not a heavy one upon the farmer.

An hon. MEMBER: Look at the enormous rates they have to pay.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, farmers had no more rates to pay than any other taxpayers. He knew that hon. Gentlemen connected with land enterprize were ready to urge the excessive burden of taxation upon land; but if they were connected with some of the towns in the country, and looked into the question of assessments, and the manner in which the rates were levied, he thought they would be only too thankful that they were not assessed as were the residents in towns. He (Mr. Illingworth) only wished to say that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given them some valuable information in regard to the incidence of taxation as between the direct and the indirect taxpayer. It was true that there had been for many years past a modification going on in this respect, and that taxation had been more extensively levied indirectly than directly. The fact was, that in times past the House of Commons was very little representative of the people, being almost entirely representative of property, and the result was that the taxes had been almost wholly laid upon the working classes, instead of on property, as they ought to be. He believed that there was even yet a great inequality to be overcome, and that there was ground for laying heavier burdens upon realized wealth. The country, he thought, would appreciate the courage which had been manifested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his dealing with the Death Duties, and he only trusted that the exemptions would not be made too numerous. He did not say that there could not be some argument used for exemptions, particularly where the purpose was purely charitable—in the case of hospitals, for instance; but when they came to ecclesiastical property, he wanted to know why that should be exempted? There was no charity in this case, where national wealth was appropriated by one religious body in the country, and that the wealthiest class of the community, and he did not think their claim for exemption should be considered while much poorer classes were ready to bear their share of such national burdens. He should be glad to support the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) in the course he had intimated it was his intention to pursue, so far as ecclesiastical property was concerned, believing that there was no ground for those exemptions. Reference had been made to the propriety of making an increase in the Wine Duties. He should probably have to refer to that subject at a later stage, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given them one good reason why that question should not be gone into at that moment. After a long negotiation they had come to an understanding with Spain, a Treaty having been agreed to between the two countries, allowing the introduction of British produce into Spain on more advantageous terms, on condition that a relaxation of four degrees in alcoholic strength should be made by this country in respect of Spanish wines. He supposed many of them only looked upon this as a very clumsy way of dealing with their neighbours; but, at the same time the great majority of the House and of the country had supported the view that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was taking; and he believed that the Government were accredited by the commercial community with the efforts they had made to bring to a successful issue those long and tiresome negotiations. ["No, no!"] At any rate, when it came to be urged that there had been an increase put upon the duties on spirits and on beer, the same rate of increase should be put upon wine, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to show that those people were wrong to argue that the people of this country got nothing which could be regarded as a quid pro quo. As far as he knew the views of the commercial community in the North of England, this Commercial Treaty was looked upon with great approval.

MR. GORST said, that the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) had made it almost impossible to follow the usual course on the introduction of the Budget. When the discussion had been almost exclusively directed to obtaining elucidations from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in burst the hon. Member for Bradford with talk about economy, in a speech which they had heard over and over again. The hon. Member not only would not himself follow the advice of the Prime Minister, but he made it almost impossible for the Prime Minister himself to follow that advice. Talk about economy seemed that night a little out of place. It was out of place in this Parliament. He remembered that in the last Parliament the economists had had it all their own way. There was then an extravagant Conservative Government in Office. The armaments of the country were bloated, and the Expenditure was extravagant; and every night the sort of speech they had just listened to was made. They had had those speeches made even while the present Government had been in Office. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) had said, prior to the last General Election, that no Government deserved the confidence of the country that could not get on with a sum of less than £70,000,000 a-year. One hon. Gentleman opposite, who had enlarged upon that theme before his constituents, had been good enough to tell the House how sorry he was that he had done it when he knew that even a Liberal Government could not carry on the country at a smaller expense. Now, that night they had a Budget of which the ordinary Expenditure amounted to between £89,000,000 and £90,000,000. The Conservative Party had not acted that night as their opponents used to act in the last Parliament. They did not come forward and say—"You ought to carry on the Government of the country at a less cost." The hon. Member for Bradford came forward and found fault with them for not complaining of the Government for bringing in those large Estimates. But the Conservative Party did not find fault with the Government on that head, because they knew that whether a Liberal or a Conservative Government was on the Front Bench opposite it was necessary to pay the legitimate expenses of the country. They knew that in a country like this Expenditure must go on increasing from year to year. Even if the hon. Member for Bradford himself were Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would find it impossible to carry on the Government of the country for £70,000,000 a-year. He would be obliged to bring in increasing Budgets, and to admit the increasing Expenditure, and would not be able to govern the country either for the £70,000,000 spoken of by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, or the much larger amount of £89,000,000 or £90,000,000 mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Under those circumstances, would it not have been better with the Budget under discussion if the advice of the Prime Minister had been followed, if Liberal Members had refrained from the discussion of details on the first night, confining themselves to questions to elucidate the statement, and putting by patriotic speeches on economy to a more convenient season? He rose for the modest purpose of putting a question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ask for information as to one point of the statement which he had failed entirely to understand. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to provide, in round numbers, for £15,000,000, and that sum he divided, providing for £7,500,000 by increased taxation, leaving the other half to be provided for. Of that £7,500,000, £3,000,000 he did not provide for at all, he left it a deficit. He used round figures for the sake of clearness; it was about £3,000,000—£2,800,000 was the exact sum. If he were tempted to follow the example of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), he might say something about not meeting the Expenditure of the year by taxation within the year; but he would leave that to the adjourned debate, the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill or some more convenient season.

But out of the £7,500,000, £4,600,000 was to be provided for by what the right hon. Gentleman called suspending the Sinking Fund. Now, if he understood the right hon. Gentleman rightly, what he called the suspension of the Sinking Fund was the suspending the operation of the Terminable Annuities; that of the whole amount payable in Terminable Annuities, that part which went to the reduction of Debt by the repayment of the capital of the Debt—the extinguishment of the Debt—was to be this year suspended, and that compensation would be afforded to holders of Annuities by the lengthening of the term of the Annuities.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The Government are the holders.

MR. GORST: But whoever were the holders they were compensated by the increase in the length of the Annuities. Now, he was surprised—for he thought he understood the operation as the Chancellor of the Exchequer described it to the Committee—he was astonished when the right hon. Gentleman came to name the amount that would give him £4,600,000. He recollected pretty well the terms stated in the House last year; but since the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, he (Mr. Gorst) had refreshed his memory by a reference to the Library. The Returns he found there rather puzzled him, because, in the Return of the issues from the Exchequer for the service of the National Debt, he found that the amount of payment of capital by the automatic operation of Terminable Annuities had been increasing steadily from year to year during the last 10 years for which the Return was given, and in 1883—the last year the Return included—the amount paid was £6,300,000 in round figures. Well, there was another Return given about the same time which showed the actual operations of the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, and the various sums they had received from the Exchequer for Terminable Annuities, and there was given a complete list of all the Terminable Annuities in existence at that time—the beginning of 1884. He found from that, that the total sum paid to the holders of Terminable Annuities who, he understood, were different Departments of Government—he believed hardly any others were held by the general public—they were all Commissioners for the reduction of the Debt, Trustees in Chancery, and functionaries of that description; but the total was £7,900,000, and of that £1,900,000 represented interest, and £5,000,000, or nearly £6,000,000, represented the payment of capital. Those two Returns were a little inconsistent the one with the other, for the one represented the payment of capital by Terminable Annuities as £6,200,000, and the other as about £6,000,000, but they were sufficiently near. No doubt the difference was explicable, they were sufficiently near to afford much of a puzzle over the operation. But when this Return set out the amount of payment of capital as about £6,000,000, how was it that the operation the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed during the present year would produce only £4,600,000—less by £1,600,000 than one would naturally expect from the Return furnished to Parliament? No doubt, that could be explained; but he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer would admit that, so far as his statement went, the explanation was not apparent, and he (Mr. Gorst) would be very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman if, when he came to answer the various observations made in Committee, he would kindly explain how it was that so small a sum comparatively, so much less than would naturally be expected, was anticipated by the operation in Terminable Annuities he intended to effect during the present year.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he was decidedly of opinion that it would have been better if, after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was concluded, the debate had been adjourned in order that the Vote of Credit might have been taken at a sufficiently early hour to be disposed of that night. The Prime Minister suggested that the Committee should do little more than elicit information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening, reserving a more serious and detailed discussion for a subsequent occasion. That would have been a very reasonable recommendation to follow but for an intimation the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to the Committee before he resumed his seat. At Question time that afternoon, he (Mr. A. O'Connor) inquired of the Prime Minister whether the Government intended to urge on the House any Vote in Committee that day? He imagined he must have been misunderstood; he was not speaking of Committee of Supply, but of a Vote or Resolution in Ways and Means. The Prime Minister said the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be left to exercise his discretion in the matter; and what did the right hon. Gentleman say? He informed the Committee that it was absolutely necessary, for reasons he did not specify, that all these Resolutions should be at least passed by the Committee of Ways and Means that night. Under those circumstances, it did seem desirable to offer such observations as he thought right that evening instead of deferring them to a future occasion. A number of Members had concurred in expressing admiration of the ability, the success, and the courage with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had submitted his proposals to the Committee; and he was perfectly prepared to admit, and fully appreciated, the singular mastery of his work the right hon. Gentleman manifested. But he failed to see the courage of the performance, and he failed to discover in the proposals anything meriting any very great admiration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was compelled to admit to the Committee that this Government of "peace, retrenchment, and reform" found themselves now, after they had been five years in Office, and while they were still at peace—for they had not yet declared war even in the Soudan—compelled to come down to the House and propose to Parliament Estimates discovering a deficit greater than had ever been presented to Parliament since the days of the Crimean War. Under such circumstances, he failed to see the consistency of those congratulations taken up so equally not only on the other side, but on the Opposition side, whence might have been expected something like healthy, manly criticism. It had often struck him that Members who took part in discussions on the Budget night were content to deal in a fragmentary and insignificant way with little portions of the Financial Statement which interested them individually, and very seldom dealt with the whole in a comprehensive manner. When the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) passed his criticism upon those who had preceded him in addressing the Committee, it might have been supposed he was about to follow the Budget at large; but he simply followed the example he had condemned, and contented himself with desultory observations upon isolated portions of the Budget. He was afraid his view of the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not find anything like general assent or approval in the House. He entertained opinions on finance and the incidence of taxation in this country, and especially as regarded the present proposals, very much at variance with the majority of the Committee; but that was no reason why he should not—perhaps it was why he should—say clearly what he thought about the Budget proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had listened with very great care to all that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, and took the most careful note he could of his figures and proposals; but he was bound to say that, after having used his best endeavours, he had been absolutely unable to comprehend the statement, and portions of it he failed to follow. When the right hon. Gentleman was speaking about the Death Duties, though he had some professional acquaintance with questions connected with Succession Duties, and therefore was as able as most Members to get a general notion of the drift, he was utterly unable to comprehend the extent of the proposed alterations. Then, again, in reference to the National Debt, though he had gone over all the Returns, and had studied finance accounts from end to end, he could not understand how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make up the deficit by the suspension of what he called the Sinking Fund. The right hon. Gentleman would, he thought, have done much better, would have treated the Committee much more fairly, if, instead of having all these Resolutions passed at once, he had consented to postpone discussion until something like a clear apprehension had got into the minds of, at any rate, a portion of the House as to what his proposals really were. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had followed, in his statement of proposals, and in laying before the Committee his accounts of Revenue and Expenditure for the past year, and his Estimates for the coming year, the old and recognized rule of adopting a separate form of account, and that form, to his (Mr. A. O'Connor's) mind, was a very misleading and difficult form to understand. He could not understand why Finance Ministers, in their explanations of the financial condition of the country, should not adopt the same simple, straightforward, common-sense plan, such as would do equally well for a nation or an individual. In regard to the individual, they could understand there were five, and only five, main sources of income, and the sources of income to a nation corresponded to those of the individual. There were five sources—first, the property which a man owned, and from which he derived an income; secondly, the business he carried on, and which brought in an income; thirdly, debts paid to him by his debtors in return for money advanced; fourthly, the money which he obtained gratuitously either by gift, or legacy, or theft, or good luck, or in any other way; and fifthly, and finally, the income he derived from those who consented to lend him money when he went into debt. Those were the five possible sources of income an individual could turn to, and it was precisely the same with the nation. There were the National property, the Crown property, hereditary sources of revenue, corresponding to the first-mentioned class; there was the corresponding second-class in those Departments of Government which rendered services to the public which were paid for, certain Departments carrying on business and receiving income in connection therewith; thirdly, the payments by those who received advances; fourthly, that source which corresponded to the gratuitous source of an individual's income, the revenue received from the Colonies, or from foreign countries, or what was raised by taxation, which was very often very like theft, or what was received by windfalls of one kind or another; and, fifthly, when all other sources were exhausted, as they were with the Chancellor of the Exchequer this year, they were obliged to resort to the last remaining source of revenue, and incur further obligations. The whole Expenditure of the country, in like manner, flowed out in five channels, corresponding to the five sources of Revenue. There were the expenses connected with the administration of property; there were the expenses connected with those Departments which carried on business at a profit; thirdly, the advances in the way of further loans; fourthly, that which corresponded to the individual's personal expenditure, his riotous living—the national war—his litigation, or what not, those were corresponding channels of expenditure; and, fifthly, the payment of money borrowed. He never could understand why Finance Ministers could not adopt such a plain common-sense arrangement of figures as he had indicated. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done so, he was perfectly certain the Committee and the country at large would be able to follow the financial arrangements very much better, and would be far better able to appreciate the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. That had not been done, and the consequence was that most Members of the House and most people throughout the country listened to the speech, or would read it as it would be reported in the newspapers on the morrow, and would carry away with them a very hazy notion indeed as to the financial condition of the country and the mode in which the existing difficulties were to be met. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had made certain proposals in regard to taxation—for he passed now to the subject-matter, saying no more about the method—and passing over the first three sources, the property of the nation, upon which he had no observations to make, and the Post Office and other matters upon which he had nothing to say; but with regard to existing taxation and the arrangements which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed for the future, he should like to say a few words. It seemed to him with the country in the condition in which it was, with something like 700,000 men, women, and children in the workhouses, and with another 750,000 keeping manfully outside the workhouses, but just on the verge of pauperism, with hundreds and thousands—~~he~~ might almost say with hundreds of thousands—of men and women without employment—there were 20,000 in Birmingham alone unable to find work—~~it~~ seemed to him to talk about throwing further taxation upon the industrial classes instead of on the property class was to mock the struggling classes. A number of taxes were left which, in justice to the people, should have been removed; they did not bring in very much to the Exchequer—he would not say they were not worth collecting, though some might be dropped without any loss at all, they brought in such small sums; but they had an injurious effect on the commerce and industry of the country, and any enlightened Finance Minister who had taken the trouble to notice the effect of the abolition of a tax of the kind, not only in the time of Sir Robert Peel, but from 1853 to now, would have, had he considered the matter, some doubt as to whether it would not be better to remove those taxes even under the present disadvantageous circumstances. Those taxes were enumerated in the Statistical Abstract of the United Kingdom, which, no doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had carefully studied, and he would refer to pages 56 and 57 for the list of what he meant. It was a list of imported articles, and it showed the amount consumed per head of the population since 1869. There were articles which were imported, and had been for years, free from taxation—bacon, ham, butter, cheese, eggs, potatoes, and sugars. Now, the result of having those articles untaxed was this—whereas in 1869 the consumption of bacon and ham was 3 decimal 68 lbs. per head per annum, the consumption in 1883 was no less than 10 lbs. decimal 96 per annum; butter increased in a similar manner from 4 decimal 52 to 7 lbs. decimal 18; cheese from 3 decimal 52 to 5 decimal 51; eggs from 14 per head to 26—nearly double; and potatoes from 6 lbs. to 16 lbs. per head of the population; corn from 155 lbs. to 250 lbs.; sugar from 38 decimal 83 to 61 decimal 87; refined sugar from 3 decimal 73 to 9 decimal 87. That was to say, when commerce and industry were left unchecked, unfettered by taxation, in every single case there was a considerable increase in the consumption per head, in some cases to two or three times the former consumption. The page also contained a Return showing the history of the articles still taxed, and which taxation he objected to this year—currants, raisins, cocoa, coffee. In 1869 the amount of currants and raisins consumed per head of the population was 4 lbs., and the consumption since then had not increased; cocoa was less than 1 lb. per head, and it was still less than that; coffee was decimal

94 per head, and now it was decimal 89; the consumption had decreased. Thus, while the articles left untaxed had increased in consumption, those upon which the wretched little taxes were placed had not increased at all, the country was debarred from the reasonable use of them, and commerce and industry were injuriously affected. It was the poorer classes alone who suffered from the taxes on dried fruits, coffee, cocoa, and chicory. Similarly in regard to tea, which, in 1863, or, at any rate, before 1869, had the duty reduced to 6*d.* from 1*s.* 6*d.* He would draw the attention of the Government to the fact that whereas in 1869 the amount of tea imported was 139,000,000 lbs., and therefore the tax amounted to that number of sixpences, in the year 1883 the importation was 222,000,000 lbs., and the tax levied was 222,000,000 sixpences. But there was a very great change in the value of the tea—a very great change in the amount of capital invested in tea. In 1869 the tea imported was valued at something over £10,000,000; in 1883 it was valued at £11,500,000—that was to say, in 1869, £10,300,000 worth of tea was consumed, but only 139,000,000 sixpences paid in duty, and in 1883, on £11,000,000 worth, 222,000,000 of sixpences were paid—the value of the tea had increased some 8 per cent, and the taxation at the rate of 70 per cent. In other words, the tea which in 1869 paid 6*d.* per 1 lb. would for the same value in 1883 have paid 9*d.* Therefore, instead of taking credit to himself for not having increased the taxation on tea, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have come to the House and proposed a reduction of the duty on tea to 4*d.* in the 1 lb. There were other duties which were simply burdens upon industry and reasonable commercial enterprise, and which any Minister deserving the character of courage, which had been so lavishly accorded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that night, would willingly have proposed to repeal—for instance, the duty on marine insurance and the duty on life insurance. It seemed to him great unfairness that people should be taxed because they protected themselves against the dangers of the sea and against the consequences of their death. Then he would refer to the tax on solicitors' certificates. He never could understand why that unfortunate class of men, solicitors, should be called upon to pay to the Government year after year a tax for permission to carry on their business. The Government did not impose any tax upon doctors. He believed the Government brought in a Bill last year imposing a registration fee, but it was a very small affair, and the fee was nothing in comparison with the taxation levied on solicitors. Then there was another question which he had no doubt would in a few years come very prominently to the front—that was the question of licensing every house where spirits, wines, and intoxicating drinks generally were sold. They had had within the last two years a considerable agitation on the subject of Local Option. One step in that direction he believed would be the transfer of the sums paid for licences of houses where drink was sold from the Imperial Exchequer to local funds. Perhaps they might have some distinct information as to whether from that point of view Local Option was desirable or not—at any rate, he thought it would go a long way towards solving the difficulty of the question by throwing out a hint for the consideration of Chancellors of the Exchequer in future years. Coming now to the subject of Debt, he pointed out that the debt of a country, like the debt of an individual, might assume one or other of three forms. It might be that the nation was bound to pay a certain fixed sum by a fixed date, and that was what this country did when it issued Treasury bills; it might be that the debt was never to be repaid in principal, but that only a certain annual interest was to be paid to the creditors of the State, and that was the usual form of most of the Funded Debt of the country; and, finally, there was the intermediate course, in which the interest and principal were paid off together by instalments, which was the form of Terminable Annuities. With regard to the Sinking Fund which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to suspend, he was inclined to agree with what most persons suspected to be in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that all this talk about Sinking Funds was absolute nonsense. The Sinking Fund idea was a financial error—a ridiculous delusion, which well-meaning men started in times when ideas were not at all clear with regard to financial matters, and had continued as a sort of financial will-of-the-wisp for some time in the House of Commons—it involved a great deal of work, and was sometimes very useful, perhaps, for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of persons who indulged in inconvenient criticism. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not boldly continued the plan which he began last year of converting the Three per Cent Stock into Terminable Annuities, which had, at any rate, the advantage that it forced the present generation, the Government, and the House of Commons to pay off debt in a certain given time, and, although it might be true that certain other debt had to be incurred in the meantime, yet if they had not a system of Terminable Annuities there could never be anything like a substantial reduction of Debt at all. In 1881 the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who was at the time Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed a system for the reduction of the National Debt which, if it could have been carried on, would have been decidedly satisfactory; but, for some reason or other, that scheme unfortunately never passed through the House of Commons, and no subsequent Bill was introduced to carry out that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal. He was not, as a rule, an admirer of the Prime Minister's schemes; but, from a financial point of view, he thought that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman in 1881 was a good one, and that it was to be regretted it had not been carried into effect. There was just one other point in connection with the question of Debt to which he desired to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the Committee. Hon. Members would be aware that every now and then Treasury bills were paid off, and that certain others were issued. Now, Treasury bills were for either three or six months. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knew that the three months' bills were more costly than those at six months—that was to say, he had to pay a higher rate upon them—and therefore why the right hon. Gentleman should increase the number of Treasury bills at three months and decrease the number of six months' bills was a point which he was entirely unable to comprehend. That might be one of those small points which sometimes tested the capacity of Chancellors of the Exchequer, and he thought that the increase of three-months' Treasury bills during the time in which the right hon. Gentleman had held the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer did not speak to his carefulness in that matter of finance. He was aware that there was the existing deficit to deal with; notwithstanding that, he would still venture to propose to alleviate the taxes which pressed on the poor as forming a burden on industry and commerce which was much more serious than the small sums which those taxes brought into the Exchequer. He would be asked how he proposed that the deficit should be supplied. Well, his proposal was not likely, as he had said before, to meet with much acceptance in that House at the present time—it would, perhaps, be more heard of in the next Parliament than in this—he was certain that before many years had passed it would be forced into the forefront of finance and politics. There was an immense area of land unemployed in this country; he knew not how many acres there were in that condition, but the number was very great. There were in the South of England, for instance, many landlords who had farms which they could not let; they could not sell them; they could not get tenants on their own terms who would work the soil, and they could not turn it to any proper account themselves. He asked whether it was beyond the power of legislation to touch that subject, to provide machinery by which some of the idle hands in the country could be brought to work on that land? To whom did that land belong? It belonged to the whole human race; but a large portion of the land of this country was in the hands of a certain privileged class; that privileged class did nothing themselves, but extracted from the industrial portion of society an enormous rent—an enormous tribute for leave to live and work and die on the face of England; those men, whenever they chose, could turn out, and had turned out, many and many an industrious tenant. Over the face of the South-Western counties of this country there was an enormous number of farms unoccupied. Why should the landlords be allowed to hold those lands without the State deriving any Income Tax from them? Because they were empty, and they were able to plead that fact as a reason why they should not pay Income Tax. Well, then, what was his proposal? There were for Income Tax purposes two Schedules, and under Schedule A there was a certain tax on the value of land. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposed to make the Income Tax 8*d.* in the pound. The greater portion of the amount to be derived from that tax would be drawn from the industrial classes, tradesmen, manufacturers, and professional men, and the smaller portion of it would come from land. Why should that be? The people who were allowed to enjoy an exclusive beneficial ownership of the land of the country should, he thought, be called upon to pay a consideration to the Exchequer for that exceptional enjoyment and privilege. If it were necessary to increase the Income Tax and raise further Revenue, why did not the Government raise it from those who possessed this land from which the industrial classes were kept off? Therefore he suggested the consideration whether it would not be fair and just, however unpopular it might be in such a form as this, that, instead of having incomes all round taxed at 8*d.* in the pound, an Income Tax of 2*s.* in the pound should be put upon the value of the land—that was to say, 2*s.* upon the rent paid for land, or upon the value of the land in the occupation of the owner. That, after all, would only be a tithe of the annual value, and would be reverting to what was the old Constitutional custom in this country. Time was when the land had to bear the expenses of the country, when the Crown was dependent on the revenue derived from land, and it was only when feudal government was done away with that the present system was established. If a gradually increasing tax were placed upon land the country would become the sole rent receiver, and the money, or consideration tax, or whatever it might be called that was paid for occupation, would be paid, not to a small privileged class of idlers, but to the community who were the real owners of the land. If they taxed land as he suggested, the Government would be able to raise their £11,000,000 without difficulty, and the landowners now unable to turn their land to account would, in many instances, be glad to get rid of it. The land would get into the market and then into the hands of men who would make a good use of it, and it would be made available for relieving the distress and pauperism in the country. Finally, he wished to say a few words on the extraordinary proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the taxation of alcohol. They were told that whereas Spanish wine of a strength of 26 degrees had hitherto paid a duty of 1s. a-gallon, the same duty was to be levied on Spanish wine henceforward even of a strength of 30 degrees. But, while the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to admit Spanish wines with an increased amount of alcohol without raising the duty upon them, he was about to charge a very considerably increased duty, amounting to 8 or 9 per cent, on the alcohol produced in Ireland and Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to raise the tax on Irish and Scotch spirit from 10s. a-gallon to 12s. a-gallon, and the tax upon beer from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 3d. a-barrel; but he proposed, at the same time, to reduce the tax on Spanish wine in the proportion of 30 to 26. A more extraordinary proposal, he supposed, was never submitted to the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman was going to benefit Spanish producers at the expense of Scotch and Irish producers; they were, in other words, to be burdened for the benefit of Manchester.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made a most interesting speech, and one which the Committee ought to have listened to with advantage, because he had produced with remarkable force all those remarkable doctrines as to the ransoming of property in land which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) had expounded to the electors of Birmingham and Ipswich in the course of the autumn. And if the Committee had listened a little more attentively to the hon. Member, and had respected the elaborate care and attention with which he had worked out those doctrines, they would, he thought, have been able to see clearly the ultimate results which the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would produce to the country. He thought, however, that the hon. Member was, perhaps, not following the right hon. Gentleman, but that the President of the Board of Trade was a follower of the hon. Member for Queen's County, who was only a little ahead of him. He could not but appreciate and admire, although he could not imitate, the great generosity which had that evening characterized the Members of the late Tory Government, for they had not taken advantage, as they might well have done, not only in their own interest, but in the interests of the public, of the opportunity to comment upon some of the leading features of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he supposed they were reserving themselves for one of those opportunities which ex-officials regarded as decent and proper, and that they left to Members below the Gangway, to whom generosity was unknown, the duty of criticism. He should not have intruded on the Committee were it not with the full assurance that Her Majesty's Government would not proceed at that late hour with any other Business of great importance, and if it were not for some remarks which were not his own, but which he asked to be allowed to lay before the Committee. The Prime Minister had been kind enough the other night to allude to himself and to his hon. Friends the Members for Hertford (M. A. J. Balfour), Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), and Chatham (Mr. Gorst) as young Members of the House, and he was sure that his hon. Friends deeply felt that compliment. For himself, he did not know whether he could claim altogether the position of a young Member of the House, having sat in it for nearly 12 years—however, as a young man, he might say that he had been quite taken aback by the appalling picture which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had painted of the state of the National finances. They had had a Liberal Government in Office for five years; necessarily on that account they had had applied to the finances of the country all the cardinal principles of exact finance, with the clear result that there was now a deficit of £15,000,000 and an Expenditure of £100,000,000, leaving £3,000,000 to be provided for it was impossible to say how. Now that was a very extraordinary state of things, one which would not have been remarkable under the old Tory Governments, but which certainly was not what the country was led to look forward to, or what Her Majesty's Opposition, benighted as they were, were led to look forward to when the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends were installed in Office. He had said that he should offer a few remarks, not of his own, but of a person of far greater weight—politically and financially. What was the first great feature of this Budget? It was the great increase of expenditure. The next great feature was that it did not provide for the expenditure of the year; the next was that it suspended the plan for the reduction of the National Debt; and the next that it presented the House with a deficit to be met of £3,000,000. That that was clear, on the face of the Budget, no one could deny; and as he had listened to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer putting those features before the Committee one after another, he could not help thinking of the series of speeches which were made very recently—only last year—by the First Lord of the Treasury. Not quite a year ago, in August, 1884, the right hon. Gentleman addressed his constituents in Mid Lothian, and he had been fortunate in finding in the Library of the House a corrected and authorized copy of the speeches delivered by the right hon. Gentleman. The Prime Minister defended the four years' finance for which his Government were responsible, and he found that he also defended himself from the charge of having unjustly attacked the late Government. Now this was what the right hon. Gentleman said—

“ I found fault with the late Government for the enormous increase of expenditure; I found still more fault with them for having broken every rule of sound finance. I quite admit that under given circumstances an increase of expenditure may sometimes be desirable and unavoidable. But the proposition that I lay down to you is this, that there are certain laws still more important than economy in expenditure, and one of these is that whatever you do you should take care to pay your way.”

Now that was a most extraordinary sentence, because it was the only sentence which he had been able to discover in any one of the speeches of the First Lord of the Treasury which had not a shadow of qualification about it. It was clear from that sentence that there were certain laws still more important than economy, and one of them was that “ whatever you do, you should take care to pay your way.” Now, it would be extremely interesting to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had submitted this Budget to the Prime Minister before he submitted it to the Committee? He was extremely curious to know, and the public would be curious to know, how it was that the Prime Minister had sanctioned a Budget which neglected entirely that cardinal principle which the right hon. Gentleman had laid down. But the First Lord of the Treasury went further, and said—

“ It may be that in some places Tory speakers will take upon themselves to open up this question of finance.”

They would, undoubtedly. There certainly was no doubt that Tory speakers, whatever they might have done up to to-day, would certainly, after the Budget of to-night, do as the Prime Minister supposed, and would “ open up this question of finance.” The right hon. Gentleman went on—

“ I say if you wish to have honest and sound finance you must pay your way.”

And again there was no qualification whatever. The speech he was quoting from was delivered by the First Lord of the Treasury in the Corn Exchange at Edinburgh on the 4th of December, 1884. [Mr. GLADSTONE: What is the page?] He was quoting from page 29. There was one more remarkable passage which he should like to quote to the Committee; it was from another speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was a singular instance of what a Liberal periodical, The Spectator, called “ The Irony of Providence.” The writer of the article, no doubt, knew what he meant; but he imagined that the passage he was about to read would throw some light on the meaning of the article. One of the features of the last Budget introduced by the right hon. Baronet who was Chancellor of the Exchequer in the late Government, was that he suspended the Sinking Fund which he had himself created; and when, after making his Budget Statement, the right hon. Baronet sat down, the present First Lord of the Treasury rose, and knowing well the position he had at that time acquired in the country, he thus commented on the proposal of the right hon. Baronet to suspend the Sinking Fund in order to meet the financial deficit. The date was the 11th of March, 1880, and the right hon. Gentleman said with a bitter sneer—

“The Chancellor of the Exchequer is called upon finally to offer up a victim upon the altar of—I know not what—evil fortune, or political justice—be it what it may, upon some altar or other he is called upon to immolate his own offspring, the New Sinking Fund, which, some four or five years ago, the House adopted on his recommendation; and, if I recollect right, by very considerable majorities.” — (3 Hansard, [251] 835-6.)

That was within a few months of the General Election of 1880. That was the way in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the suspension of the Sinking Fund under the late Government. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The First Lord of the Treasury shook his head; but this was a quotation which he could not in any way evade. The country was now again within a few months of a General Election, and it might be said, having regard to the Budget presented to the Committee that night, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the words of the First Lord of the Treasury was “called upon to immolate his own offspring, the New Sinking Fund, which two or three years ago the House adopted by a very considerable majority.” This, no doubt, was what might be considered “the irony of Providence.” It certainly was an instance of retributive justice, and he should have shown, if the Vote of Credit had come on that night, that the present position in which the Government found themselves had resulted from the very serious political features of their foreign policy during the last few years. Before returning to the wise and invaluable remarks of the First Lord of the Treasury, he might perhaps be allowed to comment on a remark which had fallen from the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). That hon. Member complained bitterly of the Tory Party; but he had no comment to make on the Budget. He had no fault to find with it, and it was a most singular feature in connection with the discussion of that evening that, although the Budget presented an enormous deficit, not a single Radical economist had uttered an expression of lament, regret, or mortification at the terrible and unexpected condition of the finances of the country which the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had presented to the Committee. The hon. Member for Bradford, no doubt, felt that condition of the finance of the country; but he had turned it upon the Tory Party, and said that they had never been able to make any efforts for the country because the country had not supported them. He thought that was a singular statement for the hon. Member to make. He recollected that about three years ago the greatest economist of all the Radical Party opposite—the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands)—got up and moved a Resolution, after long Notice, practically directing, as an Order of the House, a reduction in the charges of Civil Service Expenditure. He made a great speech, and the Tory Party came down prepared to support the hon. Member, who was answered by the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman accepted the Motion of the hon. Member for Burnley on condition that he inserted words which deprived that Motion of any value whatever. The words were “consistently with the efficiency of the Public Service,” and by their addition the object of the hon. Member was frustrated and destroyed. With the permission of the Committee, he would like to refer to another point in the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had been extremely impressive and virtuous on the subject of not placing the whole of these charges on the class who owned property. It was necessary, he said, in the interest of sound finance—and he quoted Professor Fawcett—that articles of consumption should be taxed in order that the masses of the people might feel that political power brought with it some political disadvantage. How did the right hon. Gentleman work it out? He provided for £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 by taxation, and by his equal distribution of taxation between property and articles of consumption he apportioned £3,000,000 to the former and £1,500,000 to the latter. He should be loth to argue with so great a financial authority as the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he doubted, and he believed that many others would doubt, that the great and sound principle of finance so insisted upon by Professor Fawcett, and quoted so grandiosely by the right hon. Gentleman, had been in any degree carried out. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a remark about having paid off War Charges entailed on the present Government by their Predecessors. That was a favourite argument of the present Government, and no one had resorted to it more frequently than the First Lord of the Treasury. He resorted to it in the speech at Mid Lothian to which he had referred. Excusing the high expenditure of the present Government, he said—

“I do not hesitate to say this, that the main cause of the present expenditure of the country being so high is the Military Charges, which are mainly due to the policy of the foregoing Government and the engagements they have saddled on those who have succeeded them.”

He should not think of introducing any elements of discord into the present debate by discussing that subject; but he thought anyone could scarcely charge on the late Government the £6,500,000 which were being taken for special preparations to meet the advance of Russia on India. This was a great feature of the present Budget. There was a deficit of £15,000,000, which arose out of the policy of the present Government, and with which the late Government could have had no connection whatever. There were other charges undoubtedly, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said they had been bequeathed to the present Government by their Predecessors, and in the same speech from which he (Lord Randolph Churchill) quoted, the First Lord of the Treasury said that—

Of course, that was a very telling observation to make to an audience in the country; but he would suggest to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and their followers, who generally took anything offered to them with the devotion of the followers of Mahomet, whether they were not pressing that argument a little too far. Of course, it was not altogether certain that when the next General Election had been held, and when the new electors had been consulted and had given their verdict—it was not absolutely certain that the present Government would be able to occupy the Treasury Bench, and were they not setting an example to their possible Successors with regard to this bequest argument which they might use with effect hereafter? How would the case stand if right hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House took the place of those on the Treasury Bench? They would then begin to talk about the bequest argument; they would find that when they left Office in 1880 the National Expenditure stood at £83,000,000; but they would also find that the present Government had bequeathed to them a National Expenditure of £100,000,000; they would find that when they left Office in 1880 they bequeathed to their Successors a deficit of £7,000,000, and they would find when they came into Office that they succeeded to a legacy of £15,000,000. Those were matters which he thought were not unworthy of the consideration of the House of Commons, and he certainly thought they ought to have the close attention of the country. He would not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the clearness and ability with which he had made his speech, because any congratulation coming from him would be altogether superfluous, as he had already received it from the authorized quarters; but he did congratulate the right hon. Gentleman from the bottom of his heart on the extraordinary success with which he had supplied his opponents with arguments for conducting the political campaign which would shortly open, and for having enabled them to prove to the country beyond all possibility of doubt the absolute superiority of Tory finance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Sir Arthur Otway, I think the time has come when I should endeavour to answer the questions put to me in the course of this debate, and I will do so as briefly as possible. I may say at once that it will not be my duty to reply to any statements made this evening other than those which have been addressed to me in order to elucidate any points in my Statement which may not have been sufficiently clear. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) has expressed very clearly what is the custom on these occasions—namely, without entering into a long discussion on financial policy, to endeavour to obtain [from the Chancellor of the Exchequer such explanations of his speech as may be required, and then to go to a formal vote on the several Resolutions placed before the Committee, so that those Resolutions may be reported and a Bill introduced as soon as possible. I say, therefore, having listened with great care to the financial proposals of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor), to which he devoted the greater part of an hour, that he will, perhaps, forgive me for not going into those questions, because I do not consider that this is a fitting time for their discussion; and it is, therefore, from no disrespect to the hon. Member that I do not enter upon them. My hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) has asked me whether the Circular which we put forward in regard to the payment of dividends tomorrow is in accordance with custom and legality? My answer is, that it is a Circular in accordance with custom and legality. It has always been the practice, when Resolutions for raising taxes have been adopted by Parliament on an occasion like the present, that those taxes should come into operation on the following day, and the necessary instructions have always been given by the Treasury. It is particularly necessary that this rule should be followed on the present occasion, because it is very rarely the case that the Budget is postponed until the last day of April, and on the 1st day of May very large sums have to be paid from which Income Tax has to be deducted. With regard to the duties on spirits, wines, and beer, several hon. Gentlemen who have spoken to-night appear to think that the taxation of those articles has hitherto been placed on the same footing—that is to say, that some regard has been had to the quantity of alcohol in wine, beer, and spirits respectively—and that if the taxation on spirits were increased there must necessarily be an equivalent increase of taxation on the alcohol in other beverages. I say at once that that has never been the principle adopted by Parliament. The principle on which the Spirit Duties proceed is perfectly well known, and it has no regard to the quantity of alcohol contained in other articles on which duties are imposed. But I have been asked whether the proposals I am now making are not unfair towards Ireland as compared with Scotland and England? I will explain to the Committee the effect of the proposals we have made so far as the relative payments by Ireland and by England are concerned. Spirits are consumed per head in England to a less extent than in Ireland or Scotland. Beer is almost exclusively drunk in England—that is to say, the amount of beer drunk in Ireland or Scotland per head is far less. But if we add together the consumption of the three countries so far as beer and home-made spirits are concerned, the additional sum which I estimate will be received under the Budget from spirits and beer will fall to the extent of 73 per cent on England, 14 cent on Scotland, and 13 per cent on Ireland. Now, I think that these percentages cannot be said to be unfair to Ireland; and I shall be glad to show to the hon. Gentleman opposite, if he wishes it, the foundation of my statement. Foreign spirits are almost entirely consumed in England; and if they are included the proportions falling on Ireland and Scotland will be much less. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds), whom I thank for his kind words with regard to the Budget, has asked me, with respect to the taxation of corporate property, to what extent property held for charitable purposes will be affected by our proposal? I must ask my hon. Friend to leave that question until the Bill is printed, when he will see what proposals we make with regard to the taxation of charitable property. One or two hon. Members have referred to the Wine Duties, and have said that if the duty on beer were to be increased we should also increase the duty on wine. Now, I was very careful to state to-night that since the year 1860 the ordinary fiscal principles which have been applied to the taxation of articles of consumption have not been understood to be applicable to the article of wine. The duties on wine have for the last quarter of a century been connected with our commercial arrangements with the great wine-growing countries. That has been a cardinal point in our finance for the last 25 years. The reduction in the Wine Duties from 6s. 1s. and 2s. 6d. per gallon, which took place in 1860, was contemporaneous with a great increase in the Spirit Duties but the two operations had no connection whatever. Then I am told that if you increase the duty on beer you should also increase the duty on wine, because wine at the present moment, in comparison with beer, pays a lower duty. Now, Sir, that is a mistake. The present duty on wine averages above 25 per cent of its value, whereas the duty on beer is only 20 per cent. Taking into account, again, only alcoholic strength, the duty on beer is not nearly as high as that on wine. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) has asked some questions with regard to the taxation of corporate property, and whether I would agree to the printing of a Return, of which I must confess that I know little or nothing. I cannot undertake to print the Return without seeing more of it; but, if I find it desirable, I will do so. Reference has also been made to the telephone business which we have been asked to acquire, and so improve our telegraph revenue. But I certainly am not disposed to take over the business of the Telephone Companies until I know much more, not only as to their present, but as to their future solvency. This is, therefore, a matter for serious inquiry, respecting which I cannot off-hand satisfy my hon. and learned Friend. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) has asked several questions involving points of technical detail with reference to the proposed increase of taxation on the succession to real property. I think it is hardly worth while, on the present occasion, to reply to highly technical questions; but on this subject the House will be shortly in possession of full details. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) also spoke of the proposed exemptions in the tax on corporate property, and perhaps he will do well to wait until he sees the Bill and recognizes the difficulties that surround it. When the Bill is before the House we shall be very glad of whatever assistance he can give us in debating it. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) asked me some questions as to Terminable Annuities. He quoted from some Return, but he did not tell me exactly what it was. [Mr. Gorst: The Return of 1884.] I do not think that is a Return of mine. I do not think it is the Return that professes to give the Terminable Annuities under the three heads laid down in 1883. If he will refer to the Return of 1883 he will find that these Terminable Annuities were divided under three heads, and that the amount of capital to be paid off under them was altogether about the sum I named for this year. There are other Terminable Annuities and other methods of reducing the Debt now in force; but with these I do not propose to deal. When Life Annuities are granted Stock is cancelled, and Annuities are granted instead; but with these I do not propose to interfere. Nor do I propose to touch the New Sinking Fund, or the Stock cancelled under Land Tax and other operations. All these methods with which we do not propose to interfere cancel Stock to the extent of something like £2,000,000 a-year. It will be found that the amount which we propose to raise to make good the deficiency of the present year is not far from the amount of Stock cancelled under these three heads; so that in point of fact, though not in point of form, what we shall have to intercept this year will be as nearly as possible the exact amount of Funded Debt cancelled this year; but if we interfered with these three processes we should cause great inconvenience, so that we only interfere with the Terminable Annuities under the Act of 1883, leaving the other processes alone. I said in my original statement that it was extremely difficult to understand, not the Terminable Annuities, which are perfectly simple, but the other operations by which the Debt is reduced or Stock cancelled, and that therefore I would lay on the Table a Treasury Minute, which would explain the operations. I have been asked a question, which really has nothing to do with the Budget, by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. A. O'Connor). Upon the operations he refers to I can give him further details if he wishes; but the result of what we have done we conceive to be satisfactory. I shall be glad if the Committee will now pass all these different Resolutions, in order that they may be reported as soon as possible, and that we may found our Bill upon them. The effect of passing them, I repeat, where they relate to questions of Customs and Excise, or Income Tax, will be to enable us at once to raise the new duties, though, if the Budget proposals are absolutely rejected, there will be no authority for the additional payments beyond the statutory rates of duty, and those who have paid on the increased scale will be entitled to be repaid the excess. It is absolutely necessary that what I propose should be done with regard to these duties. With respect to the Death Duties and the Corporation Duty, the present rates of duty will not be increased until the Bill has received the approval of Parliament. If I have not made myself clear, and any hon. Member will put a question to me, I shall be very glad to give every explanation in my power.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, that he only rose in consequence of one of the last observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As he understood, the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Resolutions upon which a Bill containing an alteration in the Death Duties would be founded would not be passed that night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): No, no!

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Resolutions upon which to found the Bill will not be passed to-night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I am afraid I have not made myself clear to the noble Lord. The Resolutions will be passed to-night. We shall ask for them in order to found a Bill upon them. We cannot introduce a Bill without Resolutions; but those relating to the Death Duties, the Corporation Tax, and the Stamps on Bonds, will not be acted upon until the Bill is passed.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, then he wished to put a question upon that, and he should have done so before the right hon. Gentleman rose, only that he had seen the Chancellor of the Exchequer had risen immediately upon an hon. Member sitting down in order to reply, and he (Lord George Hamilton) did not desire to interfere between him and the House. He understood the proposal to increase the Death Duties was for the purpose of equalizing the payments which those inheriting real and personal property respectively made. The right hon. Gentleman estimated that he would get by his increase on equalizing the Death Duties an additional sum of £200,000 a-year. Now, that £200,000 was only a 75th part of the deficiency which he hoped to supply. He also asked the right hon. Gentleman if he had considered what the effect of his proposal, if it were logically carried out, must necessarily be? As he understood, every person who inherited real property, or had an interest in real property, was hereafter to pay exactly the same sum as a person who inherited an equivalent sum in personality?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Practically the same.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Very well. He wanted the right hon. Gentleman to consider what the effect would be as regarded a large number of humble persons who under recent legislation had acquired and would hereafter inherit an interest in real property. Take the case of the tenants in Ireland. Every single tenant in that country had an interest in real property—that was to say, an interest in the farm which he occupied.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no; that is personality.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Let them follow it out. The landlord had a certain property. That property was estimated to be of a certain value. But the whole of that value did not belong to the landlord. A certain portion of it belonged to the tenant, unquestionably, and under recent legislation the Government had transferred that portion from the landlord to the tenant.

MR. GLADSTONE: I say that that is a personal interest.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No; it was not a personal interest. Under the legislation of the Land Act a certain portion of the value of a farm was transferred to the tenant, and if the landlord was assessed upon his interest in that holding it would fall short of the full value of the holding. Well, that being so, the interest was one which was derived from real property. It was an interest which was recognized by law, and which could be bequeathed by law; and it was an interest upon which the tenant could raise money. Now, he understood that that interest was not to be subjected to an increased Death Duty. Then who was to pay the increased duty on that portion of the property which did not belong to the landlord? [A laugh.] The Prime Minister laughed; but the property had a certain value, and only a portion of it belonged to a certain individual. Who was to be taxed for the remainder? Somebody must be taxed; and it was plain, if it was not the landlord, that it was the tenant. Upon that matter he wished to have a clear statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was a movement taking place in the country by which the number of proprietors was being increased; but if this proposal of increasing the Death Duties were pushed, as he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to push it, to its full conclusion, it was clear that all those who had an interest in land would be subjected to a taxation from which they had previously been exempted. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer shook his head; but would he say who had to pay that tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the interest of the tenant in his holding was personal property, in the same way that the ownership of a lease was personalty. Whenever a person who was in the enjoyment of leasehold property died, and that property passed to somebody else, the new inheritor, whoever he might be, had to pay on the amount as personal property. The landlord's interest in it did not come to be subjected to duty until the landlord died.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: This is not leasehold property.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the two did not come under the charge at the same time. The leaseholder's property was charged when he died; the landlord's property when he died.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am sorry to trouble the right hon. Gentleman once more; but he was understood to say that the Estimates which had been presented to the House do not even now, with the Vote of Credit, represent the expenses which the Government contemplate. It was understood that there would be an Estimate for the expense of protecting our coaling stations abroad. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will explain whether that expense is included in the estimated Expenditure for the year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): No. What I said was that, in describing the Expenditure of this year, my noble Friend (the Earl of Northbrook), in "another place," said that as to future years there might be certain expenditure connected with the protection of our military and commercial harbours for which no provision has been made. I merely made that remark as a caution, and, I think, a very necessary caution. The only item that I referred to as not included in the Estimates was a margin of £200,000 for Supplementary Estimates.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I should also like to ask whether we are to have a Supplementary Estimate for the expenses of Sir Charles Warren's Expedition to Bechuanaland? I do not understand that any provision for this Expedition has been made in the Vote of Credit, nor does it, so far as I can gather, come in the Estimate for the present year. As the Expedition is now doing its work, some provision should be made for the expenditure this year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I am sorry that I have not made myself clear to the right hon. Gentleman upon that point. What I intended to say was that the expense of that Expedition—namely, £500,000—is provided for in the regular Army Estimates.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had answered the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) on the very important question of the extraordinary increase of taxation upon Ireland. They should remember that the taxation pressed very heavily upon that country. It should also be borne in mind that in England the people had the consolation of knowing that it was their own Ministers who put additional taxation upon them; but in Ireland the people knew that none of their Representatives belonged to the Administration, except one Law Officer, who had nothing to do with the imposition of this taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had diminished the case of the Irish Representatives by the very simple and obvious expedient which all Chancellors of the Exchequer adopted when they were mistaken. He had underrated the result of the tax. He had put the figure down at some £900,000; but he (Colonel Nolan) should not be surprised if it amounted to £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. There were £3,000,000 paid on spirits in Ireland, and if they increased the duty 20 per cent he did not believe that would diminish the consumption very materially. The duty was already so high that the people who could afford to drink spirits would go on drinking them, even though they had to pay a halfpenny per glass more. A man would be almost as able to pay 3½d., which would include the increased duty, as he was to pay 3d. The duty would be 2s. There would be 64 glasses in a gallon of whisky, which was sold by the glass in Ireland, and that would come to 2s. 8d. There was no middle money. The publican could not put on a farthing, and therefore he would be sure to put on a halfpenny, so that they were now putting on every glass of whisky in Ireland an extra halfpenny, and that he (Colonel Nolan) considered a very serious thing. This one commodity was already frightfully over-taxed. He did not believe there was too much alcohol drunk in Ireland. He had no doubt that that which was consumed was unequally distributed—that was to say, that he had no doubt that some people drank too much, and that other people were too poor to pay for it, and drank too little. He did not agree with those who condemned the use of alcoholic beverages. The best medical authorities said that a certain amount of alcohol did good, instead of harm; and he must confess that his own experience confirmed that view. He felt it his duty to enter a warm protest against the manner in which Ireland was being treated in this matter. He could understand the reason of it—it all came of the fact of Ireland being subject to England, and of her having no Representatives in the Cabinet. Ireland was not allowed to have any voice in the question of going to war. The question was not submitted to the House of Commons. Members were told that it was unpatriotic to ask Questions, and the result was that Irish Members, even in the House, had no control whatever over the question of peace or war. Not only were the Irish Members without a voice in these matters, but also in matters so closely affecting them as the imposition of increased taxation upon commodities in general use in their country. The Government picked out one of those commodities and put the heaviest tax upon it. Already it was taxed 150 per cent over its value, and that tax was now to be increased to 300 per cent. Every time a man in Ireland drank a glass of whisky he would have to thank the English Prime Minister, the English Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the English Cabinet, who had brought up its price to such an enormous amount by their taxation consequent upon their spirited foreign policy. He did not wish to raise a quarrel with the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who really represented the agricultural interest so well in that House. The hon. Member said it was a pity that when any agricultural question was introduced the interests of England, Ireland, and Scotland should appear to be opposed to each other. He (Colonel Nolan), however, thought that beer was getting on better than spirits. He had lived a sufficient length of time in England to know that the English people were fond of their glass of beer. He did not think it was as wholesome as whisky; but still he thought that a certain amount of alcohol taken in the form of beer very good and proper. But he wished to point out that the alcohol in beer was only taxed at 40, while that in whisky was taxed at nearly 60. Already they were taxed four times as much in Ireland, in proportion to the population, as they were in England, and it was now proposed to still further increase that enormous disproportion. The result of the action of the Cabinet would only be to make the Irish people more and more feel that they were made to bear the brunt of wars entered into by the Government, and which were not by any means popular in Ireland. The question was not merely between Ireland and England, but between the working classes and the rich; the poor paid nine times as much in the shape of taxation upon their beverages as the rich paid upon their wine. It appeared to him that this was rather a rich man's Budget: certainly it was more an English than an Irish Budget. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had declared that the Wine Duties stood on a special basis, because they were the outcome of Free Trade arrangements with foreign countries. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman objected to the phrase; still he had pointed out that the Wine Duties, as they at present stood, had been fixed in consideration of certain advantages which we had received from the foreign countries in which the wine was produced. If the interests of foreign countries were to be considered, surely the Irish people had a right to demand consideration for their interests. But how did the Irish people know that any representations they made would be attended to? Who had they on the Front Ministerial Bench to speak for them? It was true that they had the Solicitor General for Ireland; but did anyone suppose for a moment that that hon. and learned Gentleman ever interfered in any question which was not of a legal character? He would reserve his opinion with regard to the question of taxing corporate property, simply observing that that proposal might be made most oppressive in Ireland. If it had not been for some answers the right hon. Gentleman had given to the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) and the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold)—whom he (Colonel Nolan) had been astonished to find introducing this question—it would have seemed to him that such bodies as looked after the schools in Ireland would have to carefully consider this matter. He was glad to hear that on that question Ireland had nothing to fear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He trusted he was not mistaken, and that in Ireland all those who managed those schools would find that they had no additional taxation to pay.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that the Irish people would gain rather than the reverse in the matter referred to. With regard to the larger question of the duties upon beer and spirits, he would ask hon. Members to defer raising it to the second reading of the Bill which would have to be founded upon the Resolutions. The Government were anxious to get the Resolutions passed, so that the Bill might be set up without delay.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, the right hon. Gentleman had given them figures with regard to taxation of property covering four different series of years. Would the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to lay upon the Table of the House, in the form of a Return, the figures he had given them with the details showing how those figures had been arrived at? In those figures he had contrasted the incidence of taxation on articles of consumption with the incidence of taxation on property. He had assured the Committee that the figures had been decided upon after mature consideration, and might be relied upon as perfectly correct. He (Mr. Paget) did not dispute that; but it would be interesting to go into details as to how the figures were made up. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to be good enough to lay on the Table of the House a Return of the groups of figures showing those details. There was one other question he should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman's explanation a few minutes since was that he proposed to place real and personal property, so far as it was possible, on a footing of perfect equality; and he (Mr. Paget) wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was prepared to introduce that equality in the manner in which the Income Tax was levied on realty and on personalty? On real property Income Tax was levied on gross rental; but not so on personalty. The point was one to which he wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman; because, to be consistent, and to put those two descriptions of property on a footing of perfect equality, they must make a change in the incidence of the Income Tax as it fell at present upon land and upon houses. It fell at present upon the gross rental without any deduction; and in the case of land, and still more in the case of houses, the actual receipts could never reach within a very large percentage of the gross rental on which the Income Tax was charged. If those two descriptions of property were put upon a perfect footing of equality, and funds and railway shares and other stocks were taxed in the same way as the rental of houses and land, a change must be made in the incidence of the tax upon realty. The right hon. Gentleman had recommended the farmers of England to show their accounts, and to allow their Income Tax to be charged upon the profits which they really made. Would he extend that to those farmers of England who were yeomen farmers, owning their own land, so that they might treat the whole of their interest in that land as a business? Would they be allowed, where they could show a profit, to be charged Income Tax on that profit; and where they could show that there had been no profit at all, would they be permitted to enjoy the same treatment that was given to the owner of every other kind of property? The man who farmed his own land had to pay the landlord's tax whether he made a profit or not. The only exemption he could claim was that of the occupier's tax.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, that was a question as to the incidence of Schedule A, and he had no reason to believe that the incidence of Schedule A was not perfectly proper. He was not prepared to admit that it should be altered. As to the other question put by the hon. Gentleman, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had recommended that the incidence of taxation on real property on transference on the occasion of a death should be made as far as possible the same as the incidence on personalty; but he had said nothing about the Income Tax. As to the Return asked for, he thought it might be possible to present it; but he would consult those who would be able to help him in framing it. It would certainly be a useful Return.

MR. MAC IVER wished to raise an emphatic protest against that portion of the Budget which related to the Spanish Wine Duties. He hoped to state at greater length on another occasion his objections to the proposal to reduce those Spanish Wine Duties, and all he would say now was that it was most mischievous, and that it would have to be very carefully considered. It was part of a general commercial arrangement with Spain which would, no doubt, suit the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) and certain other hon. Members who represented constituencies in the North of England; but it would not suit the country at large. They would not get equal freedom under it, and if such proposals were carried out it would be found that they would place their Australian Colonies under a very great disadvantage with regard to their wines. Under those circumstances, he felt bound to enter an emphatic protest.

MR. CAUSTON wished to know whether the extra 1s. per barrel added to the Beer Duty was to be regarded merely as a temporary war tax or as a permanent increase of the duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he did not propose to make any limitation. The Resolution would simply raise the Beer Tax from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 3d. per barrel.

MR. BIGGAR wished to offer a few remarks upon the Budget generally, and especially upon that part of it which dealt with those unfortunate liquor taxes. At present they had nothing to do with the question as to whether the money was really to be spent or not; or whether, if spent, it was to be spent in the Soudan or in Afghanistan. All that they had to deal with that night was the fact that a certain amount of money had to be raised, and the question was whether the way in which it was proposed to raise it was the right way. There was one part of the Budget of which he very much approved—that part which related to what were called the Death Duties. He did not know whether it was likely to be carried out in its details in a judicious way with which no fault could be found, especially in the provision which related to corporate property; but he confessed that it seemed to him that this business of the Death Duties was likely to be a pretty smart tax upon the owners of landed property. He had not much sympathy with hon. Members who represented the landowning interest; but he thought they were now going to bear quite as large a proportion of the taxation as they were entitled to bear. The Death Duties had been threatened for a very long time; but now it seemed as though, in what was probably a temporary Budget, put on for a special object under exceptional circumstances, a change was to be made in the Death Duties which was almost certain to be permanent, and a tax would be put on the owners of real property which they would never get rid of. There was no great harm in laying it upon the landowners pretty heavily. The hon. Member for Mid Somerset (Mr. R. H. Paget) had raised a very important question with regard to the incidence of the Income Tax—namely, the question whether it should not be charged upon gross value instead of upon net value. He (Mr. Biggar) had always thought that the Income Tax should be raised upon the net value because the difference between the net income and the gross income never went into the pocket of the person who paid the tax upon it. At the same time, secured property, such as land was supposed to be, ought to pay a higher rate than uncertain incomes made out of personal exertions. Still, on the whole, under the present Budget he thought the owners of property would have to pay quite up to the limit of their fair share. As to the indirect taxation proposed under the Budget, he was glad to see some portion of the proposals; but he was very much dissatisfied with other parts. He was glad to find that no increase of taxation had been put on tea and coffee, and that sort of thing; and as to the increased taxation upon alcoholic drinks, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have imposed something upon non-alcoholic drinks. Tea and coffee already paid duty to a certain extent, and there were a good many other so-called non-alcoholic drinks which had a proportion of alcohol in them. He remembered a story told of an old lady named Mrs. Brown, of Armagh, who used to sell a teetotal cordial, and when the summer came round, and it grew very hot, she used to put a very considerable amount of whisky into it, for otherwise it would not keep in the warm weather. She used to say that in summer time it sold remarkably well. There was a great number of those things made, and he believed that most of those so-called non-alcoholic drinks contained spirits of wine, or alcohol of some sort. Spirits of wine paid less duty than brandy or whisky, and therefore the sellers of those drinks did doubly well. As to the Beer and Wine Duties, it was a perfect scandal that wine should be charged at a lower rate in proportion to its value and alcoholic strength than whisky or brandy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that about 1*s.* 9*d.* duty was charged on wine, the total value of which was 7*s.*, while whisky, which was worth untaxed about 4*s.* a-gallon, had to pay 12*s.* per gallon duty. On wine, therefore, there was only a 25 per cent duty upon the full value, while on whisky there was a 75 per cent duty upon the full value. As to beer, it was proposed to raise the duty by another 1*s.* for every 36 gallons, while on whisky the duty was to be raised by 2*s.* upon every gallon. According to the estimate of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), the alcoholic strength in 36 gallons of beer was equal to 500 proof, or the same alcoholic strength as was to be found in five gallons of proof whisky. Yet the 36 gallons of beer were only to pay 7*s.* 3*d.* duty, while the five gallons of whisky were to pay £3 duty. In other words, the alcoholic strength of five gallons of proof spirit was to pay, in the case of beer, only 1*s.* of increased duty, while in the case of whisky it was to pay 10*s.* of increase. No defence could be offered for such inequality of treatment, and he had not the least doubt that when the Scotch Members came to discuss the question, an endless amount of time would be occupied over those Whisky Duties, with the probable result that the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have to be amended. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to wine was perfectly unreasonable and preposterous, for it practically amounted to giving a bounty to foreign producers, and levying a special tax upon home manufacturers. Free Trade was all very well; but Free Trade to their opponents, and a heavy tax on home productions, was contrary to all their ideas of what Free Trade ought to be. That part of the Budget ought to be amended, and if it were not amended pretty soon, a great deal of time would have to be spent in discussing it, and the result would not be at all satisfactory to the Government. The explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not by any means satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that it had never been the custom to charge duty on whisky, beer, and wine in proportion to their alcoholic strength or value. But that was no reason why it should not be done. The House ought to take advantage of the present Budget to try to put the relative taxation of those different articles on a more reasonable, satisfactory, and honest foundation. He (Mr. Biggar) certainly must protest against the manner in which the duty was laid upon Irish spirits.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not wish the opportunity to pass without entering his protest against the increased duty which was to be put on whisky. It was a tremendous increase, considering the way in which that article had been surcharged with duty since 1853 to the extent of 200 per cent. Formerly the duty was levied, in the case of beer, upon dry malt; and it was not so obvious then as now what was the amount of duty according to alcoholic strength. But now it was found that the duty on beer, according to the alcoholic standard, was 1s. 10d. per gallon of proof spirit, or for as much alcohol as would be found in a gallon of proof spirit. But there was a duty of 10s. per gallon upon Irish whisky, or upon the same amount of alcohol as went free, in the case of beer, for 1s. 10d. Beer was the national beverage of England; but whisky, in one form or other, was the national beverage of Scotland and Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said it was not the rule to apply the same scale of taxation to those articles. It certainly was not the rule, because before 1853 the duty on malt raised the tax on beer to about 12s. 6d. per gallon of alcoholic strength, and since then the duty had been reduced from 12s. 6d. to 1s. 10d. per gallon on the proof spirit contained in beer, while the duty on whisky had been raised in Scotland from 3s. 6d. to 10s. per gallon, and in Ireland from 2s. 8d. to 10s. per gallon. That was a measure of injustice such as had not been equalled in the Budgets of any other country in Europe. The ordinary consumption of whisky in Ireland was 6,000,000 gallons for 5,000,000 people—not a large consumption, certainly, for it showed that less alcohol was consumed in Ireland than either in Scotland or England. England consumed the largest quantity, and yet Ireland was to be the most heavily taxed, and was to be made to pay for this war, which she had had no hand in bringing about. The taxation on this one article alone in Ireland, without the addition which it was now proposed to place upon it, cast upon the country a burden of no less than £300,000 a-year. But what was the addition to be made to the duty upon beer in England? It was only 1s. on every barrel of 36 gallons, which was exactly one-third of 1d. on each gallon. Was not that oppressive in the last degree? Did it not betray an absolute cowardice on the part of the Government, when they ought to do justice between the people of the Three Kingdoms? Was there any reason why alcohol, in whatever vehicle it might be contained, ought not to pay the sum which it paid before the year 1853? What was the object in changing the old arrangement? The right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer when the change was made, and that right hon. Gentleman then explained that the change was to establish equality of taxation. But there never was a greater or a grosser fallacy palmed off upon the House than was put forward on that occasion. The duty on spirits was raised by degrees from 2s. 8d. per gallon in 1853 to the 10s. per gallon at which it stood now. The English papers had leading articles about the poverty of the Irish, and attributed it to their improvidence; but the fact was that the people of Ireland were poor because they were taxed most outrageously. Any people in the world would be impoverished if they were treated in the same manner. The true way to measure the income of a country was to consider the amount of its Income Tax. The taxation of Great Britain, which included Scotland as well as England, would be measured by an Income Tax of 2s. 6½d. in the pound, while the taxation of Ireland could be measured by this—that it would take no less than 5s. 3d. in the pound to discharge Ireland from Imperial taxation, whereas before 1853, 3s. in the pound would have discharged her from Imperial liabilities. He entered a solemn protest against this species of legislation for raising the taxes of the country. Ireland was miserable and poverty-stricken, and that fact was due solely and entirely to the unfair rate of taxation cast upon her in proportion to her means when compared with England.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he did not know whether it was intended to take a division; but if so, he should certainly vote against the Government, not because he had any particular objection to whisky being taxed, for the people who were taxed would get something from the taxation. The people of Ireland were to be taxed more heavily upon whisky, and they would feel it more heavily; but that was because they consumed more of it. But why was that increase to be made at all? The Government were going to tax alcohol in Ireland because of their taste for blood; and he, as an Irish Catholic, thought it his duty, and the duty of every person who had the interest of humanity at heart, to object to taxation which was merely for the purpose of enabling the Government to carry on a war. Much as the people of Ireland were opposed to wars and to the unnecessary shedding of blood, he believed they would consent to have their bread heavily taxed, provided that would bring about what a good many people in Ireland devoutly wished—the end of English rule, by plunging Great Britain into a war with some first-rate Power which would bring it to a sense of its duty to Ireland. But to tax the people for such a war as the Government had been waging in the Soudan and in the Transvaal, and for paying the expenses of such Expeditions as that of Sir Charles Warren, who had been sent out to try and get up another war with the Boers, in obedience to the Jingo spirit of the country—to do that, in his opinion, was nothing short of an infamous swindle. He hoped a division would be taken, not only as a protest against the proposed increase of taxation, but to show that Ireland did not derive any benefit whatever from, and was entirely opposed to, any extra taxation merely to enable the Government to carry on bloody and unnecessary wars.

Question put, and agreed to.

(1.) Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say) :

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of Eight Pence ;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act,—

In England, the Duty of Four Pence ;

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Duty of Three Pence ;

Subject to the provisions contained in section one hundred and sixty-three of the Act of the fifth and sixth years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter thirty-five, for the exemption of persons whose income is less than One Hundred and Fifty Pounds, and in section eight of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876," for the relief of persons whose income is less than Four Hundred Pounds.

(2.) Resolved, That Stamp Duties, at the like rates as are charged on Affidavits and Inventories by "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881," shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of property to be included therein according to the value thereof :

The Property to be included in the account shall be property of the following description, viz. :—

(a.) Personal estate and effects of any person dying on or after the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, which by reason of the local situation thereof are not included in any Affidavit or Inventory under the provisions of "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 ; "

(b.) Money which, by virtue of the will of any person dying on or after the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, or upon the death of any person so dying, either immediately or after any interval, is or becomes charged upon or made payable out of any real estate otherwise than by way of annuity ;

(c.) Real estate directed to be sold by the will of any person dying on or after the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, or held on trust for sale upon the death of any person so dying :

Provided, That, in respect of any legacy payable out of, or a succession to, any property according to the value whereof Duty shall have been paid on an account in conformity with this Resolution, the Duty at the rate of one pound per centum imposed by the Act of the fifty-fifth year of King George the Third, chapter one hundred and eighty-four, or "The Succession Duty Act, 1853," shall not be payable.

(3.) Resolved, That, in addition to the Successions chargeable with Duty under section ten of "The Succession Duty Act, 1853," there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every Succession as defined and mentioned in that Act, upon the death of any person dying on or after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, where the Successor shall be the husband or wife of the predecessor, a Duty at the rate of Three Pounds per centum upon the value of the interest of the Successor :

And, in addition to the Duties chargeable under such section, there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every Succession therein referred to, upon the death of any person dying on or after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, according to the value thereof, the following Duties (that is to say) :—

Where the Successor shall be the lineal issue or lineal ancestor of the predecessor, a Duty at the rate of Two Pounds per centum upon the value of the interest of the Successor ;

In all other cases mentioned in such section, a Duty at the rate of Three Pounds per centum upon the value of the interest of the Successor :

Provided, That no Duty in conformity with this Resolution shall be payable upon the interest of a Successor in Leaseholds passing to him by will or devolution by Law, or in proerty included in an Account according to the value whereof Duty is payable under "The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881," or in conformity with the foregoing Resolution, nor shall such Duty be payable by a person in whom any reversionary property expectant on death shall be vested by alienation for value in money or money's worth prior to the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five.

Provided also, That where by means of any disposition, personal property is so settled that it, or the income thereof, is to be enjoyed upon the death of any person dying on or after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five by the husband or wife of the predecessor during his or her life, or for any other limited interest, and subject thereto by any lineal issue or lineal ancestor of the predecessor for an absolute interest, the Duty of Three Pounds per centum upon the value of the property shall be immediately charged upon and paid out of such property; and, by the payment of such Duty, any claim to Duty under "The Succession Duty Act, 1863," and in conformity with this Resolution, upon the Succession of the said lineal issue or ancestor, shall be deemed to have been fully satisfied and discharged.

(4.) Resolved, That, in addition to the Legacies chargeable with Duty under the Act of the fifty-fifth year of King George the Third, chapter one hundred and eighty-four, there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every Legacy by the will of any person dying on or after the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, charged upon or made payable out of any real estate, and given by way of annuity to or for the benefit of the husband or wife of the deceased, a Duty at the rate of three pounds per centum on the value thereof:

And, in addition to the Duties chargeable under the said Act and specified in the Schedule thereto, there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every Legacy charged upon or made payable out of any real estate and given by way of annuity by the will of any person dying on or after the first day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, or upon the death of any person so dying, either immediately or after any interval, the following Duties (that is to say):—

Where the same is given to or for the benefit of any lineal issue or lineal ancestor of the testator, a Duty at the rate of two pounds per centum on the value thereof;

In all other cases specified in the said Schedule, a Duty at the rate of three pounds per centum on the value thereof.

(5.) Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, and making a permanent addition to the Public Revenue, there shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of all Real and Personal Property which shall have belonged to or been vested in any body corporate or unincorporate during the yearly period ending on the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, or during any subsequent yearly period ending on the same day in any year, a Duty at the rate of Five Pounds per centum upon the annual income or profits of such property accrued to such body corporate or unincorporate in the same yearly period, after deducting therefrom all necessary outgoings:

Subject to exemption from such Duty in favour of property of the description following (that is to say):—

- (1.) Property vested in or under the control or management of "The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works or Public Buildings," or "The Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues;"
- (2.) Property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied exclusively for the benefit of the public at large, or of any county, shire, borough, or place, or the rate-payers or inhabitants thereof, or in any manner expressly prescribed by Act of Parliament;
- (3.) Property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied exclusively for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts;
- (4.) Property of any Friendly Society or Savings Bank established according to Act of Parliament;
- (5.) Property belonging to, or constituting the capital of, a body corporate or unincorporate established for any trade or business, or being the property of a body whose capital stock is so divided and held as to be liable to be charged to Legacy Duty or Succession Duty;
- (6.) Property realised or acquired with funds voluntarily contributed to any body corporate or unincorporate within a period of thirty years immediately preceding;
- (7.) Property acquired by any body corporate or unincorporate within a period of thirty years immediately preceding where Legacy Duty or Succession Duty shall have been paid upon the acquisition thereof:

The term "body unincorporate" in this Resolution shall include every unincorporated Company, Fellowship, Society, Association, and Trustee or number of Trustees to or in whom respectively any real or personal property shall belong, in such manner or be vested upon such permanent trusts that the same shall not be liable to Legacy Duty or Succession Duty.

(6.) Resolved, That, in lieu of the Stamp Duties payable upon any security for money given to a subscriber in respect of a loan raised by any Company or Corporation and transferable to bearer, and upon a Foreign Security transferable to bearer, there shall be charged a Duty at the rate of one shilling for every ten pounds, and also for any fractional part of ten pounds of the money thereby secured:

And, in lieu of any other Stamp Duties, there shall be charged upon a Security given in substitution for a Security duly stamped a Duty at the rate of six pence for every twenty pounds, and also for any fractional part of twenty pounds of the money thereby secured :

The term " Foreign Security " shall have the meaning assigned to it by the Act of the thirty-fourth and thirty-fifth years of Her Majesty's Reign, chapter four, and shall also include a Security which, though originally issued to the holder out of the United Kingdom, is offered by him for subscription, and given or delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Motion made, and Question put,

" That, in lieu of the Duty of Excise now payable on British Spirits under the Act of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of Her Majesty's Reign, chapter one hundred and twenty-nine, there shall be charged and paid the Duty of Excise following, that is to say :—

For and upon every gallon, computed at hydrometer proof, of spirits distilled in the United Kingdom, the Duty of twelve shillings ;

and so in proportion for any less quantity."—
(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

The Committee divided :—Ayes 109 ; Noes 27 : Majority 82.—(Div. List, No. 143.)

(7.) Resolved, That, in lieu of the Duty of Excise now payable on British Spirits under the Act of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of Her Majesty's Reign, chapter one hundred and twenty-nine, there shall be charged and paid the Duty of Excise following, that is to say :—

For and upon every gallon, computed at hydrometer proof, of spirits distilled in the United Kingdom, the Duty of twelve shillings ;

and so in proportion for any less quantity.

(8.) Resolved, That, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now payable on Spirits, there shall be charged and paid the Duties following (that is to say) :

For every gallon computed at hydrometer proof of spirits of any description (except Perfumed Spirits) including Naphtha or Methylic Alcohol, purified so as to be potable, and mixtures and preparations containing Spirits.	£ s. d.
For every gallon of Perfumed Spirits.	0 12 4

(9.) Resolved, That, in lieu of the Duty of Excise now payable under the Inland Revenue Act 1880, in respect of Beer brewed in the United Kingdom, there shall be charged and paid the Duty of Excise following (that is to say) :—

Upon every thirty-six gallons of worts of Beer of a specific gravity of one thousand and fifty-seven degrees, the Duty of Seven Shillings and Threepence ;

and so in proportion for any difference in quantity or gravity :

And, in lieu of the Drawback of Excise now payable under the Inland Revenue Act 1880, in respect of Beer exported from the United Kingdom to Foreign Parts as merchandise, or shipped for use as ships' stores, there shall be allowed and paid in respect of Beer brewed in the United Kingdom on or after the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, a Drawback calculated according to the original gravity thereof (that is to say) :—

Upon every thirty-six gallons of an original gravity of one thousand and fifty-seven degrees the Drawback of Seven Shillings and Three Pence ;

and so in proportion for any difference in quantity or gravity.

(10.) Resolved, That, in lieu of the Duties of Customs now payable on Beer, there shall be charged and paid the Duties following (that is to say) :—

For every thirty-six gallons of Beer of the description called Mum, Spruce, or Black Beer—

Where the Worts thereof were before fermentation of a specific gravity,	£ s. d.
Not exceeding one thousand two hundred and fifteen degrees.	1 10 0
Exceeding one thousand two hundred and fifteen degrees	1 15 0

For every thirty-six gallons of Beer of any other description—

Where the Worts thereof were before fermentation of a specific gravity of one thousand and fifty-seven degrees	0 7 6

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Duties of Customs now chargeable upon Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say):

Tea . . . the pound . Sixpence."

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he should like to hear what answer the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to make to the observations which he (Mr. A. O'Connor) addressed to the Committee a short time ago. In the year 1869, when the importation of tea amounted to 139,000,000 lbs., the value of the article was only a little over £10,000,000. In 1883, when the importation had risen to 222,000,000 lbs., the value was only £11,500,000. That was to say, the amount of capital invested only increased by about 8 per cent; but the amount of tea on which the tax was raised had increased from 139,000,000 to 222,000,000 lbs. There was an increase of 70 per cent in the amount levied, because there was a similar increase in the amount imported as measured by weight. The amount in value had only increased very slightly. Having regard, therefore, to the amount of capital invested and the commerce done there was a virtual increase of the tax equal to about 50 per cent. It was as if the tax was 4d. per lb. in 1869 and 6d. in 1883, though all the time the tax nominally remained the same. To maintain the tax at the present figure was to burden the capital invested in the tea trade with a tax 50 per cent greater than that tax levied in 1869. In reality, the incidence of the tax was very much more grievous on the trade now than it was formerly. He should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he contemplated a reduction of the Tea Duty next year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he was not quite sure whether he followed correctly the whole of the hon. Gentleman's arguments; but he understood the hon. Member to ask whether next year the Tea Duty would be reduced. He certainly could say nothing about what might be done next year with regard to the Tea Duty.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, the point was exceedingly simple. The tax was levied, not according to the value of the tea, but according to its weight. 139,000,000 lbs. were imported 14 or 15 years ago, and 6d. in every 1 lb. weight was charged. The weight had risen to 222,000,000 lbs., and 222,000,000 sixpences were accordingly levied. But there had not been a corresponding increase in the value of the tea; there had not been a corresponding increase in the amount of capital invested; and therefore the comparatively smaller amount of capital was now weighted by the nominally equal, but in reality the greater, amount of taxation. In order to maintain the incidence of taxative equal upon the equal amount of capital, he proposed that for the word "Sixpence" in the Resolution put from the Chair there should be substituted the words "Four Pence."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Sixpence," in order to insert the words "Four Pence,"—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor,)—instead thereof.

Question, "That the word 'Sixpence' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

(12.) Resolved, That the Duties of Customs now chargeable upon Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-six, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say):

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That on a day to be fixed by the Commissioners of the Treasury the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Wine shall cease and determine, and that on and after such day there shall be charged the Duties following (that is to say):—

Wine containing less than 30·1 degrees of proof spirit, and less of such Wine, the gallon . . .	0 1 0
Wine containing less than 42 degrees of proof spirit, and less of such Wine, the gallon . . .	0 2 0

And for every degree of strength beyond the highest above specified an additional Duty of 3d. the gallon."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, this was a Resolution against which the Committee ought to protest. Wine was the only exciseable article on which a reduction was proposed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to increase the duty on spirits and beer, which were chiefly consumed by the working classes, while he proposed to reduce the tax on the drink of the wealthy people.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 26: Majority 72.—(Div. List, No. 144.)

(13.) Resolved, That on a day to be fixed by the Commissioners of the Treasury the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Wine shall cease and determine, and that on and after such day there shall be charged the Duties following, that is to say:

METROPOLITAN STREETS ACT (1867) EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL 137.]

(Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. H. H. FOWLER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Metropolitan Streets Act of 1867 defined the limits in which the police should have certain powers to regulate the traffic of the Metropolis—the radius was four miles from Charing Cross. The population had largely increased since then, and six miles to-day was equivalent to four miles in 1867. The object of this Bill was contained in the last clause—it was that six miles should be substituted for four miles. It was necessary for the safety of the public that the jurisdiction of the police should extend to the proposed increased radius.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT

(Dr. Lyons.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. LYONS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to provide increased facilities for the registration of membership of the College of Surgeons in Ireland. The Bill was approved by the Royal University of Ireland, and by the University of Dublin, and the Members for the latter University had put their names to the Bill. It had also been examined by the Department of the Privy Council, and to meet their views he had undertaken to introduce a few verbal Amendments.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Lyons.)

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR confessed that the Bill had come upon him by surprise. It was now 20 minutes to 2 o'clock in the morning; and in his opinion the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Lyons) would best consult the interests of the Bill and the interests of the House by postponing the second reading till another day. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not had time to master the details of the measure; and certainly the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin were pitched in so low a key that they did not reach the part of the House in which he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) sat. He could say with perfect confidence that, with the exception of the hon. Gentleman himself, no one in the House at the present moment had the least idea of what the Bill proposed. It was too much to ask them at 20 minutes to 2 o'clock in the morning to pass the second reading of a Bill of the meaning and purpose of which they had no idea; and in order to give the House an opportunity of considering the Bill more carefully, and, at the same time, to give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity of making some of them a little better acquainted with his proposals, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Mr. MUNDELLA said, he hoped no objection would be raised to reading the Bill a second time on that occasion. It had been very carefully considered at the Privy Council Office and at the National University. [Cries of "What is that?" and "There is no such University!"] It was a Bill in a very small compass, and with the Amendments the hon. Gentleman (Dr. Lyons) agreed to insert it would be a very valuable measure.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: What does it propose?

Mr. SEXTON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) had not given them any reason which would induce the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate. He (Mr. Sexton) had looked into the Bill, and, so far as he had discovered, it was drawn with a view of shrouding its meaning from the minds of ordinary persons. It might be that by the Bill it was desired to give to the physicians in the Queen's College increased powers. He and his hon. Friends, however, were not disposed to grant the increased powers desired without scrutinizing them very closely. He understood the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) to state as a recommendation of the Bill that the names of the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin appeared upon the back of the Bill. Now, those Gentlemen, however gifted personally they might be, were not so highly regarded by public opinion in Ireland as to be entitled to have any claim they might make in the House of Commons pass without examination.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

The argument of the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) that the measure had been carefully considered by the Privy Council was one that had no great weight with the Irish Members. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would persevere with his Motion.

Mr. HEALY trusted that after what had been said the Government would not press the Bill now. All that hon. Members wanted was to understand the Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had acquired the habit of speaking in the House as if he was addressing himself and not the Speaker, consequently it was impossible for hon. Members to understand a single word he said. If the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) would kindly say what the Bill was about they would give it their best consideration; but they certainly could not be asked to pass it without understanding it. He would undertake to say that, if Mr. Speaker himself were to take it and read it without explanation, he would be able to form no opinion as to what it meant.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

INDUSTRIES (IRELAND).

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [24th April], "That the Select Committee on Industries (Ireland) do consist of Twenty-four Members."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Mr. SHEIL said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to move that the Select Committee do consist of 25 Members, and that Mr. Kenny be one other Member to serve on the Committee. He presumed, however, that he would be out of Order in moving that Amendment, as he had already spoken in the debate before it was adjourned.

Sir EARDLEY WILMOT: I move that the Committee do consist of 24 Members.

Mr. SHEIL said, that the Amendment which stood in his name he had already spoken to, and his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had addressed the House upon it at some considerable length. They had understood the other day from Her Majesty's Government that they were determined in no way to give to Irish Members the small concession they asked for—namely, to allow them an addition of one Member on the Committee; and, that being the case, it was the determination of the Irish Party to in no way agree to the appointment of the Committee. Considering the nature of the Committee, six Members to represent the Irish Party was an exceedingly small number. He begged leave to move his Amendment, upon which he should have to take the sense of the House.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-four," in order to insert the words "Twenty-five,"—(Mr. Sheil,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'Twenty-four' stand part of the Question."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment was under a misapprehension when he attributed to the Government resistance to the desire expressed by the Irish Members. On the contrary, they had felt that the matter was one for fair discussion. It appeared to them that the representation already offered to the Irish Members was, on the whole, a sufficient representation; but, inasmuch as there was a feeling among hon. Gentlemen opposite that their number of Representatives should be increased, the Government would offer no further objection to their wishes.

MR. HEALY said, that, in thanking the right hon. Gentleman for this announcement, he could not help making a contrast between the way in which he had met them and the way in which they were met the other night by the Home Secretary.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'Twenty-five' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Ordered, That the Select Committee do consist of Twenty-five Members:—Committee nominated of,—MR. TREVELYAN, MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, MR. SYDNEY BUXTON, MR. COREY, MR.

WOODALL, Colonel KING-HARMAN, Dr. LYONS, Sir HERVEY BRUCE, Mr. WHITWORTH, Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, Mr. THOMAS DICKSON, Colonel NOLAN, Mr. CROPPER, Mr. PARNELL, Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, Mr. ARMITSTREAD, Mr. SEXTON, Mr. EWART, Mr. LEAKE, Mr. JACKSON, Captain AYLMER, Mr. RATHBONE, Mr. MOLLOY, Sir EARDLEY WILMOT, and Mr. KENNY:—Power to send for persons, papers and records; Five to be the quorum.

MOTIONS.

POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACT (ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY).

RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Contract with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, for the conveyance of the Mails to and from the West Indies, be approved."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

MR. STEWART MACLIVER said, he did not object to the Contract, but he wished to correct a statement in the Treasury Minute which accompanied it. There it was said that if Plymouth were the port of departure for the Mails, it would be necessary to post letters from the North "several hours earlier" than if they were despatched from Southampton. That was a mistake, as anyone would see who looked at the facts of the case and understood them. If the packets continued to sail from Southampton and called at Plymouth for the Mails, they would occupy from 12 to 14 hours on the voyage; and that time would be available to the merchants of the North to post their letters later, not earlier, than under the present system. There would be no sense in the application for Plymouth, if it were to be a disadvantage, as the Treasury Minute stated; and the various Chambers of Commerce which had applied for it would never have done so if they had not been convinced of the benefit which must follow the change which he recommended. He was glad the Treasury had taken power, in this new Contract, to adopt Plymouth for embarking the Mails; and he desired that the Postmaster General should avail himself, as soon as possible, of an opportunity to carry out the views which had been repeatedly pressed upon his Predecessor by the commercial classes in the Northern and Midland counties, and would be found equally advantageous to the Colonists, who were interested in a closer union with England as their great centre of trade and authority.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH said, that, from the remarks which has just fallen from the hon. Gentleman, he supposed on the part of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, he trusted that they would insist on carrying out the Plymouth Clause.

MR. KENNY said, that this Mail Contract represented a positive loss to the Post Office. He wished to know whether it was a fact that the amount derived by the Government from the conveyance of those Mails did not cover the amount they paid for the Contract?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: That is undoubtedly the fact. The Contract is not favourable, the amount received for the postage of letters falling far short of the amount paid for the Contract; but, of course, we have to consider the convenience of the public.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: What is the amount?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I think it is about £49,000 a-year.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: What is the loss?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I say about £49,000 a-year, the amount of the total Contract is £90,000 a-year. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Stewart Mac-liver) appears to have quoted from the Minute of the Treasury and not from the Contract. The Contract simply states that the Government shall have the power of calling at Plymouth at a cost of £1,250 a-year; but in the Treasury Minute the Treasury points out that letters coming from the North of England to these packets will have to be posted somewhat earlier if the steamers start from Plymouth than if they start from Southampton. My hon. Friend challenged that statement; but that challenge does not affect the Contract. He does not object to the Contract, but to the statement in the Treasury Minute. The subject will be examined, and I will take care to enter fully into the matter, and to see whether that statement of the Treasury can be relied upon or not. I must say that my belief is that it can. That is an issue that I have no doubt my hon. Friend will allow to be raised at some future time.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was glad to gather from the right hon.

Gentleman the Postmaster General that if the Lords of the Treasury could be shown to be mistaken in the Minute, hon. Members might have what they asked for—namely, have the clause as to Plymouth put into effect. He (Mr. E. Clarke) had only risen to express his belief that they would be able to show that by whomsoever those persons were informed as to delay they were mistaken. Taking into consideration the important reason that time would be saved by this plan, he thought the Government should have no difficulty in adopting it.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not say that I would make any alteration if the statement turns out to be incorrect. It will, no doubt, form an element of consideration; but there may be other matters to consider in deciding the question as to the earlier or later posting of letters.

MR. WHITLEY said, that Liverpool and Manchester considered that by the plan proposed they would have eight hours longer to post their letters. He must say that there was a strong feeling in Lancashire in favour of Plymouth.

MR. SEXTON protested against the manner in which Post Office business was transacted in that House. Here they had a Motion on the Paper for the first time—

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No; it was on the Paper on Saturday.

MR. SEXTON said, that the explanation given, or rather extracted, from the Postmaster General only increased the evil of which he complained. An hon. Friend (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had elicited the extraordinary fact from the right hon. Gentleman that the enormous amount of £90,000 was paid for this Contract, of which £49,000, or nearly half, was a dead loss to the public Exchequer. He would submit to the House that a Contract of that kind involving such a heavy loss to the Treasury was not a thing which should be sprung upon the House. At any rate, the House should not be asked to form an opinion upon it at 2 o'clock in the morning. They had that night heard of a Treasury Minute of which they had never heard before; but the tone of the hon. Member (Mr. Stewart Mac-liver) in his speech was so low, and his words were so inaudible, that when he had finished the House was no wiser as to whom it came from, or to whom it was addressed, nor as to what it contained; so that the information which had been gathered from the hon. Member was not very important. He (Mr. Sexton) maintained that at the time when the Postmaster General gave his annual negative to the appeal made to him by Irish Members for a mere bagatelle of £3,000 a-year to facilitate the conveyance of Mails over to Ireland to suit the convenience of 1,250,000 people, they should not be asked to submit to this annual loss of £40,000 on a West Indian Mail Service without a word. From an Irish point of view, that was a very questionable proceeding. Believing that the House should have time to consider the matter, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Sexton.)

MR. HIBBERT said, he must protest against the statement that this Contract was sprung against the House, because the Treasury Minute had been before hon. Members for 12 days, and everyone had had an opportunity of considering it. The present Motion had been upon the Paper for three days, and he was therefore fully justified in saying it had not been sprung upon the House. If it had not been so late he should have felt bound to make an explanation in moving the Resolution. He might add now, however, that the whole of this Contract had been most carefully considered by the Treasury. It had been before them for some considerable time, and it was only after very close consideration that they had decided upon this Contract. He should like to draw attention to this fact that, for this Contract—that was to say, No. 2 in the Treasury Minute—the Colonies contributed £23,000; and though, no doubt, there was a considerable loss in carrying the Mails, it must be remembered that those Mails went to all their West Indian Colonies, which Colonies contributed a very considerable proportion towards the expense. Taking that into consideration, the Treasury themselves felt justified in contributing something. The service, as proposed in the new Contract, would be an improvement upon the old service. The effect of the change would be to make 12 knots between this country and Barbadoes and the West Indies, the cost being £9,000 a-year more than the old Contract. They would thus get a good service; and a large number of people connected with the Colonies, in these countries and the Colonies themselves, were in favour of the proposal. Those were the grounds upon which the proposal was made. So far as Plymouth and Southampton were concerned, if wrong information had been given, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General and the Post Office Authorities would be glad to make inquiries into the subject, and to make the fullest investigation as to what would really be the best service.

MR. GRAY said, he was sure his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) had no desire to prejudice the inhabitants of the West Indian Islands by refusing to them Mail facilities; but the finances of the Post Office were in such an impoverished condition that it was impossible, according to the suggestion of the Postmaster General, to provide proper postal facilities for people at home, and that was the point to which his hon. Friend wished more particularly to draw attention. The people of Ireland were deprived of the Mail facilities they required on account of the financial condition of the Department, which rendered it impossible to spend £3,000 or £4,000 a-year in accelerating a Mail Service which would serve for 1,000,000 persons in that country. Irish Members were driven into the unhappy position of being compelled to consider whether it would be not advisable to leave the people of the West Indies in the position in which they had been before with regard to the Mail Service, if by so doing they could get a part of this increase which it had been proposed to pay on behalf of the West Indies devoted to the acceleration of the Irish Mail Service. The Irish Members were of opinion that, whether the West Indies got an addition or had a knot taken away from them, a part of this increase should be given to Ireland. He would rather give this money to the people of Ireland than to the people of Barbadoes, much as he respected them. If there was only one knot to give he would support the adjournment of the debate, in order that, if possible, Ireland might obtain a little of it. He would indulge in the hope that the Treasury, with their increased Death Duties, their increased Beer and Spirit Duties, and their other financial arrangements for increasing income, would be able to find the small sum of £3,000 to facilitate the Irish Mail Service. At any rate, in order to give the Government an opportunity, a few days to consider the matter, it would be as well to adjourn the debate.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) would not insist on mixing up the question of the Irish Mail Service with this matter of the acceleration of the Mails to the West Indies. He thought that whenever the Irish question came up for consideration it would be found that, so far as the acceleration of Mails was concerned, Ireland had not been treated illiberally. No doubt, as the Secretary to the Treasury had pointed out, the new Contract would cost £9,000 a-year more than the old one; but the convenience to the Colonists and the people of this country would be greatly increased.

MR. ONSLOW said, the question before the House was the adjournment of the debate, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be going into some old arguments with regard to another matter altogether.

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate, and not the original Motion.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he was only answering arguments which had been used on the Question of the adjournment of the debate. He would, however, confine himself to only urging the House not to agree to the Motion for the adjournment. There was no real opposition to the Motion.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had listened attentively to the discussion which had taken place on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to the Contract for the conveyance of Mails to and from the West Indies; and he desired to say a very few words on the Motion of his hon. Friend for the adjournment of the debate. They had to consider whether it was right or not to decide on the question of this Contract at that hour (2.15), or whether the discussion should be put off to another day. That was the Question really before the House, and to that Question he asked the Members of the Government then on the Treasury Bench to apply their minds. He would ask if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister knew of this Contract! [MR. HIBBERT: Yes; he approves of it.] Did the right hon. Gentleman, however, know that it was to come on that night; and did he know that the question was to be discussed and decided at half-past 2 o'clock in the morning? Of course, anything which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury said was entitled from his own high character to immediate credence; but had it not been for the authority of the hon. Gentleman he should certainly have been bewildered to think that the Prime Minister was a party to the settlement of a Contract involving no less than £45,000 at that hour of the morning. It was a most audacious proposition to say that a Contract of that kind was to be swallowed under such circumstances. He did not think that the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) would approve of the course the Government were taking in this matter; and he would appeal to those hon. Gentlemen who were constantly in attendance in the House, and who watched zealously to see that the various Services of the country were conducted upon an economical scale, as to whether that was a proper time at which to rush through the House a measure dealing with no less a sum than £45,000 of the public money? For his own part, had he not taken advantage of the Order Paper of an hon. Friend beside him he would not have known at all what was going on at the moment in the House; and, with the exception of the hon. Member for Plymouth and the two Members for Liverpool, he ventured to say that the whole House would be perfectly ignorant of the character of the proposal under discussion. That proposal which was being put to the House in funeral silence would have the result of placing an annual charge of £45,000 on the finances of the country. He said it was trifling with the finances of the country, and with the House of Commons, to endeavour to force this measure upon them under such circumstances. He again appealed to hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, in the hope that it would not be left to Irish Members alone to defend the finances of the country from this inroad. It was impossible that the discussion at that time should be as complete and satisfactory as the importance of the subject demanded; and he, therefore, added his appeal to that of his hon. Friend for the adjournment of the debate.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he would appeal to hon. Gentlemen that, having made their protest, they should consider whether it was desirable to persist in their opposition to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury any longer. His right hon. Friend the Postmaster General had arrived at a decision in this matter; and as no serious objection to the Contract had been put forward he trusted the Motion would be agreed to.

MR. HEALY reminded the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that when he sat below the Gangway he was not—on that memorable morning in July—satisfied with making academic protests. He remembered that it was 5 o'clock in the morning on that day when the right hon. Gentleman was moving adjournments of the debate and adjournments of the House. It was not by academic protests that the right hon. Gentleman had obtained his present seat on the Treasury Bench; but he must of course leave it to the right hon. Gentleman to say whether the course he was now suggesting to hon. Members on those Benches was consistent with his former mode of procedure.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Contract with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, for the conveyance of the Mails to and from the West Indies, be approved.

NORTHFLEET DOCKS BILL,

PETITIONS PRESENTED. RESOLUTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY presented Petitions with respect to this Bill, and moved—

"That the Examiners' Certificate of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee."

The noble Marquess said that the Bill was in this position—that it had not been before the House upon its merits, as it had been rejected by the Standing Orders Committee. These Petitions asked for leave to re-introduce the Bill. They were from Gravesend, Northfleet, and from workmen who were members of Associations in the Metropolis. There was a Rule of the House that by a certain day in January a sum of money should be deposited by the promoters of a Private Bill. The money was usually borrowed from some Insurance Company or stockbroker, and repaid the next day. In this case it was alleged that the person whose business it was to negotiate for the deposit being made was so seriously ill in January that the deposit was not paid until the middle of March. There was nothing more than that to justify the rejection of the Bill. The promoters complained that their opponents did not give them any notice of their opposition, but reserved their fire until they got before the Committee, and then the Bill was rejected upon a technicality. It was a Bill in which the inhabitants of the locality took a great interest, inasmuch as in the event of its being allowed to go forward employment would be found for a large number of workmen now out of work at the East End of London, for it was a matter of notoriety that thousands of people in that district, although willing to work, had no work to do, and were prolonging their existence in a state of semi-starvation. It would be extremely advantageous to them if work could be found, and if capital were allowed to be expended upon this work; and it was the wish of the Petitioners that all the obstacles raised against the expenditure of this capital should be removed. There were capitalists who were willing to expend the money. No objection was raised to the Bill by landowners or other persons in the neighbourhood, and the only objection came from the East and West India Docks, which might be called, without any disrespect, the rival shop over the way. The people who were suffering were not so much the contractors, but the thousands of workmen to whom employment would be given. It was by a technicality of the very slightest character that this Bill was not allowed to go forward. He did not wish to cast the slightest censure or blame upon his noble Friend at the Table (the Earl of Redesdale), or upon the Members of the Committee themselves; but it had been well said that all self-imposed rules should be sufficiently elastic to avoid inflicting injury out of all proportion to the irregularity they sought to arrest. Punishment was no doubt, a very good thing; but it should be inflicted with some reference to the magnitude of the offence, and on the right person. But in this case the punishment of stopping these great works was inflicted for a very trivial breach of a technicality, and really fell not on the capitalist, but on the unfortunate men who would be employed. That was the case he had to lay before his noble Friend, and he asked him in this case to temper justice with mercy. It had happened two or three times that these Standing Orders had prevented the investment of private capital, and that at a very critical period. He did not in the least appear in the position of a rebel against the despotism of his noble Friend, but he appeared rather as a suppliant to his mercy; and he exhorted him not to press the technicality in this case, when there were hundreds and thousands of starving men looking with anxiety for the decision of the House.

Moved, "That the Examiners' Certificate of non-compliance with the Standing Orders be referred back to the Standing Orders Committee."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he was sure their Lordships would feel that it was with great regret that he rose to oppose the Motion of his noble Friend. He thought the Rules of the House ought to be supported; and if they could be got rid of simply because they happened to be an inconvenience to one party to a Bill or the other, they would practically be of no use. There was one matter with regard to this Bill which he felt he must bring before their Lordships, and that was that a Bill with this very object was brought in last Session, and was dropped. The same Bill was brought in this Session, and the promoters failed to perform the duty of paying up the deposit money on the day fixed by the Rules of the House, and did not do so until two months after that day. The important question in this case was, Why was not the deposit paid? It was said someone was too ill; but it was clear that those parties who were acting as promoters of the Bill were not themselves actively concerned in providing the means of carrying it on. The Standing Orders Committee before which this Bill came was a strong one, and came to a unanimous conclusion against the Bill; and he believed there was, practically speaking, no instance in which the House had set aside a Standing Order in the way proposed. He thought the decision of the Committee was right; and those who were opposed to the Bill would be put to great inconvenience and expense if they were not supported, as they believed the matter had come to an end.

LORD BALFOUR wished to point out that the Standing Orders Committee came to the decision at the end of March; and if there had been a desire to appeal against it, it should have been brought on before the 1st of May. It would be a great injustice to the other side to reverse the decision after such a long period had elapsed.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN agreed that it was unfortunate that at a time when a great deal of distress prevailed an Order of that House should have, even indirectly, the effect of diminishing the amount of money that might be thrown into the labour market. There was, however, no guarantee that if the Order were reversed the Bill would pass and be carried into execution. The breach of the Standing Order that was committed was a very distinct breach. A deposit which ought to have been made in January was not made until March. Two months, therefore, elapsed, during which the opponents of the Bill naturally believed that it had been dropped. It would be a considerable hardship to the opponents of the Bill if they were now to be suddenly called upon to renew their opposition.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he hoped the House would not feel itself obliged to act in strict accordance with the technicalities of the question. The Committee were, of course, compelled to adjudicate according to the strict letter of the law; but the House might take a broader view, and consider the merits of the case as well as the technicalities, particularly when a considerable amount of work could be found for those who were in want of it.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that six of the Peers who had formed the Committee were present, and that not one of them had shown any intention of receding from the judicial decision to which the Committee came. It was necessary that Committees of that character should, in justice to both parties, act according to the Rules laid down; but they did not consider themselves rigidly bound by technicalities, and considered judicially whether sufficient reason existed for suspending the Standing Orders or not. The noble Marquess asked the House to reverse the decision of the Standing Committee, on the ground that the scheme advocated by the promoters of the Bill would provide employment for certain persons who were now suffering from distress. He would remind the noble Marquess that if money was prevented from going in a certain direction for the employment of labour, it was almost always certain of so going in some other direction, and thus the same result was reached in the end. He hoped that the House would support the Standing Orders Committee in their action in this case.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Earl seemed to treat with great contempt the fact that he had appealed to their Lordships on the ground that if this Bill were proceeded with work would be supplied for those who were starving. He would leave the noble Earl in full possession of that opinion. He was aware of the necessity of supporting technicalities; but, after all, they were not the Alpha and Omega of the matter. In regard to the present case, he would say that the distress which prevailed should make the House pause before determining to adhere rigidly to technicalities. It was said that the course which he advocated would be unfair to the opponents of the scheme; but it should be remembered that its opponents were, after all, only a rival Dock Company. He feared that by a rigid adherence to their rules in this case, and by stifling an enterprize which was said by the inhabitants of the locality interested to be of great importance, they would not increase the people's estimate of the action of Parliament.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY refused to be guided in his conduct in this matter by the ex parte statements of the noble Marquess to the effect that the merits of this scheme were so very remarkable. Anything said on the merits must be an ex parte statement. If he were instructed by the opponents to say that the scheme was a very bad one, and if, therefore, he strongly urged the House to maintain its Rules, he thought that was an argument which would not be listened to by their Lordships. The fact was that the Rules had been laid down for the protection of the public; and if they were good rules, as they were ably and fairly administered by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale), they ought to be complied with.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN observed that his noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) never asked their Lordships to suspend the Standing Orders on the ground of the merits of the scheme; but simply told them that the scheme, if carried out, would give a vast amount of employment, and on that account alone he asked to have the certificate of non-compliance referred back to the Standing Orders Committee. He (the Earl of Milltown) trusted, under the circumstances, that the House would assent to the proposal.

SOUTH AFRICA—METHUEN'S IRREGULAR HORSE—MILITIA LIEUTENANTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HARRIS asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether he will take into consideration the advisability of distributing a few commissions amongst Militia lieutenants now serving with Methuen's Horse in South Africa? The noble Lord said, many of those officers volunteered under the idea that their absence in South Africa would not spoil their chance of getting commissions; and he hoped that the noble Earl would be able to return a satisfactory answer to the Question, and that those who were unable to pass the requisite standard equally with those who were would share in those commissions.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: In addition to the 75 commissions granted half-yearly to Militia candidates, Line commissions have been offered to all Militia candidates who have not been successful in the last and in previous competitive examinations in military subjects, but who have obtained at these examinations the number of marks required to qualify them for commissions, provided that they were under 22 years of age on January 1, 1884. These offers have, of course, been made to any qualified Militia officers who may be serving under Sir Charles Warren in South Africa. Six Militia officers serving with Sir Charles Warren are so qualified. Three of them have already received commissions in Line battalions at the Cape, and three more will shortly be gazetted.

LORD INCHQUIN urged that the War Office would do well to stretch the limit of age a little further.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he was afraid he could hold out no hope that that would be done.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, that it had always been held by medical men at 23 was the age at which they would be most fit.

EGYPT — THE SOUDAN — THE FRIENDLY TRIBES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether, having regard to the announcement made in both Houses of Parliament on 21st April, to the effect that the Forces in the Soudan were to be henceforth considered available for service wherever they may be required, and that the Vote of Credit of £11,000,000 "does not include any provision for further offensive operations in the Soudan," they will give a distinct assurance that ample provision will be made for insuring the safety and regarding the services of the Mudir of Dongola, and of others who have been in active alliance and armed co-operation with the British Forces in the Nile Valley, as well as of the friendly tribes who have joined the British standard at Suakin? said, that there had been a great many massacres in the Soudan, and a large number of people had perished uselessly there. Inquiries had often been made why they were there, and what they were going to do; and now, when the Nile Expedition was pronounced to be a useless failure and their troops were to be retired, when their Forces on the Red Sea were to be held disposable for future events and to go they knew not whither, the whole subject of this Soudan Expedition, in which they had been engaged so long, seemed likely to remain a matter of hopeless mystery, and he supposed they would never know either why they went there, or what object, if any, they had attained. On the 26th of February the noble Marquess behind him (the Marquess of Salisbury) moved a Resolution, one part of which was—

That the policy of abandoning the whole of the Soudan after the conclusion of military operations will be dangerous to Egypt and inconsistent with the interests of the Empire."

Free discussion was debated, and a statement made in both Houses of Parliament.

MR. MORLEY most distinctly declared that the Government was not going to do a little further.

MR. MORLEY said, "The Soudan, but their did hold out no hope of now the Mahdi at done. a Question put

ENBOROUGH said, that an independent been held by medical men

Member, the Prime Minister very warmly disavowed the construction put upon his words, that he contemplated abandoning the Soudan as soon as the Mahdi was overthrown. Nothing had changed in the Soudan. They were still confronted by the power, be it more or less, of the Mahdi; they did not know what were his objects or what his resources; and if they were bound to attack him then in Khartoum, they were equally bound to attack him now. If they did not, it was simply because the hot fit had been succeeded by a cold fit, as it had so often been before in the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and that they had, in fact, got tired of their objectless slaughter of those brave men who had been pronounced on the highest authority to be persons "rightly struggling to be free." The strange point was that throughout the whole transaction they were told that they were not at war. They had been engaged since 1880 in military operations; but they never amounted to war. Mark Twain, in one of his books, described an interview he had with a French gentleman who was about to engage in a duel, and whom he said he found immersed in a profound French calm. But he added that a French calm differed in some material particulars from an English calm, and that it induced the French gentleman to tear his hair, to foam at the mouth, and to break up the furniture. At the time of the interview he was engaged in smashing his last chair. He could not help thinking that the phase in which they had been so long involved resembled the calm in which that French gentleman indulged. The whole policy of Her Majesty's Government in the Soudan and in Egypt seemed to have been simply to take the minimum of responsibility with regard to their dealings in that country. No doubt there was a time, after the bombardment of Alexandria, when the fortunes of Egypt remained absolutely at the disposal of England. Three courses might have been pursued. They might have allowed the Egyptian Government to make itself feared, to hang Arabi, and to establish the old form of Government. He did not say that that would have been a right course to pursue. Then they might have assumed the government of Egypt themselves, and established a strong Government on lines which would have been acceptable to the English people; and the third course—a course which Her Majesty's Government adopted—was to rule under the cover of a Native Prince, to thwart and insult him at every point, to paralyze his influence, to reduce him to a mere cipher, to do as little as possible themselves, but to do that little from behind the mask of their puppet, the Khedive; to allow the finances of Egypt to go to absolute ruin, and the Government to anarchy; to proclaim at every moment their non-responsibility for what was taking place, and then, when the Egyptians showed some signs of independent action, Her Majesty's Government turned against them suddenly with savagery and anger. This third course Her Majesty's Government pursued, and the natural result of their policy was anarchy, ruin every day more profound, and paralysis at the very heart of Egypt. Her Majesty's Ministers, it was true, amused themselves in establishing some form of representative Government in Egypt; but the domestic policy which had been so successful in this country was utterly and absolutely inapplicable on Egyptian soil. In July, 1882, there came the revolt in the Soudan, and, true to their fatal policy, Her Majesty's Government disclaimed responsibility. The Egyptians took the matter into their own hands, and announced their determination of retaking the Soudan; but Her Majesty's Government advised them not to do so. Then followed General Hicks's Expedition to restore order in the Soudan. At first Hicks had some success; but from January to May, 1883, things assumed a different character. The General was shut up in Kordofan, and in November his whole Army of 11,000 men was defeated and massacred. Upon Her Majesty's Government must rest the responsibility for that Expedition and massacre. In the same year the Earl of Dufferin's Mission was sent to Egypt, and the noble Earl recommended that certain parts of the Soudan should be resigned, and that a certain part should be held. The wise counsel of the Earl of Dufferin was never followed, and matters were left simply to drift. A month after the massacre of General Hicks there came another massacre, that of Moncrieff at Tokar, and then the Government seemed to wake up from their attitude of positive neutrality to immediately action for the moment. They determined to evacuate the Soudan, and they declared that the Egyptian Ministers who would not consent to the dismemberment of their country should be dismissed. In February, 1884, yet another massacre took place—Sinkat fell. Public opinion in England was certainly stirred to its depths by that event, and the immediate result was the sending out of the first Expedition of General Graham on the 12th of February. The first Expedition of General Graham to Suakin was immediately after, and consequent upon, the massacre at Sinkat; and the last Expedition of that General was immediately after, and consequent upon, the massacre of General Gordon. Two battles were fought in February and March, 1884—Teb and Tamanieb—and thousands of brave Arabs were killed. It was magnificent on both sides; but it was not war. The result of those battles was the withdrawal of General Graham as fast as possible to his ships. After that five months of inaction took place, and during that time the Government were deciding what further steps they would take. The Prime Minister, in "another place," stated that during those five months the Government were considering what was the best way of getting up the Nile to Khartoum; and he was not ashamed to say that the time was not too long in which to come to a decision upon so momentous a point. On the 23rd of April, soon after Gordon was shut up in Khartoum, Berber was invested. That investment was denied in that House, and in the other. It was said Berber was not in danger, and that the Government were without information which tended to show that relief ought to be sent. On the 10th of June another massacre of 5,000 men ensued, and Berber fell. Then came the Vote of Credit for £300,000, that miserably inadequate Vote. They now knew that £15,000,000 was the sum that had been ruthlessly spilt in the sands of the Soudan. On the 11th of February news came that Gordon had died in defence of Khartoum; so that all the gallant blood of their soldiers was spent in vain, and their gallant opponents were slain in vain, and the Relief Expedition was so much wasted energy and courage. It would have been far better never to have gone there at all. In February General Graham went out once more to Suakin to establish a route from Suakin to Berber, and to co-operate with the Nile Expedition, and join hands with Wolseley, who was on his way to Khartoum. What had been the effect of all that? One objectless battle after another. The best blood of England was sent out to die at Suakin. And they were told now that the whole of that was at an end; that their troops were wanted elsewhere; that the whole of their blood and treasure had been spent in vain; and that this Expedition had ceased. At the beginning of that time there were 10 fortified places in the Soudan; and, besides Hicks Pasha's Army, there had been massacres at Sinkat, Tokar, Teb, Tama-nieb, Berber, and Khartoum. Now, Kassala still remained; and he believed that the garrison of that and Sennaar were the only garrisons which still remained unmassacred. They were going to withdraw from the Soudan; but they had had allies and friends. Among them was the Mudir of Dongola. Were they going to repeat in the Soudan what they had done elsewhere? Would the Government give some assurance that means would be adopted to prevent their Allies and friendly Arabs from suffering because they had helped them? They might have had more help if the Arabs had not feared that they would desert them. They could not by scuttling out of the Soudan get rid of their responsibility to those who had been friendly to them, nor of their responsibility in Egypt. Egypt was their road to India, and from the beginning that had been recognized. If they left Egypt to its fate, it would be at the mercy of France, and Englishmen would not like to see the highways of India in the hands of any Foreign Power. They must, therefore, remain responsible for the affairs of Egypt. If they withdrew, they must do so with their responsibility on their heads. He, therefore, trusted the Government would be able to say that they had made arrangements to protect those who had been friendly to them. The Prime Minister once wrote—

"The curtain has been slowly rising, and what a scene has it disclosed. . . . We look back over this tract of lethargy as over days of ease purchased by dishonour; the prolonged fascination of an evil dream. They have not understood the rights and duties which inseparably attach to this country. . . . They have been remiss when they ought to have been active. They have been active where they ought to have been circumspect and guarded. They have seemed to be moved too little by an intelligent appreciation of prior obligations and of the broad and deep interests of humanity, and too much by a disposition to keep out of sight what was disagreeable and might be inconvenient."

These words were taken from the pamphlet on Bulgarian horrors. Worse horrors, and more directly connected with English rule, had been transacted in the countries of which he had been speaking within the last two or three years. He concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Marquess opposite the Leader of the Opposition, two or three days ago, asked me whether I was prepared to make any communication with regard to the Egyptian policy of the Government? He expressed a wish that such a statement should be made, and asked me whether I could fix a day for that statement. It was a request which the noble Marquess had every right to make, and it came with very great authority from him. It was with regret I said that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, such a statement would be premature, and I declined to make it. I said it was impossible for me, at that time, to make a statement with regard to Egyptian policy. The noble Viscount who has just sat down prefaced the Question of which he had given Notice by reading to us a very long essay—an essay which appeared to me to bear a very strong family likeness to a long speech which he made when the Vote of Censure was moved—a speech which I have no doubt greatly contributed to the adverse vote which fell from your Lordships on that occasion. But in the essay to which I have just alluded the noble Viscount has not stated a single ground for supposing that it would be proper or consistent in me, having declined to answer a Question put to me by such authority as that of the noble Marquess, two days afterwards to go into a statement as to a great portion of our Egyptian policy. I am quite sure the noble Viscount, on reflection, will not be surprised at my not answering the Question he has put to me.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not surprised that the noble Earl opposite should feel stung by the eloquence of the speech we have heard from the noble Viscount near me. I shall not attempt to go into the lamentable history which he has so well sketched. I fully acknowledge that the noble Earl opposite is the master of the time when he will think it right, having regard to the state of public affairs, to explain the policy of the Government. I regret that there should be so much delay in the performance of that task; and I do not believe that the task will be less easy, or the result more acceptable to the people of this country, by reason of delay. The time for balancing the books must come. We must ask ourselves how much blood has been shed; how much money we have poured out on the deserts of Africa; what we have got to show for the blood of our countrymen and others that has been shed, and the money that has been thrown away; and what we have done for the reputation of England? How can we defend ourselves for the treatment of many whom we have induced to risk everything on our behalf, and whom, when the danger came, we left in the lurch? How can we defend ourselves before our countrymen for having repeated the sad story of Candahar and the Transvaal, and allowing garrison after garrison, tribe after tribe, to be defeated? My Lords, this is a terrible account which must be rendered, and the sooner it is rendered the better. At present, if the policy of the Government in Egypt is to be what it seems to be, I am afraid the opinion passed upon it will be that our friendship has been a curse to every tribe and nation to whom it has been offered, because it has always been followed by desertion.

SOUTH AFRICA—STELLALAND.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD HARRIS, in asking Her Majesty's Government, Whether they are in a position to give the House any information as to the course affairs are taking with regard to the settlement of difficulties in Stellaland? said, that he had no idea of raising a debate, as there was not sufficient information to enable him to do so; but he thought it right to move for Papers. He wished to know what progress had been made in discovering the murderers of Mr. Bethell and Mr. Walker; secondly, whether Montsioa's location had been secured to him; and, thirdly, whether Sir Charles Warren's action was tending to secure the trade route in Central Africa; and, if it was, whether that course was to be considered as tending to any scheme of annexation? Gratitude was owing to Mr. Rhodes for the arrangements he had been able to effect, especially after the somewhat precipitous course of Mr. Mackenzie. He believed Mr. Rhodes had brought about a better feeling throughout Stellaland. A few weeks ago it was stated that Mr. Rhodes had suddenly left Stellaland shortly after the arrival of Sir Charles Warren. He hoped that did not indicate any divergence of opinion between Mr. Rhodes and Sir Charles Warren. He desired, lastly, to know whether the Imperial Exchequer was responsible for the sums advanced by Mr. Rhodes for the Government of Stellaland; and, if that were so, whether the Home Government would also be responsible for the debt incurred in Stellaland? He would conclude by moving for Papers.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Papers respecting the settlement of difficulties in Stellaland"—
(The Lord Harris.)

THE EARL OF DERBY quite agreed with the noble Lord that the information was not sufficient to justify him in raising a debate, and, indeed, even that in his own possession was not sufficient for that purpose. The unfortunate deficiency of Papers arose from causes over which he had no control. The cable had been broken, and no telegram had reached the Colonial Office of a later date than the 21st of March. The interruption still continued as regarded telegraphic communication; but a series of despatches up to the date of April 8 had reached him within the last two hours. They were very voluminous, and he had not had time to look into them. The noble Lord's inquiry for Papers was perfectly justifiable; but it would be more convenient if the noble Lord would withdraw his Motion. He should be ready to present the Papers before Whitsuntide, so that there would be ample time for a discussion upon them. With regard to what had passed, he could answer some of the noble Lord's Questions. He could, however, give no answer regarding the arrest and punishment of the men against whom charges of murder had been brought; but with respect to the securing of Montsioa's rights, he knew that was a primary object with Sir Hercules Robinson and Sir Charles Warren, and he had no doubt that whatever Montsioa could fairly claim he would obtain with their assistance. As to the trade route and the security of the line of communication, those were points of which the Government had never lost sight; and, in the new Convention with the Transvaal Government which was come to about 15 months ago, special care was taken to carry the boundary so as not to intercept the line of communication between the Cape and the independent districts North of the Cape. Sir Charles Warren had occupied Bechuanaland with a military force, and had entirely restored order. A Protectorate had been declared, including a large extent of territory to the North, and no armed opposition had been met with; but the question of what was to be done in the future for the country had not yet come before him. It was, in his view, desirable that it should be ultimately absorbed in the Cape Colony, rather than that it should be permanently maintained as a separate State. At the same time, he was not in a position to announce that any immediate annexation would take place. There were various parties to consider, and the Imperial Government could not force territory on the Cape Colony against its will. He need not point out to their Lordships the great inconvenience which would arise if they were required to station a considerable military force in that country. He trusted that before long an organized police would be sufficient for the requirements of the case. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that the affairs of Bechuanaland were a very proper subject for discussion in that House; but it was impossible to discuss them without further information than they now possessed.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON trusted that the Papers which were promised would contain all that information which it was so desirable their Lordships should have upon the subject. It was a serious matter that the cable should be broken at this time; and he would be glad to know whether it would be repaired within a short period of time? His noble Friend (Lord Harris) had referred to another point which the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had not alluded to—the difference of opinion that unfortunately was stated to exist between Sir Charles Warren and the High Commissioner at the Cape. He regretted extremely that there should be any difficulty whatever between two high officers of such character and position, who were discharging functions of so delicate, not to say critical, a nature. He hoped that the Papers would show what the differences were, and how all matters stood.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

WATER COMPANIES (REGULATION OF POWERS) BILL.—(No. 21.)

(The Earl of Camperdown.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the Bill had been very fully considered by the Select Committee to which it had been referred, and he had to thank the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) and the other Members of the Committee for their assistance during the seven days that the Committee sat. He might shortly sketch the effect of the Bill. In future, every Water Company would be obliged to furnish to its consumers a claim or demand note, before the delivery of which it would not be able to enforce its demands. Within 21 days after this note had been delivered it would be in the power of every consumer to object to the whole or any part of the details, and he would be bound to specify what his objections were, and to state the sum he thought he ought to be charged. The amount admitted by the consumer was deemed to be the minimum, and this the consumer was liable to pay forthwith. If he failed, the Company would be entitled to serve a 14 days' notice, after which the supply might be stopped. In regard to the disputed portion of the claim the Company would have to take the case for decision by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. These provisions would apply to the ordinary supply of water, and not to water supplied under some agreement.

A new clause had been placed in the Bill which was of great importance, and which provided that where the owner, and not the occupier, was liable by law or by agreement to the Water Company for the payment of the water rate, it should not be competent to the Company to cut off the supply on any ground whatever. On the other hand, the rate would be made a charge upon the premises, or, as an alternative, the Company might receive it from the occupier, who would be entitled to deduct it from his rent. This would provide against what was a very serious inconvenience now suffered by many poor tenants whose landlord undertook to pay the water rate, but who failed to do so. At present the unfortunate tenants suffered in such cases, and were deprived of the first necessary of life because their landlord and the Company fell out with one another. This would no longer be the case. He believed the views of the Water Companies with regard to the Bill had been very much modified during its passage through Committee, and that they were now convinced the measure was not so unjust or revolutionary as they had supposed.

Motion agreed to: House in Committee.

Amendments (proposed by the Select Committee) made: The Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTION.

LORD DENMAN moved—

"That this House sits on Mondays at Five o'clock in lieu of a quarter past Four o'clock." He had, he said, sat in the House for 27 years under the old system, and had a preference for the old arrangement under which the House never sat until 5 o'clock, rather than for the three years during which, besides, he had seen the present system tried. In the debate on the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) the Leader of the House had said that if the House rose before 5 o'clock, noble Lords would be able to go into the country by the train. He (Lord Denman), before the change, had heard the Motion for the adjournment of the House more often than any other Peer not a Minister, so did not wish the House to rise early. In regard to Mondays, in particular, there were objections to meeting before that hour; but the Law Lords, who on other week-days had, in consequence of the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), sat earlier in the morning, since the change had agreed not to sit till half-an-hour later on Mondays. His own position was this. He had two places in the Midlands, and, whichever of them he happened to be at, he had to sleep five miles from home overnight in order to get to town in time; and he did not like to arrive only to find that the House had adjourned, which often happened.

Moved, "That this House sits on Mondays at Five o'clock, in lieu of a quarter past Four o'clock."—(The Lord Denman.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he thought that before anything further was said they ought to have some further reasons laid before them for the change. He hoped there were not many of their Lordships in a similar predicament to that of the noble Lord.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The reasons will be found in the Railway Time Tables.

On Question? resolved in the negative.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 92.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3."—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

LORD DENMAN, who had the following Notice upon the Paper:—After Clause 12, add:—

"No person convicted under this section shall be entitled to vote at any parliamentary or municipal election, and no lodger in his or her house shall qualify under a lodger franchise so long as he keeps the house; and this disqualification shall apply to every lodger therein."

said, that he could hardly hope to introduce a disfranchisement clause in this Bill; but the Act of 1869 had not sufficiently guarded against the votes of such householders as were proved to exist on the inquest upon the Barton Crescent murder.

LORD BALFOUR said, he hoped the Government would take the opinion of the other House on this Bill, which had been passed by their Lordships on three separate occasions without being submitted to the judgment of the other House. When a Bill containing such clauses as this contained passed their Lordships' House, it would be at least respectful to their Lordships that the opinion of the other House should be taken upon it. Some of the clauses would never have passed their House except on the demand of the Government of the day. He held the opinion, which he thought was shared by many noble Lords, that to pass a Bill like this, year after year, and not take the opinion of the other House, was reducing their Lordships' House to the position of a mere debating society, and placing it altogether in a very ridiculous position. No doubt they would be told that this was on account of the press of Business in the other House; but when their Lordships had passed a Bill once or twice, he thought they should not be asked to do it again until at least the opinion of the other House had been taken upon it. He was strongly of opinion that if the earlier clauses of the Bill stood alone they would have passed without the slightest difference of opinion; and he protested against their being kept back from what he believed to be beneficent operation because of the other clauses which were totally foreign to them, and as to which there were great differences of opinion. For himself, he wished to say that if no decision of the other House of Parliament were challenged on this Bill, and if it was presented again to this House another year, he should do his best to prevent it passing until that was done, and he knew that other noble Lords shared that view with him.

Motion agreed to; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodds.)

SIR JOSEPH PEASE said, he had placed a Notice on the Paper, which had now been there for some time, of his intention to move—

"That it is not expedient to pass any Railway Bill which involves the payment of interest out of capital during the construction of works, pending the introduction of a public measure on this subject, as recommended by a Committee of this House in 1882, especially where such a Bill practically makes the alteration of the Standing Orders of this House retrospective in their action."

In moving that Resolution as an Amendment to the second reading of the Bill, it was scarcely necessary to explain that it was, of course, a direct attack upon the second reading. He would state to the House at once the position in which he stood in regard to this measure. He had taken up the question entirely as a matter of public duty. Whatever might be the opinion of the Railway Association, which he had sometimes represented in that House, he did it without regard to any resolution which they might have come to upon this subject. He had nothing whatever to do with the Railway Shareholders' Association. He was not a member of that Association; but, on the contrary, he had declined to become a member of it, as he felt that his own work was more particularly connected with railway direction and management generally than it was with railway shareholders in particular. He had always maintained that it was the duty of a Railway Director to try and hold the balance as carefully as possible between the traffic senders and the shareholders. He had, therefore, declined to become a member of that Association, which, he believed, had sent out a Circular that afternoon, stating reasons why the House should support him in the Motion he had just made. He had been under the impression that the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) stood first on the list that afternoon, and the proposal of his hon. Friend was a direct negative to the second reading of the Bill. His (Sir Joseph Pease's) ground was a somewhat different one; and probably his hon. Friend would be able to explain the different reasons for opposing this Bill much better than he could. His hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had in 1882 also opposed the Regent's Canal Bill upon the same ground as the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks)—namely, that the operations of this Company would probably result in the closing of the old Regent's Canal, and if that were done that the practical effect would be to close some of the important branches of inland navigation, which his hon. Friends considered to be for the public interest to keep open with a view of benefiting the trade of the country generally. His (Sir Joseph Pease's) argument was altogether different. It was an argument entirely based upon principle, and it had nothing to do with the railway accommodation of the district traversed by the Canal Company. He opposed the Bill, because he considered it to be wrong financially to pay interest out of capital during the construction of works. He would now endeavour to explain the position in which the matter stood, and he hoped that he would be able to lay a clear statement before the House, so that the whole matter might be thoroughly appreciated. The line was about 18½ miles long, and it ran from Paddington along the old Regent's Canal bank—which would be familiar to many Members of the House—as far as Islington, reducing the width of the Canal navigation in certain portions. The Canal was protected, as far as he could see, by clauses in the Company's Act of Parliament. Those clauses were undoubtedly inserted in the first instance, whatever might ultimately become of them, for the purpose of protecting the traffic upon the Canal. At Islington, the Railway divided itself into three distinct lines. No. 1 branched off south to the Barbican; No. 2 branched off north to the Midland and Great Northern Goods Yards; and No. 3, which was the main line, ran eastward from Islington, over Plaistow Marshes, to the Albert Docks. The Act authorizing these lines was passed in 1882, and the ordinary shares authorized by that Act were set down at £8,100,000, and the borrowing powers at £2,390,000; making a total of £10,490,000. Of this sum, £1,500,000 had been relegated to the Regent's Canal purchase, and of that £1,275,000 had already been applied to the purposes laid down in the Act of Parliament. As he understood the present Bill, it authorized the raising of an additional share capital, with the consent of Parliament, to the extent of £660,000, which was to pay interest out of capital during the construction of the works. The total amount of capital involved, which would be handed over to the care of the Directors of the Regent's Canal Company, would thus be about £11,150,000. Now, immediately to the north of this line was the North London Railway, which had cost £3,900,000, and towards which the North-Western Railway Company was a contributor to the extent of £168,000. Over the line of the North London Railway the North-Western Company had power to run, and there were junctions with the Midland, the Great Northern, the Great Eastern, and the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railways, which, together with the North London Railway, all had then access to the Albert Docks. Immediately to the south of the western end of this line, from the Harrow Road, at Paddington, to Aldersgate Street, close to its termination at the Barbican, was the Metropolitan main line, over which ran the Great Western Company. This railway had four lines of rails all the way from St. Pancras to Moorgate Street Station. The Midland and Great Northern Companies ran over two of these four lines of rails, the Metropolitan having constructed them for their special traffic. That line ran parallel with the Regent's Canal line, and had been made at a considerably less cost than the estimate for the corresponding section of the Regent's Canal line. The cost of the three miles of railway had been less than £3,000,000, or about £1,250,000 less than the estimate of the line proposed to be made by the Regent's Canal Company. Where the east end of the Canal lines ran through Plaistow Marshes, there already existed the Great Eastern line, the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway, and the North London line, all being more or less in connection. These were the Companies with which the new line, when made, would have to compete for all its traffic. He did not wish to enter at all into the merits of these railway systems; but they were there already, and they were lines with which the new line would have to compete for the traffic of the locality. After entering upon this competition, could it go on paying 4 per cent? He put it to the House plainly whether they thought it at all likely, judging from past experience, and with the competition of the Metropolitan Railway, that this line would pay the original shareholders? What, however, he particularly objected to was that the House of Commons should take upon itself to guarantee, as it were, 4 per cent for the payment of interest out of capital while the works were in the course of construction. In his humble opinion, the House would not be justified in authorizing the payment of 4 per cent, while the works were being constructed, unless they were perfectly and morally satisfied that after the railway was opened the same rate of dividend would be continued. The sole object of this Bill was to create £660,000, which was to be drawn from shareholders' subscriptions, and then returned to them during the construction of the works, and to be called interest out of capital. Instead of holding their own money, and using it as they liked and as they desired, the shareholders were to intrust it to the Canal Company, and to receive it back again, little by little, as the Directors were prepared to pay what they called interest out of capital during the construction of the works. He could not conceive how any advantage whatever could be obtained by this class of shareholders. There might be some advantage in this process to the financial arrangements of the Directors; but it was absolutely without any advantage, as far as he could see, to the deluded innocents who consented to receive their money back again out of their own capital. The old Canal shareholders got £130 for a £100 share. That, so far as he knew, was a fair and proper arrangement. But there was one curious transaction to which he should like to call the attention of the House, because it showed how some of these schemes were got up. The Canal Directors secured seven years' purchase on their fees, notwithstanding that some of them, as it was stated before the Committee on the Bill, were already 75 years of age. Beyond the Canal shareholders there seemed to be very few shareholders, and the only object the Directors had in bringing the Bill before the House was to secure additional shareholders. He could not find that there were any landowners who wanted the Bill. There might be some Local Authorities in favour of it; but no residents, as far as he could ascertain, were asking for it. In the three years which had elapsed since the Bill of 1882 was passed there had been no shareholders registered who were willing to take hold of the scheme and work out the railway. When the Bill was brought before the House of Commons in 1882 it contained a clause—No. 117—authorizing interest to be paid out of capital. That clause was struck out by the Committee of the House of Commons as a condition precedent to the passing of the Bill at all. That took place on the 23rd of May, 1882, and Clause 201 was put in to provide that no interest should be paid out of capital during the construction of works. On the 20th of July, 1882, the Bill was in the House of Lords; and Mr. Pope, the eminent Queen's Counsel, who had charge of the Bill, in addressing the Committee of the House of Lords, said—

“The promoters of this measure are responsible, and respectable, and enterprising magnates of the City of London.”

True; but the learned counsel went on to tell their Lordships that such a Directorate, and such a scheme, would be abundantly able to raise the sum required (£8,000,000). It must be borne in mind that this statement was made after the clause providing for the payment of interest out of capital was eliminated from the Bill by the Committee of the House of Commons. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair would have a lively recollection of the proceedings of that Committee, as he had happened to be a Member of it. It was, therefore, after the Committee of the House of Commons had designedly and pointedly struck out the clause, and after their Lordships had been assured, as positively by counsel as they could be, that without any such clause the Bill would be in safe and good and rich hands, and that the money would be forthcoming, that the Bill passed the two Houses. Therefore, he alleged that the promoters of the scheme, after this circumstance had occurred, in asking that the decision of Parliament should be set aside, were not keeping good faith with Parliament, seeing that the Bill had been readily accepted by the Company without this clause. A new Standing Order had been passed in 1883 by the House subsequently to the promotion of this Bill. It was proposed by the Committee that there should be general legislation upon this subject. Such legislation had never been attempted. The new Standing Order said that the Committee on the Bill might, in certain cases, if they thought fit, allow interest. The Committee before whom this Company made their proposal was a strong Committee. It had the whole of the facts before it, and went fully into the question, and yet the result was that the clause was omitted. The promoters of the Bill alleged that they were acting in conformity with the Standing Order on the interest question adopted by the House of Commons in 1883. This was manifestly not the case. The Standing Order in question was not retrospective; and, moreover, provision was made that interest should only be permitted when the Committee charged with the inquiry into the merits of the Bill reported in favour of such a practice. In this case, the Committee decided just the reverse; and it would be most unjust to the numerous Canal Companies, and other opponents who then opposed the Bill, if a question of this magnitude, after having been decided by a Committee, where opponents could be heard, was to be re-opened before another Committee, where the same opponents would have no right to be present. This was a case in which the Committee clearly decided that interest should not be paid out of capital. The present Bill was a Finance Bill; and no inquiry as to works, or the position of the Company, or the probability of paying dividend hereafter, had been made, or could be made. As a practically unopposed Bill, it would go before his hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means; but that was not what was intended by the Standing Order. It was intended by the Standing Order that every application of this kind should be thoroughly investigated by a Select Committee, in order to see whether there was a reasonable prospect of being able to pay 4 per cent during the construction of the works, and whether the same amount of interest was likely to be paid after the line was opened to the public. In 1883, under much more special circumstances, the House declined to pass a provision of this kind in the case of a Bill brought in on behalf of the Hull and Barnsley Railway Company to enable them to pay interest out of capital. His hon. and gallant Friend who sat not far from him, the Member for Wycombe (Colonel Smith), stated the case of that Company with great fairness; and although there were special reasons for passing the Hull and Barnsley Interest Bill, the House considered the principle a bad one—namely, the principle of paying interest out of capital, and they declined to pass the measure. The decision come to at that time had, he thought, been amply justified by subsequent facts. He was not concerned in these railways; but he was concerned in maintaining commercial integrity, especially in the railway world; and, looking at this as a matter of principle, he might say that all our great financiers had objected to the proposal to pay interest out of capital. Mr. Hume and Mr. Ricardo were both opposed to it—Mr. Ricardo saying that when the Directors wanted £2 10s. they called it £2 15s., and paid 5s. back again. Sir Charles Wood, Sir

James Graham, and Sir Robert Peel were all opposed to it. He came now to our own times, and there had certainly been some great men who had left the House of Commons for the other branch of the Legislature who were strongly opposed to this principle. What did the Lord Chancellor say on the 26th of June, 1883, in the House of Lords? He said—

"I cannot help thinking that we ought to proceed with great care, for it is a very serious thing to change, without ample deliberation, a Rule founded on the sound principle of letting it be understood that when Parliament sanctions a certain amount of capital it means what it says, and not something else. If you are to permit the deduction of £20 per cent from £100 of nominal capital as a dividend, that will reduce the real capital to £80 instead of £100, and will be a delusion; it is simply returning to the subscriber 25 per cent out of the money which he has nominally invested. He might just as well keep the £50 in his pocket, and let the capital be called £80."—(3 Hansard, [280] 1541.)

The Marquess of Salisbury, who, whatever his politics, was a man of astute intellect in regard to railway matters, and had solved some of the most difficult railway problems that had been brought forward, said—

"Considering the enormous amount of property affected, this is one of the gravest Resolutions this House could pass as regards it. There is an obvious objection which must strike everyone, for it is really a proposal to enable a certain number of investors to practise upon themselves a species of wholly innocent self-deceit, and to take, in the form of interest, what is really a little of their own capital returned to them. This is entirely a question whether the kind of railway, which its friends call a contractor's railway and its enemies call a bogus railway, is a kind of railway which it is desirable to multiply."—(Ibid. 1544.)

Earl Granville said—

"A good many years ago, Parliament came to the conclusion that it was unsound in principle to sanction a nominal payment of interest, which was only a return of a portion of the capital."—(Ibid. 1545.)

Lord Kimberley also said, in the course of the same debate, that the proposal to repeal the law which prohibited the payment of interest out of capital was neither made by nor supported by the Government. Our whole Statute Law was opposed to it, and every Bill passed by Parliament, with this power in it, was a repeal inasmuch of wise and good Statute Law. Our financial laws had been well tried, and were, for the most part, founded on sound principles. They declared that it was unwise and financially immoral to pay interest out of capital. The Limited Liability Companies were prevented by law from paying interest out of capital during the construction of works. Our financial laws had done much to build up the commercial standing of this country. There was no reputation in trade so high as that of an Englishman; and wherever he went he received the highest credit for the manner in which he carried out his financial engagements. To repeal these laws in whole or in part, unless some very good cause were shown, would be an infraction of principle for the sake of expediency; and was there in this case such an expediency as ought to be allowed to conquer principle? Surely, when they were framed upon right principles, these laws ought to be kept as they were. Whenever the House pursued a different course, they established dangerous precedents in regard to the credit of the commercial community. Whenever this plan was resorted to, the House might be quite certain of two things—that the rich and knowing would not make the investment, because they did not see its soundness; but that the poor and ignorant would be led into it. Those who had money to invest, and who were looking out for substantial investments, would not touch shares of this description; and it was only by putting forward proposals of this character that Companies were able to induce poor and ignorant persons, with a little capital in hand, to become shareholders. He did not wish to say anything in any way to hurt the feelings of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Wycombe; but he had mentioned the case of the Hull and Barnsley Railway, and he would refer to it again. When that line was brought out, his hon. and gallant Friend fairly and boldly stated to the House that it was a line which promised 5 per cent to the shareholders. He found, from the list of shareholders, that it was contributed to by persons all over the country—from Hull, Birmingham, London, York, Harrogate, Bedford Square, Nine Elms, Barnsley, Cornhill, Manchester, Easingwold, and many other places, who were described as fish curer, gentleman, broker, spinster, shipbroker, innkeeper, cabinet maker, manager, painter, artist, builder, architect, farmer, engine driver, city agent, bank manager, bank clerk, and cooper. Those were the class of persons who were deceived by these investments; and although in this case, during the construction of works, the shareholders received 5 per cent, in whole or in part, there was hardly a man in Yorkshire who imagined that the line, although paying 5 per cent during construction, would even pay 2 per cent to the shareholders when at work. His right hon. Friend below him, the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), when a similar question to this was raised on a previous occasion, spoke of the shareholders as being able to take care of themselves. He (Sir Joseph Pease) thought he had proved to the House by the list he had read that, in the instance he had referred to, that was scarcely the case; and he, therefore, thought that the law ought to make the matter perfectly clear. Could it be for a moment believed that when this Regent's Canal line, nursed as it was by other lines, was opened, it would pay the dividend proposed to be paid during construction? It was well known that the dividends on all the great railway properties in the Three Kingdoms together were not worth much more than 4 per cent, or, at any rate, not more than £4 3s. 4d. The money invested in railways during the last 10 years amounted to £210,000,000; and if this particular investment was a good one, there could be no reason for supposing that the necessary amount of capital would not be readily subscribed. Nevertheless, out of £280,000,000 of ordinary Stock, £60,000,000 did not pay 2 per cent. The principle was bad; the expediency was bad; but it was worse still when it was as clear as reason could make it that the dividend paid during construction could not be maintained when the line was opened. He had now stated all that he considered it necessary to lay before the House on this subject. He believed that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would contend that competition generally was good; but in this case, as soon as competition was entered upon, they would have no 4 per cent, but if competition became combination away would go all the arguments of his right hon. Friend in favour of competition. He thought he had proved that this Bill was not in accordance with the Standing Order which at present existed; that it went against the decision of their own Committee on the original Bill—that the principle of paying interest out of capital was fictitious and a trap for the unwary, and that no sound undertaking required this expedient; and, therefore, he hoped the House would affirm to-day—as it had affirmed in 1883—a principle which all our leading financiers and statesmen had approved. He begged to move the Amendment which appeared on the Paper in his name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not expedient to pass any Railway Bill which involves the payment of interest out of capital during the construction of works pending the introduction of a public measure on this subject, as recommended by a Committee of this House in 1882, especially where such a Bill practically makes the alteration of the Standing Orders of this House retrospective in their action,"—(Sir Joseph Pease),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY said, that it was altogether impossible for the House to enter into the details of a Bill of this kind. He considered it a monstrous thing that people should not be allowed to take care of their own money, and invest it in such concerns as they thought desirable, and in the mode which they thought most expedient. He understood that the object of this Bill, and of the Standing Order, was to enable a certain class of persons, who had funds at their disposal for investment, to have interest paid to them during the time the works were in progress. But the proposition of the hon. Baronet opposite was that persons who were disposed to make investments of this sort should not have their money returned in the shape which they themselves desired. The hon. Baronet said he wished to protect the poor by throwing the mantle of that House over them, and preventing them from adopting their own independent action in regard to the investment of their own money. If a man chose to say—"I have £100, and I desire to invest it in an undertaking which I think will be profitable; but I cannot forego the income which that £100 now brings me in, and, therefore,

Sir Joseph Pease

I must have some return while the works are being carried out," why should he not be able to give effect to his wishes? It was a principle that was now carried out in the ordinary affairs of life. Take, for instance, the case of a farmer. A farmer had £3,000 to invest in land, and he said—"While the crops are growing I must have something to live upon, and something to enable me to clothe myself with." The proposition of the hon. Baronet amounted to this—that the farmer must invest the whole of his £3,000 in the farm, according to some great principle, and he must not use any portion of it in any other shape, but must wait until the proper time came round for realizing a profit upon his produce. Until that moment arrived the farmer would be required to starve. But, altogether apart from that point, he was prepared to support the construction of this particular railway. He knew nothing more than what the hon. Baronet had himself stated; but he gathered, from the remarks of the hon. Baronet, that the line was designed for the benefit of the working classes. The House was aware that the Commission, in which his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) took an active part, and which contained among its Members some of the highest persons in the land, was engaged at this moment in ascertaining what measures could be carried out for improving the condition of the working classes. He understood that this line was designed mainly for the purpose of connecting certain outlets with the City of London, and to facilitate the conveyance of the working classes, who, of necessity, must be employed in the Metropolis, to and from their homes to certain points at a cheap rate—an object of great importance in connection with the problem of how to house the labouring population properly. The only argument against the line was that there were certain other railways with which it might run in competition. He thought it was a most important object to house the working classes cheaply, and to do so comfortably, with a fair amount of space in their dwellings, and in situations where they could obtain the advantage of fresh air. That in itself was, to his mind, a far higher moral object than the principle of preventing the general public from using their own money as they pleased, by providing that they should receive no portion of it back again for a certain number of years while the works were being constructed. If the House read the Bill a second time, the Standing Order would be fairly considered by a Select Committee upstairs. That was all that the Bill asked; and the hon. Baronet was endeavouring to throw a mantle of Parliamentary prevention over persons who wished to cut their cloth according to their own fashion, and to enter into what, according to their own judgment, they regarded as profitable investments. He trusted that, for the sake of laying down an abstract principle, the House of Commons would not consent to stifle a Bill which ought to be inquired into through the ordinary tribunal established by the House.

COLONEL GERARD SMITH said, he opposed the Amendment, for he contended that the Bill ought to be allowed to go before a Select Committee, instead of being disposed of on the second reading. The object of the hon. Baronet (Sir Joseph W. Pease) was, no doubt, a laudable one; and among other reasons which the hon. Baronet assigned in support of it was the ground that the Bill was unopposed. The hon. Baronet, however, was entirely in error in that respect, seeing that there were four strong Petitions against the measure. He, therefore, ventured to submit that the time of the House would be saved by allowing the Bill to go to a Committee upstairs in the usual way, instead of fighting it on the second reading.

SIR WHITTAKER ELLIS said, he wished to make one or two remarks upon the Bill, and upon the Amendment proposed by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Joseph Pease). The hon. Baronet appeared to take exception to the principle of paying interest out of capital while an undertaking was in the course of construction. Now, he (Sir Whittaker Ellis) submitted to the House that there was no great undertaking in this country which did not pay interest during the construction of works. Why was a railway to be treated differently from a public street? If the Board of Works were making a new street, they raised the money to pay the cost of that street, and to make provision for the poor who were unhoused by their operations, and to compensate others who were disturbed in their business arrangements, and the money so raised paid interest until the new street was opened. He ventured to say, if the Board of Works were to propose not to pay interest until a new street was opened, they would find that it would be necessary to pay a very much higher rate of interest on the money required, or they would have to issue their bonds at a much lower rate than they were able to do under present circumstances. Then, again, take the case of the new block of public buildings which Her Majesty's Government intended very shortly to commence. He took it that the Government would have to obtain the money necessary for the erection of the new offices from the public, and that they would pay interest upon the money they obtained while the buildings were being constructed. In that case the principle was entirely analogous, and he could not understand why the Amendment of the hon. Baronet had been placed on the Paper. He had been appealed to by a great many persons to vote against the present Bill, and he had written to some of them to know why they did not wish the Bill to pass in its present form. They told him that if interest was to be paid out of capital while the works were being constructed there would be a great many more railways laid down than there were at present. Now, he did not know whether the House or the public would care to prevent the construction of great railways; and certainly it would be a monstrous thing that a railway should be treated differently to other undertakings of a similar character. If a man built a house, he had to use his capital during the construction of that house; and if he lost the interest on the money he was thus utilizing, if he understood finance in a proper way, he would necessarily add that lost interest to the cost of the house. With the provisions that were contained in the amended Standing Order, No. 167, there was no reason whatever why this or any other railway should not be allowed to pay a reasonable rate of interest while it was being constructed, and it would be a great injustice if the line were not permitted to be made. The clause in the Bill provided that only 4 per cent per annum should be paid; and it would be monstrous to prohibit this railway, or any other railway, from paying interest in that way during the progress of the works. There was one other practical point which he wished to put to the House; and it was that if they debarred this Railway Company from paying interest and adding it to capital during construction, they would compel the Company to issue their bonds and securities at a very much lower rate per cent than they would otherwise obtain for them. What he meant was that, instead of getting 90 per cent for their issue, they would have to take 80. He opposed the Amendment of the hon. Baronet, because he thought it was undesirable that public enterprise should be checked for the benefit of the shareholders of the large existing undertakings.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN said, he rather regretted that his hon. Friend behind him (Sir Joseph Pease) should have thought it necessary to move this Amendment. He knew that his hon. Friend was a man of great public spirit, and he was sure that he was controlled by a sense of duty. But at the same time he thought he would be able to show that the course proposed by his hon. Friend was inconvenient, and would be attended with considerable disadvantage. They were not now dealing with one of those bogus Companies about which his hon. Friend was so very anxious. This was a very large and important concern, involving a capital of something like £10,000,000, and it was intended to connect the whole of the Docks at the East End of London with the Great Northern, the Midland, and the North-Western Railways, and therefore it was an enterprise of first-rate importance in regard to the convenience of trade. There was another consideration which at that moment was not altogether unworthy of the attention of the House. If this Company went on and capital was raised, a very large amount of employment would be given to the working classes of London; and just now, when there existed much depression of trade, it would be a serious thing to throw any obstacle in the way of such employment being afforded. What was the reason his hon. Friend proposed that day to take the unusual course of refusing to allow a Select Committee to consider the provisions of this Bill? It was, he said, because the Company proposed to pay interest out of capital. The hon. Member then, was proposing by a side-wind reverse the solemn decision of the House, because the whole question of whether such Companies should be allowed to pay interest out of capital was decided in June, 1883, when, by a majority of eight, the House passed the amended Standing Order permitting that practice. It was quite true that about a fortnight later the Hull and Barnsley Railway Bill was thrown out on the second reading; but that was because the Hull and Barnsley Railway Company did not comply with the Standing Order, but proposed a larger rate of interest than was sanctioned by the Standing Order. What happened? It did not prevent the construction of the Hull and Barnsley Railway, because the Company obtained powers in the subsequent year that enabled it to evade the decision of the House by raising Debenture and Mortgage Stock, which attained practically the same result as paying interest out of capital, and he believed the works were now approaching completion. Why, as a matter of principle, should that privilege be denied to Railway Companies? It was not denied to numerous other undertakings. There were numberless undertakings in which it prevailed. It prevailed without exception in foreign trade, and in almost every commercial speculation. For instance, there had been a very large enterprise entered into on this principle in reference to the refinement of sugar in Brazil. There was a State guarantee given, and that guarantee applied to payments during the construction of works. The Indian Railway Companies had a guarantee from the Government for the payment of interest during construction. His hon. Friend, speaking with the authority and position of one who represented the great established railway lines, was very hard on the new undertakings which required a provision of this kind to induce their Stock to be taken up. After all, it was a great convenience to the shareholders. In some way or other a man who had not got a large sum of money at his bankers upon interest, but had to contrive to be able to live, must provide something like an annual income, and by an investment of this sort it was very convenient for him that payment of interest should go on during the construction of the line. His hon. Friend told the House he was not now acting in the interest of the widows and orphans, but in that of high financial morality. But there was another explanation, not of the action of his hon. Friend, but of the opposition offered by some of the other opponents of the Bill. Now, he himself happened to be a shareholder of the South-Eastern Railway Company, and in his capacity as a shareholder he had received a Circular signed by the Secretary of the South-Eastern Company; and in his capacity as a Member of Parliament he had received another, both of those documents containing this statement—

"This Bill is promoted by a Company of which Mr. J. S. Forbes is Chairman, and it seeks power to pay interest out of capital upon £10,000,000. If the precedent for such an objectionable practice be once set in this case, it will be followed by many more instances of a similar character. The result will be loss and ruin to vast numbers of shareholders, without any compensating advantages to travellers or traders. You will materially help the Directors who are assisting to oppose this Bill if you will kindly write at once to your Representatives in Parliament, requesting them to oppose this Bill on second reading."

He had not written to his Representatives in Parliament; but he thought that Circular threw a great light upon this opposition. The interests of these great lines were opposed to competition. Were the interests of the country opposed to competition? There had been a great agitation lately in favour of a reduction of railway fares, and the only chance of obtaining that reduction was in the existence of competition, actual or potential. Everything, therefore, that tended to check competition and to keep up a monopoly helped the Companies in resisting any attempt on the part of the public to gain a reduction. He confessed that he was more anxious to protect the public than the foolish investor, even if the result was to establish competing lines; and he thought that the House would do wisely in passing a Bill of this kind, the proposal of which was undoubtedly a bond fide one, and one which involved a large and important addition to their means of communication.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that if one thing would have done more than another to prevent the encroachments of the great Railway Companies and keep them perfectly in check, as far as the fares were concerned, it was the adoption of the strong and unanimous recommendation of the Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons which sat about 20 years ago, and of which he had had the honour to be a Member. That Committee recommended that the Canals should not be allowed to fall into the hands of the Railway Companies; but he was sorry to say that that unanimous recommendation of the Joint Committee had not been acted upon when Private Bills came before the House. He thought it would have been very much better if the Committee, which sat upon this Bill two or three years ago, had borne that recommendation in mind, and had kept up this Canal, instead of allowing it to fall into the hands of the Railway Company. If the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had the question really at heart, he might yet do much good by putting the Board of Trade in action, whenever it was desirable, to give effect to the recommendation of the Joint Committee.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, the right hon. Gentleman had appealed to him. He thought the right hon. Gentleman could not be aware that there was in the present Bill a provision for keeping open the navigation of the Regent's Canal.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Canal was practically handed over to the control of the Railway Company, and the Proviso referred to by the right hon. Gentleman would have very little effect except in misleading the House. ["Oh!"] He did not for a moment suggest that the right hon. Gentleman himself intended to mislead the House; but what he felt was that the statement of the right hon. Gentleman was calculated to mislead many Members who were not aware of the real provisions and scope of the Bill. The question came before the House in this way. This clause, having reference to the payment of interest out of capital, had been in the original Bill, and when the Bill was before the House of Commons it was thrown out. Therefore, although in the first instance the Railway Company tried to get the benefit of the clause, the House would not allow them to have it; and when they were questioned upon the subject when the Bill was before the House of Lords, their Chairman said that he had no fear about being able to raise the money, whether the Standing Order was enforced or not.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

He added that the Company probably might have a little more trouble in persuading people to subscribe; but that was all. What had been the result? The Company got the Bill without that clause, and they had not been able, during the last three years, to persuade people that this was such a good undertaking that they ought to invest their money in it. If any hon. Member would look at the Preamble of the Bill now before the House, he would find that the Railway Company had itself inserted that fact in the Bill. They said—

"And whereas by the Act of 1882 it was provided (Section 201) that the Company should not out of any money by that Act authorized to be raised pay interest or dividend to any shareholder on the amount of the calls made in respect of the shares held by him, but that nothing in the said Act should prevent the Company from paying to any shareholder such interest on money advanced by him beyond the amount of the calls actually made as was in conformity with the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845."

The next paragraph said—

"And whereas the practical effect of the said Section 201 of the Act of 1882 has been to render it impossible for the Company to raise any part of the capital (other than the Canal capital) required for the execution of their authorized works, and it is expedient that the said section be repealed and the Company be authorized, subject to the provisions hereinafter in that behalf contained, to pay interest or dividends upon the amount paid up from time to time in respect of shares or stock in their capital, and for that purpose to raise further money by shares or stock as by this Act provided."

The Bill now came before the House in this way—the Company had obtained a railway which they thought would attract investors. But although it had been before the public for three years the public refused to invest; and, accordingly, the Railway Company had arrived at the conclusion that unless they could get the insertion of this particular clause to enable them to pay interest out of capital during the construction of works their undertaking was not likely to be a success. The Company said that there was a Standing Order in existence which would enable them to do this, and that they ought to have the benefit of it; but he would point out that the Standing Order was not retrospective; that the original Bill had been carefully considered by the House; and that, notwithstanding what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen in support of the Bill, there was no certainty and no guarantee that if the House allowed the second reading to pass, the Company would not be in a position to buy up the opposition with which it was threatened. In that case it would become an unopposed Bill, and would not come under the consideration of a Select Committee at all. Therefore, this particular question of whether interest was to be paid out of capital would run the risk of being virtually withdrawn from the cognizance of the House. He had been glad to hear the hon. Baronet the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) take such strong ground, because he believed that if they held out inducements to people that they were to have interest at 4 per cent until the railway was made, there were a great number of persons who did not thoroughly understand the matter who would be misled. They would invest their money in the belief that they were certain to receive a fair rate of interest for a good many years. He was now speaking entirely in behalf of a number of persons of small means who were constantly having prospectuses of this kind sent to them. He happened to have been Trustee for a number of poor ladies at different times, and they had sent to him many prospectuses offering them, as an additional inducement to invest, the payment of interest at the rate of 4 or 5 per cent out of capital during construction. What was the result? They invested their money, and they received 4 or 5 per cent during the time the works were being constructed, and then, when they expected their income to be increased, they found that it was suddenly diminished, and that what they had received in one pocket had been, in reality, taken out of another. He thought, as a matter of commercial honesty, that the House of Commons was bound to protect that class of people who were so easily induced to invest their money in these undertakings. He, therefore, hoped that the House would assent to the Amendment.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was bound to say that the main argument used by his right hon. Friend was not one which had impressed him very strongly. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his remarks by telling the House that it would be very much better if Parliament would prevent Canal Companies from being bought up by Railway Companies. But that was not the question which the House had to consider at the present moment. The Committee of the House of Commons had, as he understood, permitted this operation to be carried out after a full and adequate examination; and, so far as the Bill itself was concerned, they were told that it made adequate provision for keeping up the navigation of the Canal. That, however, was not the point which the House had to discuss. The main argument used by his right hon. Friend was that the Company, not having been able to persuade people that their undertaking was a good one, desired now, in order to induce the public to invest, to obtain a clause empowering them to pay interest on capital during the construction of works. Surely his right hon. Friend must have a poor idea of the intellect of the investing public if he imagined that a power of paying 4 per cent during the progress of construction was likely to convince those who had formerly thought the undertaking a bad one that it was now a remarkably good one. That was the main contention of his right hon. Friend; but he thought it was not sufficiently strong to induce the House to throw out the Bill. This was a Bill in which considerable interest was felt in the East End of London upon two grounds. In the first place, it would connect the Docks in the East End with the great railways in a way which would prove beneficial to the East End of London. There was another ground which to his mind, at the present moment, was of even greater importance. It had already been touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. During the present time of distress he had several times formed part of deputations which had waited upon Ministers of the Crown with reference to the employment of the working classes; but it had been very properly pointed out by the President of the Board of Trade that it was impossible for the Government themselves to take any step in the direction indicated. At the same time, the deputations had been reminded that there were great undertakings before Parliament which it was hoped would, if carried, provide employment for the working classes. This was certainly one of those undertakings, and he imagined that it was in the mind of the right hon.

Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade when he gave that advice. It was an undertaking which the House of Commons had declared to be a good and sound one, and one that ought to be carried out. Hitherto a difficulty had been experienced in raising the necessary capital, because the Company were unable to pay a small percentage of interest out of capital during the construction of works. That had nothing to do with the question whether the undertaking was good or bad. There was a vast number of people who could not afford to subscribe to an undertaking unless they received some interest in the meantime before the scheme was in operation, and it was for that reason that the capital in this instance had not been subscribed. If the Bill were passed, it would undoubtedly give ultimate employment to a large number of persons. It was a good undertaking in itself, and he could not imagine that any of the arguments which had been used against it that day would induce the House of Commons to throw out the Bill.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, he did not propose to enter into the merits of the Bill, or to discuss the question raised by hon. Gentlemen who objected to the Bill as to the financial morality of paying interest out of capital during construction; but he must tell his hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) that he was mistaken if he supposed that there was a general concurrence in the views he had expressed. That question had been fully investigated by a Committee, which had reported to the House. Their Report showed that their opinion was very different from that which the hon. Baronet had expressed. He (Sir Arthur Otway) could hardly see anything financially immoral in a proposition which at the present moment governed commercial undertakings abroad, and was adopted with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government in reference to their own Dependencies in India. Nor did he propose to enter into the other questions which the hon. Baronet had brought under the notice of the House. His hon. Friend had been quite eloquent on behalf of the cooper, the painter, the managing clerk, and the spinster, who were about to be deluded into investing their money on the promise of being paid 5 per cent during the construction of the works. His hon. Friend was quite in error as to the amount proposed to be paid as interest; it was 4 per cent, and not 5.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE said, he had been referring to the payment of interest under the Hull and Barnsley Bill; and he had stated that the proposal to pay so high a rate of interest had probably induced many investors to subscribe.

SIR ARTHUR OTWAY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Anderson Cross) had also been eloquent on behalf of certain poor ladies for whom he was Trustee; but the point which he (Sir Arthur Otway) wished to bring before the House was that there was already a Standing Order deliberately sanctioned by a Committee which dealt with the subject. This proposal had been discussed in connection with several Public Departments, and it was considered absolutely necessary to do something to prevent the constant violation of the Standing Orders of the House. When he first took the Office of Chairman of Ways and Means, he found that the Standing Order was constantly evaded; and after much consideration he came to the conclusion that it was desirable, and even necessary, to deal with the matter by amending the Standing Order. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) seemed to forget altogether the protection afforded to the public by the existing Standing Order of the House. The Select Committee before whom the Bill would come would have it in their power to refuse their sanction, if they thought fit, to the payment of interest out of capital. Moreover, a Report of the Board of Trade was required, and there was no prospect of the public being deceived, or for any deception of any kind, he apprehended, to be practised. All the circumstances would have to be made known. In fact, so far as the public were concerned, every protection was afforded to them by the Standing Orders which now existed; and he thought that the House, having amended the Standing Orders only two years ago, seeing that no complaint was made of the way in which they worked, would be acting most unwisely if they were now to reverse their recent decision. His hon. Friend had certainly made one statement which, if correct, would be important

He had said that the Bill would be an unopposed Bill, and, therefore, that there would be no Committee to decide whether it was proper that this privilege should be conceded or not. That was, no doubt, a very important point; and if the Bill came before him as an unopposed Bill, all he could say was that a measure involving such large and important considerations would not be one that he would undertake to adjudicate upon. As a matter of fact, however, the Bill was not unopposed, and it would go upstairs to a Select Committee, who would be perfectly competent to decide the various questions involved in it, and would be able to say whether this was an undertaking to which the privilege of paying interest during construction should be applied or not, or whether the sanction of the House should be refused to it. Therefore, there was on this point also no ground for the apprehensions of his hon. Friend. It was not necessary that he should detain the House by going into details further; but he thought he had said sufficient to induce the House to read the Bill a second time.

MR. HICKS said, that, as one who had opposed the Regent's Canal Bill in the first instance, he would ask the indulgence of the House while he explained the ground of his opposition, and while he called attention to one or two points which had not been fully raised. Of late years the House had been extremely jealous of the absorption of the inland navigation by Railway Companies; and in regard to this very Company, so recently as 1882, a Select Committee refused to sanction the payment by it of interest out of capital. When the scheme first came before the House for the purpose of taking possession of the Regent's Canal, and converting it into a railway, an opposition was raised to it on the ground that if this Canal, the head of all the English navigation, were once allowed to fall into the hands of the Railway Company, the North, North-East, and West of England would be cut off from the Metropolis. It was then said that the great object of the promoters of the Bill was to make a cheap railway for the purpose of taking the labouring classes from the East End of London into cheaper districts, where they would be able to reside more economically, and enjoy purer air. On the faith of that representation the House passed a Bill, and it went to a Select Committee, who, in consenting to the measure, refused their sanction to the clause for the payment of interest out of capital. That was in the year 1882. What had happened since? In the very next year, this Company, which professed to make a railway for the purpose of carrying passengers at a cheap rate, came to the House to ask for fresh powers to enable them to raise their rates and charges for carrying goods. Thus they tore a portion of the mask from their faces. It was still, however, to be a goods line or a passengers' line, and nothing was said about the way in which the money was to be raised. But now, at the end of three years, finding that they had been unable to raise the money, they came again to Parliament and asked for power to override another important Rule of the House, which prevented them from paying interest out of capital during the construction of works. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade told the House that they ought to grant this privilege for two reasons, one of which was that the principle was sanctioned in connection with foreign undertakings, and the second that it was also done in connection with the East India Railways. He did not think the House ought to be governed by foreign precedents; and as to the East India Railways, unless he was very much misinformed, the dividends were not guaranteed during construction, but were guaranteed in perpetuity after the construction was complete. He therefore failed to see what that argument had to do with the case. It was an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the House. This was a proposal to pay dividends out of capital during the construction of the railway; but there was no guarantee whatever of any payment after the works were completed. Then, again, another reason assigned by the President of the Board of Trade, and a reason supported by his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), was that there were a great many persons out of employment in London to whom the construction of this railway would give employment. They all knew that there were many of the working classes out of employment in London, and the circumstance was much to be lamented. But, he would ask, was this the first time that Her Majesty's Government had heard that the working classes were suffering from want of employment? Had it never occurred to the right hon. Gentleman, or to Her Majesty's Government, that there was another way of getting out of that difficulty? Had they never heard of the great distress which prevailed among those who suffered from the Sugar Bounties; and would not the Government at once seek in their Budget to put a duty upon foreign sugar? By so doing they would give abundant employment, and very much relieve the deficit which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to meet—a deficit which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had described as "grossly immoral."

MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to confine himself to the Question before the House.

MR. HICKS apologized for appearing to have wandered from the subject, and said, that he was only replying to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that the Bill would find employment for a large number of the working classes. What he ventured to venture to say was, that if they could find employment for the sugar industries by not allowing sugar to come in upon foreign bounties, the labourer of the East End of London would find abundant employment and the deficit would be avoided.

MR. GILES said, he had had some little experience of public Companies, and he ventured to protest against the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Durham (Sir Joseph Pease) upon general principles. If it were adopted it would put a stop to the progress of all public Companies. The hon. Baronet said that he brought it forward in the interest of the innocent and unwary, who might be deceived into subscribing to these public Companies if interest were guaranteed during the progress of works. But there were £700,000,000 subscribed to railways on similar principles, the holders of which must all have been innocents when they subscribed. The large and wealthy Railway Companies had no occasion to exercise this privilege, as when they wanted to carry out new lines they borrowed money on debentures or on preference stock, and paid interest thereon from the date of borrowing, which practically amounted to the same thing as that of new Companies paying interest during construction.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—LOX- DONDERRY ASSIZES—SPECIAL JURORS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many special jurors were summoned by Sheriff Mr. Thomas Chambers for last Derry Assizes; how many cases were to be tried; what was the character of the attendance; and, did Mr. Baron Dowse and Lord Justice Fitzgibbon make any comments on the subject?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Sheriff informs me that 48 special jurors were summoned, and that the attendance was a fair average. There were six special jury cases to be tried. Mr. Baron Dowse made some observations on the difficulty of getting a jury; but the Sheriff explains that the difficulty arose from the fact that both Courts were trying special jury cases at the same time, and that the right of challenge had been fully exercised in both cases.

MR. HEALY: Would not the right hon. Gentleman consider the question of applying to one of the learned Judges for the information instead of to the Sheriff? The Sheriff is the person whose conduct is impugned.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think that is necessary.

MR. LEWIS: Is not 48 the statutory number of jurors?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot say.

VACCINATION (FRANCE)—MORTALITY ARISING FROM THE OPERATION AT VILLEFRANCHE D'AVEYRON.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, What ther the attention of his Department has been called to the announcement of a vaccination disaster at Villefranche d'Aveyron, in France, in La Ligne newspaper, dated 23rd March last, where it is reported that, of forty young people vaccinated by one medical man, nine died within forty-eight hours after the operation; if not, will he be so good as to make inquiry into the case?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL (who replied) said: We were not aware of any such statement in the French newspaper referred to. If the hon. and learned Member will furnish us with a statement of the facts on trustworthy authority, we will consider whether any inquiry is necessary.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)— SMALL POX AT WEST HAM.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been directed to the prevalence of small pox in the sub-district of West Ham; whether the death rate has reached the rate of nearly 7,000 per million; whether the inhabitants of the district are vaccinated as numerously as in any district in or near London; whether 3,000 per million is assumed to have been the rate of mortality from small pox in the last century; and, whether, in fact, some defect in sanitary precautions is the cause of such disease and mortality?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL (who replied) said: We are aware that there has been a severe epidemic of small pox in the West Ham sub-district. The population of the district increased from 44,000 in 1871 to 101,000 in 1881, and is now very much larger. The number of deaths from small pox in the district during the present year has been 318. There are, however, in the district two small pox hospitals, one belonging to the Guardians of the West Ham Union, and the other to the Managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District. A considerable proportion of the persons who died in the district from small pox were brought into the district from the outside. The Returns for the last three years show that the number of children unaccounted for as regards vaccination has been greater than in other districts in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis. It has been estimated that the rate of mortality from small pox in the last century, during a period of 30 years, was 3,000 per 1,000,000; but it is obvious that no comparison can fairly be made between the average death-rate during a period of 30 years in the whole of England and Wales, and the number of deaths in four months during a severe epidemic in a particular locality. There has been insufficient hospital accommodation in the district; but, apart from that, we are not aware that defects in sanitary precautions have been the cause of the disease and mortality.

INLAND REVENUE—STAMPS UPON RECEIPTS IN PAYMENT OF ACCOUNTS BY CHEQUE.

MR. BARRY asked Mr. Attorney General, If he will remove a doubt existing in commercial circles by saying whether payment of an account of over £2 by cheque, payable to order, obviates the necessity of using a receipt stamp?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, a stamp was required to be affixed to the account under the circumstances referred to in the Question.

BOROUGH FUNDS ACT—EXTENSION TO IRELAND.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is his intention to redeem the pledge given by the Irish Government to introduce a Bill to extend the Borough Funds Act to Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Government are prepared to support the Bill which the hon. Member has brought in on this question, subject to an Amendment which I believe the hon. Member does not object to.

MR. GRAY: Owing to the Bill being blocked, will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether he can give me some facilities to press forward the Bill?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I cannot make a promise; but I will be very glad to assist the hon. Member.

COLLECTOR GENERAL OF RATES, DUBLIN.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How long the office of Collector General of Rates in Dublin has been vacant; and, when the Government intend to introduce a Bill to amend the Collection of Rates Act, Dublin?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: A temporary appointment was made to the post of Collector General of Rates in Dublin pending the probability of legislation affecting the duties of the Office. The Government have not forgotten their promise to bring in a Bill dealing with this subject; but I am not yet in a position to fix the date at which it will be introduced.

MR. GRAY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether he also bears in mind the undertaking given that the present temporary appointment should not be made permanent until the Bill is introduced?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Oh, certainly.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—PROCEEDINGS FOR ALLEGED TRESPASS AT JOHNSTOWN, CO. KILKENNY.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to, or any report received from the local constabulary, concerning extraordinary proceedings that have recently taken place in the police district of Johnstown, in the county of Kilkenny, that is to say, that Mr. Den. Keatinge, of Woodsift, a deputy lieutenant and magistrate of the county, is in occupation of certain holdings surrounding his demesne from which the tenants have been evicted some two or three years ago; that the boundary fences of the same are in a very defective condition, rendering them liable to the trespass of stock; that Mr. Keatinge, and his son Mr. Morris Keatinge, holding a Commission in one of Her Majesty's Regiments of the Line, together with a large posse of bailiffs, proceeded from their residence about midnight to those holdings, and distrained certain donkeys, goats, and sheep trespassing thereon; that they escorted those animals to the various residences of the owners, and knocked violently at their doors about one o'clock a.m., some of whom were thus coerced to pay the regulation trespass fines then and there to this local justice, and others, not having cash in their houses, remained indoors, whereupon a large and continued uproar ensued, and the doors of the dwelling-houses were battered and defaced, and, in some portions, smashed in; that especially the residence of the National school teacher of Grane, Mr. Maher, was similarly visited, and trespass for donkeys demanded; and that, owing to the difficulty of arousing the sleeping inmates, shouting and screeching and other noises were made use of, to the disturbance and terror of the inhabitants of the entire locality, extending over a considerable area, and finally the teacher himself was assailed in abusive language, and threatened with eviction; and, whether, even if such distresses are held legal, such unusual mode of proceeding, fraught with danger to the public peace, and adopted by a justice of the petty sessions district in which these dwelling-houses are situate, will be brought under the notice of the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have directed the police, who had no knowledge of the alleged proceedings, to make inquiries into the matter, but I have not yet received their Report.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE BENGAL CAVALRY—OUTBREAK OF GLANDERS.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true, as stated in The United Service Gazette, that glanders again prevailed among the horses of the 6th Bengal Lancers; whether the 6th Bengal Lancers is the same regiment that arrived glandered in Egypt in the campaign of 1882, and which, on the disease being identified by the English veterinary officers, was ordered away from the scene of operations lest it should infect the rest of the Cavalry; whether it is the regiment to which was attributed the infection with glanders of the 7th Dragoon Guards; whether he has yet received any report respecting the European officer and men of the regiment formerly infected with glanders on the voyage of the 6th Bengal Lancers from Egypt to India, concerning whom he promised inquiry on March 5th 1883; whether the regiment has ever been free from glanders since it was despatched, infected for service in Egypt; and, what is the pay of the salootrees to whom, as he explained to the House on March 5th 1883, the veterinary care of the Bengal Native Cavalry is entrusted?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India has been asked by telegram whether the 6th Bengal Cavalry has ever been free from glanders, or whether glanders has again broken out. The 6th Bengal Cavalry is the regiment of which one troop was glandered in Egypt during the Campaign of 1882, and it is the regiment to which was imputed the infection of the 7th Dragoon Guards. The Report asked for in March, 1883, arrived in June of that year, and is at the service of my hon. Friend. The deceased officer (Major Logan) had nothing to do with the 6th Bengal Cavalry; he belonged to the 7th Bengal Infantry. No Cavalry horses were on board the ship in which he returned to India; and he died about two months after landing. Sir Anthony Home, the Surgeon General of Her Majesty's Forces in India, having investigated the case, reported that, in his opinion, Major Logan's death was not due to glanders. Though the Government instituted inquiry, no case of a Native having contracted glanders could be traced. The pay of a salootree is 38 rupees a month.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—ANNUAL REPAYMENTS.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that the different Boards of Guardians in Ireland who have borrowed money from the Treasury for the purpose of building cottages under the Labourers' (Ireland) Act, are still debited in their bonds with the annual sum of five pounds seven shillings and two pence for every hundred pounds for a term of thirty-five years, notwithstanding the assurance given in March last that the Treasury had reduced the repayments of these loans to four pounds sixteen shillings and two pence per annum for every hundred pounds for the term above stated; and, if so, what steps he will take to get these loans brought under the amended terms?

MR. HIBBERT: As I informed the hon. Member on the 4th of March last, the promised reduction in the rate of interest was conditional on the passing of the amending Bill of the Government. The Treasury would not be justified in risking the longer term and lower rate of interest except upon the improved arrangements proposed in that Bill. If the hon. Member wishes to obtain early advantage of the reduction, I should recommend him to use his influence with the three hon. Members opposite me who have blocked the Bill. As the Bill is the result of the labours of a Select Committee of the House, I would appeal to those hon. Members to withdraw their block.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Will the Bill be retrospective?

MR. HIBBERT: No.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: If the blocks are removed, will the Government press on the Bill?

MR. HIBBERT: I think so. I am told so.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to asked the Leader of the Opposition, in reference to the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury that the Government were precluded from pressing the Labourers' Bill owing to the action of three hon. Members of the Conservative Party, whether the right hon. Gentleman would use his influence with these three hon. Members to cease their opposition to the Bill, which was founded on the Report of a Select Committee that included Conservative Members?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I have no knowledge of the matter.

NATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSION (IRELAND)—THE LATE LORD O'HAGAN.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of National Education have decided to allow a Return of their attendances at the Board Meetings to appear in their Annual Report; and, whether any appointment has yet been made to the place at the Board vacated by the death of Lord O'Hagan?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Commissioners of National Education have decided not to publish any such Return as that suggested in the first part of this Question. No appointment has yet been made to the Board in the place of Lord O'Hagan.

MR. SEXTON: Why do the Commissioners refuse to give the information given last year?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am only informed that they do not consider it wise to do it.

POST OFFICE—RURAL LETTER CARRIERS—BOOT AND SHOE MONEY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Postmaster General, What steps will be taken to provide the rural postmen of the United Kingdom with boots or boot money?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The idea of supplying postmen with boots has never been entertained; and there is no intention of taking any steps in the direction indicated.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS—RETIRING PENSIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government will consider a transfer of the grant of about £7,000 annually made for payment of retiring allowances to Irish National Teachers (and now about being withdrawn from that fund) to the fund appropriated for the purpose of the National Teachers' Pension Scheme?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It appears that since 1856 Parliament has voted annually a sum to enable the Commissioners of Education to award gratuities to incapacitated teachers. When the Pension Fund—which is quite independent of Parliamentary control—was started in 1879, with a large capital sum from the Church surplus, it was left optional for five years with teachers to join it. A certain number of them elected not to do so; and it is for the purpose of providing for these cases that the annual Parliamentary grant is kept up. The sum estimated for the present year is £1,800. It is intended to continue this provision only so long as there is a necessity for it; but the proposal of the hon. Member is that the Government should deprive a certain number of the teachers of their retiring gratuities, and, at the same time, make a fundamental change in the principle of the pension scheme by tacking on to it an annual Parliamentary grant. The Government could not agree to such a proposal.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — PENSIONS—CASE OF SERGEANT-INSTRUCTOR LYNE.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, If he is aware that the additional pension awarded to Sergeant Instructor Lyne, late of the Royal Marines, under War Office Regulations, which pension he, in October last year, after a delay of over six months, stated would be increased as soon as the necessary Order in Council had been obtained, has not yet been paid; and, whether an Order in Council has only recently been issued, although in October last year the War Office had already submitted the case to the Admiralty, curtly stating that the pension will not be increased; and, if so, what are the reasons assigned by the Admiralty for not complying with the award of the War Office?

MR. CAINE (who replied) said: Orders have been issued for the payment to Sergeant Lyne of the additional pension of 8*d.* a-day. There was a misunderstanding at the Admiralty as to the precise amount of additional pension payable under the Regulations of the War Office, which caused delay; but the additional pension will be awarded retrospectively, so that Sergeant Lyne will not be a loser.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What scale of remuneration the Local Government propose to allow to Poor Law officials under the Registration Bill?

MR. SEXTON also asked whether, on the introduction of the Lodger Franchise in 1868, the remuneration for additional duties in that year of the Clerks of the Peace, Town Clerks, and Clerks of Unions in Ireland was defrayed by the Treasury, under 31 and 32 Vic. c. 112, s. 27; and, if so, what was the amount so paid?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In reply to the Questions of the hon. Members for Monaghan and Sligo, a statement will be made on Monday of the course the Government intend to take on this subject; and with reference to the hon. Member for Sligo's Question, I would say that we have before us the precedent to which he refers.

MR. SEXTON: Are the matters in my Question correctly stated?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not quite.

MR. HEALY: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has understood the bearing of my Question. I do not mean to ask whether it will be a local rate or an Imperial charge; but what will be the scale fixed under the Schedule in the Act?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think it would be more convenient to make a statement on the whole question on Monday. I am not in a position to say at present what scale the Local Government Board will lay down.

POST OFFICE—MADAGASCAR.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in view of the serious complaints of the British residents in Madagascar as to the infrequent and irregular delivery of the mails from England, and as to the inability of Her Majesty's Consul at Tamatave to afford relief, he will take steps to place the postal communication between this Country and Madagascar, as far as possible, on a more satisfactory basis?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am very sorry that the mails for Madagascar are not delivered with the frequency and regularity which the British residents in that place could desire; but we avail ourselves of the only opportunity that at present exists—namely, that of the monthly French Packet—to send the mails. To establish an independent British Mail Service would be very costly; and the small amount of correspondence sent to Madagascar would not justify Her Majesty's Government in incurring such an expense as would be necessary on this account.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT—ADMISSION OF SOLDIERS TO THE FRANCHISE.

MR. LEAHY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the clerk of the Naas Union, as reported in The Leinster Leader of the 4th instant, that the married soldiers occupying huts in the Military Encampment at the Curragh, in the county of Kildare, are entitled to be put on the voters' list; and, whether this is a correct interpretation of the purpose of the Franchise Act and the Registration Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): It is not quite possible for me, under the present circumstances, to state whether married soldiers are entitled to be registered. I cannot answer that Question without being aware of the special circumstances of the case.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— ENGLISH OFFICERS—PAY AND STORES.

MR. ARCHDALE asked the Secretary of State for War, Is it a fact that the boat lanterns and filters have been taken from the officers in the summer camps in the Soudan, on the ground that they were only intended for the men, and that the officers were to supply themselves with those articles out of their field allowance; whether any provisions have been made to enable them to do so; and, is it a fact that when serving to the south of Wady Halfa the officers of the Egyptian Army's pay is doubled, while no addition is made to the pay of the British Army?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER (who replied) said: I am sorry to say that at the War Office we have no information on the subject to which the hon. Member's Question refers.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: Will the Secretary of State make inquiries?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: I will make inquiries as to the third Question; but as to the other two, they will probably be rectified on complaints being made by the officers themselves.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—POLICE FORCE AT ESKER.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the police stations at Esker, between Bangher and Clonfert, are charged as extra police; and, if so, what is the nature of their duty; and, what are the circumstances which render it necessary that the district in question should be burdened with an extra police force?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The police at Esker Station are not charged as extra police to the locality; and their duties do not differ from those of the men at any other station in the county.

POST OFFICE—PROFESSOR S. P. THOMPSON'S VALVE TELEPHONE.

MR. KENNY asked the Postmaster General, If, since October 1884, he has had an opportunity of examining the valve telephone of Professor S. P. Thompson; and, if so, what Report have the officials of the Post Office made upon it?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No opportunity has been given to the officials of the Post Office up to the present time of examining the valve telephone of Professor Thompson.

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND) — CONTAMINATION OF DRINKING WATER BY THE POLICE AT ORANMORE.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the police at Oranmore lately made a drain from the barrack cesspool into the stream from which the inhabitants of Oranmore draw their drinking water; if the Local Officer of Health and the Board of Guardians strongly objected to this contamination of the drinking water, and if the Board of Guardians succeeded in closing up this drain; if the inhabitants of Oranmore celebrated this stoppage of the pollution by assembling at the drain and playing music; if, upon this, the police prosecuted, under the Prevention of Crime Act, the Local Officer of Health and some others, and if the magistrates dismissed the summons; if he would direct that, for the future, the Crimes Act should not be used against people who, in their anxiety for pure water, assembled in a manner disliked by the Constabulary; and, if he would inform the police that cases of this kind had better be dealt with under the ordinary Civil Law?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must ask the hon. and gallant Member to give me Notice of this Question, which appeared on the Paper for the first time to-day.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS — FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE — EAST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

MR. DUCKHAM asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether it is correct that an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease has occurred at Kelleythorpe, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, as announced in The Times of Tuesday last; and, if so, whether the origin of the outbreak is known; and, whether the further report in The Times of yesterday of another outbreak at Hale, in Lancashire, is correct; and, if so, whether the origin of that outbreak is known?

MR. TREVELYAN: an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was reported on Monday, April 27, on a farm at Kelleythorpe, near Driffeld, in a herd of 144 cattle, of which 23 were reported to be affected. The sick animals are now nearly recovered, and no extension of the disease has occurred. The origin of the outbreak is not known. In reference to the alleged outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease at Hale, it appears that the disease is pleuro-pneumonia, which was detected in a herd of 75 cattle on the 24th of April. One animal is reported to have been attacked.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked whether the published statement was true, that an outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia had occurred in Boston, and that 140 cattle had had to be destroyed, involving a loss of £2,800?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not sure as to the number; and I would rather the hon. and gallant Gentleman would give me Notice of the Question.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS BILLS

MR. GREGORY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware of the difficulty that must arise in carrying out the registration of persons entitled to vote in counties under the new franchise, unless the operations of the clerks of the peace and overseers in the different districts are facilitated by the early passing of the Registration Bill, and, whether he can give an opportunity for the consideration of that measure as reported from the Select Committee?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am quite aware that the hon. Member opposite has very good foundation for putting this Question, and we are most anxious not to lose a moment in proceeding with the Registration Bill—I mean any moment such as is fairly at our disposal for the purpose. In truth, nothing but the consideration of that urgency would justify our ceasing to proceed with the Registration Bill. What we propose is to go on to-night with the Irish and Scotch Registration Bills, with a good hope that we may be able to dispose of those measures at the present Sitting. If we should not so dispose of them to-night we shall go forward with them on Monday.

day, and do what may remain necessary so far as the Committee stage is concerned. But there was an arrangement last night that, if it were not an inconveniently late hour, the Report of the Vote of Credit should be brought on. Probably it may be wished that that should not be long postponed. The arrangement failed last night in consequence of the prolongation of the debate on the Financial Statement of my right hon. Friend; and therefore we should be quite willing to adhere to the same arrangement for Monday night, and not proceed with the consideration of the Registration Bill later than 10 o'clock, in order to bring up the Report on the Vote of Credit. After that we should wish to proceed at the earliest moment with the English Registration Bill, the urgency being very great. Indeed, I am informed that the operation of registration cannot be efficiently performed if there is any serious delay in the passing of those Bills.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman contemplates in regard to the English Registration Bill. I understood him to say that if the Scotch and Irish Registration Bills were finished to-night, the English Registration Bill would be taken first on Monday, with the intention of suspending the discussion upon it at 10 o'clock. But supposing the Scotch Bill, which stands second to-day, is not finished to-night, will it be taken first on Monday? If so, does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the English Registration Bill after the Scotch Bill on Monday, or will he be disposed to take the Report of the Vote of Credit?

MR. GLADSTONE: Certainly; we shall be very glad—and we believe it to be in the public interest, if it should be generally satisfactory to the House—to proceed with all the three Registration Bills in succession in the stage of Committee. At the same time, we desire to consult the convenience of the House as to the mode of proceeding.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: It will be very inconvenient if there is no definite statement as to what is really to be done on Monday; because, when the Committee on the Irish Registration Bill arrived at a certain decision last Friday, the Prime Minister moved to report Progress on the ground of the very important change made in the Bill, stating that he desired to have time to consider the matter, and to convey to the House the intention of Her Majesty's Government. That was an important announcement; and this evening the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has informed us that the statement will not be made until Monday, as I understood, upon the English Registration Bill. At any rate, my hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) has given Notice that he will raise on the English Registration Bill precisely the same question which was considered of such grave importance by the Prime Minister when decided against the Government on the Irish Registration Bill. All we ask for is full notice when the English Registration Bill is really to be taken, in order that so important a matter may be fairly discussed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have said already that we wish to consult the convenience of the House; and we are very desirous, if the House should be so disposed, to go forward with these measures. It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, that I deemed it necessary to take time, in consequence of the vote which was given the other night on the Irish Registration Bill. We have taken time to examine the matter, and we have observed what happened in 1868, and we are prepared to make a proposal which we believe will be equitable and suited to the circumstances of the case. I apprehend, as regards the reference lately made to the 6th clause, that that clause having been amended in Committee on the Bill cannot be again taken up. We must go forward with the clauses, and anything to be done with the Irish Bill must be done on the Report. Should the statement of the Government not be satisfactory to the House at large on Monday, we should certainly make no attempt to force the English Registration Bill on that day, but would postpone it till Tuesday.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, asked after what hour the Scotch Registration Bill would not be taken that night? He would remind the House that the Bill was only circulated on the morning of the day on which it was read a second time, and that a promise was given that an opportunity would be given in Committee for discussing the various points arising.

MR. BUCHANAN asked whether, if the Bill came on that night, the Government would defer taking the new clauses, which were very important, and of which the Lord Advocate had placed no fewer than six on the Paper that morning?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Lord Advocate would be better able than he was to answer those Questions. He had had no communication with his right hon. and learned Friend on the subject. At the same time, he understood there was a general unity of feeling prevailing with regard to the Scotch Bill, and if that was so they should be disposed to go forward with it. If that was not so, however, he did not think the Lord Advocate would press the matter unduly at an inconvenient hour.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Do I rightly understand the right hon. Gentleman to state that in the event of any matter of controversy arising on the English Registration Bill it will be placed as the first Order on Tuesday?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is so. On Monday we will not proceed with it if our statement should not be satisfactory to the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: And it will be the first Order?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I may say it would be the first Order on Tuesday.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that, seeing the Lord Advocate now in his place, he would ask whether it was the intention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to proceed with the Scotch Bill at any hour that night; or whether, considering the understanding given out on the occasion of the second reading, that due opportunity would be given for discussing the points that might arise, it would be postponed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that if there was anything really contentious in the Bill, of which he was not aware, they should be glad to defer to the wishes of the House. He did not believe it would be found that there was anything contentious.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: Will the Bill come on at any hour?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): Yes.

Sir Herbert Maxwell

MR. HEALY asked whether the proposal in regard to the double lodger qualification was peculiar to Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): No, Sir. The proposal simply adopts the words of the English Registration Act. It was introduced in the English Act in 1878, and we merely propose to apply the same to Scotland.

MR. HEALY asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he would insert a similar provision in the Irish Act?

[No reply.]

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked, Whether it was to be clearly understood that the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken on Thursday week?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS), in reply, said, that the second reading would be taken on Thursday week, and the Bill would be in the hands of Members in a few days.

CENTRAL ASIA—AFGHANISTAN.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether any news has been received from Afghanistan?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; I am not aware that any information has been received.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 110.]

(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 24th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. HEALY rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland was correct in stating that the Question, "That Clause 6 be added to the Bill," had not yet been disposed of?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that it would still be necessary to put that Question.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH remarked that the clause as it now stood was perfect nonsense; and surely, if the first part were allowed to stand in the Bill, the Government would consent to strike out the last four lines, which really meant nothing at all. After the first part had gone it would be impossible to retain the last.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it would be necessary to leave out the remainder of the clause, seeing that in the shape in which it now stood it was not intelligible. What had already been done was to omit the first part, upon which the second depended.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he would be prepared at the proper time to omit the remainder of the clause.

Amendment proposed, that Clause 6 be amended by leaving out all the words after "Dublin," in line 21, down to the word "order," in line 26.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. HEALY remarked that what had occurred on Thursday week rendered it undesirable to retain any part of the clause. He would ask the Chief Secretary if he proposed to bring up a new clause?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that on Monday he would be able to state what it was the Government proposed to do. It would certainly be necessary to bring up a new clause.

MR. HEALY asked if it would be necessary to re-commit the Bill for that purpose?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he thought it would be necessary to re-commit the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 6, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. PARNELL said, he had intended to move the omission of the clause; but after the statement of the Chief Secretary he did not propose to do so. He would suggest, however, that the most convenient course would be to strike out the clause altogether, so as to enable the House to discuss the new clause which the Government proposed to bring up in Committee.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that a point of Order had been raised by the answer of the Chief Secretary. Would it now be possible in Committee to put in a new clause? His own opinion was that it would not be possible in Committee, but that it should be done on Report. He should like, therefore, to be informed, as a point of Order, whether the new clause could be inserted in the Bill in Committee, either by re-committal or otherwise? He thought himself that no charge could be imposed upon the Poor Law Guardians in Committee.

Clause struck out.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 7.—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses 8 and 9 agreed to.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN moved, after Clause 5, to insert the following clause:—

(Power to appoint additional revising barristers.)

"The Lord Lieutenant may, if he thinks it necessary, appoint one or more barrister or barristers, of not less than six years' standing at the bar, to act with the chairman or revising barrister of any county or borough in revising the list of voters in such county or borough in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five.

"The chairman, or revising barrister, and the person or persons so appointed, shall arrange for the distribution between them of the business of such revision.

"Every barrister so appointed shall have the same powers and authorities in every respect in regard to such revision as a chairman has under the Registration Acts, and shall be paid as remuneration for his services, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, such sums as the Lord Lieutenant, with the consent of the Treasury, may determine.

"In any county or borough in which more revision courts than one are appointed to sit at the same time it shall be lawful for the clerk of the peace, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, to nominate a person to attend before any of such courts other than that before which such clerk of the peace himself attends, and to discharge the duties imposed by law upon the clerk of the peace in respect of such revision.

"The person so appointed shall be paid, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, such remuneration for his services as the Lord Chancellor with the sanction of the Treasury may determine."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. HEALY said, that this was a very important clause; and he wished to remark with regard to it that, while he was perfectly content with the action of Her Majesty's Government in introducing a clause for the appointment of these additional barristers to assist when it was necessary in the work of revision; while he considered it was a very proper thing for them to do, and that they deserved consideration on that account, at the same time it was very necessary for Irish Members to know who those Revising Barristers were to be. If they were to assent to the clause without having that information, they would be, so to speak, "buying a pig in a poke." The Boundary Commissioners had been appointed without their knowing anything about them, and the Nationalist Party were now smarting under their action; and if those Revising Barristers were appointed in the same way they might be quite unable to fight any registration cases that required to be contested. There was nothing which the people in Ireland felt so keenly interested in as this question of Revising Barristers. People were sometimes kept waiting about the Court for a week; and if a man did not happen to be present when his name was called his case was passed over, although if, as was sometimes the case, the Revising Barrister was a fair man, he would allow a little law. In his own neighbourhood the Revising Barrister was a man of over 80 years of age, and quite unable to take cognizance of what was going on in Court; and he believed that 30 years ago he sentenced a man to be hanged for stealing a cow. He would like to know who those barristers were to be? He and his hon. Friends did not care very much about any of the four Provinces of Ireland in this matter except Ulster; and with regard to the matter he did not think that he should be inclined to throw any additional expense upon the Treasury. He thought it would be quite unnecessary to give additional assistance to the Revising Barristers, except in places where there would be contests; and the Government might make up their mind that in Munster, Leinster, and Connaught, the people would be put on the Electoral Roll en bloc. But in the Ulster counties the case would be very different. In respect of the other 24 counties of Ireland, therefore, he thought the Government might save their money. In the counties of Cavan and Monaghan there would be no fight; but in Tyrone, Armagh, Donegal, Derry, the Western Division of Down, and in Fermanagh there would be enough work for three or four Revising Barristers in each case; every vote would be regarded as if the Election itself depended upon it. Therefore he repeated that it was in those counties in which would arise a conflict at election time that the Government should provide additional assistance for the Revising Barrister. Take the case of Mr. Piers White. Well, he was an extremely able lawyer for whom he had the greatest respect, and certainly well qualified for the position that had been assigned to him; but it was well known how political rewards were given in Ireland; and if his appointment dated from the time when he jerrymandered the divisions of Irish counties, then he thought that the people of Ireland would have a very strong suspicion in his case. In the same way with regard to barristers to be appointed under this Act. They had no security for the confidence they were asked to place in them; they had no guarantee and therefore could not trust them; and unless they saw their names in black and white, and ascertained what kind of men were to be appointed, they would be passing this clause blindfold. He trusted they would have some statement before the Bill left the House with regard to the barristers to be appointed. It was a question which affected the barristers themselves equally with Irish Members, and it was one on which he contended that all parties interested ought to be satisfied.

MR. GIBSON said, he was glad that the Government had presented to the Committee an elastic clause like the present, because it was obvious that, as had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), the work to be performed by the Revising Barrister would vary greatly in the different counties of Ireland. There were some counties in which the work must be very laborious, and where in consequence the work of the Revising Barristers would extend over a period of, perhaps, six weeks, or, at all events, a considerable time, and unless they gave all the assistance they could to the County Court Judge he would not be able to get through his business at all—it would be impossible for him to do the work well. He was glad to see that the Government proposed to take powers not to appoint one man only in each county, but two or more as they might think fit and the exigencies of the work might demand; and he would not be surprised if it were found that the provision made for some cases, in the first instance, required to be considerably supplemented. He did not ask the Government to create any army of assistance for the County Court Judge and burden the country with the cost, because it would be probably unnecessary; but there should be sufficient assistance to enable him to do his business properly. As urged by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan there would be strong contests in some places in Ireland, and it was likely that districts where the Legal Advisers of the Crown would seek election would be keenly contested—and it was in such places that additional assistance would be largely required. It was desirable that in every place they should have a clean Register; and it would not be reasonable to expect that the County Court Judge should dispose of thousands of fresh names that would be put on the Register as the result of recent legislation without any assistance or extra remuneration. Therefore, where there was any kind of political contest, it was for the Government to see that the provision of the Act of Parliament was adequately carried out, and that as far as might be there was a pure Register, and that he said in the interest both of electoral law in Ireland, and also in the interest of the County Court Judges. The County Court Judges did not receive large salaries; they had to perform a great deal of the judicial work of the country, and it would not be fair to give them a great increase of work without giving them corresponding remuneration, or what was the equivalent to it—that was to say, taking care that their extra work should not be allowed to interfere with the remuneration they were in the habit of getting and which they had a right to expect. With regard to what had been said as to putting in the Bill the names of 12 barristers of the Irish Bar who commanded universal confidence amongst Parties in Ireland, if that were to be the settlement of the matter accepted by the Government, he would wait compliance with it almost with a feeling of intense curiosity. He was well acquainted with the Irish Bar and had great respect for its members, no matter of what creed or politics they were. He thought it would hardly be possible for the Government to name a considerable number of barristers of six years' standing and upwards to discharge this duty—at any rate the list would be an exhaustive one. He thought that, in the first instance, the Government should only name as many Assistant Barristers as they considered to be absolutely necessary, but reserve power to themselves to extend the list as far as experience showed it to be desirable to do so, and that they should waive all political feeling in their selection. Therefore, if it should be necessary to move a statutory provision in the way indicated, he thought it would be well to trust in this as in many other cases to the discretion of the Executive. The Committee were all watching to see that the Government did not appoint rabid partizans on any side to exercise this function, and it was the duty of the Government to find fair men of good professional character who would be anxious honestly to carry out the provisions of this important Act of Parliament.

MR. SEXTON said, he did not consider that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had fairly represented the argument of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). They all agreed that some such provision as that contained in the present clause would be necessary in Ireland in certain cases. The number of those cases could be ascertained with tolerable certainty. He believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken would not say that, except in the County and City of Dublin and in Ulster, there would be any contest between the two English Parties. The general impression in Ireland was, that neither the Liberal nor the Tory Party would be interested to any extent in any election outside Ulster, except that in the county of Dublin. He did not think that in the other cases the work of the Revising Barristers would be great, or that the salaries of the County Court Judges need be increased. He believed that, except in the case of Dublin, they would be able to get through their business without extra remuneration. In Ulster they would require assistance—particularly in respect of those counties with regard to which questions had been raised in that House during the passage of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill—that was to say, the counties that had been jerrymandered in order to procure a Party triumph. In those counties thousands of people would flood the Registers—objections would be taken on various grounds to many of them, and the work of revision would be protracted, and the County Court Judge would want assistance. Probably about 10 appointments would be requisite in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman thought that the Government should not put the names in the Bill; but the Irish Members had never asked for that. They asked that before the Bill passed out of the hands of Parliament the names should be communicated to the House; or, if the actual names were not communicated to the House, at any rate that a list should be made out on the assumption that 10 appointments were to be made, and that they should have a list of, say, 20 names out of which the Government would make their selection. The right hon. and learned Gentleman thought it would be difficult, if not impossible, to get a dozen names of barristers whose appointment would not provoke general hostility; he (Mr. Sexton) believed it would not be difficult to get the names of such persons, especially amongst those barristers of more than six years' standing whose political passions, it was only reasonable to suppose, had been somewhat mellowed by time. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean to say that those men could not be found? There were more than 400 practising barristers in Ireland, and surely there were a dozen men amongst them who had not taken up any violent position in politics, and who, although they should not command general confidence, might at least be appointed by the Government without provoking hostility. He asked whether the Government would not make the arrangement proposed, and submit a list to the House of persons to assist the County Court Judges in Ireland? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had made a suggestion which he (Mr. Sexton) regarded as worthless, and which he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself suspected was not very valuable. He had spoken of the check that would be afforded by public opinion. But of what use had public opinion been to them? Irish Members had been trying throughout the passage of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill to reverse the tricks of the Boundary Commissioners in jerrymandering the counties in the North of Ireland. They had public opinion with them—they had 3 per cent of the Irish electorate with them; but public opinion was of no use to them as a check on power, and it was so, because, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew, the check of public opinion was perfectly worthless whenever a Party cry was raised on any question in Ireland. Now, Irish Members on those Benches could not accept the check of public opinion, for the reason that it did not operate in the House; and the only security they could accept as being in any way satisfactory was the security that would be afforded by a list of unexceptionable barristers under the Government guarantee.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he was afraid that what the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had suggested was hardly practicable: he did not know that the course proposed by the hon. Member had been followed in any case of the kind. Where Commissioners were specially mentioned in Bills the case was altogether different; but certainly he could not find that there was any precedent for doing what was now asked for, where it was merely laid down that certain additional officials should be appointed in order to carry out general duties prescribed in a Bill. He need hardly say that the Government would not in those appointments be influenced by any of the motives suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). As a question arose, so would additional Reviewing Barristers be employed in the counties in which their services might be required, although he was afraid that any assurance which he could give would be of very little value in the eyes of the hon. and learned Member so far as the subject was concerned. The only object and desire of the Government was to have competent persons to do the work impartially and thoroughly. The hon. and learned Member asked if the Government would give a guarantee? Well, he was afraid they could give no guarantee except the assurance he had given, that they had no intention of doing anything unfair in this matter. If they could find impartial gentlemen qualified for those appointments—and, personally, he should be surprised if such could not be found—they would employ them. But two things were necessary—first, that they should be impartial; and, next, that everybody should think that they were impartial. He was not quite so sanguine about securing the second of those conditions as he was with regard to the first; but he could assure the hon. and learned Member that no effort on their part should be spared to find men, in both respects, suitable for this difficult position. The Government were fully impressed with the necessity of having persons who were free from suspicion, especially in the cases of the counties alluded to by the hon. and learned Member, in which there was, no doubt, a strong feeling as to the state of the Register.

MR. LEWIS thought that if they could not trust the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to select, out of 400 practising barristers, those 12 or 18 persons to act for a week, or a fortnight at most, in certain counties of Ireland, the sooner they displaced him the better. He did not suggest for one moment that the interests of any Party were likely to be damaged by this very important provision. He thought it likely that some 20 barristers, perhaps, would get 50 or 60 guineas for a week or ten days' work, and that, as in his own county so with others, they would not probably be required at all; and the number of counties in which additional Revising Barristers would be needed would, in his opinion, be very limited. No doubt there were some constituencies to be found, even in Ireland, which would return Members who would vote for what was called the English Party, and who represented those who still adhered to the Union. He thought that objections might be offered to their being on the Register by the so-called Nationalist Party; but whatever the duties of the additional Revising Barristers were, they would only extend over a short space of time, and he thought it was reducing legislation to a farce to ask the Government to give before the Bill was passed the names of the persons who might be employed.

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, he thought the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had gone out of their way in anticipating that the Revising Barristers would be ill-advised enough to be guilty of any act of partizanship with regard to the registration of voters. He thought those hon. Members might feel some interest in hearing from those who had had large experience in matters connected with registration that there was no such thing as partizanship on the part of Revising Barristers in England. He spoke as one who had been a Revising Barrister for many years, and had had much experience not only as to the feeling and disposition of barristers of his own political opinions, which would be little to the point, but with respect to the feeling of those of all parties; and he believed there was no such thing known as partizanship on the part of Revising Barristers from one end of the Kingdom to the other. When a young barrister was appointed to the position his one anxiety was that his decisions should be received with respect—that they should be given according to law, and with an entire absence of partiality to any political Party whatever; his great point was that his decisions should be legally correct, and not such as to be over-ruled by the Court above, and that he should establish his name and reputation in the Courts of Law as a sound lawyer. That, at any rate, was the case in England; and now with regard to partizanship amongst the Irish barristers. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy) desired to have the names of the persons to be appointed to assist in the work of registration in order that their qualifications might be discussed by politicians, a course, in his opinion, that would be derogatory to their position as judicial officers, and not likely to bring about any useful result. He (Mr. H. G. Allen) ventured to repeat, that any such feeling as partizanship was unknown amongst Revising Barristers in this country; and, from what one knew of members of the Irish Bar whom they met in the English Courts of Law and at the social tables in the Inns of Court, he did not think that they differed from Saxon barristers very much in that respect. For himself, he should have thought that the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland would have been a better authority than the Lord Lieutenant in whom to vest those appointments; but, however that might be, he trusted and felt full confidence that all sinister predictions as to partizanship on the part of Irish Revising Barristers would be entirely falsified. He had made these remarks, because he believed that the revision of voters in Ireland had been hitherto in hands of Chairmen of Sessions and County Court Judges, and that the appointment of Revising Barristers, of which there was so much experience here, was, as yet, an untried mode of proceeding there.

MR. HEALY said, the answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken might be summed up in the words—that the British Constitution was the law in England, but not in Ireland. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) thought it would be all right if the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had the appointing of those barristers. But they knew very well that the Government did not care for their opinion, or for the opinion of the majority of the people of Ireland; the only question they asked themselves was, “How will the Tory Party view our conduct?” They had to please the Tories in this matter. And it would be just the same with the Revising Barristers as it had been with the appointment of the Boundary Commissioners. Some hon. Gentleman—a Member of the Tory Party—would probably go to Dublin Castle and see the Irish Solicitor General, and describe a friend of his as being an admirable person for the post of Revising Barrister; then someone would meet the Solicitor General for Ireland in the street and give the individual's name, and say “he is a member of our Club,” and in that way the appointment would be made. As to telling Irish Members that the most impartial persons would be appointed, it had no weight with them whatever. He would not go into details; but he should like to hear the Solicitor General for Ireland get up and justify at the Table of the House an appointment made last year. The Solicitor General for Ireland would not deny that he got a Bill passed in the House last year under a promise, and that subsequently that promise was broken, owing to the intervention of Earl Spencer. That was the state of things they had to contend with; and with regard to those appointments, Earl Spencer would take out a list of Freemasons, and barristers who were Freemasons would be appointed; he would look up the men who belonged to Orange Lodges and appoint them. There would be no such thing as deferring to public opinion in the matter. He repeated that that was how those affairs were managed in Ireland; and if the Solicitor General for Ireland would challenge him as to what happened last year in Dublin Castle, he ventured to say that the statement he should make would surprise the Committee a great deal. Under the circumstances, Irish Members felt that they ought to have some guarantee with regard to the appointments in this case. How was the Boundary Commission appointed? The Tory Party got its representative upon it, and likewise the Whig Party; but the Party who had three-fourths of the representation of the country were not allowed to have a single man to represent them on that Commission. When they came to the House next year the work of the Revising Barristers would be a thing:—the past, a new Parliament would have been elected, and if Irish Members had cause to complain of the action of the Revising Barristers, and put forward their complaint in that House, the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench would simply laugh in their faces. Irish Members felt that they could not allow the seats in Ireland to be subject to a second course of jerrymandering; and therefore he again urged upon the Government to consent to give the names of the barristers to be appointed to assist in the work of revision before the Bill left the House.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that his experience of such matters was that in former days in Ireland appointments of a legal character were made by the Attorney General or Solicitor General, who exercised the patronage, although the Lord Lieutenant or any other person might nominally hold the position of making the appointments. He was sorry, however, to see that the Attorney General and Solicitors General did not maintain their position as they had been accustomed to in former days, when they would not have allowed a Cabinet Minister to interfere with them in the manner in which they had to perform in the House. He believed that these appointments would be made by those who were best qualified to make them by their knowledge of the legal position and intelligence of those whom they appointed. He thought that hon. Members opposite below the Gangway were living in a fool's paradise. Ulster had always been the special seat of disorder, at least of political and religious strife in Ireland, and in many constituencies probably throughout the three Provinces hon. Gentlemen opposite would be indulged with a contest. They seemed to think that, with the exception of the county of Dublin, there would be a lullaby all over three Provinces in Ireland at the coming General Election, and that no assistance would be required from the Revising Barrister or the County Court Judge, who in Ireland was always the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, although that was not the case in England. Hon. Gentlemen opposite appeared to think that only one state of political feeling would prevail in Ireland; but he had often heard the name of "progress" used, and when the new constituencies were formed there was certainly no guarantee that a good many of the Nationalist Representatives, as they called themselves, might not be replaced by the labourers themselves. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, it would not be in Order to follow up the allusion of the hon. Member to the labourers' question; but he noticed that it had received a cheer from the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). He presumed that the hon. Member meant to insinuate that the cause of the labourers had not received sufficient attention from those Benches.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN: Until lately.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR imagined that, in the opinion of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), the Labourers Bill would already have become law if it had not been for the obstruction of two hon. Gentlemen sitting on his own Benches. No one would dispute the good intentions of the hon. and learned Member for Pembroke (Mr. H. G. Allen); but, at the same time, the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman showed invincible ignorance. The Irish Revising Courts were altogether the reverse of those in England.

The hon. and learned Gentleman said the Revising Barristers of England were anxious to discharge their duties with thorough impartiality, that they avoided everything which bore the semblance of partizanship, and that they were kind and courteous to everybody who appeared before them. It was very different in Ireland, and he would say that there were no tribunals even in that country which gave grosser instances of partiality and partizanship than the Revising Courts there. He was prepared to justify his statement that the only way in which the Irish Courts of Revision could be properly described was by applying to them epithets which were the complete antithesis of those which had been applied by the hon. and learned Gentleman to the Revising Barristers' Courts in England. He would suggest that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) should enlarge his demand, and not only ask the Chief Secretary to name the 14 gentlemen who were to be appointed Revising Barristers in Ireland, but require that they should be all Englishmen, because in that case the Irish people would have a far better guarantee of the impartiality of the tribunal. [Mr. LEAMY dissented.] His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. Leamy) dissented from that view. He could fully understand the feeling of his hon. and learned Friend. The hon. and learned Gentleman was a member of the Legal Profession in Ireland; and, no doubt, if he were appointed, they might depend upon the impartiality of the tribunal. But in Ireland it would be impossible to obtain the services of such men, and he (Mr. O'Connor) was prepared to stand by his opinion that the people would have a far better chance of securing fair treatment from English Revising Barristers than from those selected by the Lord Lieutenant and the Attorney and Solicitor General for Ireland. There was too much cause for suspicion that barristers appointed by Earl Spencer would, in collusion with the agents of the Tory Party, manage to deprive a large number of persons of their votes. He might, perhaps, be allowed to refer to a circumstance which occurred some time ago. Under the Registration Law, every person who desired to get upon the Register was obliged to give personal attendance; and, as his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) well knew from personal experience, a man who preferred a claim was sometimes required to be in attendance for three or four days, yet if he happened to go out of the Court for a few minutes and his name was called in his absence, a partizan Revising Barrister deprived him of his vote. There was another fact he would mention. Sometimes a man whose name was objected to was actually in Court, but, owing to the mumbling way in which his name was read over, he was unable to answer to it, the name was passed over, and in that case also the voter was deprived of his rights. Those were some of the scandals which occurred in Ireland every time a Revising Barristers' Court was held; and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Pembroke (Mr. H. G. Allen), with his kindly feeling, came forward to tell the Committee that the Irish Members were rather too severe in their estimate of the character of the Revising Barristers appointed to act in that country. He thought that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) was perfectly justified in pressing the matter upon the attention of the Chief Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who by that time had acquired perfect command over his Parliamentary demeanour, had used language which no one would better appreciate than the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself; but, nevertheless, there was a public opinion in Ireland, although with perfect certainty they might lay down the rule that whoever might be appointed by Earl Spencer to act as Revising Barrister would not be amenable to it. The Chief Secretary would be able very easily, between that and the further stages of the Bill, to prepare the names of 12 or 14 gentlemen for appointment as Revising Barristers, and if he would not put them into the Bill he might state them to the House. If there were anything like fairness in the selection, the right hon. Gentleman might rest assured that no factious opposition would be raised to them by the Irish Members.

MR. FINDLATER regretted that the experience of his hon. and learned Colleague, for the very short period since he had joined the ranks of the Irish Bar, had been such as to induce him to say that its members were likely to be actuated by partizan motives in discharging the duties of Revising Barristers.

MR. HEALY said, he had not made any assertion of the kind.

MR. FINDLATER said, the Committee had generally understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say so. No doubt many generalities had been stated, but he had not heard a single case adduced by hon. Members opposite of any injustice done by members of the Irish Bar when placed in judicial or quasi-judicial positions. His knowledge of that Bar was much longer than that of his learned Colleague; and he must say that in the whole course of his experience of over 30 years, he never knew anything of the kind to occur. The best proof he could offer of his hon. and learned Colleague's having made a charge, such as he alleged, was that as an illustration of what might be expected from the barristers who would be appointed by the Government, the name of Mr. Piers White had been referred to, and he was charged with having manipulated some of the Northern constituencies when acting as a Boundary Commissioner. He had been acquainted with Mr. Piers White for years, and he was satisfied that everyone who knew that gentleman must have formed the highest opinion of his character and of his ability to do any work that might be intrusted to him. He was a splendid lawyer, with an eminently judicial mind, occupying the very highest position at the Bar, a man of profound culture, and quite incapable of such practices as were attributed to him. If anyone would look at the map of Ireland which had been published some time ago in connection with a certain newspaper in which his hon. and learned Colleague was largely interested, and which purposed to show the constituencies which would return Nationalists at their next Election, they would notice that all of it, with the exception of a small portion at the North-East corner, was coloured green, the national colour; so that, notwithstanding the charges made against Mr. Piers White it was plain the Nationalist Party expected to carry nearly the whole of the country, and that the imputations were the merest clap-trap. ["Order!"

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now discussing another Bill, and is, therefore, out of Order.

MR. FINDLATER said, that his principal reason for rising to take part in the discussion was to defend the members of the Irish Bar from the attack which had been made upon them. He had had very much more experience of the Irish Bar than his hon. and learned Colleague; and he was proud to say that he had had most intimate and friendly relations with some of the most eminent men at that Bar. He believed there was no member of it who was not actuated by as high motives as the Sister Bar of this country, and who was not altogether incapable of the improper conduct which had been suggested.

MR. HEALY said, that the hon. Member had, as usual, shown his ability to misunderstand a perfectly clear statement. All that was asked was that impartial men should be selected for those appointments, and there was no aspersion upon the character of the Irish Bar in making that request. His hon. Colleague had shown himself incompetent to understand the nature of the argument.

MR. FINDLATER very much regretted that his hon. and learned Colleague had brought in the name of Mr. Piers White as that of a gentleman who had been engaged in "jerrymandering" the constituencies. The hon. and learned Member had referred to that gentleman as an illustration of what the gentlemen appointed by the Government were likely to be. As to the flattering comments of the hon. and learned Gentleman upon his own capacity, he could only say "perhaps he was not such a fool as he looked."

MR. MACARTNEY said, he understood the proposal to be that the names of the barristers who were to be appointed to act as Revising Barristers should be submitted to the House. He wished to know if that was the practice in appointing Revising Barristers in England? If it was not, there could be no reason for doing so in the case of Ireland; and, therefore, there was no ground for the extraordinary proposition which had led to this extremely unnecessary and unpleasant discussion.

MR. SEXTON said, the request made to the Government was not that the names of the Revising Barristers to be appointed in Ireland should be submitted for the approval of Parliament, but that they should be made known to Parliament. So far as Mr. Piers White was concerned, he had not been accused of "jerrymandering" one constituency, but of "jerrymandering" six or seven.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he hoped that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) would press the demand he had made that the names of the Revising Barristers should be made known before the Bill became law. It was true that there were many barristers in Ireland who, if appointed, would act in a fair and impartial spirit; but it was also true that in Ireland, as in other countries, there were barristers who could not be regarded as impartial. As that was specially the case in Ireland, what the Committee had to consider was not whether gentlemen of sufficient impartiality could be obtained, but the character of the person or persons who were to appoint those legal gentlemen. It was proposed in the new clause submitted by the Chief Secretary that—

The simple fact that by this proposal the power was to be placed in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant was quite sufficient to arouse the suspicion and hostility of the Irish Members. He had not the slightest hesitation in saying that the very fact of the appointments being in the hands of a man of the character and position of the present Lord Lieutenant was sufficient to induce the Irish Members to oppose the clause. It was altogether preposterous that appointments of so important a character should be left to the Lord Lieutenant. The Revising Barristers would have to perform most important public duties in connection with matters that were of the highest interest to the Irish representation; and that being the case, the people of Ireland and their Representatives ought to have some influence over the appointments made. The very least the Government could do was to place the names of the persons they proposed to appoint before the House, so that if there were any objections they might be duly ventilated. Certainly they were bound to oppose the proposal to leave the whole matter in the hands of a man like Earl Spencer, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy) would divide the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN moved, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clause:—

(Informalities in Registration shall not affect validity of Register.)

"As regards the registers of voters to be made in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, no election shall be questioned by reason of any error or informality whatsoever in relation to the forming, printing, publishing, revising, or completing the lists of voters, or the register of voters, for any county or borough, or by reason of any matter or thing not having been done within the time limited by law for that purpose. The signature of the chairman or revising barrister, or his deputy, to such register shall be conclusive evidence that such register has been in all respects duly made and revised, at the time and in the manner prescribed by and in conformity with the Parliamentary Registration Acts and this Act."

(Collectors shall give assistance in serving notices.)

"The collectors of poor rate in a union shall assist the clerk of the union in carrying into effect the duties imposed upon the clerk by the ninth section of 'The Representation of the People Act, 1884,' by serving the notices mentioned in that section and otherwise."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. SEXTON said, this was an extremely useful clause, as far as it went, and it enacted the important principle that no Register should be rendered invalid on account of any informality. The effect of the clause was to guard against informalities or irregularities in the forming, printing, and completing of the Register by officials; but he thought it ought to be extended by preventing the disfranchisement of persons who through mistake or ignorance did not comply with all the required formalities. He held in his hand a copy of a form issued in Ireland, which was of a most complicated and troublesome character. It referred to—

Mr. William Redmond

"Property in respect of which the person making the return is rated or liable to be rated."

An expression very vague, and not easy to understand. Even an educated man might fill that column in in a manner that would not be perfectly formal or in accordance with the Act. The second column required the situation or description of every dwelling to be given "as defined by the Representation of the People Act;" and the third required the "surname and other name" to be given of every man who was on the 15th July in the English Act, but in this on the 20th, and—

"Up to the date of the return, an inhabitant occupier of any dwelling house in the same column."

He wished to know what the meaning was of inserting in the Irish Bill a different day for the qualification to take effect from that in the English and Scotch Bills? It might be a mistake, and, if so, he hoped it would be rectified; but his contention with regard to these forms was that they were too complicated, and that the uneducated Irish voter would not find it easy to fill them up according to law. His hon. Friend the Member for Wicklow (Mr. W. J. Corbet) had shown him a form which he (Mr. W. J. Corbet) had filled up himself, and it was no easy matter to comprehend how such a form was to be filled up with strict accuracy. He was satisfied that a great many mistakes would be made; and he maintained that, unless there was a desire to see a great number of voters disfranchised, they must extend the scope of the form simply because in their present condition any man, however fairly and honestly he might desire to fill them up, would find it exceedingly difficult to do so. He complained, further, that the forms, although printed with the same object, were not uniform in substance; and he thought there ought to be a penalty subjecting any Clerk of the Union or other official who proceeded contrary to the Act to dismissal. It was of no use to say that the Clerk of the Union must do a certain thing unless they made the law effective by imposing a penalty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) pointed out that non-compliance with the form would not disfranchise the voter or invalidate the election. The clause simply declared that the signature of the Revising Barrister to the Register should be conclusive evidence that the Register had been in all respects duly made and revised, at the time and in the manner prescribed by and in conformity with the law. The validity of the former would not depend upon anything it was the duty of the Clerk of the Union to provide for, but rather upon the machinery for obtaining the necessary information. He did not think any difficulty would arise from any informality in connection with the printed forms.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Clause be added to the Bill."

MR. HEALY expressed a hope that the Government would issue stringent instructions to the Union officers. The letter of the Chief Secretary was very good as far as it went, but it did not go far enough. Would the Government take steps to inform the Poor Law officers in Ireland that they would be acting at their own peril if they refused to carry out the requirements of the Act?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that proper care would be taken to see that the law was carried out.

MR. SEXTON said, he should certainly press a clause for the dismissal of any Poor Law officer who acted contrary to the provisions of the Act.

MR. HEALY wished to point out that unless the agents of the National Party were allowed to see the rate-books in the present month of May, they might as well give up the fight. They had applied to the Clerk of the South Dublin Union for permission to look at the rate-book, but had been refused, although the privilege was at once conceded to the agents of the Conservative Party, even in the presence of the other side. He had those facts in his pocket in a sworn information. He thought, however, it would be better to deal with the matter in a new clause; but he wished to know what undertaking the Government would give that they would have the subject properly attended to, and would support the insertion in the Bill of some provision of this kind? All he asked was that equal facilities should be given to the agents of both political Parties.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN remarked, that if the hon. and learned Member should communicate to the Government the facts in his possession, they would be inquired into. He remembered some days ago receiving a mysterious telegram containing a number of statements which were perfectly unintelligible to him at the time, but which he had no doubt now related to the matter referred to by the hon. and learned Member. He would promise directly he was put in possession of the facts of the case to have them thoroughly inquired into.

MR. HEALY said, that was the third time a complaint had been made to the Government of practices of this kind in connection with the Dublin Unions—not in the time of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary, but of his Predecessors. It was alleged that names were left out which ought to appear on the books. Chapter and verse had been given to the President of the Local Government Board in Ireland; but it was found impossible to obtain one single atom of satisfaction, and the Clerk of the South Dublin Union was still flourishing and carrying on his malpractices. He wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman would support a clause to prevent those practices in future? He had no wish unduly to trouble the right hon. Gentleman, because he knew the Government were anxious to get on with the Bill; but the right hon. Gentleman would perhaps allow him to read a short extract from a letter on this subject. It was from the County of Dublin Registration Association, and it stated that on Monday week two persons called upon the Clerk of the South Dublin Union and requested to see the Rathmines rate-book. They were told they could not have it, as he was using it himself, and they asked for another book, which they were allowed to see. On the following day they again asked for the Rathmines book, and were again refused, and upon asking when they would be permitted to see it, they were told "Not for a month at least." It was scarcely necessary to remind the Committee that to be of any service at all the rate-books must be examined in the month of May. The letter went on to say that the agents of the Association spent the two following days at the office of the Clerk of the Union examining other books under the impression that the one for Rathmines was not to be had, when, much to their surprise, they saw two men from the Constitutional Club march into the room in which they were writing with the Rathmines book in their possession. Those circumstances required no commentary from him. He would only add that the National Party had long been complaining of the conduct of the Clerk of the Union.

MR. LEWIS said, the question now under the consideration of the Committee was whether a new clause should be added to the Bill, which provided that informalities in the registration should not affect the validity of the Register; but the hon. and learned Member had been calling attention to some alleged misconduct on the part of the Clerk of the South Dublin Union. He really did not see how they were to make progress with the Bill if those digressions were to be allowed.

MR. HEALY contended that his remarks were perfectly regular, seeing that one part of the clause was to provide that the Poor Rate collectors should assist the Clerk of the Union in carrying into effect the duties imposed on the Clerk by the Representation of the People Act of last year.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in regard to an alleged infringement of the principles of this clause. I see nothing irregular in that.

MR. HEALY said, he would not trouble the Committee further. His only object had been to impress upon the Chief Secretary the necessity of seeing that equal treatment was meted out to the agents of both political Parties in regard to the inspection of the rate-books. If the right hon. Gentleman would make inquiry, he would find that the Constitutional Club obtained possession of the Rathmines rate-book, whereas the Clerk of the Union refused to allow the agents of the Dublin Registration Association to inspect it.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he would inquire into the matter if the hon. and learned Member would give him the particulars.

Mr. Healy

MR. HEALY promised to place the right hon. Gentleman in possession of the sworn information.

MR. GIBSON remarked, that it ought to be known that the Clerk of the Union had important duties to perform, which required him to examine the rate-books himself.

MR. SEXTON said, the only comment he would make upon the remark of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that the necessity for examining the rate-book himself did not account for the Clerk of the Union handing it over to the agents of one Party and retaining it to those of the other. The complaint was that both Parties were not treated alike, but that the rate-books had been dealt with to the advantage of one side and the damage of the other. He would ask, as a matter of information, whether the Government could extend the period for the inspection of the rate-books so that disfranchisement might not result from want of time?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that it was intended to extend the time by an additional six days; but he did not think it would be necessary to make provision for any further extension of time.

MR. P. J. POWER wished to point out that already some of the officials of the different Unions in Ireland had taken action in the matter. A Board of Guardians with which he had some connection had three weeks ago moved in the matter, and yet they told him that it might be impossible for them to comply with all the necessary formalities at the time fixed by the Act. And yet the Waterford Union stood in an exceptionally favourable position, seeing that they had already taken steps. Many other Unions had taken no steps whatever, and if those who had moved already found it difficult to comply with the provisions of the law, it would be absolutely impossible for others less favourably situated to perfect the arrangements by the proper date. Under those circumstances, he hoped the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) would receive the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 1, after Clause 1, to insert the following Clause:—

"For the purposes of the household qualification created by 'The Representation of the People Act, 1884,' separate rating of a dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, separately occupied, shall not be necessary to entitle the inhabitant occupier of same to be registered as a voter in respect thereof."

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. GIBSON said, the proposal virtually amounted to an interpretation of an Act passed only a few months ago—the Representation of the People Act. He altogether protested against it, and would remind the Committee that it was not sought in the same way to interpret the Act so far as England and Scotland were concerned. He should be glad to learn what the Government intended to do in the matter?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the matter had been carefully considered in regard to Ireland. This law was only extended to that country by the Act of 1884. A doubt had been raised whether separate rating of a dwelling-house, or part of a dwelling-house, separately occupied, was necessary to entitle the inhabitant occupier to be registered, and after careful consideration the Government had come to the conclusion that such a doubt should not exist in Ireland. The question would be rendered quite clear by the insertion of this clause.

MR. GIBSON said, that by this clause they were dealing in a Registration Bill with a question altogether outside registration, and there was no similar clause either in the English or the Scotch Act. He should certainly indicate his dissent from the adoption of the clause, although he would not say that he would put the Committee to the trouble of a division. It was, however, in the last degree unsatisfactory that a matter entirely outside the scope of registration should be illegitimately inserted in a Registration Bill. Whatever might be the merits of the clause, it had no right to find a place there.

MR. MACARTNEY pointed out that it was common in Ireland to have two habitations under the same roof, which were really separate residences of equal value. How would the clause apply to such a case? One of the occupiers might pay his rates, and then be made liable for the other.

MR. LEWIS remarked, that the Representation of the People Act was either complete or it was not, and he could not believe that it was necessary to supplement in another and a distinct Bill the provisions of a measure passed so recently as three or four months ago. The present proposal virtually amounted to the insertion in a Registration Bill of an Interpretation Clause to the Representation of the People Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) concurred with the view which had been expressed by the Solicitor General for Ireland. The only object of the clause was to make the law perfectly clear, and to prevent future litigation.

MR. SEXTON said, the clause simply amounted to a declaration of the law upon a point that was now vague.

MR. MACARTNEY remarked, that what was desired in Ireland was that the law there should be assimilated to that of England and Scotland.

MR. LEWIS said, the House had hitherto sheltered themselves under the ample folds of the Attorney General, who they believed to have been responsible for the drafting of the Representation of the People Bill. They now understood from the hon. and learned Gentleman that after all the labour which had been bestowed upon it by the House and the officials of the Government the provisions of that Bill were ambiguous. He deeply regretted that announcement; but he thought it followed that for the sake of safety a similar provision should be inserted in the English Registration Bill. He protested against the attitude taken by the Government, and thought that it was most inconvenient to amend in a Registration Bill any defects in the Representation of the People Act of 1884.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that England and Ireland stood in a different position in regard to registration. The Act of 1878 applied to England and not to Ireland, and the object of this clause was simply to make it clear what the law was, so that no difficulty might arise when the Revising Barristers held their Courts.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. HEALY moved, after Clause 2, to insert the following Clause:—

(Correction of list by Revising Barrister.)

“Where, on the revision of the list or lists of voters for any county, city, town, or borough in Ireland, the matter stated in a list or claim, or proved to the revising barrister in relation to any alleged right to be on any list, is, in the judgment of the revising barrister, insufficient in law to constitute a qualification of the nature or description stated or claimed, but sufficient in law to constitute a qualification of some other nature or description, the revising barrister, if the name is entered in a list for which such true qualification in law is appropriate, shall correct such entry by inserting such qualification accordingly, and, in any other case, shall insert the name with such qualification in the appropriate list, and shall expunge it from the other list, if any, in which it is entered.”

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be read a second time.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, this was a clause taken from the English Act of 1878, and the only question which arose was whether it was not desirable to add to the clause as it stood on the Paper Sub-section 13 of the English clause. He would suggest that that addition should be made.

MR. HEALY assented.

Clause, as amended, read a second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, he had intended to move the omission of Clause 6 for the purpose of proposing the insertion of a clause to remunerate Clerks of Unions and Poor Rate collectors for the duties imposed on them by the Registration Acts; but as the Government intended to bring up a clause dealing with the question, he would not move it.

MR. SMALL moved to amend Clause 5 by adding to the end of it words requiring the Town Councils or the Town Commissioners of the Irish boroughs to divide such boroughs into polling districts in the manner most convenient for taking the votes of electors. The smallest of the nine boroughs left in Ireland would have at least 1,000 voters, and it would be very inconvenient indeed to have 3,000 voters polling at the same place. It was therefore advisable, he thought, to give the Town Councils power to divide the boroughs into polling districts, either alphabetically—although that might perhaps, be inconvenient—or otherwise.

New Clause:—

(Town Council and Commissioners may divide boroughs into polling districts)

“Not later than one month after the passing of this Act, the Town Council or Town Commissioners of each of the other boroughs in Ireland shall respectively take into consideration the division of the borough into polling districts, and shall respectively divide each borough into polling districts, in such manner as may be most convenient for taking the votes of electors, and in such manner that as nearly as possible an equal number of voters may be allotted to each polling district.”—Small,

—brought up, and read the first time

Motion made, and Question proposed: “That the said Clause be read a second time.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said the hon. Member would observe that in the Bill provision was made for the division by the Town Councils, of the boroughs of Dublin and Belfast into wards. The reason of that was that those boroughs had already been divided, and, therefore, it was necessary to make provision for them. It was not considered necessary to make provision for the other boroughs; but as Dublin and Belfast were already divided it was necessary to provide for polling places there.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed: “That the Clause be added to the Bill.”

MR. GIBSON said, there seemed to have been some misconception as to regard to this clause, as it had been read a second time, although the Solicitor General for Ireland opposed it as unnecessary.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80: Majority 51.—(Div. List No. 146.)

The Attorney General

MR. SMALL said, he would now move the second Amendment that stood in his name—namely, the insertion of a new clause after Clause 7, for the purpose of providing that—

It appeared to him that it would be only quite fair that the Town Commissioners of Newry should pay the cost of revising the list of voters as far as those voters were resident within the limits of the borough of Newry, and that it would be very unfair to call upon that body also to pay the expenses of revision in the case of those voters who resided outside the limits of the borough and in parts of the counties of Down and Armagh, and who contributed towards the taxation of those counties. The hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had a similar proposition on the Paper with reference to the City of Dublin and the county adjacent, the question which arose in that case being exactly the same as that which had arisen in regard to the borough of Newry, except that Newry extended into two adjoining counties instead of one. If this clause were not accepted the town of Newry would not only have to pay the cost of the revision of the borough list of voters, but also a portion of the cost of revising the voters' lists for the two counties of Down and Armagh. That, he thought, would be an injustice to the ratepayers of Newry, and it was to remedy that injustice that he proposed the present Amendment. He had no reason to anticipate that the clause would meet with any opposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, inasmuch as it merely dealt with a state of affairs which ought never to have arisen. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would display a more generous spirit than to oppose the clause.

New Clause:—

“The treasurers of the counties of Down and Armagh shall repay to the Town Commissioners of Newry such sums respectively as shall bear to the entire expenses of the revision of the voters' lists for the borough of Newry the same proportion as the number of electors of the borough qualifying out of premises outside the municipal boundary of Newry, in the counties of Down and Armagh, bear to the entire number of electors of the borough, and the Town Commissioners shall not be liable to contribute any sum towards the expenses of the revision of the voters' lists for the counties of Down and Armagh.”—(Mr. Small.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be read a second time.”

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the case of Newry was one that had been very curious to deal with. It was not an analogous case to that of Pembroke, for while the borough of Newry ran into two different counties it did not, in so doing, present anything like a well-defined area. It was proposed that where the borough of Newry overlapped the counties of Down and Armagh, the Grand Juries of those two counties should provide for the cost of revising the voters' list; but at the same time the hon. Member, in making that proposal, had not stated out of what fund the money should come. It would no doubt be hard upon the borough of Newry to have to pay the expense of revision in the case of those voters who resided beyond the municipal limits; but it would be still harder to throw the cost on those who inhabited parts of baronies in the two counties, where the area was part of a county barony but also part of the borough of Newry. In such a case, the question was who ought to pay the expense of revision? Was it to be the inhabitants of the borough, or was it to be the inhabitants of the barony outside, who had nothing to do with the registration affecting the borough? It seemed to him that of the two propositions the more reasonable one would be to throw the expense on the inhabitants of the borough, because the borough would certainly have the benefit to be derived from the inclusion of the additional electors. With regard to the other proposal of the hon. Gentleman, he could not see what connection it had with this subject, and he did not think there was anything to be found in the Bill that would warrant an arrangement of the kind proposed.

MR. SMALL said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman fully understood the local bearings of the matter, and there could be little doubt that in the present instance there had been an oversight. The right hon. Gentleman had asked out of what fund the money was to be paid? The answer was, out of the general fund of the county, of course. The borough of Newry was quite willing to continue its liability with regard to anything within the municipal limits; but they asked the county to resume their original liability with regard to anything out of the municipal boundaries. All that was asked by this clause was a simple act of justice, and it was no part of the bargain that Newry should pay the expenses of revising lists of voters for those who resided outside the municipal boundaries. With regard to the second part of the question, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman could really be of opinion that it was quite fair that the borough of Newry should pay for the revision of the county lists.

MR. MACARTNEY said, as a Grand Juror for the county of Armagh, he believed he might state that a bargain was made between the town of Newry and the county of Armagh, in which specific conditions were laid down; and it was now proposed that those conditions should be got rid of by a side wind. It seemed to him that such a proposition was most unfair. With regard to the question as to the difference in the expense being borne by the borough or the county, he thought it only right to point out, as a matter for the consideration of the Committee, that while there were a great many voters for the county of Armagh who resided in Newry, there were no voters for Newry who resided in the county of Armagh.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) had ventured on a mere assumption of his own.

MR. MACARTNEY: I think I remember.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Gentleman now thought he remembered.

MR. MACARTNEY: I am sure I do.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Member was improving as he went on, and presently, in all probability, he would swear he remembered; but until the Committee had something better than the statement of the hon. Gentleman before them, he (Mr. Healy) should be very sorry to act upon it. He would, however, offer a suggestion which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would be prepared to accept. The Government had proposed to adopt a remedy in the case of Dublin which was very similar to that of Newry; but, as usual, they had not put the matter in an intelligible and practical shape. He had been about to draw the attention of the Government to this question, and to ask them to state what their proposals really were. He thought the Government ought to say at once that they would bring up a new clause, under which it should be provided that no one area should have imposed upon it the preparation of the list of voters belonging to any other area. Surely one set of people ought not to be called upon to bear the expense that ought to be defrayed by another set of people. His hon. Friend the Member for Westmeath (Mr. Small) was a member of the Town Council of Newry, and therefore understood the matter with which he proposed to deal; and he (Mr. Healy) felt very assured that unless there was such better evidence of a contract between the borough of Newry and the county of Armagh than the "I remember," or "I think I remember" of the hon. Member for Tyrone, that House would not be disposed to do what would really amount to the perpetration of an injustice towards the borough of Newry. The Government, ought, therefore, to say definitely that one area should not have a claim to make charges of one sort on another area, involving financial relations of a character which he could not understand.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

MR. LEWIS said, it seemed to him that the Government ought to deal with questions of this kind, instead of leaving them to be dealt with by Amendments and proposals from all parts of the House. It was for the Government to take the responsibility in regard to those things upon themselves and they ought to satisfy themselves before the Report as to what ought really be done. But, instead of taking those matters entirely under their own charge, the Government accepted all sorts of Amendments moved by individual Members. That was a most unsatisfactory way of doing business, and he should oppose the Amendment on that ground.

MR. SEXTON said, he did not propose to supplement the arguments that had been brought forward in reference to the case of Newry; but he desired to point out that with regard to the case of Dublin the grievance was undeniable and required a remedy.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, there was a proposal on the Paper dealing with the matter referred to by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton).

MR. MACARTNEY submitted that instead of proposing the clause as it stood the hon. Member for Wexford ought to propose an Amendment providing that the Town Commissioners of Newry should not be liable for any revision expenses in connection with the adjoining counties.

MR. HEALY said, that was what the clause proposed. He wished to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he would, on the Report, bring up an omnibus clause that would deal fairly with the whole question?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, in his opinion, the cases of Black Rock and Pembroke were quite different.

MR. GIBSON ventured to say that the question under discussion was not a matter of controversy as affecting one side of the House and the other; and they appeared all anxious to do the best they could in regard to it. He understood that some statement had been made to the effect that there might have been a contract on the subject as between the borough of Newry and the adjoining counties. He did not know how far that was so, but, at any rate, they had heard the arguments used on behalf of the borough; and, on the other hand, the other areas that would be affected had a right to be heard, and as the matter was not one of controversy, but one that might be settled between them and the Report in a peaceful way, he would suggest that the clause should be withdrawn, that the treasurers of the counties of Down and Armagh, who understood the question, should be consulted, and that, after it had been thoroughly investigated and a fuller knowledge of its merits arrived at, the Government should deal with it on Report.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had no objection to the adoption of the course suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson). The only objection he could see was that the area outside the municipal boundary of Newry was not a very well arranged area in itself.

MR. SMALL said, he was willing to accept the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) and to withdraw his Amendment with the intention of bringing it up again on the Report stage, on the understanding that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would consider the matter in the meantime.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn

MR. GIBSON said, he had upon the Paper a clause intended to enable the Lord Lieutenant, with the consent of the Treasury, to grant to the County Court Judges such remuneration and assistance for the first sitting for the registry of voters after the passing of this Bill as might be deemed just; but he found that he was unable to move it. He hoped, however, that the Government would take care that the duties of the County Court Judges should not be substantially infringed, and would modify their labours as much as possible by availing themselves of the powers already given for the appointment of a sufficient number of Revising Barristers to obviate any difficulty that might otherwise be experienced.

MR. MACARTNEY hoped the Clerks of the Peace for the counties would not be forgotten.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, he had now to move the clause which stood on the Paper in his name. The clause was one that dealt solely with frivolous objections to voters, and the point involved had already been fully debated in that House. He thought that the existing state of the Law of Registration in Ireland had been well and truly described by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, when he had said a worse system of registration it would be impossible to find, inasmuch as by its operation in that country, particularly in regard to the number of frivolous objections, thousands of men were deprived of their rights of citizenship. As the law at present stood, instead of affording facilities to claimants to be put upon the lists of voters, it placed every obstacle in the way of their getting on the Register. The result was that in the Irish Registration Courts claimants attended, day after day, for the purpose of sustaining their claims until they became wearied out and gave up the attempt in disgust, and either went back to their homes, or, as the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had stated, were absent from the Court at the time their names were called, and thus were struck out of the list, without any means of obtaining redress. Thus, after having waited for several days, and incurring considerable expense, they failed entirely in their object, and went home in disgust. It was pretty well known that for a man to get his name on the Register in Ireland was almost an impossibility and the next thing to a miracle, and any man who wanted to look after his business, and who did not mix himself up in politics, would not attend the Revision Courts and subject himself to all the trouble and worry thereby entailed. The consequence was that the hired and paid objector had only to invest a few shillings in postage stamps, and to send out notices of objection broadcast, and his object was secured, because the persons objected to, although their names might have been passed by the collectors and Clerks of the Peace, would not put themselves to the expense and trouble of attending the Courts for the purpose of substantiating their claims. That House had recently passed a measure designed to enfranchise the Irish people; but unless an amendment of the law as to registration were made so as to put a barrier in the way of frivolous objections, the people of Ireland would not obtain that measure of enfranchisement which it was the object of the Representation of the People Bill to confer. He contended that it was the duty of the Government to give the people it was intended to enfranchise every opportunity of being put upon the Register. The main feature in the clause he now moved was that the ground or grounds of objection should be specifically stated in the notice of objection, and it was also proposed that no person objected to should be required to give evidence in support of his claim otherwise than in regard to the points of objection specified in the notice; but this was not a part of the question immediately before the Committee. He appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite to assist the Committee in the endeavour to put an end to the frivolous objections against which the clause was directed, and he hoped the clause would meet with acceptance at the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

New Clause:—

Prevention of frivolous Objections.

(Notices of objection shall state grounds of objection. See 28 and 29 Vic. c. 36, s. 6.)

"Any notice of objection given under sections twenty-six or thirty-six of 'The Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Act, 1850,' to any person on any list of claimants may be given according to the provisions of either of those sections respectively; but, with that exception, no notice of objection given under the said Act to any person upon any list of voters shall be valid unless the ground or grounds of objection be specifically stated therein; and this provision shall be deemed to be sufficiently satisfied by naming the column or columns of the register on which the objector grounds his objection, and any objection grounded upon any one of the said columns shall be deemed a separate ground of objection, and such notice may be according to the form in the Schedule to the Act annexed, or to the like effect, in substitution for the forms numbered (12) in Schedule (A) and (15) in Schedule (B) respectively of 'The Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Act, 1850,'"—(Mr. T. A. Dickson),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN expressed his assent to the clause, and reminded the Committee that the clause put on the Paper by the hon. Member (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had been embodied by the Government in a Bill that had left that House two years ago.

MR. LEWIS said, these new clauses offered another illustration of the practice by which the Government fathered Amendments without taking upon themselves the responsibility of proposing them. The assumption was that these clauses were to assimilate the law of Ireland with that of England; but the assumption could hardly be made good because the Government had already assented to an Amendment to this Bill with regard to the receipt of medical relief that made a wide difference between the law of Ireland and that which was retained in England. The clause now under consideration went far beyond anything that prevailed in England. It was only with regard to county voters that there was any such requirement in the English law, and the reason was that when they were dealing with county votes all sorts of questions as to freeholds and so forth arose. With regard to borough votes, however, the case was more simple, and the questions arising were of a very different order. He thought that that was a remarkable instance of the Government allowing other persons to do what ought to be their business. That being a Government Bill, the House ought to have the benefit of the Government responsibility in regard to important proposals, which ought to be brought forward by their Law Officers instead of being left in the hands of private Members. The effect of this clause if carried would be to run far ahead of the law of England by requiring in the case of boroughs that all notices of objection should set forth the different grounds of objection. The Act of 1878, no doubt, was the Act which regulated the registration in boroughs. He had searched through the clauses in the endeavour to discover anything which required the grounds of objection to be stated, and had failed in his attempt. He thought, therefore, that this was inapplicable to boroughs, at any rate, though there was no ground for it in the counties.

DR. LYONS said, he wished to endorse the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson). On a former occasion when the subject was under consideration he had mentioned a remarkable fact in connection with himself. For 10 years, owing to frivolous objections, he had never been able to get his name upon the Register of the county of Dublin. He had never been able to attend personally, and in consequence of that fact and other circumstances he had never been put on the Register.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that the clause proposed would make the law of England and Ireland identical, as would be seen on reference to Clause 26 of the Act of 1878. That clause required that in the notice to be given in the case of borough voters the objection should be stated specifically.

MR. HEALY said, that on a former occasion he remembered the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) making some remark as to this system of objection. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had pointed out that this proposal left too much power in the hands of the officials, and he (Mr. Healy) was to a certain extent inclined to agree with him, and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward any Amendment for the purpose of providing that Union officials who corruptly discharged their duties should be punished, he (Mr. Healy) would be glad to support him. He thought that a clause of this kind, which gave power to Union officers to put on the Register whomsoever they liked, ought to be tempered with some penal provision to the effect that, if it was found—as had been found in the case of the South Dublin Union—that people were put on the list who were never in the district at all, the officers who were guilty of such misrepresentation should be heavily punished. The Committee was familiar with what had occurred in the South Dublin Union—names had been put on the Register fraudulently, and it could not be for a moment contended that it happened from accident. He confessed that, whatever might have been the state of the case previously, he (Mr. Healy) was not so enthusiastic as to this provision as he was two or three years ago; in fact, he had been not ungrateful to the House of Lords for having rejected the Bill in 1883. He believed it would have been impossible for them to have worked the County Dublin had the House of Lords passed it. In his own case in the county of Monaghan the Register would have been against him under the £12 franchise if this clause had been carried. He certainly viewed with apprehension this power given to the Union officials in Ireland to make themselves Returning Officers in counties and boroughs unless some severe penalty were provided for fraudulent entries. As to one detail of this clause, it would prevent frivolous objections to voters, but it did nothing to prevent frivolous objections in the case of claimants. Yet the next proviso was that all “persons”—claimants as well as voters—should not be required to give evidence except in so far as such right was called specifically in question by the notice of objection. That appeared to him to be somewhat extraordinary, and he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland as to this point, whether this was not inconsistent?

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, that having seen the Registration Act worked, he might say that when a man was put upon the voters' list, he could not be struck off unless evidence were given that he had no qualification; but when a man was on the claimants' list, he then had to prove his possession of a qualification, and that made all the difference. A man could not be struck off unless substantial proof were given in Court that he had lost his qualification.

MR. CALLAN asked, how the hon. Member would deal with the supplementary lists, which were most important?

MR. T. A. DICKSON: They are lists of claimants.

MR. CALLAN said, they were not; and that showed how little the county Members understood this question. The claimants' lists and the supplementary lists were quite different. The rule in Ireland was that if a man was on the electoral list he could not be displaced unless it were proved that he had lost his qualification. A claimant could be obliged to prove his claim; but there was another important list—namely, that which was called the supplementary list—a list of those whose names were brought forward for the first time, who had not been electors in the previous year, and who were obliged, even if there were no objection lodged against them and even though they were on the list of poor-rate payers, to prove their claim. Vexatious objections might be raised to that list, and the onus of proof should be on the objector, and not upon the person who was not a claimant, but had been put upon the list by the rate collector. His (Mr. Callan's) contention was that, unless there were objections raised to those persons being put upon the list, they should be put on as a matter of course.

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, that the law really was this—and it had been found a very salutary one—that those who came as claimants to be placed upon the list for the first time, never having been on it before, were required, in answer to an objection made generally, to prove their title. After that, any objection made against them must include substantially the specific grounds of objection. When a man had once got upon the Register, it required a very strong case to strike him off. The Amendment before the Committee would assimilate the law of Ireland upon this subject to that of England, and he had much pleasure in supporting it.

MR. FINDLATER said, that he could speak from experience of the necessity of making perfectly sure that, when an objection was taken to a name of a voter being placed upon the list, the person raising the objection should be subjected to the payment of costs.

MR. GIBSON said, he objected to the scheme and scope of this Bill being diverted from what it was stated it was to be by the Prime Minister and those who were responsible for the Registration Bills. They had been told that Registration Bills would be introduced for the three countries to apply the existing registration machinery to the electorate manufactured by the Reform Bill. It was not the intention stated by the Prime Minister and the Government, and it was not in accordance with common sense that in the Bill relating to one of the three countries the opportunity should be taken of not only introducing a machinery registration measure, but also a Reform Registration Bill. The clauses now under discussion were really Reform Registration Clauses and were, therefore, outside the scope of what the Bill should be. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Findlater) and his hon. and learned Colleague who sat upon the Opposition side of the House (Mr. Healy), so far as he (Mr. Gibson) could see, the clauses of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) did provide that as to objections taken to names already on the voters' list, those objections should be specific and detailed. That was the way he (Mr. Gibson) took it; he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had considered the matter, and had put his own construction on it. The proper reading was that the notice of objection having been given, all the grounds of objection should be specifically and plainly stated. Both Members for Monaghan seemed to desire that, and therefore he would not take objection to it.

MR. CALLAN asked, whether in the proposed new clause any distinction had been made between the list of claimants and what was called the supplementary list? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) appeared to be ignorant on that subject.

MR. GIBSON: Oh, no; I understand it perfectly well.

MR. CALLAN said, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was perfectly familiar with the point, and what he (Mr. Callan) said was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be ignorant. In Ireland there were three lists published. First, that of the people whose names were on the Register for the preceding year; and if any objections to the voters whose names had appeared on that list were taken, it was necessary for the objectors to show that the voters had lost their qualification before they could be displaced. But then there was the supplementary list, which was a prima facie list of those entitled to be on the Register. Supposing a man died and his son who inherited his name was put on, or supposing a man inherited or was entitled to be put on by marriage, his name was put on that list. The name of such person would be put on the Register without any proof whatever, and the person would become an elector unless his claim was disproved. But if he received a notice of objection three months before the month of October, the onus was put upon him to come forward and prove his claim. The result was that whenever any voter in Ireland died, or any of his connections from whom he inherited, a three-fold objection was made against him, and he was compelled to come and uphold his right. That list was very different to the list of claimants—so essentially different that he should not like to vote with the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan on the question of claimants. On all matters affecting Party in Ireland the Conservatives were able to use an elaborate and efficient organization, and to lodge a number of objections to the supplementary list. Every name that appeared on the supplementary list was objected to, in the hope that the person would not be able to prove his claim. In that manner the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Corry) and others of his class succeeded in striking from the Register in Belfast and other places, for their own purpose, the names of a great many artizans. The supplementary list was only a list of those who, by marriage, inheritance, and so on, came upon the list; and he (Mr. Callan) would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to place his foot down and say that those who came on the supplementary list should be placed in the same position as those who were already on the list of voters. He would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to express his view upon this matter. The list of the Clerks of Unions should be taken as a prima facie proof of a man's title to the franchise.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that anyone who had studied the Act of 1850 would know that it included those persons on the Register of the previous year and on the supplemental list.

MR. HEALY said, he did not pretend to understand this matter; he thought that any voter should have a right to object to a perfectly new claimant who had not been on the list before without being obliged to serve notice of objection. He would allow anyone in Court to object. As it was, all three Parties, the Liberals, the Conservatives, and the Nationalists, objected, each being obliged to throw away a 3*d.* stamp. Why should they not allow anyone to object—why throw away those 3*d.* stamps? It only gave the Revising Barristers more work to do. Claimants were bound to be objected to in that roundabout way, because, unless objection had been previously taken, it was not possible to put a question to them in Court. If the Solicitor General for Ireland would refer to the fifth line of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), he would observe these words—

“But, with that exception, no notice of objection given under the said Act to any person upon any list of voters shall be valid unless the ground or grounds of objection be specifically stated therein.”

But later on they intended to provide that objections against all “persons,” that was claimants included, should state the grounds of objection. With regard to the first part of the provision, he would suggest, as he had already stated, that anyone should have the right prima facie to object to the claim of a person to be put on the Register without it being necessary to provide these 3d. stamps. If that were not done, people would object to a claimant without knowing anything about the matter, simply to be on the safe side and to assist the Revising Barrister in doing his duty.

MR. CALLAN asked how the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) proposed to deal with voters on the supplementary list to whom objection might be taken? Would those persons whose names were in the voters' list of another Union stand in the same valid position as they did in the voters' list of the previous year?

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the supplementary list might be shortly described as a record for the use of the Clerk of the Union of persons debarred from voting for one cause or another. He wanted those persons who appeared on the supplementary list to be protected in the same way as the voters on the previous Register were protected.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) suggested that the clause should be allowed to pass, and that the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) or the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) should raise their objection to it, if they had any to raise, on the Report stage.

MR. CALLAN said, he did not raise any objection whatever to the clause. As a matter of fact, he had always objected to the supplementary list. He objected to the supplementary list in his own county; he objected to the name of anyone who was unfavourable to him, and thereby put him on the proof. He regarded it as a most unfair thing; but, at the same time, it was a facility afforded him by the law as it now existed. He wanted to do away with that; and he remarked that however objectionable it might be when it was a question of 200 or 300 names, it would be far more so when there were 2,000 or 3,000 to deal with. There were two official lists published, and he wanted to call the attention of the Solicitor General for Ireland to this fact. One was the official list of the voters of the previous year. For instance, if an election took place this year there would be the official list published of persons on the Register for 1885; that was sent to the Clerks of the Unions in the month of July, and that person put objections against the names of persons on various grounds. Then there was what was called the supplementary list, which contained the names of persons entitled since the previous year to be on the Register; that was dealt with by the Clerk of the Union in the same manner as the ordinary list. In the case of objection being raised to anyone on that list, he must prove his right to vote; whereas he (Mr. Callan) contended that the onus of proof ought to be placed on the objector. He thought that common sense demanded that a change should be made in this matter.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Costs to be awarded not to exceed £5. 2s and 2d Vic. c. 36, s. 14. 13 and 14 Vic. c. 69, s. 62.)

“The sum ordered to be paid by way of costs shall not upon any one vote exceed the sum of five pounds, and the sixty-second section of ‘The Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Act, 1850,’ shall be read as if the words ‘five pounds’ had been substituted therein for the words ‘twenty shillings.’” — (Mr. T. A. Dickson.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be read a second time.”

MR. HEALY suggested that the clause should not be put in this form so far as the present Motion was concerned. It would be better that the clause should be put as far as the words “five pounds” in the second line.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Proceedings on objections. 13 and 14 Vic. c. 69, s. 55. 41 and 42 Vic. c. 26, s. 25.)

“Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in ‘The Parliamentary Voters (Ireland) Act, 1850,’ where any person whose name is on any list of voters for a county, city, town, or borough (not being a list of claimants) is duly objected to by some person other than the clerk of the peace, the clerk of the union, the poor rate collector, or the town clerk, the county court judge, chairman, or revising bar-ister, whether the person objected to does or does not appear before him, shall, before requiring it to be proved that the person objected to is entitled to have his name inserted in the list of voters for such county, city, town, or borough, or expunging such name, require prima facie proof to be given to his satisfaction of some ground of objection against such person, and, for the purpose of determining whether such prima facie proof is satisfactory, shall examine the collectors of poor rates, clerk of the union, or any other person who may be present, touching the truth of the alleged ground of objection, and if such prima facie proof is not so given to his satisfaction, he shall retain the name of the person objected to in the list of voters,"—(Mr. T. A. Dickson,) —brought up, and read the first and second time.

Mr. Healy

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

MR. LEWIS said, that this provision was meant to apply to persons who would now come upon the list for the first time as well as to old voters. It was capable of so much misuse that he proposed to add to the clause an Amendment to the effect that the section should not apply to any objection where the person objected to was on the list of voters in respect of a qualification for which he should not have been registered on the list of voters for the present year. It was necessary that there should be a clear line of demarcation between the old list and the new with regard to the costs of objections. As to the form that had to be handed in by occupiers relating to sub-tenants, he did not believe that one Member of the House out of 50 could of his own motion fill it up properly; anything more technical or misleading to be placed in the hands of persons deficient in ordinary intelligence and experience could not be conceived. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that the question as to what constituted a dwelling-house had been raised in the Courts of Law, and that the decision had ultimately turned on whether the chief occupier or landlord resided on the premises or not. This form then assumed that the person was acquainted with an abstruse point of law, and the result must be that vast numbers of those forms would be filled up ignorantly, and a great number of them improperly. He believed that persons would be put on who might have been in occupation only a week, and many who were not in occupation of a dwelling-house at all. His Amendment was to prevent manipulation, either by ignorance or fraud, by enacting that the stringent provision that the objectors should prove their objection prima facie should not apply the first time a name appeared on the list. He believed that it would be obvious to the Committee that it was desirable that that addition should be made, and he could see no reasonable objection to it, because it was hostile to the interests of no Party. His contention was that the onus should not be shifted, and that it was fair that it should remain where it was at present in the case of new voters.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new Clause, at end, add—

"But this section shall not apply to any objection where the person objected to is on the list of voters in respect of a qualification for which he shall not have been registered on the list of voters for the present year."—(Mr. Lewis.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the Amendment would nullify what the Committee had already agreed to, and he could not, therefore, agree to it.

Amendment negatived.

Clause added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Power of revising barrister to summon witnesses.)

"A revising barrister may by summons under his hand require any person to attend at the court and give evidence or produce documents for the purpose of the revision, and any person who, after the tender to him of a reasonable amount for his expenses, fails so to attend, or who fails to answer any question put to him by the revising barrister in pursuance of this section, or to produce any document which he is required in pursuance of this section to produce, shall be liable to pay a fine not exceeding five pounds and not less than twenty shillings. Such fine may be imposed by the revising barrister at his discretion, and may be recovered in the same manner as any other fine imposed by 'The Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1850,' is now by law recoverable,"—(Mr. Healy,)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that the contingency contemplated by the hon. and learned Member was sufficiently provided for by the 56th section of the Act of 1850. He did not think, therefore, that the clause was necessary, and he suggested to the hon. and learned Member that it should not be pressed.

MR. T. A. DICKSON said, as a matter of fact, when a County Court Judge summoned a witness, and he did not attend, no further steps were taken. Dozens of cases of that kind occurred; and the Judge would not compel the witnesses to attend. If notice was issued, he thought that they ought to be compelled to attend.

MR. HEALY pointed out that, as the matter now stood, a witness who happened to be hostile had only to get up when he liked and walk out of Court.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked why, if, as the Solicitor General for Ireland had stated, this was provided for in the Act of 1850, it was necessary to provide for it again in the English Act of 1870?

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could see no possible objection to repeating in the Irish Act what was already in the English Act.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he would not press his objection to the Amendment.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Costs of appeal.)

"The costs of an appellant against a decision of a revising barrister may, if the appeal is successful, be ordered by the court hearing the appeal to be paid by the clerk of the peace or town clerk named as respondent in the said appeal, whether he shall or shall not appear before the said court in support of the decision.

"For enabling an appellant to obtain such an order he may, at or before the time of making his declaration of appeal under section fifty-eight of 'The Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1850,' require the revising barrister to name the clerk of the peace for the county, or the town clerk for the parliamentary borough or municipal borough, as the case may be, to which the appeal relates, to be respondent in the appeal.

"The revising barrister if so required shall, and in any case may, name such clerk of the peace or town clerk, as the case may be, to be respondent in an appeal, either alone or in addition to any other person referred to in section fifty-nine of 'The Parliamentary Registration (Ireland) Act, 1850.'

The Solicitor General for Ireland

"The expenses properly incurred by a clerk of the peace or town clerk as respondent, including any costs which he may be ordered to pay to the appellant in any such appeal, shall be allowed to him as part of the expenses incurred by him in respect of the revision of the list to which the appeal relates. The costs of an appeal against the decision of a revising barrister shall be in the discretion of the court hearing the appeal,"—(Mr. Healy.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the said Clause be read a second time."

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Rate-books may be amended.)

"The board of guardians of any poor law union may from time to time amend any rate made for such union by virtue of the Acts for the relief of the destitute poor in Ireland, by inserting in the rate-book the name of any person claiming and entitled to have his name therein as owner or occupier, or by inserting therein the name of any person who ought to have been rated, or by striking out the name of any person who ought not to have been rated, or by raising or reducing the rate at which any person has been rated, if it appears to the board that such person has been under-rated or over-rated through clerical error, or by making such other amendments therein as will make such rate conformable to the said Acts; and no such amendment shall be held to avoid the rate: Provided always, That every person aggrieved by any such alteration shall have the same right of appeal therefrom as he would have had if his name had been originally inserted in such rate, and no such alteration had been made; and as respects any such person the rates shall be considered to have been made at the time when he received notice of such alteration, and every person whose rates are altered shall be entitled to seven days' notice of such alteration before the rate shall be payable by him,"—(Mr. Healy.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he did not think this clause was germane to the subject of registration.

MR. HEALY said, he appealed to the hon. and learned Gentlemen to consider this Amendment in a fair spirit. It was not a matter that had anything to do with Party considerations; he might call it an all-round matter. If a wrong existed, as was admitted, now was the time to amend it and that was what his clause was for.

tended to do. There was no power invested in the Board of Guardians to make the alterations in question, and as he had shown that no Party considerations were involved, he hoped he should receive the support of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) and the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis).

MR. GIBSON said, he was utterly at a loss to know why his name should be dragged into the discussion on every Amendment relating to those matters. It was always the same; whether he spoke, or whether he was silent. It was said he agreed to this, and did not agree to that, even when he had never opened his lips on any matter. However, looking at this question, he was inclined to agree with the Solicitor General for Ireland that the Amendment was not in the slightest degree germane to a Registration Bill. It might be open to examination and discussion if it were brought forward on a Rating Bill; but he was bound to say that his hon. and learned Friend was justified in taking objection to the introduction of the Amendment on such a Bill as the present, and that objection he felt bound to support.

MR. HEALY said, he would not press the Amendment, but would ask why a Rating Bill was not introduced, seeing that it was admitted that his Amendment was germane to a Rating Bill?

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause:—

(Duties and powers of court of revision.)

"The court shall, with respect to the lists of Parliamentary voters which it is appointed to revise, perform the duties and have the powers following:

"(1.) It shall correct any mistake which is proved to have been made in any list;

"(2.) It may correct any mistake which is proved to have been made in any claim or notice of objection;

"(3.) It shall expunge the name of every person, whether objected to or not, whose qualification as stated in any list is insufficient in law to entitle such person to be included therein;

"(4.) It shall expunge the name of every person who, whether objected to or not, is proved to be dead;

"(5.) It shall expunge the name of every person, whether objected to or not, whose name or place of abode, or the nature of whose qualification, or the name or situation of whose qualifying property if the qualification is in respect of property, or any other particulars respecting whom by law required to be stated in the list, is or are either wholly omitted or in the judgment of the revising barrister insufficiently described for the purpose of being identified, unless the matter or matters so omitted or insufficiently described be supplied to the satisfaction of the court before it shall have completed the revision of the list in which the omission or insufficient description occurs, and in case such matter or matters shall be so supplied the court shall then and there insert the same in such list;

"(6.) It shall expunge the name of every person, whether objected to or not, where it is proved to the revising barrister that such person was, on the twentieth day of July then next preceding, incapacitated by any law or statute from voting;

"(7.) Before expunging from a list the name of any person not objected to, the court shall cause such notice, if any, as shall appear necessary or proper under the circumstances of the proposal to expunge the name to be given to or left at the usual or last known place of abode of such person;

"(8.) Subject as herein and otherwise by law provided, the court shall retain the name of every person not objected to, and also of every person objected to, unless the objector appears by himself or by some person on his behalf in support of his objection;

"(9.) If any objector other than the clerk of the peace, town clerk, or a clerk of union, or collector-general, so appears, the court of revision shall require him to prove that he gave the notice or notices of objection required by law to be given by him, and to give prima facie proof of the ground of objection, and for that purpose may examine and allow the objector to examine any clerk of union, collector-general, or other collector of rates, or any other person on oath touching the alleged ground of objection, and unless such proof is given to the satisfaction of the court, the court shall, subject as herein and otherwise by law provided, retain the name of the person objected to;

"An objection made under this Act by a clerk of union, collector-general, town clerk, or clerk of the peace, shall be deemed to cast upon the person objected to the burden of proving his right to be on the list;

"The prima facie proof shall be deemed to be given by the objector if it is shown to the satisfaction of the court by evidence, repute, or otherwise that there is reasonable ground for believing that the objection is well founded, and that by reason of the person objected to not being present for examination, or for some other reason, the objector is prevented from discovering or proving the truth respecting the entry objected to;

"(10.) If such proof is given by the objector as herein prescribed, or if the objection is by a clerk of union, collector-general, town clerk, or clerk of the peace, then unless the person objected to appears by himself or by some person on his behalf, and proves that he was entitled on the twentieth day of July then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list in respect of the qualification described in such list, the court of revision shall expunge the name of the person objected to,"—(Mr. Healy),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, there was some redundancy in the clause, which, however, might be corrected on the Report.

MR. LEWIS said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland seemed unable to understand his (Mr. Lewis's) objection. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would turn to Sub-section 9, he would there find that prima facie proof was required. They had passed upon the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) that the objector was bound to give some prima facie evidence of the ground of objection, otherwise the objection would not be allowed to be gone into. That was the same subject-matter which was proposed to be dealt with by Sub-section 9. He did not know whether the Government would like to have in the same Act of Parliament two clauses dealing in different language with the same subject-matter.

Motion agreed to.

Clause read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be added to the Bill."

MR. LEWIS would like to hear what the Solicitor General for Ireland had to say about Sub-section 9.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that there was, perhaps, some resemblance in the wording of the two sections; but it occurred to him that that might be cured on Report.

Motion agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. HEALY proposed the following new clause, which was also taken from the English Act:—

(Objections not to lapse by death of objector.)

"Any objection by a qualified objector may after his death be revived by any other person qualified to have made the objection originally by a notice to that effect in writing signed by him and given to the clerk of the peace or town clerk at or before the time of revision of the entry to which the objection relates."

Clause brought up, read the first and second time, and added to the Bill.

MR. HEALY proposed the following new clause:—

(Dates for lodgers' qualifications.)

"In the construction of the fourth section of 'The Representation of the People (Ireland) Act, 1868,' and the enactments amending or affecting the same, the first day of July shall be substituted for the twentieth day of July."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said this clause dealt with a very curious matter, which must, of course, have been brought under the notice of the Solicitor General for Ireland. At the present time, lodgers in Ireland were required to declare on the 14th of July that they were in occupation of their lodgings on the 20th of July. Now, that was absurd, and ought to be remedied.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) suggested that the Motion should be withdrawn, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman should confer with him with the view of a clause being prepared by Report.

MR. HEALY thought that the 21st of July would be a better day; but the 20th of July would not give sufficient time, in his judgment, for the preparation of the list. He would, however, ask leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY moved the following new clause:—

(Objections to claim lists.)

"Every registered voter or person whose name appears on the list of voters shall be entitled, without giving any notice of objection, to oppose the claim of every person claiming to be inserted in the list of voters in the same manner and with the same rights and liabilities as such registered voter or person had given no notice of objection. For the purposes of this section no list of voters shall be deemed to include any list of claimants."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said he certainly moved this clause with a great deal of hesitation, because of Amendment with regard to objections coming from one side of the House appeared rather odd. If the Government liked to accept it, he would be quite prepared to press it.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. LEWIS said, that if the clause were accepted, it would be quite possible for persons to be struck off the list without their knowing anything about it. He certainly thought that a person should receive notice that his name was to be objected to.

MR. HEALY asked leave to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY proposed the following new clause:—

"For the preparation of the voters lists in the City of Dublin, the Commissioners of the townships of Pembroke and Blackrock shall repay to the treasurer of the Corporation of Dublin the expense of making out the lists for each portion of these townships as are situated within the Parliamentary borough of Dublin."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, the Government had promised to amend the law in this respect. No one knew this matter better than the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, because he was counsel for the Corporation when they fought the matter some years ago, and when the Court of Queen's Bench decided that the expenses would have to be borne by the city at large. He (Mr. Healy) presumed that if the Government were not able to accept his clause, they would state what they were prepared to do on Report.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) thought there was a good case made out for some alteration of the present system, because Pembroke and Blackrock were distinct townships. The clause, however, did not supply the means of working out what the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy) desired. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw the clause, by Report a clause might be framed which would effect the object in view.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY proposed the following new clause:—

(Students in rooms not to be registered as lodgers.)

"No student occupying rooms in any college for collegiate purposes shall be entitled to be registered to vote as a lodger."

The hon. and learned Gentleman said, he was induced by the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who, he regretted, was now absent, to put this Amendment on the Paper. The other night, when he moved an Amendment upon the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, the right hon. Gentleman promised him to look into the anomalous condition of things in Dublin, whereby young gentlemen, to the number of some hundreds, who had no interest whatever in the City of Dublin, and whose board and lodging as well as their education was paid for by their parents, were entitled to be placed on the list of lodgers and to vote in the election of Members for the City of Dublin. He had inquired whether anything of the kind existed at Oxford or Cambridge, and he had been told that no person in either of those Universities could vote as lodgers for the towns in which the Universities were situated. He need scarcely point out to the Committee how absurd it was that a number of young gentlemen who came up from the Provinces to Dublin University, occupying rooms there for purposes connected with their degrees, should plump themselves down to the number of 200 upon the voters' list of the city in which they paid no rent, rates, or taxes. That state of things did not exist in England or Scotland, and it had only existed in Ireland within the last few years owing to a decision sanctioning it given in the Dublin Registration Court. He was sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) would agree with him that those young gentlemen were already sufficiently represented in the House of Commons. The right hon. and learned Gentleman could not reasonably say that the students of Trinity College did not now possess a sufficient voice in the affairs of Parliament. He might be told that those gentlemen did not vote in the University. But they would soon get on the University Roll, and have the pleasure of recording their votes for the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen who now represented that constituency. The few hundred persons in the University were already accorded two very admirable Representatives; and, therefore, he now proposed that those students should not be allowed to vote in the City of Dublin—in other words, that the honest burgesses of Dublin, the people who paid rent, rates, and taxes in the city, should be allowed to have some little voice in the management of their own affairs.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. GIBSON said, that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy) had moved the Amendment with such good humour, accompanied by kindly references to himself (Mr. Gibson) and his right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket), that he felt a certain amount of difficulty in replying. But as the clause had been moved, he must encounter it by fair and legitimate argument. This was not a Disfranchisement Bill, and the whole Reform scheme of the Prime Minister and of the Government was an enfranchising and not a disfranchising scheme. This was not a Reform Bill, but a Registration Bill, and the particular section under discussion was such that if it found a place at all in any Bill it should be in a distinct Franchise Bill. The proposal of the hon. and learned Member was entirely opposed to the Reform Bill submitted to the House by the Government, and, therefore, was quite out of place. He might, however, say that it must not be taken that students were raw boys fresh from the country; they must be 21 years of age, and they must be in possession of rooms as lodgers for a year. Trinity College paid very large rates, and there was no reason whatever why those young gentlemen—he did not know the exact number of them, but he supposed there were less than 200—[MR. HEALY: Above 200.]—should be refused the right of contributing, not a very large share, to the voting power of the City of Dublin. It had been stated incidentally that none of the students of other Universities were registered as lodgers. That was not so. [MR. HEALY: I said Oxford or Cambridge.] Hon. Members sometimes failed to remember all that they said. As a matter of fact, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) mentioned the Scotch Universities. He (Mr. Gibson) had ascertained how Scotland stood in this matter—indeed, only the other night the hon. Member for Glasgow Mr. I. Russell) pointed out that the very same provision or arrangement prevailed in the Scotch Universities; that those who resided within the walls of the Glasgow University were registered to a much larger extent as voters for the City of Glasgow than the students in Trinity College, Dublin, were registered as voters for the City of Dublin. He (Mr. Gibson) did not know that that was so until it was stated. ["It is not so."] He did not know what the fact was, but what he had said was stated in the House the other night by the hon. Member for Glasgow without question or contradiction. He (Mr. Gibson) was aware how affairs were managed at Oxford and Cambridge. He was not aware that the matter had ever been brought before the Revising Barrister for the City of Oxford or for the town of Cambridge; but it certainly was not to be decided according to the ordinary Registration Law of the country. He met this clause by saying it was a distinct disfranchisement clause, out of place in this Bill or in any Bill, out of keeping with all the statements of the Prime Minister, and that, therefore, he imagined there would be no hesitation on the part of the Committee—if, indeed, the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) meant to press it—in rejecting it.

MR. R. BIDDULPH MARTIN said that when he was at Oxford some of the undergraduates endeavoured to get upon the Register, but without success. Of course, he was speaking of many years ago; but as far he remembered they were met by the objection that they had no possible right to be registered. He did not profess to have any knowledge of the state of affairs in the University of Dublin; but as Oxford and Cambridge had been mentioned he desired to state his experience.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, that as far as he understood no students resided within the University buildings in Scotland. If it be the case that no students in the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge were entitled to the franchise outside the University, he did not see why the students of Trinity College, Dublin, should be allowed to vote.

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had said he (Mr. Healy) mentioned Scotland that night. He mentioned it three or four nights ago, and he was met by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. T. Russell), who, of course, was a new Member of the House, and who did not know exactly what they were driving at, with the assertion that the Scotch Universities had votes. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think they were objecting to students who lived in the town having votes. The hon. Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Williamson) now stated that the Scotch students were not residential. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. T. Russell) would see the mistaken view he had taken in this matter. The right hon. and learned Gentlemen (Mr. Gibson) very deftly seized upon the mistake of the hon. Member for Glasgow. It was not desired to deprive men lodging in towns from voting; but it was desired to deprive undergraduates from voting in respect of lodgings which they held as school boys and no more.

MR. GIBSON protested against the method of carrying on Public Business. He had stated a series of propositions founded upon the statements of the Prime Minister; and he protested against the Government not rising to express their views upon this important subject.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he did not know what the case exactly was at Oxford and Cambridge. As to the Scotch Universities, he never heard of residential students having votes. There might be students who lived in the Professors' houses, and who might be registered as lodgers. He could not say exactly how the matter stood; but there were no residential students in Scotland in the sense in which there were in Dublin and in Oxford and Cambridge. Treating the case as it stood, he was disposed to reply that he was very much averse to disfranchising anybody. He thought that the more people admitted to the franchise the better, providing they were justly entitled to it. If a student in Dublin, over 21 years of age, capable of exercising the franchise, was in such a position as in any other place would give him the franchise, why on earth should he not have it? If a student held his rooms or tenement in the same way and under such circumstances as would elsewhere give him the franchise, why should he not have it? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had said these persons were school boys sent up by their parents. Well, if they were, they were school boys of 21 years of age. He (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) confessed he did not like the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member, and he was disposed to vote against it. This was not a question of politics, and the number of persons affected by the Amendment was small. [MR. HEALY: 200.] Even if there be 200, he maintained that if they were qualified as lodgers, or in any other way, and that their qualification would be good in Cork, or Limerick, or Belfast, it ought to be good in Dublin. If their qualification was not good they would not be put on the Register. Do not let them be disqualified because they happened to be students.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) take the line he had done under what might justly be called the intimidation of the Front Opposition Bench. A distinct pledge was given upon this matter to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) by the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) when the Irish Members felt it their duty to insist upon an assimilation of the English and Irish Registration Laws. They had gone no further. They had asked the Government and the Committee to agree to such Amendments of theirs as would assimilate the Registration Law of Ireland to that of England and Scotland. He (Mr. Parnell) put down some new clauses; but he felt that, having the principle of assimilation in view, they came in competition with those of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson), and therefore he said nothing about them, but allowed them to go by default. His clauses were of a more perfect character, and of a very much more advantageous character, than those of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. A. Dickson); but as he and his hon. Friends had repeatedly announced that they only desired to bring the Registration Law of Ireland up to that of England, he considered he would not be entitled to persevere with them, for they would have opened up a wider and more extended field of improvement in the system of registration. But now they were met by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, under the circumstances to which he (Mr. Parnell) had just alluded, with a distinct refusal to carry out in the Dublin University the system which prevailed to his knowledge in both Oxford and Cambridge, and which prevailed, according to the testimony of the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Williamson), in the Scotch Universities. This was not an Amendment for disfranchising men who lived in lodgings outside the University; but it was an Amendment which declared that an undergraduate in the Dublin University, possessing peculiar advantages as a result of exceptional endowments, possessing peculiar advantages with regard to his rooms within the College, holding his rooms at a much less cost than he could obtain apartments elsewhere, should be treated in the same way as students were treated under similar circumstances in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and of Scotland. This was the first time in the consideration of this Bill that the claim of the Irish Members for assimilation had been refused. Now, there were circumstances connected with this matter which rendered the facts of the case still more aggravated. It so happened that Trinity College had been placed in the jerrymandered division of the City of Dublin, so that those 200 voters might make the difference of a seat to one Party or the other. If the Government refused to give the Irish Party fair play in respect to the boundaries of the different divisions, he and his hon. Friends were entitled to call upon the Government to give them, at least, fair play in this matter by making the law in Ireland similar to the law in England. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had said that this was a matter properly appertaining to the Representation of the People Act which had been passed, rather than for a Registration Bill. But whenever they raised a question like this on the Representation of the People Bill, they were told by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it was a question to bring up on a Registration Bill; so that whether they hit high or hit low there was no pleasing the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Of course, that was what they expected from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin; but they did expect that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant would Act consistently in this matter, and maintain the tenour of the Bill so far as it had gone, a tenour which the Irish Members had not endeavoured to limit.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was not prepared to say whether there was any provision in any English Franchise or Registration Bill disqualifying students in Oxford or Cambridge because they were students. Students were either qualified, or they were not. If they were qualified, it was proposed that because they were students they should be disqualified. To that he objected. He had no predilection in favour of the students of Trinity College; but he did maintain that if a student living in a College had the ordinary qualification he should have the vote just as anyone else should.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that whether there was or was not any provision in any English Act which would disqualify students of Universities because they were students, it was very probable that a large number of persons residing in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge would come in under the new service franchise. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had spoken about the division of the City of Dublin. He (Mr. Arnold) supported the hon. Gentleman against the Government when that question was formally raised in Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill; but he could not support an Amendment which proposed to disfranchise a certain number of persons. From his point of view, the more men they could get on the Register the better. If men were admitted to the Register of voters he welcomed them there, and he could not see why inquiries should be made as to what order of men or what quality of men they were, or what position in life they occupied.

Mr. Parnell

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, that as the Committee did not seem to be aware of the English law on this subject, it was perhaps as well that he should direct their attention to the Reform Act, 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, s. 78, which provided that—

“Nothing in this Act shall entitle any person to vote in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for the city of Oxford or town of Cambridge in respect of the occupation of any chambers or premises in any of the Colleges or Halls of these Universities.”

This disqualification was recognized and continued by the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 26, s. 43.

MR. GIBSON said, he was not inclined in the slightest degree to argue the case of Oxford and Cambridge. He was arguing a much narrower point. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. R. Biddulph Martin) had recounted his own experiences at Oxford. He (Mr. Gibson) assumed that those experiences were prior to 1877-8. Had any effort been made in Oxford or Cambridge since Martin's Act was passed, and since a great many interpretations of the lodger franchise had been given, to test whether any person resident in those Universities could get on the Register for the borough? He was not aware that there had. Oxford and Cambridge seemed to have stood still in the matter for a good many years. But that was not his point. His point was that there were—taking the figures of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) as correct—200 persons actually on the Register and entitled to vote for the City of Dublin; and that this was an Amendment, not to enlarge the franchise, but to remove the voters in question from the Register and to disqualify them. He maintained that this was a monstrous proposition in face of all the statements that had been made to the House by the Prime Minister and by the Government, and of all the arguments which had been addressed to the House even by those who were in favour of the present proposition. There was nothing whatever under the existing law, as openly administered in the Irish Registration Courts, to prevent these young men being upon the Register. They occupied separate premises, for which they paid separate rent. Only that night the Committee had accepted an Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) himself, declaring that it was not necessary that separate premises should be separately rated. [MR. HEALY: It is in the English law.] Be it so; they had accepted that provision. Now, this was not a Reform Bill, but a Registration Bill; and under cover of the Bill it was sought to remove from the Register men who, under the existing law, had a right to exercise the franchise. He appealed to the sense of fair play in the Committee—was it reasonable, was it just, was it fair that those 200 men should be struck off the Register because, as the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had declared, they would vote in the one portion of the city where the hon. Member considered the chances of his Party were in jeopardy, owing to the equality in the strength of Parties? Was it fair or reasonable, when that was the avowed object of the Amendment, that those 200 men should be deprived of the franchise which, under the existing law, they were entitled to exercise?

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), referring in stentorian tones to the good service which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Pembroke (Mr. H. G. Allen) had done in reading to the Committee the clause in the English Act bearing on this question, said he did not take his stand upon the case of Oxford and Cambridge. Yes; but the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant did. The right hon. Gentleman appealed to them to show him that English students were disqualified, and then he said he would be able to deal with them. From the right hon. Gentleman's own side—from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Pembroke—came the statement that the students of Oxford and Cambridge were disqualified. He (Mr. Healy) called upon the Chief Secretary to make good his words; he pinned the right hon. Gentleman to his own words. The other night the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said that this was a matter which did not arise upon the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill; but if it were postponed he would give it his best consideration. Were they to be dodged like a shuttlecock from one Bill to another? At one time it was not a matter for the Representation of the People Bill, at another it was not a matter for the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, and at another it was a disfranchising clause. He (Mr. Healy) and his hon. Friends took their stand upon the declaration of Ministers. They were within the recollection of the Committee. The words of the Chief Secretary still echoed in the Chamber; the right hon. Gentleman said—"Point out to me in any English Act any disqualification similar to that now proposed." Of course, the inference was that if such a disqualification could be shown he was quite prepared to assimilate the Irish to the English law. All the Irish Members wanted was assimilation. They had been fighting for the English law, and they appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to stand by his own words, and give them in Ireland the benefit of the same law which was dealt out in Oxford and Cambridge.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said he could not recall exactly the words he used; but he remembered that he began by saying he was against the disfranchisement of anybody. Then he asked hon. Members whether they could prove that what was alleged with regard to Oxford and Cambridge was really the fact. He asserted his own ignorance on the subject. He now found that the students in the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge were disqualified by a special clause of an Act of Parliament—there was no doubt now upon the matter. He was sorry they were disqualified, because, as far as he could form an opinion, they ought not to be. If the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy) said that he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) went so far as to say he did not wish any different treatment of the students of Dublin University to that of the students of Oxford and Cambridge, he was afraid that precluded him from voting to extend a privilege to the students of the Dublin University which was denied to those of Oxford and Cambridge. He was sorry that by a hasty expression he had precluded himself from the possibility of voting upon this subject. Under the circumstances, it would perhaps be better that he should refrain from voting; but he thought his opinion on the subject would be gathered from what he had said. He did not think anyone ought to be prevented from voting because he happened to be a student. He regretted to find that the students of Oxford and Cambridge were excluded from the franchise, though they might possess the necessary qualification.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he had understood that no one who had a vote was to be disfranchised. Long before this small question about University students was raised, the Prime Minister told the House, and no Member of the Government could possibly depart from the assertion, that no one was to be disfranchised by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had said so over and over again. And now, when they came to this particular point, it so happened that something had been found out which was different from what was expected—that was to say, the Irish Members who wished the same law as prevailed in England to prevail in Ireland—he wished they held that opinion in other matters—had found out that the English students had not the right to vote, whereas the Irish students had. That was no reason why the Irish students should be disqualified. It might be a good reason why the English students should be enfranchised; and if such a proposition were made he should certainly be inclined to support it. When he was at the University he felt his disfranchisement very much. He could never understand why he should not have a vote, occupying chambers in Cambridge as he did. He certainly could not agree to the disfranchisement of the students in Dublin because the students of Oxford and Cambridge were disqualified from voting. He took his stand upon the declaration of the Prime Minister that no one was to be disfranchised by this Bill. Of course, it was quite plain that this disfranchisement could not be made upon a mere Registration Bill, though he should oppose the proposal just as strongly if it were made upon a Franchise Bill. The question of the franchise was settled; and now they were dealing with the registration of those persons who were, by the Representation of the People Act, to have the right to vote. Nothing had been taken away from the Irish students by the Representation of the People Act. It was now a pure question of registration, and not of who were entitled to vote and who were not. He certainly should most strongly support the view which had been expressed by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), and impress upon the Government the necessity of adhering strictly to the last statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It was only a personal statement.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, there could be no personality in the case of a Government. The Prime Minister spoke for the Government, and his view was that no person should be disfranchised. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) called upon every hon. Gentleman now sitting upon the Treasury Bench to carry out the view of the Prime Minister by going into the Lobby against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy).

MR. O'SHEA said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was quite mistaken. The Prime Minister never said that no one was to be disfranchised by this Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes; over and over again.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross), admitted, on the part of the Government, that the Prime Minister said more than once that the group of Bills now before the House—the Franchise Bill and the Registration Bills—were in no sense to be disfranchising Bills. Under those circumstances, the Government were precluded from voting with the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), whatever view they might have of the merits of the case. If he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) understood rightly there were many students in Trinity College, Dublin, who were now on the Register; and if the Committee were to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman those students would be disfranchised. The Committee would, therefore, be infringing the rule which the Prime Minister and the Government had laid down for themselves in this matter. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would not express any opinion on the merits of the case. The time had passed for considering whether those students should have votes or not. That question ought to have been decided on the Representation of the People Bill of last year. This was a mere Registration Bill, and upon it the Government felt themselves precluded from making any change which would result in disfranchisement.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that great weight had been attached to the statement of the Prime Minister that this was not to be a disfranchising Act, and that no class of persons would be disfranchised under it. This was a very curious case, which he believed did not come within the purview of the Prime Minister when he was making that assertion. It seemed to him to have been forgotten that the Prime Minister proclaimed another principle, and it was this—that under this Act the people of the Three Kingdoms should enjoy equal rights and privileges. He (Mr. Sullivan) maintained that that was as much a principle of the Prime Minister's speech and speeches with reference to this matter as the version which had been so frequently quoted. The right hon. Gentleman declared over and over again that there should be equalization of registration; but simply because this handful of young men happened to be Tory, and hailed from the centre or headquarters of Toryism in Ireland, the words of the Prime Minister as to disfranchisement were clung to with great affection by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who sat above the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House. The Prime Minister committed himself, unmistakably, to the principle that there was to be from first to last in this matter equality of treatment between the people of the three countries; and it was only because the Tory Party found they had an advantage in this particular matter that they fastened on to the words of the Prime Minister, which he (Mr. Sullivan) was sure were never meant to cover a case such as that under consideration.

MR. R. BIDDULPH MARTIN said, it seemed of importance that they should assimilate the laws which prevailed on this subject in the different parts of the United Kingdom. He thought it really would be in conformity with the wishes of the Committee that this Amendment should be passed, and that then the question of qualification or enfranchisement of University students in the three countries should be made the subject of a separate Bill. Though it was perfectly true that the Prime Minister said this was not a disfranchising Bill, the opportunity might be taken of adjusting this anomalous state of things. He hoped the Committee would take this opportunity of assimilating the law between the two countries, even at the risk, he must admit, of doing some injustice in this particular case.

MR. SMALL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had said it was not possible for him to support this Amendment, because it would have a disfranchising effect. But the Representation of the People Act of the Government was in some respects a disfranchising measure. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; all joint occupiers of houses valued, say, at £10, were disfranchised by the Act passed last autumn. It seemed to him very extraordinary that right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, who swallowed the Representation of the People Act, containing as it did several disfranchising clauses, should raise objection to some 200 young gentlemen being disqualified to vote in a constituency in which they had no title whatever to exercise the franchise.

MR. HEALY said, he had been greatly edified by the attitude of the Treasury Bench in this matter. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who, the other night, distinctly promised to give the subject his best consideration. The right hon. Gentleman was brought into the House; but when he found what was going on, he, in the immortal words of Mr. Disraeli, "scuttled away." Then the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) came to the fore. The right hon. Gentleman was very bold in the early portion of the night. He wanted the law of Ireland to be assimilated to that of England. "Show me," said the right hon. Gentleman, "anything in an English Act which disqualifies the students of Oxford and Cambridge, and then I will deal with the students of Trinity College, Dublin." And then, when the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Pembroke (Mr. H. G. Allen) produced the clause from the Reform Act which distinctly disqualified the students of Oxford and Cambridge from voting in the city or town, as the case might be, the right hon. Gentleman said—"I spoke hastily." The right hon. Gentleman had two voices—one voice was that of the Irish Secretary, and the other voice was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs. The right hon. Gentleman now attempted to disassociate himself from his official position in the hope of defeating the Amendment. The inference to be drawn from the right hon. Gentleman's words was that if it was proved to be that English students were disqualified, he would assent to the disqualification of Irish students. When it was proved to him that English students were disqualified he said—"I only spoke for myself." What Minister ever took up such a position? Was it to be tolerated that in one breath the right hon. Gentleman should speak as the Irish Secretary, and in another breath as Mr. Campbell-Bannerman? The right hon. Gentleman, as Irish Secretary, opposed the Amendment on the ground that the provision involved was not contained in any English Act. It was proved to him that he was mistaken; but, nevertheless, he still opposed the Amendment, but not as the Irish Secretary, but in his personal capacity. And yet Irish Members were asked, upon matters relating to Ireland, to have full confidence in the Government. The President of the Local Government Board was called in by a messenger despatched by his Colleagues; but finding that the waters were troublesome he made off. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, as such, repelled the Amendment, but in his individual capacity said—"I will not be able to vote against the Amendment, but I will not vote for it." Such was the conduct of the Government in which they were asked to have confidence. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) came forward, and said—"Well, but the Prime Minister has said this is not a disfranchising Bill." The Prime Minister said that in reference to a particular Bill. Let the dead bury the dead. What the right hon. Gentleman said last July under totally different circumstances did not apply now.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he did not refer to anything the Prime Minister said on the Representation of the People Bill, but to a declaration the right hon.

Mr. R. Biddulph Martin

Gentleman made on the group of Registration Bills.

MR. HEALY said, that, as far as his recollection served him, the Prime Minister made no such declaration with regard to any group of Bills. In the famous phrase of the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt), on the 17th of March, "Where are the traces?" Produce the Prime Minister's words upon which this Amendment was opposed. The Government could not deny that he was led the other night to withdraw an Amendment bearing upon the subject by the promise of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to look into the matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could not deny that to-night he asked them to show him what was provided by the English Act, and then he would know whether he ought to assimilate the laws of the two countries.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No ; I did not say that.

MR. HEALY remarked, that it was only a few minutes ago that the right hon. Gentleman said he did not recollect what he did say. He (Mr. Healy) appealed to English Members who had been witnesses of these proceedings whether there had been a creditable exhibition on the part of Her Majesty's Government? He appealed to English Gentlemen to refrain from supporting the Government on this occasion. He thought that when pledges were given by the Government the House ought to be in a position to rely upon them. The other night they were led astray by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Thomas Russell). It turned out that there were no residential students in the Glasgow University; that, in fact, the only places where there were residential students were Oxford and Cambridge, and that those students were distinctly disqualified. They were told by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) that he wished to get everybody on the Register they possibly could, so he (Mr. Healy) wished that everyone possessing proper qualifications should be put upon the Register; but the students in Trinity College did not, in his opinion, possess the necessary qualifications, and, therefore, they ought to be struck off. Such were the arguments with which he and his hon. Friends were met; and he confidently appealed to the honour of English Gentlemen to say whether the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were not words which led the Committee to believe that if these students of Oxford and Cambridge were disqualified he would be prepared to refuse to admit to the franchise in Dublin City people who did not pay any rent, rates, or taxes?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN objected to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) attributing to him the assertion that he was prepared to assimilate the laws of the two countries in that respect. At the outset he said he was in favour of disfranchising no one; he said he did not know how the facts stood with regard to Oxford and Cambridge; and he asked hon. Members on the other side of the House whether they could produce any evidence that the students of Oxford and Cambridge were disqualified from voting. Then he went on to say that it was his opinion—and such was still his opinion—that if a student had such a qualification that, under any other circumstances, he would obtain a vote, he should not be disqualified because he was a student. What had happened since he made his speech? All that had happened was this—that the discovery had been made that there was a special clause in an Act of Parliament which excluded the students living in any of the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge from voting. He said again he was very sorry for it, and he should be very glad to see that law repealed. Now, what were they to do with reference to the clause proposed by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Healy)? He thought the Government would be altogether wrong, and that the Committee would be altogether wrong, if it proceeded to disfranchise those who already possessed the franchise in Dublin, because it so happened that what appeared to him to be an injustice was done in Oxford and Cambridge. He was in the recollection of the Committee that what he had now said was the gist of what he stated originally. He was puzzled to discover any particular inconsistency in anything he had laid before the Committee.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR said, a great deal had been said that night about the disfranchisement of men. He had as much regard for the natural rights of men as the right hon. Gentlemen who occupied the Front Government and Opposition Benches; but he held that the students of Trinity College, contemplated by this Amendment, were not men in the proper sense of the term, but were mere birds of passage. Speaking as a citizen who often had to come into contact with those gentlemen, he objected to have his citizen rights overborne by the votes of mere birds of passage. What other functions did those gentlemen perform? Did they serve upon juries? No. Did they join the Army? Perhaps they would in a while; but they were exempt from doing so now. Did they fulfil any conditions of citizenship? No, they were merely there as a floating balance of power to overbear the votes and the voices of such citizens as paid rates. Those men came and went, and left no traces behind them, except the expression of their peculiar opinions. For those reasons he supported the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Healy), and he appealed to the Government to assimilate the law of the two countries in this respect, as they had endeavoured to do in others.

MR. THOMAS RUSSELL was sorry if anything he said the other night led the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) to understand that there were any residential students in the Scotch Universities. He (Mr. Thomas Russell) was perfectly aware that in Scotland no students were resident within the University; but he had yet to learn that residence within College walls was to make a difference between a student living there and a student living in a street close by. If a student fulfilled the law so as to qualify as a lodger, he did not see why he should be debarred from the privilege of the franchise, and it was not so in Scotland. Every student who fulfilled the lodger qualification had a vote.

MR. HEALY: Scotch students do not live in the College.

MR. THOMAS RUSSELL said, that that was so; but he could not conceive that residence within the College made any difference in the matter. He should like to point out to the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the Committee (Mr. J. O'Connor) that students were not mere birds of passage, but fulfilled all the duties of citizenship just as much as other classes of lodgers—they paid rents, and taxes were included in their rents. Other lodgers did not serve upon juries, and he did not see why a student, possessed of all the necessary qualifications to entitle him to the lodger franchise, should be treated differently to the bank clerk or the mechanic who might be a lodger. He might also point out to the Committee that at present Ireland and Scotland were in the same position as regarded students. He was very sorry indeed to hear that the students in Oxford and Cambridge had not the same privilege, and he thought it extremely desirable that they should have the same privilege conferred upon them. It was perfectly evident to everybody that a student of 21 years of age, with a considerable amount of knowledge, was as well qualified to exercise the franchise as any other lodger. Seeing that Ireland and Scotland were in this matter upon an equal footing, he thought it would be better that the law of England should be assimilated to the law in those countries.

MR. MACARTNEY pointed out that the students in the Temple had votes for the City of London. They always had had votes, and they were not debarred from voting because they happened to reside within an establishment in which law was taught.

MR. SEXTON said, it was as well before they went to a division, that the claim put forward on behalf of these young men should be thoroughly understood. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) wished the Committee to maintain an exclusive privilege on behalf of this body of young men, which was denied to young men in a similar condition in Great Britain. There was no similar case in Scotland because in Scotland no residential students existed. What was the difference between a student who lived in his University, and a bank clerk, for instance, who occupied apartments in the city? The bank clerk, who was a man earning his own living, had, generally speaking, to pay heavily for his apartments, whereas the student was in a state of pupilage, and occupied his rooms at a particularly low rent, owing to public generosity—[“No!”] Did the hon. Gentleman who interrupted him mean to say that a student in Trinity College paid as much for his rooms as a young man lodging in the City of Dublin paid? It was well known that Trinity College was richly endowed from the lands that some time ago were taken from the people; it was well known that the possession by Trinity College of those lands, and the rents they yielded, enabled the Governing Body of Trinity College to give rooms to young men and the students of the College at rates which were only a fraction of those paid by the gentlemen who lodged outside. That was the difference between the student in Trinity College and the bank clerk lodging in the city. That was a fundamental difference; and the claim which was now made on behalf of those students was a claim to maintain and continue an exclusive privilege, which was not only unjust to those on whose behalf it was made, but offensive to the general body of the community outside. The Committee had been told that the Government scheme of Reform was not intended to have any disfranchising effect. But there were disfranchising clauses in the Representation of the People Act, and he was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) endeavour to represent this scheme of Reform to be entirely free from any disfranchising element. He (Mr. Sexton) was completely at a loss to understand what the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) wished the Committee to understand with regard to his position in the House and in the Government, and with regard to the meaning to be attached to the declarations he made in debate. They saw the right hon. Gentleman a couple of days ago, when he yielded to the solemn voice of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), left in the lurch. After he had made declarations at the Table as positive as that he had made to-night, they saw him, when the common sense of the Committee went unanimously against him, abdicating his position and abandoning his responsibility; they saw him, as the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had said, “scuttle out of the House.” If the right hon.

Gentleman did not intend to take up a misleading position, perhaps he would inform the Committee what his position really was. The right hon. Gentleman, only a few minutes ago, challenged hon. Members to show him any clause disqualifying students in England. When, after a lapse of time, the clause in the English Act was produced, the right hon. Gentleman coolly said—“Oh, I made no promise to assimilate the law of the two countries.” What was the meaning of the challenge the right hon. Gentleman threw out?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not challenge anybody. I merely asked for the production of the clause.

MR. SEXTON said, that that was only another instance of the unfair treatment to which Irish Members were subjected. Really, the strong Caledonian common sense of the right hon. Gentleman had developed, since he became Chief Secretary, into strong Hibernian ingenuity. The inference to be drawn from the right hon. Gentleman's words were that, in his opinion, there was no clause in an Act of Parliament disqualifying the students of Oxford and Cambridge; when, however, an hon. and learned Gentleman behind him (Mr. H. G. Allen) produced the clause the right hon. Gentleman executed a manœuvre worthy of Jim Crow. If the disqualifying clause could not have been produced, the right hon. Gentleman would have pleaded and relied upon the absence of such a clause as a reason for opposing the present Amendment. The clause was produced, and from that moment its significance ceased. The right hon. Gentleman then became, not the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs. At the moment the right hon. Gentleman retained the salary of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, but threw off the responsibility of Office. Hitherto they had been accustomed in the House of Commons to understand that even though the Government might break promises which related to any date, to any month, or any year, they would at least have the good faith to keep a promise which related only to the present. They had been accustomed to understand that Ministers in charge of a Bill were to be relied upon to carry out the natural indication flowing from their language. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had, however, introduced the House to a new condition of ethics; and if he proceeded much longer in the manner in which he proceeded the other night, when, after having pledged himself to a certain course on a Bill, he failed to carry out his compact, and he shamed his own compeers by leaving the House—if he again repeated such conduct it would be well he should have two flags, and hoist one or the other according as he spoke in his official or in his personal capacity.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the argument would disqualify not only students, but Masters of Arts, Professors, and so forth.

MR. SEXTON: No; students only.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the argument was that students occupied rooms at a cheaper rate than outsiders; and of course that argument applied equally to Masters of Arts and other members of the Universities.

MR. SEXTON: The argument applied to those in a state of pupilage.

MR. HEALY: Their masters might look them up on the polling day.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he thought a great deal of unnecessary heat had been imported into that discussion. No one could suppose for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had desired to mislead the Committee in anything that he had said. His right hon. Friend had fallen into the mistake which he had admitted—namely, of saying that not only graduates, but undergraduates in Oxford and Cambridge, were entitled to vote for the borough. This was not a disfranchising Bill, and he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would therefore suggest that this Amendment should not be pressed, but that some opportunity should be taken hereafter of correcting what hon. Members admitted to be an injustice, and which arose from the peculiar position of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge at the time the Statute was passed—namely, that the Colleges had been formerly extra-parochial, and not liable to pay rates. That was the reason the clause had been passed; but that condition of things had long ceased to exist. He would suggest that the present Amendment should be either withdrawn or negatived, and that some future opportunity should be taken of removing the injustice done to members of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and of putting graduates at least who were disqualified in a position to vote.

MR. PARNELL said, he rose for the purpose of asking the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for some information as to the course which he intended personally to adopt. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to vote for the original proposal or the Amendment of his (Mr. Parnell's) hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), or whether he intended to take the third course of walking out of the House when the Question was put; because the right hon. Gentleman had on three several and distinct occasions that evening announced to the Committee that he was going to adopt each one of those courses. It was obvious that he could not adopt three courses; and he (Mr. Parnell) should be glad to know, for his own information, if their right hon. Gentleman had fixed upon the course he intended to adopt? As to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Osborne Morgan), he (Mr. Parnell) thought he would probably find that the opportunity which had been referred to would be presented to the Conservative Party a little sooner than the right hon. and learned Gentleman or his Government would like on the Registration Bill. When that opportunity came he did not see how the Government could possibly refuse to adopt an Amendment enfranchising the students of Oxford and Cambridge in the face of the attitude they had adopted in regard to the students of Trinity College.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had appealed to him to know what course he proposed to follow, and he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) thought he had explained that already. He had endeavoured to do so several times. He had addressed the Committee on this small point repeatedly, and had given a good many reasons against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). On the first occasion he had, amongst other reasons, stated that he had not been aware of the facts of the cases of Oxford and Cambridge, and he had asked hon. Gentlemen who had spoken about it if they could produce evidence of the facts they alleged. That was the whole sum—front, beginning, and end—of his offence. On that occasion he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had said that he did not know what the state of things at Oxford and Cambridge was, and should be glad to know it. Now, however, they knew that the students at Oxford and Cambridge did not vote for the city and borough. But he had then stated—and he would refrain from stating again—a good many other considerations, every one of which led him to reject the proposal of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, the state of the law was anomalous between the different parts of the United Kingdom. In Scotland and Ireland it seemed that these undergraduates were qualified to vote at borough elections.

MR. HEALY: Not in Scotland—not residential students. They do not exist.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that, at any rate, the undergraduate in Dublin came under the conditions of the law as to the lodger franchise. With every disposition to go as far as possible with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), he was afraid the hon. and learned Member really had not, and could not make out, a case for the refusal of the franchise to undergraduates as lodgers. The case was that there was an apparent injustice to the undergraduates in the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge; but it seemed to him that really in no Registration Bill, neither English nor Irish, were they called upon to deal with the question of this franchise. He would go further, and say that he thought that what hon. Gentlemen opposite were entitled to attack in every possible way was the representation of the University itself. It was that that was the main grievance. Upon that point he (Mr. Illingworth) had already voted with the Irish Members, and upon that point he should be glad to go with them again. But surely there could not be a case established—surely Parliament could not take cognizance as to what particular buildings persons might live in, or whether the rent of those buildings was higher or lower according to the peculiar circumstances of the case. If the students complied with the ordinary conditions of the law, no Revising Barrister should go beyond the ordinary inquiry, and distinguish, as hon. Gentlemen opposite had distinguished, between different classes. He could only hope that hon. Gentlemen would go a step further, and would not draw a distinction between the position of these electors and those who might be bank clerks, or who might hold other positions. He did not hold that these students were birds of passage any more than were other classes of young men who were entitled to the franchise. [MR. HEALY: They are not producers.] He (Mr. Illingworth) really thought that hon. Members opposite were arguing a case on which justice did not stand on their side.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to say a word as to how this matter stood, so far as the English Universities were concerned. The graduates and undergraduates did not vote under the old system previous to 1832. It was thought that, under the first Reform Act, students might be qualified to vote for the city of Oxford and borough of Cambridge. It was thought right, in the Reform Act, to insert a special clause, stating that nothing in the measure should enable the students of Oxford and Cambridge to vote for the city of Oxford or the town of Cambridge. They never had done so before, and all the Act of 1832 did was to say that they should not be allowed by that Act to vote for the city or the borough; but, so far as other Universities of England were concerned, there was nothing to prevent students of the University of Durham, or the Victoria University of Manchester, from voting just like ordinary persons. The clause that was passed in 1832 did not seem to have been passed in the case of Dublin; and when they came to the English Bill, and the question again arose as to allowing students at Oxford and Cambridge to vote for the city and borough respectively, he should be ready to support a proposal to extend the privilege to them.

MR. COMMINS was of opinion that the two main points involved in this question had been, to a large extent, evaded. The first was—was the law in Ireland to be assimilated to that in England as to the position of students who were in statu pupillari, and were not sui juris? With regard to Durham, there were no resident students there, and there were no residential students in the Victoria University of Manchester, to which the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had referred. Nor were there any either in the London University or the Royal University of Ireland. The only students who were in a similar position to those at Oxford and Cambridge were the students of the University of Dublin residing within the walls of Trinity College.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The students of Durham are in the same position.

MR. COMMINS said, he was not aware that there were any residential students in Durham. If there were any, they were so few that they were not worth taking any note of. He should like to know how many dozen students of the University of Durham were resident within the walls of that University, or ever were at one time? He did not believe that one dozen were ever residential within the walls at one period. The question was—were they to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England in this matter? The policy of doing that had been sufficiently pointed out in the Committee. There was a higher question than that which hon. Members had been discussing, and that was—was it advisable that students who, as he had said, were not sui juris, and were subject to academical discipline, should have the apple of discord, in the form of political partizanship, thrown amongst them? Was it wise that those students should have their thoughts diverted from those legitimate objects which had taken them to the Universities—was it advisable that they should be thrown into the confusion and turmoil of election contests, which meant the destruction of all University discipline? It was evidently the opinion of the Government in 1832 that that state of things was not advisable, and they had introduced a clause into the Reform Act, stating that the students of Oxford and Cambridge should not enjoy the franchise for the city and town. The provision did not apply to Masters of Arts, or to anyone but students, and for the exclusion of those there were ample grounds. He thought that, instead of taking away the disability in the case of the English students, it should be allowed to remain to protect them against political turmoil, and to secure for them the serene air of the Universities, and that the students of Trinity College, Dublin, should be placed in the same position.

MR. MARUM said, he just wished to say one word before the Committee divided. He was a Member of the London University, and, as such, he wished to remind the Committee that the Reform Act of 1832 had deliberately made this exception. The reasons for the adoption of this provision 50 years ago were sound, and he did not see why the same reasons should not obtain at the present day. He did not know that they were any better reformers than their ancestors.

MR. TOMLINSON deprecated the adoption of this proposal as an Amendment to a Bill with which it really had no concern. Reasons had been given for the Amendment inconsistent with each other. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had based his support of this proposal on the ground that the students were birds of passage; but students were none the less birds of passage if they happened to live outside instead of inside the walls of the University. The students of the Scotch Universities or of the University of London were quite as much birds of passage as those who lived within the walls of the University of Dublin. Then the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had based his support of the proposal upon an entirely different ground. He maintained that students who lived in Universities were in a more independent position than those who occupied lodgings. But students who lived outside the walls of the Universities were partakers of the benefits of being in the Universities just as much as those who lived within the walls of the University of Oxford. There was in the University of Oxford at the present time a system by which certain students did not belong to any College. They were members of the University, and subject to a special Governing Body. Those gentlemen were, apparently, not excluded from voting; and he maintained that the exceptional exclusion of those who occupied rooms in the Colleges should be brought to an end. It was said that those students were not sui juris; but that applied to those who lived outside the walls as well as to those who lived within. The whole thing was anomalous, and could not be consistently supported. The proposal was, moreover, as he had observed, outside this Bill, which was to amend the law for the registration of voters in Ireland, and had nothing to do with disfranchisement. If hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway desired to bring forward a proposal for disfranchisement of this kind, they should have done so on the Representation of the People Bill. They had told the Committee that that Bill was to a large extent a disfranchising measure, though there was some exaggeration in the manner in which they alluded to it; but if they had a clause to move on this subject they should have brought it in as an Amendment to that Bill. The Amendment at this moment should be rejected by the Committee.

Question put.

Mr. SEXTON said, he now begged to move the first of the three clauses standing on the Paper in his name, entitled "Service by post of form of requisition." The clause was an attempt to deal with a very pressing matter. It said—

"No clerk of union, or other official to whom the form of requisition for names of inhabitant occupiers is to be returned when filled up, shall be entitled to refuse to receive such form, or omit to proceed upon the information it contains, because it has been returned through the post without prepayment of postage, but shall receive such form, and act in regard to it in every respect, as if the postage had been prepaid, and, in case of failure so to do, every such clerk or other official shall be liable in respect of each such form refused or not proceeded upon to a penalty of not less than forty shillings."

The Act gave no instructions as to whether the form sent out by the Guardians bearing the name of the inhabitant occupier should be prepaid or not, and the fact was that a number of forms had been returned with no stamp upon them, and the Guardians had been charged by the Post Office 1*d.* for each. There was this pressing difficulty to face—that many of the Boards of Guardians in Ireland might for political reasons refuse to act upon the Returns which came to them without the postage having been prepaid. In the North Dublin Union he had been informed that a large number of the forms had been returned unstamped. The clerk had asked whether he was to receive the returned forms and pay the postage, or whether he was to refuse them, and the Chairman had said that it would be hard to deprive those people of the franchise because they had not prepaid the postage on the forms which they had sent in. He (Mr. Sexton) had seen one of the forms sent out by the North Dublin Union, and he had noticed on the back of it the letters O.H.M.S., which everybody understood to mean "On Her Majesty's Service." When those letters appeared on a document the general impression was that it could go through the post free of charge. In the North Dublin Union, Mr. M'Neil, a Tory Guardian, had moved that the Returns which were sent back unstamped should be refused. That motion was not carried; but had it been made in the South Dublin Union instead of the North, no doubt it would have been adopted, and that would have had the effect of excluding those persons from the Register. He (Mr. Sexton) did not care very much how the matter was settled. If it were agreed that the Post Office should carry the letters post free, it would suit his purpose very well; or if, on the other hand, it was decided to instruct the Guardians to receive the notices, whether stamped or not, he should be satisfied. The amount would not be very great, supposing nobody paid the postage. About 700,000 notices would be sent out, being the number which would come upon the Electoral Roll under the Representation of the People Act, and, supposing that none of them paid the postage, the whole sum would only amount to about £1,000. No doubt, after those matters had been discussed and noticed in the papers, a great many people would take the precaution to pay the postage, but some might not do so, and it would be unfortunate if by a misapprehension a great many people should be deprived of the vote. He would press his Amendment very strongly, and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would be able to assure him either that the Post Office would deliver the notices without charge, or that the Guardians would be instructed to receive them and act upon them whether they were stamped or not.

New Clause:—

(Service by post of form of requisition.)

"No clerk of union, or other official to whom the form of requisition for names of inhabitant occupiers is to be returned when filled up, shall be entitled to refuse to receive such form, or omit to proceed upon the information it contains, because it has been returned through the post without prepayment of postage, but shall receive such form, and act in regard to it in every respect, as if the postage had been prepaid, and, in case of failure so to do, every such clerk or other official shall be liable in respect of each such form refused or not proceeded upon to a penalty of not less than forty shillings,"—(Mr. Sexton.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the said Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, the question as to whether those notices should be carried without being stamped was one entirely for the Postmaster General. He did not think there would be any difficulty in the matter, at any rate not so much as was anticipated. He thought it would be well to leave it to the common sense of the Clerks of the Unions, and that it was not necessary to legislate in the matter.

MR. LEAMY asked whether the Local Government Board would have any objection to send instructions to the Clerks of the Unions to receive those forms unstamped?

MR. HEALY said, he hoped the Postmaster General would take a liberal view of this matter, and that in view of the fact that thousands of new voters would come on the Register, many of whom would not know that it was necessary that the notice should be returned with the postage prepaid, he would not enforce the halfpenny stamp.

MR. SEXTON said, the Solicitor General for Ireland had not touched the case at all. What had happened at Dublin would happen again in these cases. The clerk would refuse to receive the notices. There was a great possibility of fraud and collusion under the existing arrangement. The majority on the Boards of Guardians were Tories; and if the Tory landlords occupied themselves with politics, and objected to the popular candidate, all that was necessary was that the landlords should send back the paper unstamped, and the Tory Clerk of the Union or other official should decline to receive it. He contended that they should not be placed within the possibility of a large number of people being disfranchised for the want of a halfpenny stamp. He was sure that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General would not, for the sake of the small sum of money involved, refuse to instruct his subordinates in Ireland that, whenever these Returns came into their hands, the fact of their not being stamped should not be allowed to interfere with their delivery; he would not refuse to guarantee that the papers should get into the hands of the persons to whom they were addressed whether they were stamped or not. The whole matter was a very small one, and one that, in his opinion, ought to be decided without hesitation.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was a question of exemption, and he would consider it before the Report.

MR. SEXTON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland would be able to devise a practical settlement of the matter. He would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment in that expectation.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, before the Amendment was withdrawn he wished to express a hope that there would be no miscarriage of justice over a technical matter of this kind; but while it would be a very serious thing that the object of the Bill should be nullified by the want of these stamps, he trusted, on the other hand, that care would be taken that no harm was done to the Inland Revenue.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON said, he believed that no one would contest his contention that any Clerk of the Union or other official charged with any duty under the Representation of the People Act, 1832, who refused to carry out that duty, and thereby endangered the vote of any person, should be dismissed from his office. The clerk or official who delayed or killed time in connection with his duties came within the scope of that contention, and he thought it was necessary clearly to indicate at the earliest possible sible moment that no insubordination, delay, or action likely to prejudice the rights of voters, should be tolerated by that House; and, for that reason, he asked the Committee to say that if any official sinned against the Act in question he would not be allowed to retain his position. With that object in view he would move the Amendment in his name.

Mr. Sexton

New Clause :—

(Duties of clerks of unions under "The Representation of the People Act, 1884.")

"Any clerk of union, or other official charged with any duty by 'The Representation of the People Act, 1884,' who, after having been called upon to perform such duty, shall refuse or delay to enter upon and proceed with such performance, shall be liable to dismissal without notice,"—(Mr. Sexton.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be read a second time."

MR. GIBSON said, this was an important clause. He did not at all object to a clerk who, by delay or neglect, caused grave obstruction in a matter of this kind being punished for it. That was entirely right; but it would seem a matter to be dealt with by the official heads of the Department. He did not know whether the Government felt that this clause, as drafted, was necessary to strengthen their hands; whether, in its present form, it was calculated to do so in the most efficient way. He desired to elicit from the Government how far they considered a clause of the kind necessary, and how far they were satisfied with the clause as proposed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he did not think it necessary to introduce into the Bill a clause of this kind, because such a breach of duty would be considered a matter justifying dismissal. He considered that to adopt a new clause under the circumstances would be to go beyond the necessities of the case.

MR. SEXTON said, the point was that every hour was of importance in this matter of the voting of the people. They knew that evil-doing on the part of a Clerk of the Union or official could only be discovered months afterwards. This clause was not intended to meet the case of default; it was only intended to meet the case of refusal or delay in proceeding. It was a matter for ascertainment by the Local Government Board. If it were reported to the Local Government Board that any clerk or official had refused to proceed, they could then send down and investigate the matter. But that should be done without notice, for obvious reasons. He thought it necessary to deal with a dereliction of duty by a penalty; and, in this case, thousands of people might be disfranchised unless the officials were told that the iniquity in question would entail loss of office.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had already pointed out that in the case of misconduct no notice was necessary.

MR. HEALY said, that, last year, they had made out a list of over 100 cases where an official had acted falsely and fraudulently; but what satisfaction did they get by leaving the matter to be dealt with by the Local Government Board? Why, the fact that officials were accused by hon. Members on those Benches was in itself sufficient to cause right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench to screen them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was President of the Irish Local Government Board, and how did he treat complaints made to him? His one idea was not to please the people, to give them satisfaction, or to do anything agreeable to them. He would screen the officials, and the one question he would ask himself would be—"How can I thwart the Parnellites?" His own belief was that when the Clerks of Unions and officials in Ireland grossly misconducted themselves, the right hon. Gentleman and the Irish Government would quite as grossly maintain them in their offices.

MR. SEXTON said, unless the Government promised to take the matter into consideration and ceased to put them off with answers of the kind they had just received, he thought they would be compelled to occupy considerably more time in discussing the question. He understood the Solicitor General for Ireland to say that the course that would be pursued was that which he (Mr. Sexton) wished to have declared in the Bill. Both the learned Gentlemen who had spoken on the Amendment admitted that if an official did what was described in the clause—that was to say, refused to perform his duty, or delayed to enter upon its performance—he was liable to dismissal. What then was the cause of the abhorrence on the part of the Government to have that declared; what harm could there be in saying that under the circumstances the individual would be dismissed? There was one other course open to the Government. If they had this insuperable objection to the clause, would they accept a compromise—that was to say, if under the circumstances, as was admitted, an official was liable to dismissal, would the President of the Irish Local Government Board undertake that the Board would immediately issue to the Clerks of Unions a Circular intimating to them upon the authority of the Board that refusal or delaying to perform the duties cast upon them by the Act would entail their dismissal?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir. I do not accept the way in which the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) has put this question, or his description of the action of the officials of the Local Government Board. I can assure him, however, that we have every desire to see justice done in this matter; but I am not aware that any instance has been pointed out to me, or my hon. and learned Friend near me, of unfairness in these matters. The Local Government Board have undertaken to issue instructions, but we could not accept the clause in its present form. If it will meet the views of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) I will agree to a clause running in this way—

“Any clerk of union, or other official . . . who, after having been called upon to perform such duty, shall wilfully refuse or delay, and so on.”

MR. SEXTON: I accept that.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think there would be no objection to that.

Clause read a second time.

Question, “That the word ‘wilfully’ be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

New Clause:—

(Devolution of title.)

“For the purposes of this Act the production of letters of administration by any claimant in order to establish any devolution of title to or from any qualification shall not be deemed necessary, and the pendency of proceedings under or the non-compliance with any of the provisions of the third section of ‘The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881,’ shall not be deemed to invalidate a claim to any qualification.”—(Mr. Marum,)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be now read a second time.”

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he did not think it would be advisable to accept the clause.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he must confess that the difficulty with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) aimed at by the clause was one very certain to arise.

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, this was not so much a question of difficulty as a matter of actual fact. At the last revision in the Queen’s County, a considerable number of men were disfranchised because they had not taken out letters of administration. He knew of cases where men had died leaving several sons, but only one son had remained in occupation of the farm for perhaps 12 or 15 years, this arrangement being completely satisfactory to all the parties. According to ordinary presumption, the man who had been in occupation, and had paid rates, was entitled to vote. But that was not enough for the gentleman who presided at the Registration Court, and he disallowed vote after vote, on the ground that though the men had been in exclusive occupation for a very great number of years, they had not qualified themselves legally by taking out letters of administration. Prima facie those to be registered did not avail the men at all. He (Mr. Arthur O’Connor) saw his constituents, one after another, disfranchised on no better ground than that he had stated. This means of disfranchisement had been adopted in the past, and he had no doubt it would be adopted in the future unless steps were taken to avoid it.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked: the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur O’Connor) could give the Committee an estimate of the disfranchisement in such circumstances?

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, he saw five men disfranchised in a quarter of an hour.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he did not think that such disfranchisement as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. O'Connor) referred to would be possible, when regard was had to the provisions of this Bill. There was a clause providing that actual occupation should give the vote, and if evidence were given of actual occupation, one could hardly understand the vote being disallowed. As to the latter part of the clause of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Marum), it would not in his (the Solicitor General's) opinion have any effect at all. The words were—

"Or the non-compliance with any of the provisions of the third section of 'The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881,' shall not be deemed to invalidate a claim to any qualification."

He did not quite understand what was meant by non-compliance with any of the provisions of the 3rd section of the Land Act, because that section provided that a man had to bequeath to one person only. If a man bequeathed to more than one person, he (the Solicitor General) did not understand what was to follow. If the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Marum) was agreeable, they would confer together to see whether the difficulty suggested could be properly met. Whatever evil there was, he (the Solicitor General) did not think it would be remedied by this clause. He thought that, as a matter of fact, the clause would be a mere nullity.

MR. MARUM said, he would point out that it was possible that there might be pendency of proceedings within the 12 months to determine who was the tenant of premises. It was to prevent the pendency of proceedings invalidating a claim to a qualification, that he proposed this clause. He knew many persons who did not like to sub-divide a holding. They agreed amongst themselves, and then came the difficulty who was the tenant? When they came before the Revising Barrister, that gentleman invariably asked, first of all, who the occupier was.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Marum) would confer with the Law Officers, they would be very happy to do what they could to meet his views. If, after a conference, the hon. and learned Gentleman preferred his own words, he could move to re-introduce his clause on the Report.

MR. MARUM said, he would very gladly avail himself of the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SCHEDULE.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN proposed an Amendment, in page 4, line 1, before "Schedule," to insert "Second."

Question, "That that word be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN proposed an Amendment, in Schedule 2, page 4, lines 9 and 10, after "2," to leave out "and the Schedules," and insert "except sub-sections one and two of section two."

Question, "That the words 'and the Schedules' stand part of the Schedule," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'except sub-sections one and two of section two' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN proposed an Amendment, in Second Schedule, page 4, leave out from beginning of line 27 to end of Schedule, and insert—

"The forms and directions applicable to cases where new polling districts have been constituted, contained in the First Schedule to this Act, shall be substituted for the corresponding forms and directions contained in the Schedule to 'The Polling Districts (Ireland) Act, 1873.'"

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. HEALY said, he would ask the Government whether they were willing to agree to the holding of night Sessions in places like Kingstown, especially now that the Franchise Act had made a great change in the general character and the number of persons who would come up to prove their claims?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he would consider the subject and determine upon it by Report.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words proposed be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN moved the insertion of a new Schedule.

New Schedule (Containing the Forms necessary to carry out the Act in counties and Boroughs separately, and in Counties and Boroughs conjunctively,) —(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman,) —brought up, and read the first and second time.

Question proposed, "That the Schedule be added to the Bill."

PART III.—FORMS APPLICABLE TO BOTH COUNTIES AND BOROUGHES.

FORM No. 31.

CLAIM OF LODGER.

MR. HEALY, in moving, as an Amendment, to leave out Column 4, "Amount of Rent paid," said, the term in question was a very confusing term, because the lodgings were to be of the value of £10 unfurnished. The people who got the forms would be puzzled to know whether the phrase to which he referred meant with or without furniture. He and his hon. Friends were puzzled to know how to fill up the form, and that fact was sufficient to show that many other people would experience the same difficulty. He would, therefore, propose that the column be struck out.

Amendment proposed, in Part 3, Form No. 31, to leave out Column 4, "Amount of Rent paid."—(Mr. Healy.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he could not agree now to the striking out of the column. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would reserve the point until Report.

MR. GIBSON said, he had no bigotry about this Form at all. The lodger franchise had been retained, in addition to all the other franchises now created. There must be some column in the Form, the filling up of which would enable anybody to ascertain the value of the lodgings in respect of which a man claimed to be registered. If this column were struck out, how was a person to find out that the figure of £10 was reached? There certainly should be something to indicate the value of the lodgings.

MR. HEALY thought that instead of a column, "Amount of Rent paid," it would be better to have one, "Are your rooms above the value of" so much? The present column was mere surplusage, because no man would fill up the Form, unless he considered the value of his rooms was over £10. The point was this—that in the City of Dublin people were in the habit of taking rooms and furnishing them themselves. There were also, as a matter of course, furnished lodgings, and therefore a distinction ought to be made between furnished and unfurnished rooms, and this column did not make any distinction between them. Perhaps the difficulty would be met if the word "furnished" were put in.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he would point out that there was one column, "Description of Rooms occupied, and whether furnished or not."

MR. HEALY said, he would agree to the postponement of the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. FINDLATER (for MR. T. A. DICKSON), the following Amendment made:—At end insert the following Schedule:—

(Schedule B.)

NOTICE OF OBJECTION to be given to PARTIES objected to by any PERSON other than the CLERK of the PEACE or CLERK of the UNION, or POOR RATE COLLECTOR.

Polling district of

To Mr. _____, of _____

Take notice that I object to your name [in the notice to the tenant, instead of the words "your name," insert the name of the person objected to] being retained on the list for this polling district of voters for the county of _____ [or borough of _____], and I ground my objection on the column of the register headed—

"Christian name and surname of each person on the register;"

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(The Lord Advocate, Mr Solicitor General for Scotland.)

[BILL 132.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title); and Clause 2 (Definition), severally agreed to.

Clause 3 (Power of Her Majesty in Council to prescribe forms).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 12, to leave out "including," and insert "excluding," said, he proposed the Amendment for the purpose of keeping in the hands of hon. Members the alteration of an Act of Parliament which was very important to Scotland. The clause proposed to enable the form of the Valuation Roll to be altered by an Order of the Queen in Council, instead of its being brought to the House of Commons and altered after consultation with the Scotch Members. It was quite possible that English and Irish Members did not know that the Valuation Roll was the most important document the Scotch people had. It was formed 32 years ago as the basis of all rating in Scotland, and it had been of the greatest value since. In Scotland they could not get on without it; and the English and Irish people would be very well satisfied if they adopted the same system. But that, however, was another matter. The Order of the Queen in Council was a very high sounding term; but, in point of fact, it really amounted to the Lord Advocate and his clerks. This was purely a Scotch business; and he would show the way in which this very Bill had been brought before the House, as an instance of how easily alterations might be made without any consultation with the Members from Scotland. This Bill was printed and delivered to hon. Members between 8 and 9 o'clock last Wednesday, and at 1 o'clock on the same day it was read a second time. He believed that not more than one or two Members from Scotland then knew that the Bill was in existence. He asked several Scotch Members, and only one of them told him that he had noticed that the Bill had been delivered that morning. He believed that the rapidity with which the Bill was read a second time was unprecedented in the annals of Parliament. There was no record of a Bill being read a second time the day it was delivered to Members. He mentioned that as an instance of how easily the Valuation Roll might be altered without the Scotch Representatives knowing anything about it. The alteration that was proposed in this case was the adoption for the counties of a form of roll now used in boroughs. He would deal with that more in detail when they reached the Schedules. The county Members in the counties in Scotland had no organization by which they could bring to the notice of the Lord Advocate either their objections to the proposed change, or their wishes with regard to it. In that respect they were in a very different position to the burghs of Scotland, which had what was called the Convention of Burghs—an organization for the purpose of looking after the interests of the burghs—having its head-quarters and offices in Edinburgh, and for its President very often the Lord Provost of that city. They had, therefore, means of access to the Lord Advocate and other officials in Edinburgh for the furthering of their wishes. He did not say that the interests of the burghs and counties were antagonistic; but his point was that they were not identical. Their wants were very different, and what was suitable for one might not be suitable for the other. It would be very easy for the officials of the Government to make changes which might have a political bias, and which might affect the voting of either burghs or counties in a very important manner, and, therefore, he thought hon. Members of that House ought to retain what they had had for 30 years—namely, the privilege of altering the law. He, therefore, proposed just merely to strike out of Clauses 3 to 4 so much as enabled them to alter the Valuation Roll of counties without coming to that House. He hoped hon. Members would see that it was proposed purely to keep in their hands that power which they had now, and not for any purpose of obstruction or hostility to the measure of the Lord Advocate. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 12, to leave out the word "including" for the purpose of inserting the word "excluding,"—(Sir Alexander Gordon),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'including' stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as he understood him, both from his Amendment on the Paper and from his speech, did not object to the Queen in Council being vested with the power of prescribing forms for the execution of this Act generally, but merely objected to that power being extended to the Valuation Roll. [Sir ALEXANDER GORDON: Yes; that is so.] In that case, he could assure the Committee that the only object with which this provision had been introduced was for the sake of convenience. They had now had a good many years experience of the Valuation Roll. It had been very frequently altered by Act of Parliament; and he believed that the counties had by no means adhered to the particular form which had been prescribed from time to time, so that there were in the various counties considerable variations. His hon. and gallant Friend had spoken of the want of facility for communication. He could assure the hon. Member that the reason why the Bill was somewhat late in being introduced was because they had been in communication with the assessors of the leading counties with the view of ascertaining what was the prevalent opinion as to the most convenient form and method of accomplishing the object they had in view—namely, simplicity and clearness in this Roll. It was found, from time to time, that some of the entries were needless, and that others required to be introduced. Instead of making it essential to come back to Parliament for authority to get this done, they had thought it would be convenient to propose a simpler method of making such alteration as might be thought necessary from time to time. He conceived that that would be in accordance with the prevalent opinion; but he need scarcely say that if there was an idea on the part of Scotch Members that this should be made the subject of legislation, he would have no objection. A mere alteration of the form or the style was hardly worth—he was going to say occupying the time of the House, but he would not say that. He regarded the Valuation Roll as important; but it was not quite the charter of their liberties, as the hon. and gallant Member would seem to imply. He should like to know what the prevalent opinion on the subject was?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had spoken of the Valuation Roll having been altered several times. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought, would find himself mistaken with regard to that. It had only been altered once.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): No; several times.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had here two Acts of Parliament—namely, the Act of 1854, and the subsequent Act of the 24 & 25 Vict.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the Valuation Roll was altered with regard to burghs by the Burghs Reform Act, and in regard to counties by the County Voters Act of 1861.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that was what he was speaking of. The Act of 1861, no doubt, had altered it. It had made it optional for the period to be one or five years, as the Commissioners of Supply thought proper. It was for the purpose of assimilating the Roll; but there was no object to be gained by assimilating the Roll of the counties and the burghs. The two were wholly different, and nothing would be gained by having the two forms amalgamated. Therefore, he hoped his Amendment would be acceded to.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that he had understood the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to invite an expression of opinion as to the propriety of the proposals in the Bill. Well, he (Sir Herbert Maxwell) hardly concurred in the proposals in the Bill. He thought it would be distinctly to the advantage of those who had to deal with the working of the Act in the counties and burghs that there should be a certain elasticity given which could not be obtained by the complicated machinery of an Act of Parliament. It might seem a trivial point, and a somewhat unimportant point, which had been raised by his hon. and gallant Friend

Sir Alexander Gordon

Sir Alexander Gordon); but he could assure the Committee that there was a great deal of expense, unavoidable expense, involved in this question. It was the practice in the counties to adopt a most cumbersome and expensive form of printing the register of voters. He held in his hand a sheet of the register of voters for his own county, and he thought hon. Members, if they would look at it, would agree that it was a most inconvenient form. In his own constituency there were not more than 1,700 voters, and, absurd as it might seem, the register of these voters—the papers on which these 1,700 names were printed—weighed no less than 1½ lbs.; and he left it to the Committee to consider what would be the weight of records containing the names of, perhaps, 25,000 or 30,000 voters. He thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate deserved the thanks of the Committee for having referred this matter to the Privy Council; for, no doubt, the recommendations would reach that Body more perfectly and more readily than they would in the form of an Act of Parliament brought before this House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, line 24, after “1861,” insert “and section sixteen of ‘The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act;’” and in line 27, leave out “section four of the said Act,” and insert “the last-mentioned section.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Assessor may call for a list of inhabitant occupiers).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the first Amendment on the Paper in his name was as follows:—In page 2, line 4, after “every,” insert “occupier or others.” He did not, however propose to move it. He desired to accomplish the same thing by a slightly different method—namely, by moving to insert, in page 2, line 5, after the words “in respect of,” the words “the occupation of.” It had been pointed out that the clause, as it stood, did not define with sufficient clearness what the rating was to be. In Scotland, differing from the usual English practice, there was a rating both on the proprietor and the tenant, and under the clause, as it stood, there would be laid on the proprietor, however large his property, an obligation to send in a Return specifying all the names of the servants that even the tenants had on his property; and if the Committee accepted the proposal, he would have to specify also the time at which the servants entered his service. It would not be reasonable to ask that of the proprietor if he was not in the occupancy, because he might not have the means of knowing the facts; and accordingly the words he (the Lord Advocate) proposed to insert would make the clause run—“Every person rated, or liable to be rated, in respect of the occupation of lands.” If he were the proprietor in occupation, then he would have to make the Return, and if he were the tenant in occupation he would have to do it. It was only the occupier who knew the service men on his property.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 5, after the words “in respect of,” insert “occupation of.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In page 2, line 6, after “dwelling-house,” insert “or on some agent of such person concerned in the management of such lands and heritages;” line 7, leave out “himself,” and insert “such person;” line 9, after “dwelling-house,” insert “and the month and year in which they began to occupy such dwelling-house;” line 10, leave out “he,” and insert “any such person or agent;” and in line 12, leave out from “conviction,” to end of Clause, and insert—

“To the same penalty as is enacted in similar cases by section seven of the Act passed in the Session of the seventeenth and eighteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter ninety-one.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Special provision as to voters in 1885), agreed to.

Clause 6 (Dwelling-house to be entered in valuation roll).

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to leave out “separately.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'separately' stand part of the Clause."

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, he wished to know the meaning of the Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it had been suggested that the use of the word "separately" was a direction which led the assessors, or some of them, in making up the lists, practically to make double entries. They might feel it their duty to enter a name a second time in connection with the houses of servants. A criticism had been made upon that by those familiar with the working of the matter.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, he thought it desirable that the different houses attached to a farm should be entered separately.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, there was such a specification as would show that there was a different place inhabited by a different person. He had thought it safer to have the word "separately" in. They had been told that it would lead to double entry, and without it the section would be quite sufficient in itself.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON thought that each individual house should have a separate number on the Roll. Every house which carried a vote with it should have a separate number on the Roll.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, it should be individualized, whether it was numbered or not.

MR. R. P. BRUCE said, he thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate should consider the matter before Report. Take the case of a large farm; it might have four or five houses on it, the inhabitants of which would possess votes. There would be a list of four or five names in another column of the Roll, and nothing in the Roll to show where the houses were, or by whom they were occupied. That point he thought worthy of consideration. Should not the word "cottage," or whatever it might be, be put against each name?

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I hope the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate will consider that matter.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I will undertake to do so.

MR. ORR-EWING thought each house should be clearly specified.

MR. BUCHANAN asked whether there would be a separate entry?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that specifying a dwelling-house meant entering that dwelling-house individually. There might be a farmhouse, then so many cottages, and so on.

Question put, and negatived; word let out accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Register in divided parishes).
Clause 8 (Register in parliamentary burghs merged in counties); Clause 9 (Advertisement of new polling places in counties, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 28); and Clause 10 (Registration where counties are divided), severally agreed to.

Clause 11 (Assessor not to be collector of poor rates or factor).

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he did not know what the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate expected to gain by the clause. No doubt it was a desirable thing that the assessor of a burgh—might be a small one—should not be allowed to be a factor or land agent within that small burgh; but there was no reason why he should be prevented from engaging as factor or land agent in farm operations in a district 10 or 12 miles away. He was sure the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did not wish to prevent that, although that was the result of his clause. He (Mr. Williamson) proposed to remedy it in either one or two ways—either to insert after the word "assessor," in line 11, the words "in the county or division of the county"—that was to say, to exclude the operation of the clause from an outside district. If that were not acceptable, he would suggest, as an alternative proposal, to put at the end of the clause the words "in the county district or burgh in which he may be assessor." He would move the first of the two alternative Amendments, but would leave the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to make his choice between the two.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 11, after the word "~~assessor~~" insert "in the county or division of the county."—(Mr. Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Williamson). He quite understood the reason of this clause. It might be advantageous to have the restriction in some cases; but there were instances in which burgh solicitors were to a very small extent land factors, and these gentlemen it would be unnecessary to exclude from the office of assessor. He believed the language of the clause was unnecessarily wide, and was of opinion that the case the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had in view, and which the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had also borne in mind, would be met by making the provision apply to counties only. He thought that burgh factors should be excluded from the clause. They were in no sense factors in the sense in which he understood those referred to in the Bill to be.

DR. CAMERON said, he hoped that the second alternative proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews (Mr. Williamson) would be accepted. To include small burghs in the operation of this Bill would be to put a stop to some flagrant cases of pluralism which existed in small burghs, and there could be no particular hardship in the proposal. He quite agreed that there was no reason why an assessor in a burgh or county should be prevented from doing what he liked in any district beyond his official jurisdiction; but that brought in the second alternative. But if this was to be inserted in the clause, and he thought it was desirable that it should, he protested against burghs being taken out.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL could not understand the object of the provision in the Bill which they were discussing. If gentlemen acting as factors in many districts were excluded by their office from acting as assessors, they would lose the services of those who were really the most capable men in the county for discharging the duties of assessors. Of course, in large towns there was plenty of choice; but he would ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to remember that in sparsely populated districts and rural places the most capable business men, and the best men, were selected as factors and land agents, and that these would be the best qualified for discharging the duties of assessors. He must protest against the idea, which seemed to be accepted in some quarters, that because a man was employed in a certain capacity to act between a landlord and tenant, he utterly and entirely lost the capacity for acting impartially in any public office. He entirely protested against any such idea as that, and trusted the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would, if he did not abandon this Amendment, at all events show some better reason why the Committee should support it than it bore on the face of it.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he supported the view of the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell). He had an Amendment on the Paper to leave out all the words after the word "rates" to the end of the clause. He failed to understand why burgh assessors should be placed in a better position than county assessors, as his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire had just stated. Some of the factors who acted as county assessors were the very best men in the county. He had in view the cases of several assessors in several towns who had been acting as factors for various properties for 25 years past. He had never heard any complaint against these gentlemen; and he thought that to prevent a choice being made from amongst the factors and land agents was to deprive the public of the services of a very valuable class of men. The result of the exclusion proposed would be that they would be apt to get an inferior class of men, because the superior class would have to choose between giving up their factorships or relinquishing the assessorships. He thought in the case of men who had acted for 25 years without a whisper of complaint against them, it was a hard thing to put before them the alternative of giving up either their factorships or their assessorships. He had not heard a single argument in favour of the plan the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate proposed; and he should like to hear from the right hon. and learned Gentleman what he had to say in favour of depriving this worthy class of men of their assessorships or their factorships, as the case might be?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he thought he could explain in a few words the reason why this clause was introduced. It had been introduced in consequence of representations received from a variety of quarters to the effect that the combination of the offices of assessors and factors had resulted in a good deal of complaint. Pluralism was objected to as being disadvantageous in the holder of a public office, but it was not merely to prevent that that the clause had been introduced. Legislation had no concern with that by itself, unless it was shown that there was some possible conflict between the discharge of a public duty and a private one. What were the duties of an assessor and his powers? An assessor had to go about and collect all kinds of information regarding hereditary property. He had to go about the lands in his district, whether county or burgh. He asked all kinds of questions, and made all kinds of notes, and entered what he thought the value on the Valuation Roll, and he very often had a considerable amount of judgment to bring to bear. Take, for instance, the case of houses in the town or in the county which were not let, but in the occupancy of the owner. The assessor had to form an opinion as to what value he would put upon them. On the other hand, observe what an assessor's duties as factor were. One of his duties as factor was, of course, to manage in the interest of his employer, and to avoid any taxation that could be avoided. He should be very sorry to make any charge against the factors; but it was quite plain that they might be tempted to take a more favourable—that is, for the purposes of taxation, a lower—view of the valuation of property they managed than they would if the same property were managed by someone else. Accordingly, it was thought there was a possibility of a conflict of public and private duty to which no one should be subjected. Certainly there were parts of the country in which the feeling existed—whether rightly or wrongly—that it was unfortunate that there should be persons in such a position. He put it as a matter of general principle which he thought the Committee would accept. If what he had said were true of the country, he should imagine it was even more true of the towns. It had been represented to the Government that there were in towns gentlemen holding the office of house factors and also of assessors, and it had been pointed out that it was unfair they should have the power of valuing houses they managed and the houses they did not manage. The same considerations, therefore, came into play in towns as in counties. Assessors who acted as house factors would get to know the affairs of their neighbours, and it might be of their rivals in trade. They might obtain particulars with regard to other houses that it was not desirable they should acquire. In short, this was not a position in which a man should be placed. Such was the ground on which this provision with regard to factors had been introduced. He might point out that no objection had been made to the collectors of poor rates being disqualified from acting as assessors. The reason of their disqualification was obvious. Poor rate collectors also had certain duties to perform with respect to the preparation of the Register. But it appeared to him that the case against factors acting as assessors was even stronger than that against poor rate collectors. He should, however, be quite prepared, if the Committee thought fit, to accept the second Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Andrews Burghs (Mr. Williamson), because the possible conflict of duty would not arise except where the management was in the same area as that in which the second set of duties were to be performed. If his hon. Friend (Mr. Williamson) would for the words "for a county or division of a county" substitute the words "in the county or burgh," he (the Lord Advocate) would be prepared to accept the Amendment. But he was not disposed, for the reasons he had given, to drop the provision, unless there was a feeling in the Committee that it was not a right provision.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he was very sorry the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had thought it necessary to introduce this clause, because he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) thought that the clause was quite unnecessary. They had not been told the sources from which the Government had obtained the information upon which this clause was defended. It was a great pity that owing to secret communications, a clause should be inserted in an Act of Parliament which really endeavoured to cast a reflection upon a most respectable class of men. This clause would be found to be all the more unnecessary when it was borne in mind how the assessors were appointed. The Government assessors valued each district of Scotland, and the counties almost invariably appointed them their assessors—indeed, he was not aware of any county with which he was acquainted that did not accept the valuation of the county assessors. It must be a very small county that acted differently. It would save the counties a great deal of expense, and a clashing of valuation between the Government and county assessors, if the Government valuation were to be adopted. It would be much better for the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to withdraw this clause altogether. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would only give the matter a little thought, and throw aside the anonymous correspondence he had received, he must see the force of the arguments addressed to him.

MR. WILLIAMSON asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, seeing that the Lord Advocate was prepared to accept the alternative proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, after "be," insert "a sheriff clerk or clerk of supply."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. R. P. BRUCE said, he wished to point out that if these men were prevented from engaging in the work, it might be found necessary to employ men of an inferior class.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he would remind the Committee that sheriffs' officers had other public duties to perform.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked what sort of persons it was contemplated to employ in future as assessors? In many districts there was only a limited number of persons who could possibly be so employed; and if by this Bill they were to exclude such persons, who would have to be appointed in future? No one could make a living by being assessor only; and if an assessor was not to have any other means of obtaining a living, he (Mr. Dalrymple) failed to see who they could appoint to the office.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) thought a very convenient method would be to appoint the Government assessor. He believed that the Government assessor was employed in all the counties of Scotland except six.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

DR. CAMERON proposed, in page 3, line 12, after "poor," to insert "or other public." It appeared to him that the same argument applied in the case of the one officer as in the case of the other.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, after "poor," to insert "or other public."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he doubted whether it was wise to use such very general words. He did not exactly know what they covered. He thought the Committee ought to know whether any particular office was pointed at, and whether it was expected there would be any conflict of duty.

DR. CAMERON: The municipal and police rates, for instance.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he did not know that the mere collecting of money raised a conflict, and he put it to his hon. Friend whether the words adopted did not cover every office that was necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he was not satisfied with the explanations given by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, and as he believed, with his hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing), that the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman cast a slur on a deserving body of men, he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 13, to leave out all after "rates" to end of Clause.—(General Alexander.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he did not propose to repeat what he had already said on this matter; but he must point out that what was proposed did not cast a slur upon anybody—he should be very sorry if it did. Parliament had repeatedly declared by Acts that particular offices should not be held together. That did not cast a slur upon anybody; it merely affirmed that in the estimation of Parliament it would be better that certain offices should not be held jointly. The object was to prevent any possible conflict of duties.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that an undoubted slur was cast upon the factors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said he had received anonymous communications.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I did not say anonymous.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that so far as the Committee were concerned the communications were anonymous. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had received communications, he declined to say from whom; but he invited the Committee to be influenced by communications of this nature. He (Sir Herbert Maxwell) would be very surprised if the Committee of the House of Commons consented to pay any attention whatsoever to the communications in question. Why, they all knew that nobody could fill any public office in any rural town or large town without making enemies. It was very possible that an enemy of one of the factors had written to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not to suppose that the Committee would on any trivial grounds consent that a class of men should be discredited in the manner proposed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke as if to be tempted was tantamount to being tempted. He spoke of the motives which would actuate these gentlemen, and he mentioned certain forms of temptation to which they would be exposed by the fact of holding a number of offices. Of course, men were exposed to temptation; but it was not the business of the House of Commons to build a hedge round every subject of Her Majesty so that they should not be tempted. The gentlemen in question could resist temptation, and therefore he cordially supported the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend (General Alexander).

MR. ORR-EWING said, there were only six counties in Scotland which did not adopt the Government assessor. He would put it to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate whether it would not be better to introduce a clause compelling these six counties to adopt the Government valuator as the county valuator? If that were done, the difficulty which the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his Friends foresaw, of having factors and Poor Law Inspectors acting as assessors, would be prevented. If this suggestion did not meet with approval, he hoped the Committee would reject the clause altogether.

DR. CAMERON hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would adhere to this part of his proposal. He did not see that any slur was cast upon any section of the community by what was proposed. There was a strong temptation to employ as factor a man who had power of fixing the assessment of properties. The liberal reforms which had taken place would work a very material change, especially in the Highland counties; and from the knowledge he (Dr. Cameron) possessed of the classes who were to be enfranchised, he could say that they would not regard with anything like confidence or satisfaction the holding of the office of assessor by the factors. Officials of this sort should be above suspicion; and when they were legislating on this subject, it was well that a change should be made if good reason were shown for making it. The hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had spoken of anonymous communications. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did not mention anonymous communications, but spoke of having received communications from various quarters of the country. He (Dr. Cameron) had also received many communications on this subject.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would accept the request of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing). That hon. Gentleman had proposed a compromise which would be acceptable to all Parties. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) agreed with the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, that there was some advantage in having officials who were above suspicion; but he also agreed with his hon. Friend, that there was no more deserving class in all Scotland, a class more capable of doing their business than the factors. If it was true that this clause was likely to be interpreted as a slur on that deserving class, could not that be avoided without injury to the Public Service? Would it not be well for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to engage, between this and Report, to make it obligatory on all counties in Scotland to engage the Government assessors?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. A. BALFOUR) said, he thought it was possible it might be regarded as an interference with local self-government if the Government were to say—"We appoint certain gentlemen as assessors, and you must appoint them as your assessors." Besides, the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Orr-Ewing) did not cover the case of burghs, and he (the Lord Advocate) was not sure whether that was not a more important case than the other.

MR. ORR-EWING suggested that it should be arranged to include the burghs in the provision.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the only counties in which this was in question at all were the Highland counties, and it was just in those counties where there would be difficulty in finding any efficient official other than the Government official. He was certainly of opinion that it would be well if some compulsion were put on the counties in this matter.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment in order that a division might be taken upon the Question, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved an Amendment, in page 3, line 13, after "factor," to insert "for heritable property."

Question, "That those words be there inserted" put, and agreed to.

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he would propose the Amendment accepted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate—namely, at the end of line 13, to add "in the county or burgh for which he may be assessor."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 13, at end, to insert "in the county or burgh for which he may be assessor."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BUCHANAN asked whether it would not be necessary to insert the words "Parliamentary burgh?"

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he did not know whether that would be necessary; but he would consider the matter on Report, and also whether they should not insert the words "county or division of county."

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

DR. CAMERON proposed to insert, in line 13, at end—

"And every person who is the partner of a person so employed shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed himself to be so employed."

His object in proposing this Amendment was to prevent an evasion of the meaning of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 13, at the end of the Clause, to insert the words "and every person who is the partner of a person so employed shall, for the purpose of this section, be deemed himself to be so employed."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the qualification was an individual qualification, and he did not think there was any fear of a clause being evaded in the way contemplated by the hon. Gentleman. If the clause were allowed to stand as at present, there would be no possibility of harm arising.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he considered the Amendment was necessary, and therefore trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate would see his way to accept it.

DR. CAMERON said, the clause might be necessary or not; but his belief was that if the clause was necessary, to make it effective they must put in words such as he proposed. Therefore, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not accept the Amendment, he should divide the Committee.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 76: Majority 45.—(Div. List, No. 148.)

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 11, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 27: Majority 53.—(Div. List, No. 149.)

Clause 12 (Separate valuation of water, gas, and other companies to be made in police burghs having population over 5,000).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In page 3, line 14, after "twenty-three," insert "twenty-five and twenty-seven;" and in line 19, leave out from "Act" to end of Clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in moving the insertion of a new clause, after Clause 12, providing for the printing of the Valuation Rolls, giving the Commissioners of Supply of any county, or the magistrates of any burgh, duly assembled for such purpose, the power to enter into contracts for such printing, and declaring the expense of such printing to be part of the expense of making up the Roll, and to be assessed for and levied accordingly, explained that under the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act of 1867 the power was given to the Commissioners of Supply to contract for the printing of the Roll only for one year at a time, and it was thought that it would be much cheaper to give the power to contract for a period not exceeding 10 years. The new clause, therefore, proposed that they should have power to make such contracts for 10 years.

New Clause:—

(Printing of Valuation Roll. 30 and 31 Vic. c. 80.)

"It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Supply of any county, or the magistrates of any burgh, to resolve at any meeting of their number, ordinary or special, duly called, and by a majority of those attending and voting, that the Valuation Roll of such county or burgh shall be printed for any period of years not exceeding ten, and it shall be lawful for such Commissioners or magistrates to enter into contracts for printing the same, and the expenses of such printing shall be deemed to be part of the expenses of making up such Roll, and shall be assessed for and valued accordingly: Provided always, That notice of the intention to move such resolution shall be inserted in the notice calling the meeting at which it is to be moved.

"And section ten of 'The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1867,' is hereby repealed,"—(The Lord Advocate),

brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, he would move that Progress should now be reported. Many hon. Members had not been able as yet to look very carefully at these Amendments, some of which had been put upon the Paper for the first time that night. Another reason for postponement was that he and several other Scotch Members had sent off the Bill and the Amendments to their friends in Scotland for their consideration, and before going into the new clauses, which occupied a couple of pages of the Paper, he would like to know what his friends in Scotland thought of them. The only result of persevering with the Bill now would be that discussion would be raised upon it on the Report stage.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman be directed to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. A. R. D. Elliot.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, there was another reason for reporting Progress. The Prime Minister had announced at Question time that evening that he should have a statement to make next week with regard to the course he proposed to take in the English Bill in reference to the question of paying for the expenses of registration. It would be observed that these new clauses dealt with the question of the cost of registration. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would tell the Committee what course the Government would take on this question in the present Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that was a matter for the judgment of the House. But if the Bill passed through Committee that night it would be reprinted before the Report, and it would be more convenient to discuss the matter then. He did not propose to go into the general question now; but whatever might be decided in regard to it in connection with the English measure, the same principle would of course, apply to the Bill for Scotland.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT said, he was in that case, withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress. His only object was to prevent the Committee from going in the dark.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then, we understand that, whatever arrangement is come to in the English Bill on this point, a similar arrangement will be made for Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Yes.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in moving the insertion of a new clause providing for the registration of lodgers in the case of the joint occupation of lodgings where the interest of each lodger, not more than two in number, amounted to an annual sum of not less than £10, explained that the object of the clause was to give the same privilege to lodgers in Scotland as was enjoyed by lodgers in England under the Registration Act of 1878.

New Clause:—

[(Joint occupation of lodgings.)

"Where lodgings are jointly occupied by more than one lodger, and the clear yearly value of the lodgings if let unfurnished is of an amount which when divided by the number of the lodgers gives a sum of not less than ten pounds for each lodger, then each lodger, if otherwise qualified, and subject to the conditions of 'The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868,' shall be entitled to be registered, and when registered to vote as a lodger, provided that not more than two persons, being such joint lodgers, shall be entitled to be registered in respect of such lodgings,"—

(The Lord Advocate.)

—brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HENDERSON said, he wished to know whether, in any case where there were more than two lodgers in joint occupation of the premises, the Revising Barrister would be permitted to make a selection among them?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, that could not be done under the English law, and it would not be possible under the present Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

VOL. CXXCVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved the insertion of a new clause, providing that the declaration of a lodger annexed to his notice of claim should be prima facie evidence of his qualification.

New Clause:—

(Declaration of lodger to be prima facie evidence.)

"In the case of a person claiming to vote as a lodger, the declaration annexed to his notice of claim shall for the purposes of revision be prima facie evidence of his qualification,"—

(The Lord Advocate.)

—brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. ORR-EWING said, he wished to know what would be the effect of the clause?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that here again the analogy of the English Act was followed. It had been said that a man ought not to be obliged to go and prove affirmatively that he was a lodger, and the object of the clause was simply to provide that the onus of objecting to him should be thrown upon the person who objected.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

On the Motion of THE LORD ADVOCATE, the following new Clauses were read a first and second time, and added to the Bill:—

(Remuneration of collectors of poor rates.)

"For the duties imposed upon them by sections eighteen and nineteen of 'The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868,' collectors of poor rates shall be entitled to remuneration at the rate of six shillings for every thousand names, and such remuneration shall be paid as part of the expenses of registration in counties and burghs respectively."

(Additional officers for registration in 1885.)

"During the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five—

"(1.) It shall be lawful for the assessors, with the consent of the Commissioners of Supply and of the Town Council, in counties and burghs respectively, to employ such assistants as may be necessary in order to complete the registration of voters at every stage at the proper date;

"(2.) It shall be lawful for the sheriff to appoint such number of substitutes as he thinks necessary to assist in the revision of the list of voters, such substitutes shall have the qualifications required by law for a salaried sheriff-substitute, and shall be paid at the rate of seven guineas per day;

"All expenses under this section shall be paid as part of the expenses of registration in counties and burghs respectively."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved the insertion of a new clause dealing with the cases of the double entry of voters upon the lists.

New Clause:—

(Double entries of Voters.)

"(1.) When the name of a person appears to be entered more than once as a voter on the lists of voters for the same county or burgh, the sheriff, when revising the lists, shall inquire whether such entries relate to the same person, and, on proof that such entries relate to the same person, shall retain one entry and strike out the others.

"(2.) The said person may select the entry to be retained by notice in writing delivered or sent by post to the sheriff clerk at or before the opening of the first court at which the sheriff revises any of the lists in which any such entries appear, or by application made by such person or on his behalf at the first sitting of the court for the revision of such lists.

"(3.) If no selection is so made the entry to be retained shall be determined as follows:—

"(a.) In counties:—

"(i.) If one of the entries is an entry on the list of voters as proprietor, and unobjected to, that entry shall be retained; and

"(ii.) If none of the entries is on the list of voters as proprietor, and one of the entries is the place of residence of the voter, and unobjected to, the entry in respect of the place of residence shall be retained; and

"(iii.) In any other case the entry which is first reached by the sheriff in revising the lists shall be retained:

"(b.) In burghs:—

"(i.) If one of the entries is the place of residence of the voter, the entry in respect of the place of residence shall be retained; and

"(ii.) In any other case the entry which is first reached by the sheriff in revising the lists shall be retained:

"And, if any such entry to be retained is objected to the sheriff shall not finally strike out any other entry until the objection to the entry to be retained has been determined by him in favour of the voter:

"(4.) When a Parliamentary burgh is divided into divisions, and the name of a person is entered in the register of Parliamentary voters in more than one division, and one of these entries is his place of residence, he shall be entitled to vote only in that division in which he is registered as a voter in respect of his place of residence, and shall not vote in respect of any other entry,"—(The Lord Advocate), —brought up, and read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he was glad the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate proposed to reprint the Bill, because this clause was of a somewhat startling character in its arrangement and method. It not only contained four sub-sections, but one of these sub-sections was sub-divided into two; and of those two secondary sub-sections, one was again sub-divided into three parts, and the other into two. Altogether the clause was of a most complicated character, and it might surely be made more intelligible. He would like to know what was meant by the word "entries," because it was difficult to ascertain whether they were men or things. In line 3 of the clause they were clearly things; but in line 17 as clearly they were persons. He hoped this sort of criticism would not be considered hypercritical—it was very important that they should be clear in the wording of the Bill. He would also like to see the words "unobjected to" omitted. Clearly they were not English, and he did not know that they were Scotch. They formed an unfortunate expression for an Act of Parliament. As the Bill was to be reprinted, he hoped that attention would be given to these points.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he did not know whether the words "unobjected to" were Scotch; but he had no doubt whatever that they were English, because they were taken from the English Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause verbally amended, as amended agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Schedule.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, the substitution of a Schedule in a different form from that contained in the Bill. Under the Act of 1854, two separate forms of Bill were established, one for counties, and the other for burghs. The one for counties had a column like the one he now proposed for the description of subject; but the one for burghs was subdivided, and had a small space for streets. In counties the houses were not numbered, and therefore the place for numbers was of no use. For some reason unexplained, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate now proposed to introduce one form both for counties and burghs. In 1861, under the County Voters Act for Scotland, the two original forms were reduced to one form, and the double columns for towns were discontinued, and one simple form was introduced for both counties and burghs. That had been in use ever since 1861, and he was not aware that any inconvenience had arisen from it. But the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate now proposed to reverse the arrangement—to have one form for counties and burghs; but to make the counties adopt the burgh form, by which there would be a complicated column with three divisions introducing a number. There ought to be a separate roll for counties, with one plain column, in which to place the entries. He had in his hand some of the forms, and there would be no difficulty in filling them up with one column. He did not attach much importance to the point; but, as it would simplify the procedure, he would move to leave out the words “and situation.”

Amendment proposed, in column 2, to leave out the words “and situation.”—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he must point out that it was most essential to have a clear specification. He apprehended that the Committee would think that the column, as it stood, was a proper column.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had an Amendment to propose in order to carry out the 5th section of the Act of 1868, which was to the effect that any person holding property of the value of £5, after deducting feu duty, should be entitled to vote. That section, not having been repealed, it was important to have the feu duty placed on the Valuation Roll, in order that it might be deducted from the total value, and that it might be seen at once whether the person was entitled to vote. If that was not done, there would be a great inducement to assessors making up the Roll to take the value of property as it stood, without deducting the feu duty. It was also very important that there should be a public record of all feuars. Feuars were liable to assessment in cases where tenants were not so liable; therefore it was most desirable to have on the Valuation Roll a statement of those who were feuars, and those who were tenants. That was the custom with regard to the last Valuation Roll, and it had been found to be very useful. He therefore proposed that the right hon. Gentleman should agree to take out the first money column of the Government Schedule, because that column was of no value whatever. His proposal was that they should have the net result put in the column of the yearly rent or value.

Amendment proposed, in column 7, to leave out the words “yearly rent or value,” in order to insert the words “feu duty and ground annual,”—(Sir Alexander Gordon,)—instead thereof.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS: What is the meaning of “ground annual?”

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Ground rent.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the Schedule had been prepared after very careful consideration with assessors in the leading counties of Scotland. There seemed to have been something like a consensus that it was not necessary to insert the feu duty; but he found that there had since been a good deal of representation in another sense. He was therefore willing to accept the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the column headed “Observations.”—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

Amendment agreed to; column left out accordingly.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 151.]

WAYS AND MEANS.—REPORT. CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE BILL.

WAYS AND MEANS — Resolutions
[April 30] reported.

Resolution 1 (Income Tax) read a first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, 'That the Resolution be read a second time.'

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, his Resolution is an integral part of the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which is one of the most important that any of us can remember, both as to the amount of expenditure and the amount of deficit, and as to the steps proposed to be taken for meeting the deficit of the year. The first step, of voting the Resolutions in Supply, has been taken without any substantial discussion, only certain observations of a conversational character having passed; and we know that when we are asked to take the Report stage at this hour of the morning (1.45) there can be no real discussion of principle. I do not object to the Report being taken now; but I think it ought to be clearly understood that we shall have an opportunity of discussing all the proposals of the Budget on the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. For that purpose I think it ought to be made the first Order on the day on which it is brought forward, and I say we ought to have also a fair opportunity of discussing that which lies at the root of the finance of the year—namely, the Vote of Credit for £11,000,000, which has not been discussed, but which has been allowed to pass the Committee stage. It stands for Report, I believe, on Monday next. Now, what we desire is that we should have a proper opportunity of discussing that Report. I believe that the Government desire to put down the English Registration Bill as the first Order, and that they have also some proposal to make an order to meet the demands put forward in respect of questions relating to registration. That we understand will be a statement made by the Prime Minister, or by someone else on his behalf, at the commencement of Business on Monday; and if that is satisfactory we understand that the Report of the Vote of Credit will be taken, but if not, that the Registration Bill will stand over until Tuesday, and Supply taken on Monday. Sir, I do not think that would be a satisfactory arrangement. Considering the magnitude of the Vote, and its relation to the finance of the year, considering also the close bearing of the Vote on the policy of the Government in Egypt and elsewhere, it is only reasonable, I think, that we should have a full opportunity for discussion on that subject. Anyone of experience, who knows what it is to have Supply suspended at a late hour, to admit of another question of importance being taken, must be aware that, under such an arrangement, we cannot have the same satisfactory discussion as when the question is taken at an early part of the evening. I suggest, therefore, that the Government should make the arrangement for Monday such that we may have the greater part of the evening for the discussion on the Vote of Credit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Sir, I think the right hon. Baronet has fairly stated the case. The Prime Minister not being present, it would be out of place for us to make any alterations in the arrangement with regard to the Business of the House; and, therefore, I can only say that it is the desire of the Government to place as much time as possible at the disposal of the House for the discussion on the Vote of Credit. I will undertake to communicate the statement of the right hon. Baronet to the Prime Minister.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 2 (Stamp Duties on Account of Property).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question with regard to the course he intended to take in the matter of Probate and Succession Duty. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that it was his intention to place all the points affecting this matter in a separate Bill, and not include them in the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would follow that course, because it would be inconvenient to deal with a permanent change of law in the same measure with the alterations in the Income Tax and other similar duties. The Probate and Succession Duty was a subject of great importance, and as such required and deserved considerable discussion. He believed the right hon.

Gentleman would admit that, and also that it would not be easy to insure that discussion on the second reading, or even on the Committee stage of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill. That being so, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take care to keep this matter apart from all other questions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I must remind the right hon. Baronet that this question was formerly settled after great controversy, which ended in the rule that all Budget proposals relating to Customs and Inland Revenue arrangements should be embraced in one Bill. I need not go back to the controversy that ended in that settlement; but it has been adhered to; and whenever great changes have been made since — and very great changes have been made since 1861 in matters connected with the Stamp Duties, which are, at first sight, distinct from Custom and Excise Duties—the rule has been maintained. The whole of the Customs and Inland Revenue changes have been embraced in one Bill, and I cannot consent to depart from that rule. I said last night that the alteration in the Income Tax must take effect from this morning; but that the alterations embodied in the Stamp Resolutions would not take effect until after the Bill had passed through Parliament. That is a distinction made in previous years; it is a proper Constitutional distinction, and we are prepared to maintain it; but to deal with the financial proposals of the Government in two Bills would be absolutely impossible.

Remaining Resolutions agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir ARTHUR OTWAY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. HIBBERT.

METROPOLITAN STREETS ACT (1867) EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL 137.]

(Mr. H. H. Fowler, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Extension of limits of Act under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 134. s. 4.).

MR. FIRTH asked, why "six miles" was substituted for "four miles." There was no six miles area for any purposes; but the four miles area did exist for cab and other purposes.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the Act which this Bill proposed to amend had three limits. There was the Metropolitan limit, the general limit of the Act, and the special limit of the Act. All that this Bill proposed to deal with was the general limit of the Act, by extending the radius from four miles to six.

MR. FIRTH asked what was the reason of the change?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Because we think it most desirable in the public interest.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time on Monday next.

WATERWORKS CLAUSES ACT (1847) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Daniel Grant, Mr. Torrens, Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Arthur Cohen, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. William Lawrence, Baron Henry De Worms.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Explanation of s. 68 of Act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 17).

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that, in fulfilment of the pledge he gave to the House some time ago, he would propose, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 15, after "shall," to insert—

"Within the Metropolitan area as defined by the Act of the eighteenth and nineteenth of Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty, section two hundred and fifty."

The object of the Amendment was to limit the operation of the Act to that district which came under the control of the Valuation Act of 1869. That Act constituted a standard of value, and means of ascertaining value, which did not exist in other parts of the Kingdom.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after "shall," insert "within the Metropolitan area as defined by the Act of the eighteenth and nineteenth of Victoria, chapter one hundred and twenty, section two hundred and fifty."—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

latest and highest judgment on the subject—namely, the judgment in the Dobbs case. If this clause passed as it now stood, it would inflict great injustice on the Companies; it would reduce the basis on which they were entitled by law to make their charges, and it would be a distinct breach of public faith. Of course, he knew that, in a case like this, he must be in a great minority; but, nevertheless, he felt it his duty to make this protest, in order that it might not be said when the question was argued, as it was sure to be, in “another place”—[“Hear, hear!”]—he supposed that cheer meant that they had to look elsewhere for justice than from the present occupants of the Treasury Bench—he could not put any other construction upon it. However, he would not now detain the Committee longer. He should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow); and if that was not carried he should propose the Amendment which stood in his own name.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he should like to say a word or two in this matter, because he was probably as familiar, or even more familiar, with the Dobbs case than any other Member of the House. He did not think there was any substantial difference between the words as they existed in the Bill and the words proposed by the hon. Member behind him (Sir Sydney Waterlow), as he believed the two expressions “net annual” and “rateable” would be held to mean the same thing. But the speech that his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Makins) had just delivered seemed exactly to point to the desirability of shaping the Amendment, and putting beyond question what the meaning was. The hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. W. M. Torrens), whose measure this was, had, he thought, somewhat depreciated its value when he said that its object was merely to carry into effect a decision of the House of Lords. No Bill would be necessary for that purpose.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, the object was to remove a doubt with regard to the decision of the House of Lords.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Bill proposed to do something beyond that. He believed that what it proposed to do was quite right; but there was no use in shutting their eyes to the fact that it would go somewhat beyond the decision of the House of Lords. That decision said that the net annual value they were to arrive at was the net annual value after making certain deductions, there being a sum required for the purposes of rating to cover estimated rental above rateable value. It was left open for cases to be tested as to what was the net annual value—that was to say, what were the annual deductions for purposes of rating to be made from a given sum. The measure proposed that within the Metropolitan area all this litigation should be got rid of—inasmuch as they had an independent authority, under statutory regulations, working out this very problem, and arriving at the net annual value. After making these deductions, it should be taken, within the Metropolitan area, as a satisfactory solution of the question of what the net annual value was. That was the purpose of the Bill. Inasmuch as the Local Authority, from time to time duly constituted, when they arrived at that, by Act of Parliament called it “annual value”—which they were bound to do, as they intended to include all the rateable value—it was much better to say so, because in the Statute that regulated these rates they found the words “net annual value.” Though it did not make a change in the substance, it made a very distinct declaration, and avoided the possibility of controversy as to what the meaning was, and he did not think his hon. Friend behind him would find it make any substantial difference in “another place.” What they were doing was to make the decision of the Assessment Committee conclusive, instead of leaving it open to litigation in each case.

MR. HARDY said, he took a very different view of the justice of this Bill, and he agreed that if they were going to make the net annual value the rateable value they had better call it so.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for his statement on this question. He (Mr. Rogers) had always thought that the decision the House of Lords arrived at in a perfectly well-known case was that the annual value should be taken, which they explained to mean the net annual value; but he could not help thinking that the House of Lords would be very glad if the House of Commons were to decide for them that it should be the rateable value. Net annual value was not a phrase known to the existing system, and they would stop an infinite amount of litigation which was not only open to them in consequence of such an expression as this being used, but which had been imminent in many cases ever since Clarke's case. They constantly saw in the Police Courts attempts made on the part of the Water Companies to indirectly evade the consequences of the proceedings in Dobbs's case. That was very well known to most hon. Members in the House; it certainly was well known to him, having, as he had, been connected with local government for a long period, and having once taken upon himself the function for three years of working out the local assessment of the town in which he lived. He was bound to say that the proposal of the Government was intelligible and satisfactory, and one with which every person interested would agree.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that, so far as he could judge, the Companies had loyally accepted the judgment in Dobbs's case, and had invariably endeavoured to carry it out. He believed that in almost every case which had come before the magistrates the contentions of the Companies had been upheld. In not 5 per cent of the cases which had been adjudicated on by the magistrates had the Companies been proved to be wrong.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked whether the hon. and gallant Member had said that the amount charged was 13 per cent above the rateable value?

COLONEL MAKINS: No; what I said was that the decision of the magistrates gave 13 per cent above the assessment value.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the word 'rateable' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. W. M. TORRENS was proceeding to move an Amendment, when—

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to Order; the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) had an Amendment down which came to the same point as that of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), and stood first upon the Paper. The reason why he rose to Order was, because his hon. and learned Friend's words were so drawn that those of the hon. Member for Finsbury would properly follow them; if they were to put the words in the opposite order they would have to be altered.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood that the hon. Member for Finsbury intended to propose another Amendment altogether.

MR. W. M. TORRENS: No; that is not the case.

MR. FIRTH said, he should be willing to give way if the hon. Member (Mr. W. M. Torrens) desired it; but, if not, he would proceed to explain his own Amendment, which was, at the end of the clause, to add—

"So, nevertheless, that where on any re-assessment of the Metropolis under the provisions of 'The Metropolitan Valuation Act, 1869,' the assessed net annual value of any tenement is increased by the assessing authority, no Water Company shall be entitled to charge any higher or further rate in respect of such increase, except where such increase is in respect of structural or other alteration of the premises, or in respect of other matters than unearned increment of value."

This Amendment followed upon a Question or two he had put in the House in regard to what had been suggested by the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Coope), who was not now in his place, which was based upon a misapprehension. Under the Act of 1869 there had been a quinquennial valuation, the tendency of which had been in the Metropolis to increase the value of a house by what was supposed to be absolutely increased value, but which was unearned increment; and the Water Companies were entitled, as they knew, to charge upon that annual amount, and would in future be entitled to charge upon the annual rateable value. He (Mr. Firth) had stated in an interrogatory form that the increased rateable value between the quinquennial valuations upon which the Companies could levy their rates amounted to £2,000,000, representing an increased income of £100,000, which, of course, increased the vested interests of the Companies to an enormous extent. The figures he had used in this way—The Metropolitan Board of Works' Report had given the valuation of the latest and highest judgment on the subject—namely, the judgment in the Dobbs case. If this clause passed as it now stood, it would inflict great injustice on the Companies; it would reduce the basis on which they were entitled by law to make their charges, and it would be a distinct breach of public faith. Of course, he knew that, in a case like this, he must be in a great minority; but, nevertheless, he felt it his duty to make this protest, in order that it might not be said when the question was argued, as it was sure to be, in “another place”—[“Hear, hear!”]—he supposed that cheer meant that they had to look elsewhere for justice than from the present occupants of the Treasury Bench—he could not put any other construction upon it. However, he would not now detain the Committee longer. He should vote against the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gravesend (Sir Sydney Waterlow); and if that was not carried he should propose the Amendment which stood in his own name.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he should like to say a word or two in this matter, because he was probably as familiar, or even more familiar, with the Dobbs case than any other Member of the House. He did not think there was any substantial difference between the words as they existed in the Bill and the words proposed by the hon. Member behind him (Sir Sydney Waterlow), as he believed the two expressions “net annual” and “rateable” would be held to mean the same thing. But the speech that his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel Makins) had just delivered seemed exactly to point to the desirability of shaping the Amendment, and putting beyond question what the meaning was. The hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. W. M. Torrens), whose measure this was, had, he thought, somewhat depreciated its value when he said that its object was merely to carry into effect a decision of the House of Lords. No Bill would be necessary for that purpose.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, the object was to remove a doubt with regard to the decision of the House of Lords.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Bill proposed to do something beyond that. He believed that what it proposed to do was quite right; but there was no use in shutting their eyes to the fact that it would go somewhat beyond the decision of the House of Lords. That decision said that the net annual value they were to arrive at was the net annual value after making certain deductions, there being a sum required for the purposes of rating to cover estimated rental above rateable value. It was left open for cases to be tested as to what was the net annual value—that was to say, what were the annual deductions for purposes of rating to be made from a given sum. The measure proposed that within the Metropolitan area all this litigation should be got rid of—inasmuch as they had an independent authority, under statutory regulations, working out this very problem, and arriving at the net annual value. After making these deductions, it should be taken, within the Metropolitan area, as a satisfactory solution of the question of what the net annual value was. That was the purpose of the Bill. Inasmuch as the Local Authority, from time to time duly constituted, when they arrived at that, by Act of Parliament called it “annual value”—which they were bound to do, as they intended to include all the rateable value—it was much better to say so, because in the Statute that regulated these rates they found the words “net annual value.” Though it did not make a change in the substance, it made a very distinct declaration, and avoided the possibility of controversy as to what the meaning was, and he did not think his hon. Friend behind him would find it make any substantial difference in “another place.” What they were doing was to make the decision of the Assessment Committee conclusive, instead of leaving it open to litigation in each case.

Mr. HARDY said, he took a very different view of the justice of this Bill, and he agreed that if they were going to make the net annual value the rateable value they had better call it so.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for his statement on this question. He (Mr. Rogers) had always thought that the decision the House of Lords arrived at in a perfectly well-known case was that the discrepancies which existed between the rateable and the gross annual value of houses in the Metropolis. There were nearly 100 cases given in this Paper; but he was prepared to say that, in all probability, for every one case here set down it would be quite easy to find a thousand; therefore, the document really represented a large number of cases. If this Amendment were carried, these houses, a large number of which were probably paying on the net annual value—because Companies were aware of these facts and had made their charges upon the net annual value—would have to pay on the rateable value. By the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea they would have to be kept at that rateable value, which was admittedly less than half what they ought in many cases to be paying—which was less than half that which in many instances their neighbours on each side of them were paying. Was that a state of things which should exist? The real injustice of this arose from the fact that the Government had supported this Bill, allowing it to come forward as a public measure, and not requiring it to be sent like other private Bills to a Select Committee, where it would have been thoroughly inquired into and sifted by counsel on the one side and the other. He would undertake to say that there had never before been a case in which interests involving millions of money, and being dependent on Parliamentary sanction, had been attacked in Parliament without any sort of inquiry being instituted. It was impossible to know what the effect of this clause would be. He himself had been connected with the New River Company for something like 20 years, and he knew the circumstances of that undertaking very well; but he could not possibly tell the House, by reading these clauses, what the extent of their effect upon that Company was likely to be. He could not say whether they would be likely to effect it to the extent of £10,000 a-year or £100,000 a-year before the matter had been inquired into by competent authorities and the provisions had been viewed in all their bearings. Surely it was not possible for the Government to accept a clause so unfair as this, which virtually said to the Water Companies—"Heads I win, tails you lose—your rates are never to rise; but under certain eventualities they may go down." The House had before it a statement to the effect that in the 100 cases submitted the rateable value was not within 100 per cent of what it ought to be; and yet it was proposed to stereotype the injustice not only against the Water Companies, but against the very neighbours on each side of a ratepayer who might be called upon to pay a higher rate.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not in this matter speak on behalf of the Government so much as he spoke as a Metropolitan Member, and as one interested in the subject. He did not think that in a Bill of this kind, introduced by a private Member, it was necessary for the Government, as a Government, to take a very distinct position; but he certainly thought it right to express an opinion upon the subject as a Member of the House, and one whose constituents were interested in the question. The hon. Member who had just addressed the Committee (Mr. Hardy) declared that the Companies hitherto had acted in the way of making a valuation for themselves. It must be remembered that in the Metropolis there was no control—

MR. HARDY desired to explain. He had been speaking solely against the Amendment, and not against the Bill. Without this Amendment, personally, he should be prepared to support the measure.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the hon. Member submitted that an enormous discrepancy between the real value of premises and the amount at which they were rated had been shown. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was bound to say that a great deal of care had been exercised in the Metropolis which was not exercised elsewhere in the preparation of the assessments. Though there was power to appeal to the surveyor against the decision of the Assessment Committees in cases where it was believed that over-charges had been made, it was remarkable, as evidencing the accuracy of the valuations, that over a valuation of such an enormous number of millions alterations to the extent only of a few thousands had been made in the decisions of the Assessment Committees. That was a fact, and he had the figures before him at the present moment, and could submit them to the Committee if necessary. The surveyor of taxes had the power of appealing against the valuation; but he found the figures so correct that in hardly any cases was he obliged to alter them. In the Metropolis the property was assessed for the purpose of House Tax and Income Tax. He agreed with what had fallen from his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Firth), as to the enormous unearned increment in the water rentals within the last few years. The hon. and learned Member had mentioned some facts on that branch of the subject which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could supplement. The average supply of water to the houses of the Metropolis had diminished. The Companies said that the houses had increased in size; but, even if that were so, the average supply, house by house, had greatly diminished, and a smaller amount of water was now supplied than was supplied in 1883. The aggregate capital of the Companies had enormously risen. In 1872 the amount of share capital was just under £8,000,000; but in 1883 it amounted to £10,333,000. In the same period £8,500,000 had been paid in dividends, and the amount of share and loan capital taken up by the shareholders at par had been nearly £3,000,000, which was estimated as equivalent to a bonus of £1,500,000 more, so that the dividends really amounted to more than the whole share capital of the Companies. In face of that fact he did not think it could be wisely contended that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would amount to confiscation.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was sorry to hear the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) declare it was his intention to support the Amendment. He (Mr. Edward Clarke) was anxious that the Bill should pass; but he considered it extremely dangerous that this Amendment should be inserted in it. It was, he thought, essential to mention the intention of the Bill as it was first proposed. The measure had the intention of providing a definite method of valuing a house upon which the rate was to be levied; but if the Amendment were accepted and added to the Bill, it would set up at once the very difficulty and uncertainty which it was the object of the measure to remove. Let the Committee remember what the words of the Amendment were—

“No Water Company shall be entitled to charge any higher or further rate in respect of such increase, except where such increase is in respect of structural or other alterations of the premises, or in respect of other matters than unearned increment of value.”

Suppose a house was rated at £200 a-year, and, in a year or two, its rating was increased to £230, a controversy would take place as to whether the increase had been caused by “structural alterations” or “other alterations” which was a very large expression indeed, and one which might mean decorative alterations or “other than unearned increment of value.” What “structural” or other alterations would mean in an Act of Parliament he could not pretend to say; but he was sure the adoption of this Amendment would be fatal to the hope of getting the Bill on the Statute Book, because if they were to add it to the Statute Book with this phrase in it he believed that the litigation which would result from the attempt to interpret that section would diminish, if not altogether destroy, the value of the measure. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) desired that the Bill should pass, and that the ratepayers of the Metropolis should be relieved of their doubt and uncertainty as to their position in regard to what they were to be charged for water, he would withdraw this Amendment.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment, as it seemed to him that it would be creating a mischief which, when the Committee had agreed to the words “rateable value,” they had been endeavouring to get rid of. The Amendment would have the effect really of establishing two rateable values. He agreed that it seemed very hard that ratepayers should be called upon to pay a larger sum every year, notwithstanding that they might not use a larger amount of water; but the question would then arise whether the people should not be asked only to pay for the amount of water they really used—that a sum should be fixed for a certain quantity, that the consumption should be ascertained by meter, and that if the rate charged was not sufficient to recoup the Water Companies, Parliament should be called upon to adjust the amount. That, however, important as it was, was a question that did not come under this Bill. Under the measure, they were endeavouring to get an uniform rate notwithstanding that under it, if the value went up, so would the charge for water. Supposing that from accident or want of information—some inadvertence on the part of the Assessment Committee—premises had been assessed too low, then the Assessment Committee would have power to make the necessary alteration, surely the Water Companies would be entitled to charge upon the additional valuation. He hoped the Amendment would not be assented to.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was a strong supporter of the Bill, and considered that the Water Companies were alone to blame for the necessity of any legislation on this matter at all. The Companies had been very severe in their exactions; they had pushed their claims to an intolerable extent; and, therefore, he willingly joined in bringing in this Bill, the object of which was to fix some definite and distinct basis on which the charges were to be made in future. Such being the scope of the Bill, he was unable to support the Amendment which had been moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth). He would suggest that if there was any desire to have legislation such as the hon. and learned Member proposed, it would be very much better to introduce it in a separate form in a separate Bill. They would run a very great risk of losing the benefit of the Bill altogether if such an Amendment as this were tacked on to the Bill. There was another reason why he could not support the present proposition; and it was that if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member were accepted, he did not see how the Committee could, with any justice, refuse the Amendment to that Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins). It would be a very unjust thing to say that the Water Companies were to derive no benefit whatever from any rise which might take place in the assessment, and yet be bound to accept any reduction made in the assessment. Under all the circumstances, his hon. Friend in charge of the Bill (Mr. W. M.

Torrens) would do wisely not to accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea, but to allow the Bill to remain substantially in the form in which it was brought in by himself and those associated with him in the Bill.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Firth) would not withdraw the Amendment. It was better that the Bill should be lost than that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and for this reason—that the state of things which now existed would not exist much longer, and the matter could be settled much more easily as a whole, than in the piecemeal fashion suggested. What hon. Members on the Opposition Benches had been discussing were difficulties of method. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Edward Clarke), and hon. Gentlemen near him, seemed to demand that the Water Companies should, in addition to having a fair price paid for the water they supplied, be also made into the rating authority—that they should be able to rate the community of London for things they did not supply. In other words, hon. Gentlemen desired that the Water Companies should not only receive money for the water they supplied, but that they should have an increased income every five years, resulting not from any increased value of the article they supplied, or from any increased quantity supplied, but simply by the method of rating adopted. This was a question whether a private Company should, for its own profit, put a tax on a community for which it rendered nothing in return. That was the principle on which this question would have to be settled. He did not think that the House of Commons would sanction the injustice of the people, not only of London, but of all large towns, being required to pay exorbitantly for so common a necessary of life as water; to pay, not on account of the increased quantity or quality of the water supplied, but simply because the Company had power which should not belong to any private Company—that of taxing the people for five years.

COLONEL MAKINS said, he had on the Paper an Amendment to this Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth); but he hoped it would not be necessary to move it, because the evident sense of the Committee was that the Amendment now under consideration should be withdrawn. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke) and his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Firth) had dealt only with private supply. They had said that houses only received the same amount of water as formerly. They had lost sight altogether of the fact that in London the private consumption of water was not paid for by meter, as was the case in Manchester and Liverpool. In addition to the payment by meter for the water consumed, each house in Manchester and Liverpool was rated for the public supply. In London the whole service, whether public or private, was included in the rate which the consumer paid; therefore, when the rateable value went up, it meant that the rates were increased, that the quantity of water used for the extinguishing of fires and for other public purposes was increased, though the actual amount per head of the population might not have been increased. He should be perfectly prepared to consider a measure, if it were brought in by the Government, providing that water used for domestic purposes should be paid for by meter. Of course, to that would have to be added such a rate for water for public purposes which would make the remuneration of the Companies that which Parliament intended it should be. The Amendment now before the Committee was one-sided. They all desired the same thing, though they might not view the matter from the same point of view.

MR. HARDY said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins) was mistaken when he supposed that all public supplies were gratuitous. It was only the water supplied for fires that was supplied without payment.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that some hon. Members of the House would be very glad to see the Bill passed; while others simply wished to make it an engine for future agitation. He wished to see the Bill passed; and, therefore, he should vote against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth).

MR. FIRTH said, that all he had to say was that they would have to buy out the Water Companies sooner or later, and that if this Amendment were not passed they would this year be found to have increased their vested interest by £2,500,000. He would not, under any possible circumstances, be a party to so wicked an injustice as that; and, therefore, he intended to carry his Amendment to a division.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 34: Majority 13.—(Div. List, No. 150.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, to add at end of the Clause—"Provided, That where the water rate is chargeable on the annual value of a part only of any hereditament entered in the valuation list, such annual value shall be a fairly apportioned part of the rateable value of the whole tenement, ascertained as aforesaid, the apportionment in case of dispute to be determined in manner provided by the said section."—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he would point out that the words "annual value" could not be found in the Metropolis Valuation Act, 1869.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE thought it was quite right in this instance to say "annual value."

Question put, and agreed to; words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 (Short title) agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. W. M. TORRENS, the following Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill:—

(Construction of Act.)

" 'The Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847,' and this Act shall be construed together as one Act, and the provisions of this Act shall be held to repeal and supersede such of the provisions of that Act as are inconsistent with this Act."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the new clause ("Supply of Water by Meter") standing in the name of the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Daniel Grant) appeared to him to be beyond the scope of the Bill, and, therefore, could not be put. The same observation applied to a new clause standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce).

Preamble.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 7, after the word "not," to insert "in the Metropolis."—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there was a little ambiguity with respect to the Metropolis. He did not oppose the Amendment; but he might find it necessary to ask the hon. Gentleman to move another Amendment on Report. There were two purposes for which the Metropolis was not the same. Under the Metropolis Management Act, that which was called the Metropolis was not the same as the Metropolis to which the Valuation of Property Act applied. The area would have been better defined as unions and parishes to which the Valuation Act applied, and he would suggest that his hon. Friend (Mr. W. M. Torrens) should move an Amendment in that form on Report. The difference was that Penge was included in the Metropolis Management Act, but was not in the Valuation Act; and the hamlet of Mottingham was included in the latter, but not in the former Act.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he would bring up an Amendment on Report, as suggested by the right hon. Baronet.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Amendment proposed to further amend the Preamble, by omitting the words "net annual" in line 7, and inserting the word "rateable."—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

Amendment agreed to.

Preamble, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Friday next, and to be printed. [Bill 152.]

EAST INDIA UNCLAIMED STOCKS [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of the Revenues of India, of any costs and expenses which may be incurred by the Secretary of State in Council of India, arising out of the transfer of Unclaimed Stocks, and the payment of dividends thereon, under the provisions of any Act of the present Session relating to the transfer of Unclaimed India Stock.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Seeing the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs early in his place, I wish to ask him whether he is able to give any information to the House on two important matters which occupy public attention—namely, the negotiations with respect to the Afghan Frontier, and those with reference to the suppression of The Bosphore Egyptien?

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the noble Marquess I shall give all the Committee if necessary. The surveyor of taxes had the power of appealing against the valuation; but he found the figures so correct that in hardly any cases was he obliged to alter them. In the Metropolis the property was assessed for the purpose of House Tax and Income Tax. He agreed with what had fallen from his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Firth), as to the enormous unearned increment in the water rentals within the last few years. The hon. and learned Member had mentioned some facts on that branch of the subject which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could supplement. The average supply of water to the houses of the Metropolis had diminished. The Companies said that the houses had increased in size; but, even if that were so, the average supply, house by house, had greatly diminished, and a smaller amount of water was now supplied than was supplied in 1883. The aggregate capital of the Companies had enormously risen. In 1872 the amount of share capital was just under £8,000,000; but in 1883 it amounted to £10,333,000. In the same period £8,500,000 had been paid in dividends, and the amount of share and loan capital taken up by the shareholders at par had been nearly £3,000,000, which was estimated as equivalent to a bonus of £1,500,000 more, so that the dividends really amounted to more than the whole share capital of the Companies. In face of that fact he did not think it could be wisely contended that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend would amount to confiscation.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was sorry to hear the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) declare it was his intention to support the Amendment. He (Mr. Edward Clarke) was anxious that the Bill should pass; but he considered it extremely dangerous that this Amendment should be inserted in it. It was, he thought, essential to mention the intention of the Bill as it was first proposed. The measure had the intention of providing a definite method of valuing a house upon which the rate was to be levied; but if the Amendment were accepted and added to the Bill, it would set up at once the very difficulty and uncertainty which it was the object of the measure to remove. Let the Committee remember

“No Water Company shall be entitled to charge any higher or further rate in respect of such increase, except where such increase is in respect of structural or other alterations of the premises, or in respect of other matters than unearned increment of value.”

Suppose a house was rated at £200 a-year, and, in a year or two, its rating was increased to £230, a controversy would take place as to whether the increase had been caused by “structural alterations” or “other alterations” which was a very large expression indeed, and one which might mean decorative alterations or “other than unearned increment of value.” What “structural” or other alterations would mean in an Act of Parliament he could not pretend to say; but he was sure the adoption of this Amendment would be fatal to the hope of getting the Bill on the Statute Book, because if they were to add it to the Statute Book with this phrase in it he believed that the litigation which would result from the attempt to interpret that section would diminish, if not altogether destroy, the value of the measure. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) desired that the Bill should pass, and that the ratepayers of the Metropolis should be relieved of their doubt and uncertainty as to their position in regard to what they were to be charged for water, he would withdraw this Amendment.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment, as it seemed to him that it would be creating a mischief which, when the Committee had agreed to the words “rateable value,” they had been endeavouring to get rid of. The Amendment would have the effect really of establishing two rateable values. He agreed that it seemed very hard that ratepayers should be called upon to pay a larger sum every year, notwithstanding that they might not use a larger amount of water; but the question would then arise whether the people should not be asked only to pay for the amount of water they really used—that a sum should be fixed for a certain quantity, that the consumption should be ascertained by meter, and that if the rate charged was not sufficient to recoup the Water Companies, Parlia-

the meaning of the words "Provide means for any settlement which may be needful of the differences?" What is to be referred, and what will the result of the reference be—will it be the punishment of those who have misconducted themselves, or will it be simply an apology from one Government to another?

EARL GRANVILLE: I made the statement with regard to The Bosphore as full as I could in order to give the general information to your Lordships' House. At the same time, I do not wish to go into very great detail on either of the points in question, inasmuch as the Papers which will soon be produced will give your Lordships a much fuller knowledge of the circumstances than I could in a statement in answer to Questions. With regard to one of the Questions of the noble Marquess, however, I have no difficulty in giving an answer. The illegality of the seizure of The Bosphore arose out of the rights of the French Government under the Capitulations with regard to the Press. As to the Afghan Question, we have agreed to refer to the judgment of a friendly Power the mode of arriving at a settlement closing the incident, and which shall be honourable to both Parties. I think the noble Marquess will and must see that it is impossible for me in this place to anticipate what the result of that judgment will be.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then it is a general reference without any special indication of the limits within which the jurisdiction is to be exercised, and a general reference of all matters of difference that have arisen with regard to this Penjeh incident? I would ask another Question, which arises out of the noble Earl's statement—and which I may observe is merely put for the purpose of elucidation. He stated that the Government would be much guided by their knowledge of the wishes of the Ameer with respect to his own Frontier. Were the Government entirely ignorant of the Ameer's wishes on this point before they began these negotiations—that is to say, until quite recently?

EARL GRANVILLE: It must be perfectly obvious to the noble Marquess that when there has been an interview of several days between the Viceroy of India and the Ameer we have not only more information, but information on which we can better rely, than that which we previously possessed. With regard to the reference to the judgment of a Sovereign of a friendly State, the text of that reference has not yet been absolutely decided upon; and I think it is quite clear that I had better adhere to the words I have already used, and not go further into details.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Are the Capitulations to which the noble Earl has referred to be printed along with the Papers?

EARL GRANVILLE: The Papers to be presented are under consideration, and I shall do my best to lay all information before the House.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH: The noble Earl stated that Russia had evacuated, or would consider the evacuation of, Penjeh when the labours of the Commission commenced. What does he mean? Does he—

EARL GRANVILLE: No; the noble Lord has quite misapprehended what I said. I said they had agreed to consider it. I really think that I cannot go further than the statement I have made.

EGYPT (AFFAIRS OF THE SOUDAN)— THE EGYPTIAN FRONTIER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, How soon Her Majesty's Government expect to be able to explain what was the limit to the south in Egypt on the Nile which they have pledged themselves to continue to defend, and from what place on the Nile southwards they hold themselves to have perfect freedom in regard to future action; also, whether Dongola is considered to be in Egypt or the Soudan? The reason why he put the Question was that he wished to obtain some explanation of the two statements made by the noble Earl in reference to the Frontier of Egypt, on the introduction of the Egyptian Loan Bill on the 21st of April—one, in which he stated that no provision was made in the Vote of Credit for offensive operations with a view to an early advance on Khartoum; and the other, in which he stated that the Government preserved to themselves full liberty of action in the matter, seeing that they had not at that information in our power as to the two questions to which he refers. It is as follows:—The Bosphore Egyptien was suppressed by a lawful decree of the Egyptian Government, and the British Government gave its sanction to the act. The French Government, while wholly refraining from questioning the suppression of the newspaper (1) declared the seizure of the paper and closing of the printing office, in which other business was carried on, to be illegal; and (2) complained of the forcible removal of the French Consul, who had attended personally to protest against the closure of the office. The French Government demanded—(1) the re-opening of the office; and (2) the punishment of the persons concerned in the act. In the meanwhile, Her Majesty's Government had obtained full Reports from Sir Evelyn Baring as to all the circumstances, and had taken advice as to the legal bearings of the case. The conclusion to which Her Majesty's Government came was, that the closure of the office was not warranted by law, and that the technical force used against the French Consular authorities was, therefore, not justifiable. We, therefore, took note of the declaration of the French Government, that there was no desire to shield The Bosphore Egyptien; that they wholly refrained from raising any question as to the suppression of the newspaper; and, further, that they expressed their readiness to withdraw their demand for the punishment of those who acted under the orders of the Egyptian Government. Accordingly we stated that Her Majesty's Government, who do not disclaim responsibility for the decision to suppress the newspaper, were ready to associate themselves with the regret which they have advised the Government of the Khedive to express as to the incidents which have attended the suppression. Her Majesty's Government advised Nubar Pasha to re-open the office, and that his Excellency should visit the French acting Agent and Consul General to convey the expression of his regrets for errors committed in the execution of the lawful decree of the Egyptian Government. With regard to the second Question asked by the noble Marquess, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government, agreeing with the Government of Russia, that they desire to provide means for any settlement which may be needful, of differences between them arising out of the engagement at Ak Tepe, concur with them that they do not desire to see gallant officers on either side put upon their trial. For this purpose they are ready to refer to the judgment of the Sovereign of a friendly State any difference which may be found to exist in regard to the interpretation of the agreement between the two Cabinets of the 16th of March, with a view to the settlement of the matter in a manner consistent with the honour of both States. The two Governments trust that no difficulty will occur as to the details of the reference, and are prepared, under these circumstances, to resume at once in London the negotiations on the main points of the line, for the delimitation of the Frontier, the details of which only would be examined and traced on the spot under the conditions agreed on in the Commission. This negotiation, of which it is not possible at present to anticipate the result, will be much facilitated, as regards Her Majesty's Government, by the knowledge they now possess of the views of the Ameer and the full topographical information which has reached the India Office. It is further agreed that the district of Penjdeh shall be neutralized during the negotiations, and the Russian Government have intimated their willingness to consider the question of the Russian outposts being removed on the arrival of the Commissions.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I should like to ask the noble Earl a Question or two with regard to the statement he has made. First, when he states that the seizure of the offices of The Bosphore was illegal, does he mean illegal under any International instrument which would give the French Government a right, as against the Egyptian Government, to interfere—that is to say, under what are called the Capitulations; or, does he mean merely illegal under the existing decrees and laws of the Egyptian Government? And, secondly, I wish to know, whether the action of the Egyptian Government in closing The Bosphore was due to the initiative and suggestion of the Representative of Her Majesty's Government, or whether it was taken spontaneously? With respect to the announcement which the noble F—han is negotiating the meaning of the words "Provide means for any settlement which may be needful of the differences?" What is to be referred, and what will the result of the reference be—will it be the punishment of those who have misconducted themselves, or will it be simply an apology from one Government to another?

EARL GRANVILLE: I made the statement with regard to The Bosphore as full as I could in order to give the general information to your Lordships' House. At the same time, I do not wish to go into very great detail on either of the points in question, inasmuch as the Papers which will soon be produced will give your Lordships a much fuller knowledge of the circumstances than I could in a statement in answer to Questions. With regard to one of the Questions of the noble Marquess, however, I have no difficulty in giving an answer. The illegality of the seizure of The Bosphore arose out of the rights of the French Government under the Capitulations with regard to the Press. As to the Afghan Question, we have agreed to refer to the judgment of a friendly Power the mode of arriving at a settlement closing the incident, and which shall be honourable to both Parties. I think the noble Marquess will and must see that it is impossible for me in this place to anticipate what the result of that judgment will be.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then it is a general reference without any special indication of the limits within which the jurisdiction is to be exercised, and a general reference of all matters of difference that have arisen with regard to this Penjeh incident? EGYPT (AFFAIRS OF THE SOUDAN)— THE EGYPTIAN FRONTIER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, How soon Her Majesty's Government expect to be able to explain what was the limit to the south in Egypt on the Nile which they have pledged themselves to continue to defend, and from what place on the Nile southwards they hold themselves to have perfect freedom in regard to future action; also, whether Dongola is considered to be in Egypt or the Soudan? The reason why he put the Question was that he wished to obtain some explanation of the two statements made by the noble Earl in reference to the Frontier of Egypt, on the introduction of the Egyptian Loan Bill on the 21st of April—one, in which he stated that no provision was made in the Vote of Credit for offensive operations with a view to an early advance on Khartoum; and the other, in which he stated that the Government preserved to themselves full liberty of action in the matter, seeing that they had not at that moment absolutely made up their minds. On the 19th of February, the Government announced a definite policy to the effect that it was their intention to go to Khartoum. The statement made by the noble Earl on the 21st of April was a completely new departure. Their policy at a previous period was defined as one of "rescue and retire." It now appeared to him (the Earl of Galloway) that it might be more aptly described by the two words "bombast and bolt." He did not wish to go into these matters in detail, but simply to remind the House of some of the facts; and he put the Question for the purpose of protesting against any desertion of any of Her Majesty's faithful allies, such as the Mudir of Dongola and some Native tribes. He also wished to know what was meant by the Frontier of Egypt, and what was the limit on the Nile up to which Her Majesty's Government were still ready to announce that they would hold the country? He would ask whether Dongola was within the Frontier; whether that meant Old Dongola or New Dongola, because there was a considerable distance between them? He hoped the noble Earl would be ready to give a plain and civil answer to a plain and civil Question.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Galloway) has asked for a plain and civil answer. I can only say that we shall try to make the matter plain, and I hope to give him a civil answer. Your Lordships will remember that at the last Sitting of the House a Question very much of the same class as this Question was put to me by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Bury), who is not now present; and one of the answers which I gave was that at a previous Sitting of the House the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), speaking with all the authority that belongs to him, had put a somewhat similar Question to me, which I was obliged to meet with a negative. As I have stated, the noble Viscount is not now here, and I should not only be doing something uncivil to the noble Marquess, but also to the noble Viscount, if I gave the noble Earl a different answer to-night. But be that as it may, I must say that with regard to myself it would not be consistent to do so, reserving the hope that I may be able to make a full statement to the House when the Government are prepared to do so.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that while the noble Earl refused to give any answer to the Question of the noble Earl (the Earl of Galloway), he (Viscount Cranbrook) thought the House ought to know whether any guarantee would be given to the friendly tribes of Arabs who had assisted the British troops. The Government had been represented in the Soudan by a most distinguished General, to whom they had given the powers almost of a Plenipotentiary, and he had perpetually held out hopes to the tribes that the English people would never forsake them. So late as the 12th of February last, Lord Wolseley had given it out most distinctly that the English would march to Khartoum and capture it, and that those who had put their trust in the English might be certain they would not be deserted. That was not the first time that he had used language in regard to the protection of the Native tribes. There was some danger that what had happened in the Soudan would happen in North Africa. When they read in the papers that morning that the 1,500 Coolies, for instance, who were taken away from the railway between Suakin and Berber had been returned to that country, it naturally aroused a new interest as to whether that railway was going on, or whether, in consequence of what had happened with respect to Russia, new conditions had been brought into consideration with respect to the Soudan, and the Government were reverting to their former policy. This was a question which deeply interested the English people, because it was one which touched their honour and credit; and it was not to be wondered at that they pressed earnestly for an answer to the Question, whether or no the pledges of Lord Wolseley were to be maintained?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) would see that the Government having come to the conclusion that they ought not at this moment to go into the question of their general policy in Egypt, it was impossible that he (Earl Granville) should be seduced by Questions such as that of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Galloway) entirely to depart from their resolution; and, therefore, he thought that, while adhering to a decision which might be right or might be wrong, he should not be led into partial accounts of particular points connected with Egypt and the Soudan.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not know whether I have judged correctly, or whether the noble Earl can answer me as to a question of fact with regard to the Suakin-Berber Railway; but I should like to ask him if he can tell me whether that railway has been stopped or not?

[No reply.]

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN: Can the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India say whether the railway is going on or not?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: If the noble Marquess will give Notice of the Question I will endeavour to answer it; but the question of the Suakin-Berber Railway is not in my Department.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Are not the Coolies in the noble Earl's Department? If not, what has become of them?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: They have passed from my control now.

THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES — THE WAR OFFICE AND ADMIRALTY—THE STONE FOR BUILDING.

QUESTION.

LORD LAMINGTON asked, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to make further inquiries with the view of finding a durable stone to build with before commencing with the new public buildings? He believed there was a sandstone which was to be found in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis which was most durable and well fitted for the purpose.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, in reply, said, he could assure the noble Lord that every attention would be paid to the point to which he had directed attention. He was in communication with the architects at that moment on the subject. Of course, the noble Lord was aware that the main difficulty was that of discovering a stone that would resist the effects of the London atmosphere. The last stone that was used in the erection of public buildings was the Portland stone, and he did not know if it was possible to find a stone that would resist the London atmosphere better than the Portland stone.

In reply to the EARL of WEMYSS,

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he understood that a model of the buildings was being made, and that the particular plan to which the noble Earl had directed his attention, and in relation to which the model was made, was now in Westminster Hall, as no adequate accommodation could be found for it in any other part of the building. He was not quite sure whether it was completed; but he had given orders for its being pressed forward. As to the general question of the plans, the first Vote for the purpose had passed the House of Commons, and therefore might be considered to pledge the House of Commons in some degree to the plan; but, of course, it was open to the other House to raise the question again.

RAILWAYS—LEVEL CROSSINGS.

QUESTION.

LORD BRAYE asked, Whether the railway companies in the United Kingdom are under any obligation to Parliament to abolish their level crossings; and, if so, during what period of time; and, if this is not the case, whether the Government intend to take any steps towards prohibiting the construction of level crossings for the future, or to compel the railway companies to gradually reduce the number of such crossings with a view to their total abolition; and, if so, during what period of time this gradual reduction is to extend?

LORD SUDELEY, in reply, said: All level crossings of public roads are specifically authorized by the special Act which sanctions the construction of the railway. Railway Companies are under no obligation to abolish such level crossings unless the special Act contains a provision to that effect. The Railway Clauses Act, 1863, which applies to all railways authorized since that date, empowers the Board of Trade to require a Company to carry any turnpike or public carriage road over or under the railway by means of an arch or bridge, instead of crossing the same on the level, if it appears to them necessary for the public safety. In addition to this, the Board of Trade have since the year 1859, and in compliance with the Standing Orders, reported to Parliament on all level crossings of public roads proposed in the various Railway Bills. There is, however, no compulsion upon Select Committees to adopt these Reports, and the recommendations of the officers of the Board of Trade are occasionally disregarded, and level crossings which they have objected to are sometimes sanctioned.

TURKEY—THE BOSPHORUS AND DARDANELLES—CONVENTION OF PARIS, 1856, AND TREATY OF BERLIN, 1878.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, who had a Notice to move an humble Address to the Crown for the Protocols or Treaties by which the authority of the Sublime Porte to admit foreign ships of war into the Dardanelles was regulated, said, that in consequence of the statement of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) he would not proceed that evening with the Motion, which was suggested by the prospects of a war with Russia.

QUESTIONS.

WAYS AND MEANS — INLAND REVE-NUE—THE STAMP DUTIES—PATENT MEDICINES.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that the provisions of the 44 Geo. III. c. 98, requiring (under a penalty of £10) that packets or bottles of drugs, &c. offered for sale at less than one shilling should be sold with a threehalfpenny stamp affixed to them are daily infringed but rarely enforced; with whom rests the power of deciding in what cases the penalty is to be enforced; whether the Government have any intention of remedying, by legislation or otherwise, the evils arising from the uncertainty of practice prevailing with regard to the enforcement of these penalties; and, what amount was realized to the Exchequer in the last financial year or in 1883-4 from the threehalfpenny duty imposed by the above enactment?

Lord Sudeley

MR. HIBBERT: The Inland Revenue Board is well aware that the Act referred to is very frequently evaded, as is shown by the numerous penalties which it is found necessary to inflict from time to time. The management of the affairs relating to this and other stamp duties is in the hands of that Board, who have discretion to decide in each case whether the full penalty should be exacted or otherwise. The receipts from the three-halfpenny duty amounted in 1883-4 to £93,500.

VACCINATION—HOSPITAL ATTEND- ANTS—SHEFFIELD HOSPITAL.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whehe has yet received information respecting the contracting of small-pox at the Sheffield Hospital by a medical man and a nurse, and the result of the attack; and, whether one or other had been re-vaccinated previously?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: At the Sheffield Hospital in 1882 the medical officer and a ward servant, who had both been re-vaccinated, had attacks of small-pox so mild that scarcely any rash appeared. The cook, who had not been re-vaccinated, but who had previously had small-pox, had an attack in a modified form. The only severe case in the hospital at the time was that of a patient who had never been vaccinated.
This patient died.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has communicated to the authors of the Facts Concerning Vaccination, published with the sanction of the Local Government Board, his view of the unguarded nature of the statements that no hospital nurse has been attacked with small-pox after re-vaccination?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have informed the National Health Society of the reply which I gave to the Question of the hon. and learned Member on the 31st March last.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND) — BEITH SCHOOL ELECTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether he has inquired into the truth of the statements made by Mr. J. M'Whirter, of Beith, to the effect that, at the School Board election there on 17th April—

“The several candidates, with two exceptions, had supplied themselves with rooms in the immediate vicinity of the ballot station, in which were stowed an abundant supply of liquors, and all day long their supporters were supplied without stint,” and that—

“not content with this, several publicans applied for and obtained an extension of the hours of sale in their own premises till two o'clock in the morning, when drink was served to all and sundry; the doors were kept open, and a roaring trade carried on up to the limit of time granted;”

whether it is competent for any extension of hours of sale to be granted other than for a public or special entertainment, not originating directly or indirectly with the licensed person by whom such extension is applied for; whether justices granting such licences are directed to assure themselves that the public or special entertainments, in respect of which such extensions of hours are granted, are of a legitimate and proper character; and, if he would inform the House how many public inns and public houses there are in Beith; how many applied for extension of hours till 2 a.m. on the night of the School Board election; on what grounds they based their applications; how many applications were granted and how many refused; whether the statement as to common sale “to all and sundry” being carried on after 11 o'clock is correct; and under what provision of the Scotch Licensing Acts is such an extension for purposes of common sale provided for?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have made inquiry into this case. I am informed that it is the fact that candidates, with one or two exceptions, had committee rooms near to the polling station, and that in these rooms refreshments, consisting of food and drinks, were supplied to persons from a distance. The conditions under which an extension of hours may be granted are contained in Section 6 of the Public-houses Act of 1862, and are shortly, but I think correctly, stated in the Question. I am informed that there are five hotels and nine public-houses in Beith. Application was made on behalf of four hotels for an extension of time for social parties on the occasion of the School Board election. The applications were all granted. The police have no knowledge that liquor was supplied to any persons not being members of the social parties.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND) — NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS—PENSIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the claim of the Irish National School Teachers of the “Old Divisions” of the First and Second Classes to pensions proportionate to their status and class salaries, in accordance with the principle applied to all the other grades of the service, will be conceded in the revision of the pension scheme now in progress?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The pensions scheme is not being revised; but the assets and liabilities of the fund are being valued. If the result of the valuation should be such as to warrant any increased benefit to the contributing teachers, or to any of them, the form which this benefit may most advantageously take will be a matter for careful consideration; and in the meantime no particular expectation can be encouraged.

FISHERY COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND) — CANDIDATES FOR VACANT COMMISSIONERSHIP.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, having regard to the important interests confided to the Irish Commissioners of Fisheries, Her Majesty's Government, in the probable case of a vacancy in the Commission, will take into consideration as a factor of efficiency in the candidates for the appointment, some knowledge of fisheries and of the habits of fish and fishermen?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have no doubt that, in the event of a vacancy, due weight would be given to the qualifications mentioned by the hon. Member.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT (IRELAND)—
GALWAY CUSTOM HOUSE—AMOUNT PAID FOR OVERWORK, 1884-5.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he would state the total sums which officers of the Custom House in Galway have received for their own personal benefit from merchants during the last twelve months at the port of Galway; if he would state how much of this was for attending on Bank holidays, and how much for attending after or before official hours; and, if he would give the names of the Custom House officials receiving such sums; if he would give directions that, for the future, ships may discharge non-excisable articles between sunrise and sunset without these private payments to Government officials at least on those days on which the sun does not rise before six; and, if he would make inquiries into the fact of a ship's captain having been summoned immediately after the last Question addressed on this subject for a very trifling breach of regulations; and, if it were found on inquiry that the magistrates stated that there was no smuggling intended, and that they would, if they had the option, dismiss the case, would he remit the penalty?

MR. HIBBERT: The total sum received from the merchants by the Customs officers at Galway on account of overtime during the last 12 months has been £11 7s. 2d., of which £5 6s. was for attendance on Bank Holidays and Good Friday, and £6 1s. 2d. for attendance before and after legal hours on ordinary working days. This sum was divided between the superintendent, an examining officer, an outdoor officer, and three boatmen. The rules governing the hours of attendance are the same throughout the Three Kingdoms, and there seems no advantage, but a great deal of difficulty, in altering them. I have seen a report of the case referred to in the last paragraph of the Question; and the circumstances disclosed would certainly not justify any remission of the very light fine imposed by the magistrates.

ARMY (INDIA) — THE NORTH - WEST FRONTIER—GRANT OF MEDAL AND BATTA TO OFFICERS AND MEN ENGAGED IN THE ZHOB EXPEDITION.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the efficient manner in which the Zhob Expedition last autumn was conducted to a successful conclusion, under conditions, which the climate and nature of the country traversed, the arduous character of the work performed, and the hostility of the inhabitants rendered most trying to the troops employed, it is intended to grant the frontier medal, and the usual grant of war batta for three months, to the officers and men of the British and Indian regiments who took part in that expedition.

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India have reported the conclusion of the recent operations in the Zhob Valley, and have conveyed to the Commander-in-Chief their approbation of the manner in which they were conducted. In this opinion the Secretary of State will express his concurrence. The Government of India have not, however, proposed that any further recognition should be made of the services rendered; and the circumstances of the case do not appear to warrant any special distinction such as the grant of a war medal or of a money reward. The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the grant of war batta is usual in such cases.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—VENTILATION OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether during the recess the Chief Inspector of Chemical Works has complied with the request of the Ventilation Committee to ascertain the sources of smell around the House; and, whether he will submit his conclusions in the form of a Report, to be printed with the other Papers about to be presented?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In consequence of the Report of the Select Committee, Mr. Fletcher, the Chief Inspector of Alkali Works, was requested by me to make inquiry as to how far chemical, gas, or other works or deposits of ashes and refuse in the neighbourhood of the river might account for the offensive smells which were complained of. A watch has also been kept by the police. Mr. Fletcher made a Report on his inquiry, and I have no objection whatever to that Report being presented to the House when any other Papers on the subject are presented, which will depend on the Office of Works.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS— THE FIRE BRIGADE COMMITTEE.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the Committee of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade are unable to make the necessary increase in that body, and in the plant, owing to the want of funds; and, whether this is mainly due to the refusal of the Fire Offices to increase their contribution to the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, and to their opposition to the Bill for the removal of the limitation of the halfpenny rate?

MR. CAUSTON asked, whether the principle of calling upon insurance companies to pay for the protection of those who did not themselves pay for their own protection was not an unsound one; and, whether the burden ought not to be borne equally by the whole of the ratepayers?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: In reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to say that the state of the funds now at the disposal of the Metropolitan Board of Works for Fire Brigade purposes has certainly prevented them, on more than one occasion, from entertaining requests made for additional stations; and no doubt if Parliament had passed the Bill which I introduced last year for the increase of the insurance companies' contributions and the removal of the limitation of the rate, the difficulties under which the Board are placed would have also been removed. With regard to the second Question which has been addressed to me, I think the hon. Member had better give Notice of it, because it introduces controversial matter, and I cannot answer it on the spur of the moment.

CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE)—MR. WILLIAM JOHN- STON, INSPECTOR OF IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on the 21st ultimo, Mr. William Johnston, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Fisheries in Ireland, delivered a public speech, in which he denounced what he termed "the errors of the Church of Rome," and incited the Protestant clergy to do the like on the 12th of next July; whether the Government are aware that the 12th of July is an anniversary celebrated by the Orange Society, and that the manner adopted to celebrate this anniversary has frequently led to disorder, riot, and loss of life, through conflicts between people of different creeds; and, whether, having regard to the undertaking exacted, after repeated warnings by the Lord Lieutenant from Mr. Johnston with regard to public speeches, he will be longer retained in the public service?

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the public letter written by Mr. Wm. Johnston, Inspector of Fisheries, to the Orange Grand Master, which appeared in The Belfast News Letter,

is he aware that this official admits the authorship of the following letter in The Belfast Evening Telegraph:—

"The 12th of July is being prepared for all over Ulster. In view of the approaching General Election it will be of unusual importance. On that occasion I hope to take my place with my Orange brethren. No more loyal addresses will be presented to the Prince and Princess of Wales than the Orange ones, and I hope to be able hereafter to give emphasis to them when I am Member for South Belfast;"

will he explain on what principle the Government consider that such declarations by a Civil Servant of his intention to seek a seat in Parliament do not constitute a breach of the Treasury Rule of November 12th 1884 (since made an Order in Council), which requires that any Civil Servant who, by an election address or "in any other manner, announces himself as a candidate," should resign his position under the Crown; is it the fact that Mr. Johnston, who threatens next 12th July "to take my place with my Orange brethren," is the same official whose repeated political speeches compelled the Irish Executive to exact from him a promise in writing that he would never again interfere in politics while a public servant; whether, since the answers given in the House, denying that Mr. Johnston was a Parliamentary candidate, that official, as reported in The Freeman of May 1st, spoke as follows at a meeting in the Dublin Metropolitan Hall:—

"He would be followed by Mr. Russell, to whose labours they owed the Sunday Closing Act for Ireland, and if, as he hoped, Mr. Russell would have a seat in the House of Commons after the General Election, where perhaps he (Mr. Johnston) might also be able to complete the work that was begun in 1878;"

and, what course the Government will take under all the circumstances of this case?

MR. LEWIS asked, whether there was any restriction upon the utterance of religious convictions?

MR. HEALY: By officials.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Two points are raised in these Questions. The first is whether Mr. Johnston, by recent declarations of his intention to become a candidate for election to Parliament, has come within the Rule laid down by a recent Order in Council, which says that a Civil servant shall resign his office as soon as he issues an address, or in any other manner announces himself as a candidate. On examination, it appears to us that the words used did not constitute such a definite announcement as is contemplated by the Order in Council; and a letter has been received from Mr. Johnston, dated May 2, in which he says:—

"The idea of my being a candidate for a Parliamentary seat at the General Election has now been abandoned."

[MR. HEALY: Now!] The second point is whether, in several recent speeches, Mr. Johnston has not departed from that neutral attitude in political and Party matters which ought to be maintained by a public servant; and whether he has not in particular infringed the undertaking he gave in February last year to "refrain from taking any active part in any public Party meetings or discussing in public any Party questions."

The Government take a most serious view of these speeches as reported, and we are in communication with Mr. Johnston on the subject.

MR. HEALY: When shall I put another Question on this subject?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In about a week.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—RICHMOND LUNATIC ASYLUM—GRIEVANCES OF ATTENDANTS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (for Mr. HARRINGTON) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the memorial addressed to the Board of Governors by the male attendants of the Richmond Lunatic Asylum on the 10th of June 1884, as directed by the then Chief Secretary, on the subject of their grievances, and other applications prior and subsequent to that date, have been yet considered; if any decision has been arrived at; and, if so, when the memorialists may expect to receive an answer?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I find that the Board of Governors of the Richmond Asylum transmitted to the Inspectors in January last some proposals in favour of the attendants, and that, for some cause or other which is unexplained, the Inspectors have only very recently submitted the proposals to Government. I have asked for an explanation of the delay, and have given instructions for the matter to be pressed to an early decision.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND AND WALES)—PENSIONS TO TEACHERS.

MR. BRODRICK asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he can state the number of pensions granted to teachers appointed 1846-1851, awarded since the Debate of April 29th, 1884; what sums were awarded, and what total annual charge has been added to the Consolidated Fund beyond the £6,500 granted in 1876; and, whether he would object to giving a Return of the pensions granted, with the names of the teachers, and the schools to which they were attached?

MR. MUNDELLA: The number of pensions, varying from £20 to £30, granted since the debate of April 29, 1884, to teachers appointed 1846-51 is 200. The total sum charged on the Consolidated Fund beyond the £6,500 granted in 1876 is £4,705. In addition to the foregoing there are a considerable number of applications for pensions, which will be dealt with within the next few days. There are serious objections to the granting of such a Return as that suggested in the hon. Member's Question.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS—BALLYSHANNON HARBOUR.

MR. SEXTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has learned of the existence of a dangerous wreck at the entrance to the harbour of Ballyshannon, county Donegal, and whether the wreck, if not soon removed, will block up the entrance, and render navigation impossible; whether, also, a wreck has been lying for some time nearly opposite Mount Charles, Donegal Bay, in the fair way of navigation to Donegal; whether a fishing boat struck the wreck in November last, and the lives of the crew were only saved by assistance from the shore; whether it is the duty of the Board of Irish Lights to inquire into these matters; whether that Board has taken action in regard to them, or made any report with reference to them; and, whether the wrecks in question will be now removed without delay?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have communicated with the Irish Lights Commissioners, and am informed by them that, although the steamship Rockabill was sunk off the entrance to Ballyshannon Harbour as far back as May 25, 1884, the Commissioners did not become aware of the occurrence till the month of January last, when they at once invited tenders for the removal of the obstruction. Two tenders were duly received—one for £1,980, and the other for £970; but these amounts appearing excessive, and looking to the fact that no application for the removal had been made by those interested in the trade of Ballyshannon, the Commissioners decided to defer consideration of the matter until the Inspecting Committee had visited the locality while on their general tour of inspection during the coming year, and had advised the Committee on the subject. Subsequently, however, the Town Commissioners of Ballyshannon brought the matter under notice by a letter dated April 7 last; but the Commissioners having been given to understand that steps were being taken to constitute a local harbour authority for that port, they still decided to await a Report from their Inspecting Committee. With reference to the wreck off Mount Charles, Donegal Bay, the Commissioners have no knowledge of the occurrence, it having never been reported to them.

COMPANIES ACT, 1862, SEC. 51.

MR. KENNY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty on April 16th last, in re the Railway Sleeper Supply Company (Limited), reported in The Times, relative to the construction of the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862; if he is aware that great inconvenience may arise in many cases, if special resolutions passed, previous to Mr. Justice Chitty's decision, should in any instance be declared invalid, when too late to remedy any alleged defect therein; and, if he will consider the necessity of introducing a short Bill to provide that the fourteen days referred to in that section shall not be computed so as to exclude the days of holding the two requisite meetings, necessary for the Company to pass a special resolution?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen a report of the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty to which the hon. Member refers, and I am informed by the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies that this judgment is in accordance with a decision given on the same point by Vice Chancellor Bacon as far back as August, 1882. I am also informed that these decisions are in accordance with the view which has always prevailed at the Registry of Joint Stock Companies; and, under the circumstances, I do not propose to initiate any legislation on the subject.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—DEATH OF A STUDENT AT KING'S COLLEGE SCHOOL.

MR. ACLAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the death of the lad named C. F. Bourdas, aged 12, who died from injuries received at King's College School, and to the verdict of the coroner's jury thereon; and, whether, in consequence of that verdict having been given, he intends to take no notice of the matter?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am glad my hon. Friend has called attention to this case, because I think it is a most serious one. I do not think there is any greater blot on our social system than the abominable practice of bullying which takes place in the great schools, and, for the matter of that, in some of the small schools of the country. The history of this case is this—This unfortunate child was taken ill on the 10th of last month; but it was not till several days afterwards that the father could get the child to tell him what was the cause of his illness. He says—

“On Tuesday I asked him if he had had a blow on his back, and he said that, if I promised not to tell Dr. Stokoe, the Head Master of the school, he would tell me. I promised him. He said that on the 10th inst., when leaving the dining hall, the big boys, those belonging to the upper forms, ranged themselves along the corridor in great numbers, each boy administering a blow with his fist on the back of each little boy, and that he got about a dozen blows. He said that this had occurred twice previously.”

The poor boy died from concussion of the spine produced by these blows. Now, I will venture to say that I think both parents and masters are greatly responsible for allowing the state of things, which is not peculiar to this school, to go on. A system of terrorism exists, of which we have had an example in the case of this poor boy. He did not venture to tell what had happened, and when it comes to the knowledge of the parents, they are afraid that if they make a complaint the boy will suffer; and the masters of the school allow these things to go on for fear of mischief happening to the school. They do not inquire, and do not take measures in order to put a stop to things of this kind. By this system of terrorism which is carried out, immunity is secured to those brutal tyrants who exercise these cruelties. As soon as I heard of this case, I wrote to the managers of King's College, and I received a reply which I do not regard as at all satisfactory. The writer says—

“I am sorry to be unable at present to give you any further information beyond what came out at the inquest. The school is at present broken up.”

I do not see why that should be a reason why inquiry should not take place. The letter goes on—

Mr. Acland

“In the meantime, a special committee of the council has been summoned to meet on Friday next.”

That is, Friday of this week. To my mind, that is not at all a satisfactory way of dealing with such a case as this. Therefore, Sir, three or four days ago I placed the case in the hands of the Public Prosecutor, with instructions, if possible, to obtain evidence and procure the conviction and adequate punishment of offenders of this description. There are hundreds of boys sent to prison for offences trivial in comparison with crimes of this description. I think the time has come for dealing with this matter seriously; and when big boys guilty of offences of this kind are punished as they deserve to be, and when schools managed so as to allow a state of things of this sort to be possible are made to suffer, we shall then get to the end of a system which makes a number of innocent young lives miserable and intolerable.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he did not consider it to be the bounden duty of a Coroner in the case of a death arising from violence to summon before him the eye-witnesses of such violence before the verdict was given?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think I had better not express any opinion now, as the matter is in the hands of the officers of public justice, who will see that the whole thing is inquired into.

PAPAL SEE—DIPLOMATIC COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE VATICAN—

MR. ERRINGTON.

MR. SEXTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is willing to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the record made from time to time, and preserved at the Foreign Office, of the proceedings of Mr. Errington on any of his visits to Rome; by whom, and from what material, these records have been made; whether a record is being prepared, or will be prepared, for preservation in the Foreign Office, of the proceedings of Mr. Errington on his present visit to Rome; and, whether communications are passing between Mr. Errington and any Member of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the filling up of the vacancy now existing in the Catholic see of Dublin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I adhere to the pledge which I was authorized two years ago to give to the House, and which was accepted. The record will be the letters which have occasionally been written to and from Mr. Errington. I have to repeat that Mr. Errington has received no instructions to recommend any Prelate to fill up the existing vacancy in the Catholic See of Dublin.

MR. SEXTON: I should like to ask the noble Lord whether the letter of recommendation to Rome given by Lord Granville has ever been withdrawn; and, if so, whether, in the absence of any formal instructions, Mr. Errington is not in the position of an uncontrolled Plenipotentiary; and, whether there is any other instance of a Representative of this or any other country offering advice to a foreign Sovereign without any communication with his own Government?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: In reference, Sir, to the answer just given, in which the noble Lord says that Mr. Errington was not instructed to recommend any Prelate for the See of Dublin, I wish to ask the noble Lord whether Mr. Errington was instructed to object to anyone?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: And I should like to ask whether it is not in the sole power of His Holiness the Pope to receive or to refuse to receive advice from Mr. Errington, or to decline to grant an audience to anyone?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: With regard to the different Questions that have been asked me, I must request any hon. Members who wish for further information to place their Questions on the Paper, because it is not in my power, without Notice, to give further information.

MR. BOURKE: But, Sir, as a Question arising out of the answer just given, the noble Lord says that the answer which he gave two years ago was accepted. I wish to ask by whom it was accepted? Certainly, it was not accepted by hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: When I said that the answer was accepted, I intended to convey that it seemed to me to meet with the acceptance of the House. It will be in the recollection of the House that a great number of Questions were asked at that time, and a considerable controversy arose. That controversy ceased as soon as the statement was made to which I alluded just now, and which was made on the authority of the Secretary of State.

MR. SEXTON asked to whom Mr. Errington addressed the letters which were recorded at the Foreign Office?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have stated that the records are "To and from Mr. Errington."

THE CITY OF LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES COMMISSION.

MR. BRYCE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, When it is expected that the removal of the office of the City of London Parochial Charities Commission from Craig's Court to Gwydyr House, a step promised some months ago with a view to accelerating the business of that Commission, will be carried out; and, what progress has been made by the Commissioners in the work of preparing the Schedules of City Parochial Charity property directed by the Act of 1883 as a preliminary to the issuing of schemes for the better application of the charity funds for the benefit of the people of London generally?

MR. MUNDELLA: My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds will answer the first part of the Question. With reference to the second part of the Question, I must refer the hon. Member to the 32nd Report of the Charity Commissioners, page 13, which states that—

"Since the appointment of additional Commissioners under the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, we have prosecuted the inquiry directed by the Act into the property of the charities subject to it. The whole of the scheduled parishes are now under investigation. In about one-fifth the inquiry may be considered as practically complete, and it is hoped that within a year from the present date the whole of this part of the work will have been accomplished."

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)— PRESCOT (LANCASHIRE) UNION— APPOINTMENT OF RATE COLLECTOR.

MR. BIGGAR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Has he seen the report that it is proposed by certain guardians in the Prescott (Lancashire) Union to give the appointment of rate collector to Mr. John Kitchen, on condition that he allow Mr. Dunn, who has been recently dismissed for embezzlement, £50 a-year out of his salary; and, whether he approves of such an arrangement; and, if not, whether he will use his influence to discourage that or any similar arrangement?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We are informed that the election of a collector took place on the 30th ultimo. Mr. Kitchen's application for the appointment was not entertained by the Guardians, and no suggestion was made by any Guardian in favour of an arrangement such as that referred to.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MISCONDUCT OF A POLICE CONSTABLE AT MULLINGAR.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true, as reported in The Westmeath Examiner of April 25th, that on the previous Sunday, in Mullingar Police Barrack No. 2, a detective policeman was guilty of grossly indecent behaviour towards a girl of tender years who was employed in the barrack; that this was the second time on which he was guilty of such behaviour towards the same girl; and that she is the third girl who has had to leave the employment of the police on account of his conduct; and, what action the authorities at Dublin Castle propose to take in the matter?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This matter is still under investigation by the Inspector General, who informs me that, so far as has been ascertained, there is no truth in the statement as reported in the paper referred to. The only irregularity which has so far been discovered is the employment of girls of this age in the Constabulary Barracks. This is quite against the Regulations, and has been at once put a stop to.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION AT MARLINSTOWN, MULLINGAR.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that police protection has been granted to a man named Fagan who has lately taken a farm at Marlinstown, near Mullingar; and, if so, in what manner will the cost of the protective force be charged?

Mr. Biggar

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Police protection has been given in this case, and it is considered absolutely necessary. The men form part of the free force of the county.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—INQUIRIES UNDER THE ACT.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Local Government Board are empowered to receive evidence in connection with the Labourers Act other than what is produced at the sworn inquiries held at the Union by their Inspector; whether evidence outside such inquiry was received in the case of a recent investigation in the Carrick electoral division, Mullingar; whether the requisition for a certain number of labourers' cottages in that electoral division was filled up and signed by twelve ratepayers, in due form of law; whether it is true that the bailiff on Captain Rochfort Boyd's estate induced some of those ratepayers, by threats of calling up the hanging gale of rent or other such menaces, to send a memorial to the Local Government Board withdrawing their signatures from the requisition; and, whether such intimidation constitutes an offence under the Crimes Act?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is quite open to the Local Government Board to receive any information which may be furnished to them in these cases. In this instance they received a document, signed by several of the signatories of the original representation, purporting to withdraw their representation on the ground that they had appended their names without understanding the matter. The Board have no information as to how the signatures to the second document were procured; but they have decided to accept the signatures to the original representation as valid, and to confirm the Guardians' scheme, omitting one cottage which was intended for a man who is a cripple, and could not, therefore, be regarded as an agricultural labourer.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE VOLUNTEER MEDICAL STAFF CORPS—THE EDINBURGH STAFF CORPS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any communication from the officers of the Edinburgh University Volunteer Medical Staff Corps, asking that the corps may be included in the new Volunteer Medical Staff Corps; and, whether there is any reason why their request should not be complied with?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Yes, Sir; such an application was received after the Army Estimates, which fix the establishments for the year, were issued, and no addition to the corps could then be made. The new Volunteer Medical Staff Corps is an experiment in a sense; and although it is hoped to extend the scheme, it is thought that at present there should only be one corps, any additions taking the form of outlying detachments. But no additions can be made except in connection with the next Army Estimates, and when the establishments for the whole Force are under consideration.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—INCIDENCE OF THE MALT TAX.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What was the rate of the incidence of the Malt Tax on a quarter of barley before the abolition of that Tax; what is the equivalent Tax on a quarter of barley at the present rate of the Beer Duty; and, what will be the equivalent Tax under the proposed new Beer Duty?

MR. HIBBERT: The rate of the incidence of the Malt Tax, together with the burdens which accompanied it, on a quarter of barley before the abolition of that Tax, was calculated by my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury at £1 4s. 6½d. At the present time it appears, from the Brewers' Return annually presented to Parliament, that the equivalent tax on a quarter of barley at the present rate of Beer Duty is almost exactly the same—that is, £1 4s. 6½d. If the Beer Duty is increased from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 3d. a barrel as proposed, the charge on a quarter of barley will be about £1 8s. 5½d.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS PENSION FUND.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the money subscribed by National Teachers in Ireland for the purpose of providing a pension for themselves on their retirement is wholly applied to that purpose; and, if not, whether he will state how much has been so applied in each year during the last ten years, what the balance has been in each year, and how it has been applied?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: All the contributions of the teachers are placed to the credit of the fund, and no payments whatever are made from it other than pensions and gratuities to retiring teachers, except the refund of their total premiums to those teachers who quit the service otherwise than by death or retirement on pension or gratuity. The scheme has only been in operation since January 1, 1880, and the annual disbursements have since been largely in excess of the teachers' subscriptions. For details I may refer the hon. Baronet to the accounts of the fund, which are annually presented to Parliament.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—PLEURO-PNEUMONIA AT FEARN (SCOTLAND).

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether a serious outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia has occurred in Ross, one hundred and fifty cattle having been slaughtered at Fearn, involving a loss of £2,800?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Local Authority of Ross have informed the Privy Council that pleuro-pneumonia exists at Fearn. We have not yet received the Inspector's Return, but a telegram received from the Clerk of Supply states that one animal was slaughtered by the owner; that two more were attacked; and that to-day the slaughter of the whole herd, numbering 135, has been ordered. The compensation will be calculated on the legal basis—full value for healthy animals, and three-quarter value for diseased animals—in neither cases fancy prices being given.

In reply to Mr. ACKERS,

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was extremely doubtful whether foot-and-mouth disease had broken out in Yorkshire. That was the Report of the Inspector sent down; but there would be further inquiry.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882—RIOT AT ORANMORE BARRACKS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the police at Oranmore lately made a drain from the barrack cesspool into the stream from which the inhabitants of Oranmore draw their drinking water; if the Local Officer of Health and the Board of Guardians strongly objected to this contamination of the drinking water, and if the Board of Guardians succeeded in closing up this drain; if the inhabitants of Oranmore celebrated this stoppage of the pollution by assembling at the drain and playing music; if, upon this, the police prosecuted, under the Crimes Act, the Local Officer of Health and some others, and if the magistrates dismissed the summons; if he would direct that, for the future, the Crimes Act should not be used against people who, in their anxiety for pure water, assembled in a manner disliked by the Constabulary; and, if he would inform the police that cases of this kind had better be dealt with under the ordinary Civil Law?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : It appears that a drain was about being constructed at the Oranmore Barracks, not for the purpose stated in the Question of draining the barrack cesspool, but to remove surface water. Some of the inhabitants assembled, and by force closed up the works, and they were not afterwards proceeded with. Notice was subsequently served on the 14th of March by the Sanitary Authority forbidding its construction. Eleven days after this a disorderly crowd forced their way late in the evening into the garden of the police barrack, accompanied by a band, took possession of the garden, and refused to leave. They remained for a considerable time, and conducted themselves in a very disorderly manner. The police authorities considered that if such lawless proceedings were allowed to pass unchecked great danger might arise to the public peace, and the principal persons were prosecuted for taking part in an unlawful assembly. The magistrates dismissed the case with a strong caution, holding that while the defendants' conduct did not, under all the circumstances, amount to an unlawful assembly, yet it was very gross, and brought them close to the verge of such unlawful assembly; and they cautioned them that if brought up for similar offences the Court might deal differently with the matter.

COLONEL NOLAN : The Chief Secretary has not answered the last paragraph, which is the most important. What I wish to ask is, whether he will direct that, in cases of this kind, recourse will be had to the ordinary Civil Law, and not to the Crimes Act?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : Was understood to say that each case should stand upon its own merits.

COLONEL NOLAN : Has the right hon. Gentleman sent any reprimand to the constables who proceeded in this case under the Crimes Act?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : No, Sir; I have sent no reprimand.

MR. HEALY : Would the right hon. Gentleman say whether the objectionable people at Oranmore were people who objected to having the wells poisoned by the drain coming from the police cesspool?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN : It is a long story, but I do not think that was the case.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—REDUNDANT CLERKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What steps have been taken to transfer eligible clerks, redundant in one Department, to fill up vacancies in the Upper Division elsewhere; whether the statement which has appeared in certain newspapers, that the Treasury propose to transfer eligible redundant Customs clerks, not over thirty-five years of age, is correct; whether all the Customs redundant clerks, with a single exception, are not already over that age; and, whether, if there is good and sufficient evidence that there are several redundant clerks over thirty-five years of age on the establishment of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, who are eligible for transfer, the Treasury will offer to them Upper Division vacancies in other Departments?

MR. HIBBERT : My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this Question; but I am afraid I can add but little to the statements on the subject of it made by him on the 7th of November and the 12th of March last. The Treassurey would be glad to see the number of redundant clerks reduced, and lose no opportunity of suggesting transfers where there is any possibility of their being practicable and advantageous. But there is no power to compel a Department to fill up a vacancy by means of a transfer; and the objections to such a course are obvious and strong, especially where the redundants are above 35 years of age, as is the case with all those at the Customs except one.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—SPAIN AND THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. WHITLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can inform the House what are the existing obligations of this Country to France, Germany, Spain, and Italy with regard to the maintenance of the Duty charged on wine at its present rate per gallon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The existing obligations of this country in the matter are contained in the Protocol of the 1st of December, 1883, and in the Declaration of the 21st of December, 1884, with Spain. These documents are given in the Parliamentary Papers, Commercial No. 5, of 1884, and No. 2, of 1885. Under these engagements the limit of the lower or shilling scale of Wine Duties is fixed at 30 degrees. There are no specific Treaty stipulations with France, Germany, or Italy in respect of the Wine Duties; but, as the hon. Member is aware, the produce of all countries obtains equal treatment in our tariff.

EGYPT (THE SOUDAN)—PRISONERS OF THE MAHDI.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to the following Letter in The Times of 1st May:—

"The Mahdi's Prisoners.—A Letter has been received at Cairo, on the 20th of March of this year, from Sister Therèse Grigolini, dated February 3rd, written with a pencil on a cotton pocket handkerchief. It briefly narrates the terrible sufferings of herself and the other sisters and priests imprisoned by the Mahdi at Omdurman, and suggests a plan to relieve them which it is not prudent to publish, but which is very hopeful. Another Letter, dated February 28th, was received at Cairo on March 18th, sent by M. Santoni. This last contains categorical replies to certain questions which it is not prudent to publish. M. Santoni went first to Abu Gussi, thence via Kordofan to Ambiliba, thence to Omdurman. At that place he actually saw and conversed with the priests and sisters. He was arrested and imprisoned as an English spy, but was subsequently released, and worked his way back with the Letter of Sister Therèse sewn in a fold of his shirt;"

and, if any steps can and will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to endeavour to obtain the release of these unfortunate prisoners from their terrible captivity?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The first of the letters referred to by the hon. Member has been forwarded to Her Majesty's Government by Sir Evelyn Baring; but they have no knowledge of the second letter. The subject is receiving the attention of the Secretary of State, who is in communication with the Italian Government in case any means may offer themselves of securing the release of these unfortunate women, who are believed to be Italian subjects. I must, however, add that, in a recent telegram to the Secretary of State for War, Lord Wolseley states that Sir Charles Wilson reports that there are at present no means of communication for ransoming any Europeans who may be captives in the hands of the Mahdi.

SUNDAY CLOSING EXTENSION (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. GIBSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, bearing in mind that Her Majesty's Government brought in a Bill in the Session of 1883 to render permanent the Irish Sunday Closing Act of 1878, and extend its provisions to the five cities and towns exempted from them, and re-introduced it in 1884, when it was again withdrawn from want of time, Government intends to bring in the Bill during the present Session of Parliament?

MR. MAURICE BROOKS: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question I would like to ask him whether, having regard to the fact that a large number of the working classes who are about to be enfranchised are the persons who are most interested in the restrictions about to be imposed by the Sunday Closing Act, he will consider whether it would not be better to leave the settlement of this question to the new Parliament, having in mind the warm manner in which this question—
[Cries of "Oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. GLADSTONE: Without entering into any argument, and looking at the matter drily, and only as a matter of business, I will point out that I have commonly answered Questions of this kind by what is called a dilatory reply, asking hon. Members to wait until I can state on the part of the Government what Bills we can undertake to bring in with a hope of passing them. The time to do so is now approaching; but with regard to this Bill, viewing the time of year we have already arrived at—and certainly our view about the Bill is perfectly clear and strong, yet it is a Bill that is likely to excite opposition and require time—I do not see any reasonable probability of our being able to introduce and proceed with the measure during the present Session.

ARMY—DIVINE SERVICE—PRESBYTERIAN CHAPLAINS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH asked the Secretary of State for War, How many Presbyterian commissioned chaplains are there in the Army, what are their salaries, and to which denomination of Presbyterians do they belong; how many of them are actively employed abroad with the Army; in whose hands does their appointment rest; what is the scale of their retiring allowance; and, how many Presbyterian soldiers are there in the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There are seven Presbyterian commissioned chaplains in the chaplains' department. Their salaries are regulated by Article 244 of the Royal Warrant for the pay of the Army. Five belong to the Scotch Presbyterian Church, two to the Irish Presbyterian body. Three are employed abroad, in Egypt. The appointment rests with the Secretary of State for War, who is usually guided by the advice of the Moderator of the Church from whose ranks the candidate is chosen. Retired pay is regulated by Article 979 of the Royal Warrant. According to the last general Annual Return of the Army, the number of Presbyterian soldiers was 12,619. The preliminary Return for 1884 shows 6,640 serving at home on January 1, 1885.

ARMY ORGANIZATION — THE TERRITORIAL SYSTEM.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the rumour is correct that the Adjutant of the Somersetshire Militia is to be appointed Adjutant of the Oxfordshire Militia, and in succession to Captain Boyle; if so, whether such an appointment is not in contravention of the territorial system as explained by Lord Cardwell and Mr. Childers, who gave it to be understood that all Adjutancies of the Auxiliary Forces would in future be supplied from the Territorial Regiments?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Both Line battalions of the territorial regiment being abroad, no officer could be spared from them to assume the duties of Adjutant to the 4th Battalion (formerly the Oxford Militia). At the request of the commanding officer of the 4th Battalion, the Adjutant of the Somersetshire Militia, who had formerly served in the 2nd Battalion (late 52nd Foot) was accordingly appointed.

ARMY — ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT — THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN—DEFECTIVE CARTRIDGES.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, If his attention has been called to the following description of the cartridges served out to the troops during the recent engagements in the Soudan:—

"Enquiries have been made on the spot as to the cause of the disastrous jamming in action, and the conclusion arrived at is that the fault is in the cartridge itself. The metal case is thin, papery, and in too many pieces. It bends and breaks in the men's pouches, and frequently expands with such force on being fired as to render the rifle useless. The extraction of the jammed case is a lengthy and elaborate process. Some of the rifles have been jammed at the very first shot, and the officers and non-commissioned officers have thus, from the commencement of the action, had to act as sort of game-keepers to their men, clearing their guns, while they fought on with those of their dead and wounded comrades;"

whether it is not the fact that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been repeatedly called to the dangerous condition of the cartridges served out to the troops for some time past; whether he will give the House a positive assurance that the present war preparations shall not include the manufacture of the same defective cartridges; if his attention has been called to the unserviceable condition of many of the bayonets used by the troops during the recent battles at Suakin; and, if he is still of opinion that these weapons are perfectly serviceable ?

MR. BRAND: My attention has not been drawn to the statement to which the hon. Member refers, and I have no idea who made it. The attention of the Government has not been frequently drawn to the dangerous character of the Boxer cartridge. There has been a great deal of exaggeration about this matter. The Boxer cartridge has answered well in several campaigns, but it is inferior in some respects to the solid-drawn cartridge. As I have previously stated, the solid-case cartridge is in course of manufacture. My attention has not been called to the unserviceable character of bayonets to which the hon. Member refers, and I have no reason to believe that the bayonets in possession of the troops at Suakin are not perfectly serviceable. I have, indeed, received a statement similar to that made by the hon. Member, but without any evidence in support of it. If the hon. Member will furnish me privately with any evidence in support of his statement, I will cause a strict inquiry to be made.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked whether the new cartridge had been approved or not ?

MR. BRAND said, he did not say that the solid-case cartridge had not been approved for active service. What he did say was that no decision had been taken to use the solid-drawn case for practice. The Boxer cartridge, of which there was a large supply in store, was perfectly serviceable for practice purposes.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked whether the failure was not due to old cartridges being refilled.

MR. BRAND: No, Sir.

GREAT BRITAIN AND RUSSIA—PORT HAMILTON (COREA).

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that, in deference to the opposition of the Russian Government, Her Majesty's Ministers have abandoned the plan of occupying Port Hamilton near the Corea ?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have only to repeat the answer which I gave the other day on this subject—namely, that no communications have taken place upon this subject between the two Governments of Great Britain and Russia.

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—RUSSIAN ATTACK ON THE AFGHANS AT PENJDEH—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that Her Majesty's Ministers have invited the Russian Government to submit to arbitration the question whether General Komaroff's attack upon the Afghans on 30th March was a breach of the "solemn agreement" of 17th March; whether the Russian Government have accepted this proposal; and, if so, who is to be arbitrator; whether the Russian forces will continue in occupation of the strip of Afghan territory south of the Khoja Saleh—Sarakh's line, which they have seized since the appointment of a joint Boundary Commission by the two Governments; and, how much longer it is expected that the British Commission will have to wait upon the frontier for its Russian colleagues ?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not able to enter upon the points presented by the hon. Member in his Question; but I shall have a short statement to make relative to the subject of the Correspondence with Russia when I am free to do so.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: When does the right hon. Gentleman propose to make that statement—before proceeding to Business, or after ?

EGYPT—SUPPRESSION OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN."

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the right hon. Gentleman gives me the opportunity of making a statement both in respect of that Question and with respect to another question in which an interest has been felt—namely, the incident of The Bosphore Egyptien. I will mention the latter first—it being, as I may say, now completed, and the Papers being now ready to be laid upon the Table. They will be in the hands of Members as soon as they can be got through the press. In the case of that paper the facts are as follows:—The Bosphore Egyptien was suppressed by a lawful decree of the Egyptian Government, and the British Government gave its distinct sanction to the act of suppressing that newspaper upon the grounds that were laid before it. The French Government made strong representations upon the subject. They have declared that they wholly refrain from raising any question as to the suppression of the newspaper; but with regard to the manner of the suppression, they raised important questions, and made demands in connection with it. They declared that the seizure and the closure of the printing office, where the newspaper was carried on, and in which other business was carried on as well, was, in their judgment, illegal, and they complained of the forcible removal of the French Consul, who had attended personally and officially to protest, as he conceived himself entitled to do, against this illegal closure of the office, as they described it. The French Government thereupon founded two demands—first of all, the re-opening of the office; and second, the punishment of the persons concerned in the proceedings. In the meanwhile Her Majesty's Government had obtained a full Report from Sir Evelyn Baring as to all the circumstances of the case, and they had likewise taken advice upon the legal aspect of it. The conclusion to which they found it their duty to come was that the closure of the office was not warranted by law, and that the technical force used against the French Consular authority was upon that ground not justifiable. We therefore took note of the declaration of the French Government that there was no desire to shield The Bosphore Egyptien, and that they wholly refrained from raising any question with regard to the act of suppressing the newspaper. Further, they expressed their readiness to withdraw their demands for the punishment of those who had simply obeyed the superior orders that were given for the seizure of the office, and for what was consequent upon that seizure of the office, and who had acted simply under the orders of the Egyptian Government. Accordingly, taking into view the illegality in the method of this proceeding, which practically we cannot deny, we stated that Her Majesty's Government would by no means disclaim their responsibility for the suppression of the newspaper itself, but were ready to associate themselves with the regret which they advised the Government of the Khedive to express as to the incidents which had attended the suppression of the paper. They accordingly advised Nubar Pasha to give effect, without scruple, to what they believed to be the law upon the subject, and to remove the bar to the re-opening of the office. They also recommended that His Excellency the Khedive should visit the French Consul, and should, upon that visit, convey an expression of regret for the irregularities which had been committed in the course of the proceedings.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the paper be re-issued as before?

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, no. A question of law, I believe, may arise as to the method of suppressing the newspaper, but the re-issue of the paper is not included in this arrangement.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Now, Sir, with regard to the more important question—the Correspondence with Russia—I am glad to say that the impediments which have presented themselves to the friendly prosecution of that Correspondence appear to us to have been removed. The state of the case is this—that the two Governments agree together to provide means for any settlement which may be needful of differences between them arising out of the engagement at Penjdeh, the British Government agreeing with the Government of Russia that they do not desire to see gallant officers on either side put upon their trial. For this purpose they are ready to refer to the judgment of the Sovereign of a friendly State any difference which may be found to exist in regard to the interpretation of the agreement between the two Cabinets of the 16th of March, with a view to the settlement of the matter in a mode consistent with the honour of both States, and they trust that no difficulties will occur as to the details of this reference which in principle is completely agreed upon. The two Governments are prepared, under these circumstances, to resume at once their communications in London on the main points of the line for the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier—I say on the main points of the line, for the details of the line would be examined and traced upon the spot in conformity with the conditions which were provided for in the Commission appointed for that purpose. This negotiation, of which it would be quite premature for me to anticipate the results, will be much facilitated as regards Her Majesty's Government by the more full and exact knowledge which, since the meeting at Rawul Pindi, they have obtained of the views of the Ameer with regard to the points of the Afghan Frontier, and likewise by the valuable topographical information which has reached the India Office. I may also say, on another point of interest, that the Russian Government have expressed their willingness to consider the question as to the removal of the Russian outposts when the Commissioners meet. That, I think, is all I can say. I cannot speak yet with regard to the time of the presentation of the Papers; but if matters proceed as I hope they will, there need be no long delay in their presentation.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the precise point that is to be referred to the mediation of a friendly Power?

MR. GLADSTONE: I put down the words which I intended to use. I am anxious to be very accurate on the subject. They are these—

“To refer to the Sovereign of a friendly State any difference which may be found to exist with regard to the interpretation of the agreement between the two Cabinets of the 16th of March,”

—that is, the agreement with regard to the advancing or attacking, on the one side, or on the other—

“with a view to the settlement of the matter in a mode consistent with the honour of both States.”

I trust that no difficulty may arise.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: May I ask whether, under these circumstances, which appear to differ materially from those under which the Prime Minister made his important statement to the House the other night, Her Majesty's Government propose to proceed with the Vote of Credit to-night, and whether the House may not have further time to consider the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; this process is still going on, and we must not assume things which have not happened. In consequence of what has happened, our views and expectations have changed; but, in our opinion, we can only ask Parliament to proceed with the Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to ask whether it is not a fact that the determination the Government has come to—to decide the boundaries, to a certain extent, at all events, in London—is not one which hitherto this Government has always resisted, and the Russian Government has always pressed?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; the answer to that question will require a more summary mode of expression than the hon. Member appears to expect. I rather think that it was the Russian Government that originally proposed the settlement on the spot. Certainly, since that time, the British Government have been disposed to look for a settlement on this point in London; but a variety of circumstances has happened which my hon. Friend will be better able to appreciate a short time hence, when the Papers are on the Table, which have led us to enter into this agreement, not at all by way of concession to the Russian Government. [Laughter.] With respect to that indication of feeling, I should not be in the least degree ashamed of this agreement, even if it were a concession, provided it was a good and sound concession. But it is not a concession to the Russian Government. We are entirely of opinion with the Russian Government that, in the state of matters now reached, it was very desirable indeed that the main points in controversy should be settled in London.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT begged to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this new arrangement which had just been submitted to the House implied the abandonment of the whole frontier line which the Joint Commission was appointed last July to delimit; whether Her Majesty's Government had agreed to give up Penjdeh to the Russian Government; whether that was part of the arrangement, either private or public; and whether there was any point fixed from which the Russian outposts would be withdrawn, or to which they would retire?

MR. GLADSTONE: In due time I have no doubt the desire of the hon. Member will be satisfied. It is really premature to bring forward this matter. I have announced that we are on the point of proceeding to consider the different points of a frontier line in London without delay. I hardly think that it would be consistent with the public interest that I should now touch upon those points in reply to the hon. Member.

ARMY—EXAMINATIONS FOR COMMISSIONS.

MR. HENEAGE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that candidates for Commissions in the Army are prohibited from competing at the examinations in March, July, or in any subsequent month, unless they have attained the age of nineteen previous to the 1st of January in the year in which such examinations are held; whether such rule was made by the War Office or the Civil Service Commissioners; and, whether he will consider the advisability of altering an arbitrary regulation which involves, in many cases, the loss of a year's seniority to the candidate, and entails a heavy expense on parents, without any advantage to the public service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The rule referred to by the hon. Member applies only to the Militia candidates for Line commissions. It was made in 1879 by the War Office, and was a concession in the interests of the candidates. If the ages of candidates were reckoned from July as well as from January, those who at the beginning of the year were approaching the maximum limit of age, and had only served for one training, would be permanently disqualified for commission, for, not having served for two trainings, they could not compete in March; and if they reached the age of 22 between January and July, when the Militia training takes place, they would by age be ineligible for competition in September. Consequently, as regards the maximum age, the rule confers a great advantage on candidates. As regards the lower limit of age to which the hon. Member's Question is directed, candidates whose birthdays fall in the early months of the year are under some disadvantage. Their admission into the Army is postponed for some months. The rule, however, has been in force for six years, and parents can make arrangements for their sons' education accordingly. If they desire their sons to enter the Service at an earlier age than the Militia rule allows, they can resort to admission by open competition. In fixing the lower limit of age, care must be taken not to give Militia candidates an advantage over those who enter the Army by open competition. Whatever date is fixed, apparently hard cases must inevitably occur when candidates' birthdays fall immediately after that date. The advantage given by the rule in question to the older candidates, who would, if it were altered, be permanently excluded from the Army, appears to me to be so much more important than the inconvenience which some delay in obtaining their commissions may cause to the younger candidates, that I see no reason for making any change in the regulations.

THE REGISTRATION BILLS.

MR. HEALY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, When the statement which the Chief Secretary promised would be made to-night on the subject of registration is to be made, by whom, and under what circumstances?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I was about to make a statement on the subject on the Motion to proceed with the Orders of the Day; but I will make it now in answer to the hon. Member. Her Majesty's Government have had to consider, since the debate and division on the Irish Registration Bill on the 24th of April, whether they could make any proposal to meet in part the views put forward by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. As regards Ireland, a special and temporary grant of a few thousand pounds was made in 1863 for the acceleration of registration. We have prepared for the Irish Bill a clause which follows generally the precedent of 1868, which will be found in the 31 & 32 Viet. c. 112, s. 27, with two exceptions—first, the benefits of the clause are extended to collectors of poor rates, which is now deemed proper owing to the much larger number of new voters in 1885; secondly, such Clerks of the Peace as receive salaries from the Votes and are bound to give their whole time to the public are not to get any extra pay. There were none in this position in 1868. The expenditure in 1868 was about £6,200. This year, allowing for the changed conditions, it will be about £10,000 as a maximum. Provision is, as the House knows, already made for the payment of additional Revising Barristers out of voted moneys.

MR. HEALY: Does the £10,000 include the pay of the Revising Barristers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; it is all for the purposes I have mentioned —the purposes for which the £6,200 was made in 1868. As regards England and Scotland, we cannot be parties in the last year of a Parliament to proposing that the whole charge of Parliamentary registration should permanently be thrown upon the public in general taxes. No proposal with regard to England and Scotland was made in 1868.
We are, however, prepared to make a temporary proposal for the present year which will leave the matter open for the consideration of the new Parliament, either in connection with the reform of local government and taxation generally or otherwise. The expenses of overseers are not separated in the local taxation returns from expenses connected with municipal registration and the preparation and printing of jury lists.
Neither is there any return distinguishing what proportion of the overseers' expenses is for county and what for borough registration. The direct repayment of the overseers' expenses would be almost impossible for reasons which we are prepared to give in debate. There are also the expenses of the Clerks of the Peace in counties, including remuneration for their services which are subject to an allowance by Quarter Sessions paid out of the county rate. These expenses in 1883—excluding a few counties in which no return was made—were in England, £12,572. As regards boroughs, scarcely any additional trouble or cost will be occasioned by the Franchise Act. County voters in boroughs are included in the county register in England. The pressure will be in the counties, and there, no doubt, especially in the present year, it will be great.
Our proposal is to make a grant to the counties in respect of the county registers and the other expenses of the Clerks of the Peace in England, and the assessors of the Valuation Rolls and other officers in Scotland, whose labour and expenditure will be very largely increased at the coming registration. In order to guard against extravagance and abuse we shall propose that this Vote shall be calculated on an estimate of the number of voters on the register for 1886. A contribution of 2*d.* a name would amount in England to about £20,000, which could be remitted with very little trouble to the county treasurers to the credit of the county rate, and a similar amount would be transmitted to the Commissioners of Supply in Scotland. That is the proposal which we shall be prepared to submit to the House in Committee of Supply.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked whether it was proposed to give £20,000 to Scotland as well as to England?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I said a corresponding sum to Scotland. I meant at the rate of 2*d.* a name.

COLONEL NOLAN: Do the calculations of the Government show that the £10,000 for Ireland will cover all the expenses now paid by the Poor Law Unions?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: As the Irish proposal will be made in a clause of the Bill, I would suggest to the hon.
and gallant Member that it would be better to discuss it on the clause.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH
asked whether the proposal with regard to England would be embodied in a clause, so that the House might know what they had before them? As far as he gathered, the Government only proposed a temporary grant of £20,000 to England, although the registration expenses under the present system were more than £100,000.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: What the registration expenses are it is difficult to estimate. Our proposal is as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, and I shall be glad to answer any question respecting it which on reflection the right hon. Baronet may think fit to give Notice of. No clause will be necessary.
This will be a matter for settlement by a Vote in Supply.

MR. GORST asked if he was right in understanding that the proposed subsidy was to be entirely in relief of those expenses of registration which were charged upon the county rates, and if no relief would be given in respect of those which fell upon the poor rates?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In our opinion it will be impossible to repay the overseers' expenses which in the case of a great majority of parishes amount to only a few shillings.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the Scottish Bill which had passed through Committee contained a clause by which the Sheriffs were enabled in their discretion to employ any number of assessors, and to fix seven guineas a-day as their remuneration. He wished to ask whether the Local Authority would have any control in regard to the expenditure?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): There are only two or three places in Scotland where any such employment would be necessary at all—Lanarkshire and possibly one or two others.

MR. GIBSON: In view of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, I wish to ask is the £10,000 to be proposed for Ireland a temporary sum for the purposes of the next revision? Secondly, is the £10,000 a sum that will give a greater or less proportion for each vote than 2*d.*?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: A greater proportion.

MR. GIBSON: How much?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: How much more depends upon whether you count the borough as well as the county votes.

MR. HEALY: I wish to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland if he can state whether the Government have now made up their minds with regard to the Question I asked the Irish Secretary on Friday—Whether the Government will ask the Local Government Board to put down the exact scale on which they purpose to remunerate the officials, unless they intend, as we press them to do, to leave it to the Boards of Guardians; and whether, as the Bill is now being reprinted, the Government will put down their own Amendments, and also re-arrange the numbering of the clauses?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, with respect to the last remarks of the hon. Member, he had anticipated them; with respect to the former, a statement would be made on Report.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked, When it was expected to make further progress with the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that would be in some degree dependent on the progress of the Scottish and Irish Registration Bills. He did not know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite would think themselves in a position to proceed to-night with the English Registration Bill? [Cries of "No!"] Seeing that was not the case, they should propose to proceed to-morrow with the English Registration Bill, putting the Reports of the Scottish and Irish Bills after it. Should they not get through the three stages to-morrow, they should put them down for Wednesday; but supposing they got through these stages to-night, the next stages of those Bills would be placed for Wednesday, and under those circumstances they should propose to take the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill on Friday night.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether any Minister was present who could state what would be the course of Business to-night?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the proposal was that they should take either the English Registration Bill or Supply until 10 o'clock; that they should then report Progress in order to get on with the Vote of Credit. He understood it was not convenient to right hon. Gentlemen opposite to take the English Registration Bill. They therefore proposed to take Supply till 10 o'clock.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Under these circumstances I wish to give Notice that I shall resist, as strenuously as I possibly can, any progress with Supply to-night, and I shall do my best to force Her Majesty's Government to bring the Vote of Credit at once under the notice of the House.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Under these circumstances, I will take upon myself to say that we will give the whole evening to the Vote of Credit.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE MALT TAX.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that the Secretary to the Treasury had, in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, said that the Malt Tax was originally 2*s.* 5½*d.* a-quarter. As he remembered, the tax was 20*s.* 8*d.* and 5 per cent, or 21*s.* 8*d.* in all. He wished to know, in order to avoid misapprehension, whether he was not absolutely correct in that statement?

MR. HIBBERT said, that when the tax was changed, it had been stated by the First Lord of the Treasury to have been 2*s.* 5½*d.* a-quarter, and he had himself stated that up to the present time the tax substituted for the Malt Tax was calculated to be of the same amount. If the additional 1*s.* were placed on the barrel—6*s.* 3*d.* instead of 5*s.* 3*d.*—the tax would be at the rate of 28*s.* 6½*d.* a-quarter.

REGISTRATION EXPENSES—RELIEF AS TO BOROUGHES.

SIR MASSEY LOPES asked, Whether the Government proposed to give any relief to the boroughs as well as to the counties?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the hon. Gentleman's own Friends had not proposed in 1868 to make such a suggestion. The present proposal was a temporary one, and would be open to the revision of the next Parliament. The work had scarcely increased at all in the boroughs, and, indeed, had long been less than it had been in 1868.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the announcement made by the Prime Minister would be followed by any change in the manner in which the Vote of Credit would be put before the House? There was very little chance of the troops in the Soudan being engaged elsewhere. Had the Government considered the advisability of separating the Vote into two items?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir; the Government have considered it, and they do not intend to make any change in the form of the Vote.

MR. ONSLOW asked whether the decision of the Government regarding the negotiations recently concluded between Russia and England had been communicated to the Viceroy of India, and had been accepted by him; and whether they had also been communicated to the Ameer of Afghanistan, and whether he was a consenting party?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I think the hon. Member had better ask those questions on the Vote of Credit?

MR. BOURKE reminded the right hon. Gentleman that during the debate on the Vote of Credit it would not be possible to obtain information from the Government by means of questions. The fact of every Member of the Government, with the exception of the President of the Local Government Board, having gone out of the House before, they could be questioned with reference to the Prime Minister's statement had placed the Opposition in an unsatisfactory position. He wished to ask several questions. He desired to know whether there was any truth in the report which had appeared in the newspapers that certain coolies, who, having been ordered back from Suakin to India, had, on their arrival at Aden, been told to return to Suakin? He hoped he should get a definite answer to that important question. Secondly, whether the Government had received any Reports from Lord Wolseley with respect to their policy of abandoning the Soudan—a policy which was sprung upon the House in a most extraordinary manner? Thirdly, whether any Report had been received from Lord Wolseley with respect to the engagements which that noble and gallant Lord solemnly made to the Chiefs at Dongola and along the Nile that they would not be deserted when he returned in the spring to take Khartoum? Fourthly, whether the Government had received any information from Lord Wolseley respecting Osman Digna, with regard to whom Lord Wolseley had stated most distinctly that the Military Authorities were determined to crush? [Ministerial cries of "Order!"] He did not wish to do anything irregular; but the Opposition were placed in a very awkward position by the extraordinary desertion of the Treasury Bench by the Members of the Government. Then there was another question which he desired to ask. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House distinctly that there were two capital heads of negotiations on the Russo-Afghan Question. First, that the breach of the agreement of March 16 was to be referred to arbitration. [Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] That was what he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say. The other head was that the negotiations as to the delimitation of the frontier were to be proceeded with in London. He wished to know whether these two subjects were to be dealt with simultaneously? He wished also to know whether the Papers were to be presented to the House forthwith, and, if not, when? Until these questions had been answered thoroughly and satisfactorily it was impossible that the House should be in a position to proceed with the debate on the Vote of Credit. In the circumstances, would it not be reasonable to move the postponement of this Vote?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The right hon. Gentleman, in the form of asking questions, has made something like a speech. In answer to the last question, it is, in the opinion of the Government, imperatively necessary, in the interests of the country, that the Vote of Credit should be proceeded with. With regard to the first question, as to the coolies, I must ask him to give Notice in the usual way? It seems to me eminently a question of the class requiring Notice. As to Lord Wolseley's Report, I have myself read his despatches, and I do not think that if they were laid before the House they would bear out the view the right hon. Gentleman seems to take. No doubt, they will ultimately be laid before the House. But I imagine they are not despatches of the kind which it would be customary, during such operations as are now taking place, to lay before Parliament.

MR. BOURKE: What about the other question as to Russia?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I imagine the Prime Minister's statement was to the effect that the difficulties which had prevented the going on with the Frontier Question were now in the course of removal or solution, and that, therefore, it was now possible to go forward with the consideration of the question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked how they could go on with the Vote of Credit in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Heads of every Department concerned in the Vote?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Prime Minister and the Heads of the other Departments are at present meeting a few yards off, and they are prepared to come back the moment the discussion on the Vote of Credit begins. They would not be absent at this moment were it not for important Public Business.

Mr. Bourke

MR. CHAPLIN asked that the Prime Minister's statement should be read again to the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the most important part of the agreement had been already read a second time by the Prime Minister.

MR. GIBSON: The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the Prime Minister repeated the most important part of the agreement, that is, with respect to what he called "the sacred covenant." Will the reference to arbitration include the point whether that "sacred covenant" has been broken; and, if so, will the Power who is to arbitrate be requested to indicate what reparation is to be made for its violation?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend said that it was not possible to state more fully at the present time the nature of the arrangement come to between the two Governments. I do not understand that the actual terms of reference to the friendly Power have as yet been agreed upon.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Though the terms of reference may not have been drawn up, Her Majesty's Government surely must have made up their minds as to the matters with which the arbitrator will have to deal. The Prime Minister stated that Her Majesty's Government had agreed to refer to the Sovereign of a friendly State any differences of opinion as to the violation of the agreement of the 16th of March, but that the gallant officers were not to be put upon their trial. What is the question to be referred to arbitration if not the conduct of those officers? I must press for an answer. Unless we do have an answer it will be quite impossible to go on with the discussion.

MR. R. T. REID: I wish, before that question is answered, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he considers it is for the public interest that questions of this character should be asked at this time without Notice?

MR. ONSLOW: Does Russia agree to be bound by the decision of the Sovereign who is to arbitrate on this question?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I understand that while I was absent from the House a request was made that the terms used by my right hon. Friend should be repeated to the House. I am prepared to do that now; but I do not think I am in a position to make any further statement. [The noble Marquess then repeated the words used by the Prime Minister with reference to the agreement between the two Governments.]

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Do not those words imply this—that any action taken by one or other of the two Powers consequent upon their interpretation of the “sacred covenant” shall be taken into consideration by the arbitrator?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the words “the gallant officers” refer to General Komaroff and Sir Peter Lumsden, or to General Komaroff and the Afghan officer?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no authority to interpret a term of this kind; but if the noble Lord asks me my opinion, I should say it refers to anybody that falls within the definition of officers on either side.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: “The two general officers” is the expression.

MR. GLADSTONE: The words are “the gallant officers on either side.” There are other persons who had a share in the transaction than Sir Peter Lumsden—British officers who were near the scene of the engagement.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: As it is evident that the Government do not know the meaning of their own statement, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the House is to understand that the words which he has read to the House as expressing the so-called arrangement between the two Governments are words drawn up by the Russian Government, and not by the English?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I rightly caught the statement made by the Prime Minister, the question which is to be put to arbitration is the interpretation to be placed upon the agreement of the 17th of March; but I think the matter in dispute between the two Governments was not the interpretation of the agreement, but the action of the Russian officers, and I should like to know which of these two things is to be submitted to arbitration?

MR. GLADSTONE: Here again, Sir, I cannot carry the agreement further than the language of the agreement. But if my hon. Friend should ask me my opinion, I should say the question has never been the trial of any officer at all. What the arbitration has to do with is the honour of the Governments involved in the agreement of the 16th of March, and we have the right, and the Russian Government have the right—each party to a compact of that kind has the right—to hold the other party to the execution of that agreement. That is the point of view from which alone I think we can try the question.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Do we understand that to mean that the one Power considers that the agreement has been violated, and that the other Power considers that it has not, and that it is to be referred to a friendly Power to decide whether the one or the other is right?

MR. GLADSTONE: The reference is to be made in the terms of the agreement itself, and I could not bind myself to say—I carefully avoided saying on Monday night—who had violated the agreement. I simply said that there had been a failure in the fulfilment of its terms. Beyond that I did not go and do not go.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I would ask the Prime Minister whether he did not say on Monday night that the attack was a Russian attack? If he did, I wish to know whether the question is to be raised again whether this was a Russian attack or not; and, if not, whether the Prime Minister withdraws his expression or qualifies it?

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I adhere expressly to my statement.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that the question to be referred between England and Russia can go no further than this—namely, whether the Government of St. Petersburg passed on at once the terms of the solemn covenant to General Komaroff?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no power or disposition to place any such limitation as the hon. Gentleman has suggested upon the meaning of the words.

MR. MACIVER asked whether it was the fact that Russia was to retain the fruits of General Komaroff's action, or whether it was intended to withdraw the Russian troops pending the arbitration?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I must repeat the question which the Prime Minister has omitted to answer—namely, whether the agreement will exclude the consideration by the arbitrating Power of any action taken in consequence of disagreement as to the interpretation of the agreement?

MR. GLADSTONE: The ground upon which I am invited to enter is entirely beyond me. It is not in the power of one of two States which have agreed to an arrangement to claim an exclusive right of interpretation. What I would suggest is that the House should wait until it has the agreement before it. I think it will be found to be sufficiently clear.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Will the Sovereign of a friendly State have power to determine who has broken the agreement?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Sovereign of a friendly State will have the power of determining on any difference which may be found to exist as to the interpretation of the agreement between the two Governments.

MR. MACARTNEY asked whether it would be competent to submit to the arbitrator the advance of the Russian Army, and whether that was to be considered tantamount to putting on his trial the officer who commanded?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (who was received with cries of "Oh, oh!") said: I am not going to ask any embarrassing question; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would answer this question, Whether "the Sovereign of a friendly State" included the President of a Republic—say France, Switzerland or America, or whether the arbitrator was confined to Sovereigns in the sense of Kings or Emperors?

MR. GLADSTONE: We have not made that matter the subject of any particular investigation.

MR. MACARTNEY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer my question?

[No reply.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—VOTE OF CREDIT.—REPORT.

Postponed Resolution [27th April] further considered.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £11,000,000, be granted to Her Majesty, beyond the ordinary grants of Parliament, to defray the Charge which may come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, for—(1.) Remaining Charges in the Soudan and Upper Egypt; (2.) Special Naval and Military Preparations."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, it was with utter consternation that a very large proportion of Members heard the unprecedented statement which fell just now from the Prime Minister. It was his opinion that the news announced by the Prime Minister was terrible news, terrible news, at any rate, to those who were deeply anxious for the security of our Empire. There were three points about which, undoubtedly, issues had arisen between the Government of Russia and Her Majesty's Government. The first and original point was the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier; the second point was the conflict at Ak Tapa; and the third point was whether the delimitation could be settled on the spot or in London. The Prime Minister had announced to-night that on every one of these points Her Majesty's Government had made a base and cowardly surrender. He greatly feared, though he hoped his fears would not be realized, that we might lose India—[Cries of "Oh!"]—not lose it in the actual technical sense of the word, for he did not mean to say that our Army and our officials would have to bundle out of India to-morrow, bag and baggage, as the Prime Minister wished to bundle out the Turks from Europe—[Mr. GLADSTONE: Never!] —but he greatly feared that by the action that Her Majesty's Government had taken under the present extraordinary circumstances, they had lost for a long time, and perhaps for ever, the respect and loyalty of the Natives, and whatever affection existed between ourselves and our Indian subjects, which constituted the virtue and the vigour of our government. He felt certain that when the news of what had been stated to-day in the House of Commons reached and was widely known in the bazaars of India, from Lahore to Delhi and from Bombay to Hyderabad, the respect and sympathy of the Indian people would be greatly alienated from a Power which they had only to look upon to see how it had fallen from its high estate. The news had come upon the House so suddenly that it was, he admitted, difficult to discuss it. He had hoped against hope that Her Ma-

Majesty's Government were really in earnest, particularly when the Prime Minister made the speech the other night, in which he indicated that by no action of theirs would they jeopardize one jot of the interests of this country or of India. He had hoped that; and he believed that every one of the Opposition entertained the same hope, for even the Prime Minister acknowledged that the attitude of the Opposition was eminently patriotic when they abstained from putting questions and from inconvenient debate on this subject. But now their hopes were utterly shattered. The steps that had been taken could not be retraced, the surrender to Russia could not be recalled. Under these circumstances he contended that it was a perfect farce to proceed with the Vote of Credit. One more point. The Prime Minister denounced the Vote of Credit of the Conservative Government of 1878, because he said it was unparalleled and unprecedented that a Power should come together with a friendly Power for the highest pacific purposes, and should have their Conferences wantonly disturbed by the clash of arms. How did this arbitration with a friendly State, and these amicable Conferences between the two Powers—how did they differ from the Conference of 1878, for which the then Conservative Government asked for a Vote? Why, if the right hon. Gentleman's contention was sound, did he now invite the House of Commons to depart from the maxim which he himself had laid down, and disturb this Conference with Russia and a friendly State by the clash of arms? This was not his argument; he would not give two pence for it. He did not believe in the lines upon which it was based or in the contention by which it was put forward. His argument was that a Vote of Credit so enormous was the largest demand which a Government could make upon the confidence of Parliament, and he contended that the circumstances which on Monday last might have been more or less favourable to a unanimous expression of confidence, were now distinctly unfavourable. He did not think it was possible for any Member of that House opposed in political views to Her Majesty's Government to allow this Vote to take immediate effect without debate and protest, for if they passed it without protest they would be thereby expressing confidence in the Government which it was perfectly impossible to entertain. The Prime Minister in his speech on Monday said that the time of bringing forward a Vote of Credit was not the moment to bring the Government to book. That was a most extraordinary contention, and he could not refrain from asking what the Liberals did in 1878. He looked upon the action of the Government in 1878, and the Constitutional action, whatever else it might have been, of the then Opposition, and he wanted to know why the Members of the Tory Party were to depart from such Constitutional action when the Liberal Government was in Office? He submitted that a Vote of Credit was the only opportunity which independent Members had of calling attention to the policy of the Government. If the Leader of the Opposition, as the mouthpiece of his Party, desired to call in question the conduct of the Government, he had only to frame a Motion and lay it on the Table to find an opportunity given him to discuss it; but independent Members, like those sitting near him, had no opportunity of placing their views before Parliament and the country unless they took advantage of these Votes of Credit. Now, the granting of a Vote of Credit of £11,000,000 which the Prime Minister had demanded was the most unlimited mark of confidence in a Government which Parliament could show. There were at the present time many weighty reasons why many hon. Members could not feel that confidence in the Government, and many reasons against allowing it to appear to the country or to Europe that they had confidence in the Government in this matter. What he wanted to point out was that the responsibility of Parliament with regard to this question was greater than the responsibility of the Government. The Prime Minister in his Mid Lothian campaign insisted, and rightly and properly insisted, that he was not arraigning the Government of England, but Parliament, which had sanctioned the action of the Government. The responsibility of Parliament, therefore, became very heavy, and could not be lightly assumed. But if Parliament protested against the action of the Government, the responsibility remained upon the shoulders of the Government. Whatever others might now do he, at any rate, wished to enter a protest against the conduct of the Government in submitting a Vote of Credit without giving the slightest information as to the nature of the policy which they meant to pursue by means of that Vote. He entered a reservation because even now it was obvious, from what had passed across the Table to-night, that it was impossible to elicit from the Ministers what was the exact point at issue between the Government of Russia and the English Government, and he wished humbly, but still as earnestly as he could, to raise a warning to the Government and to the House as to the nature of the Power with whom we were dealing, and as to the nature of the interests of India. For that purpose he would venture to ask the indulgence of Parliament. There were two parties with whom independent Members of the House of Commons had to deal in this matter. They had to deal directly with Her Majesty's Government, and indirectly with the Government of Russia; and it was perfectly certain, and he thought he should be able to prove it to the House, that in the Government of Russia the Parliament of England could place no confidence. He thought it would also be obvious to the House, from what he should lay before them, and from what had passed to-night, that in the Government of the Queen the Parliament of England could place no confidence. He did not know whether there were many Members who were aware that at the present moment, and for a long time past, Russia had been deliberately violating a solemn agreement entered into by her, and curiously enough, an agreement more or less based upon arbitration. That agreement between the Government of Russia and the Government of the Queen was the result of negotiations which extended over more than two years—from 1869 to 1872. The negotiation was commenced by Lord Clarendon and Prince Gortchakoff, on the proposal of Lord Clarendon. In reply to Lord Clarendon Prince Gortchakoff said—

"The Czar looks upon Afghanistan as completely outside the sphere within which Russia may be called upon to exercise her influence."

Shortly afterwards Lord Clarendon and Prince Gortchakoff happened to meet in Germany, each of them taking the German waters. They had an interview at Heidelberg, and Prince Gortchakoff assured Lord Clarendon that Russia had no further intention of going South, and that extension of territory was not the object of the Imperial Government. So things went on, and unfortunately Lord Clarendon died and was succeeded by Earl Granville, and it was quickly decided that the boundary of Afghanistan was to be fixed, and that the arbitrator or referee to whom all British plans and views and British maps were to be referred was to be General Kaufman, who was on the spot. Time dragged on, and General Kaufman made no Report which was communicated to the British Government, upon which Earl Granville showed the only signs of energy and courage which he had ever been able to detect in the whole of that great man's career. The noble Earl wrote a somewhat dignified and even peremptory despatch to the Russian Government, saying that he should not wait any longer for the Report of General Kaufman, but that he would himself define the boundary of Afghanistan. The noble Earl did so, and the boundary he laid down was deliberately and solemnly accepted by Prince Gortchakoff in the year 1873. In a despatch of the 19th January, 1873, alluding to the boundary and other details, Prince Gortchakoff wrote to Baron Brunnow, the Russian Ambassador at this Court—

"Considering the difficulties experienced in establishing the facts in all their details, considering the great facilities which the British Government possesses for collecting the precise data, and, above all, considering the wish of His Imperial Majesty not to give to a matter of detail an importance which is not due to it, we accept the boundary line laid down, and trust that our doing so will be accepted as a proof of the desire of our august master to maintain and consolidate friendly relations with the Government of Queen Victoria."

Thus agreement was arrived at, and curiously enough an article written by the Prime Minister and describing that agreement appeared in The Nineteenth Century just a year after it had been concluded. The Prime Minister in that article said—

"During the existence of the late Administration [his own Government] a wise, pacific, and friendly negotiation, due to the forethought and initiative of Lord Clarendon, was instituted with Russia to promote the tranquillity of Central Asia and to insure a good understanding between the two Empires in that portion of the world. It was an essential part of this understanding, and was so recorded in many avowals, that Russia should abstain from all endeavours to exercise excessive influence in Afghanistan; while England, on the other hand, was to use her best efforts for inducing the Ameer to fulfil the duties of good neighbourhood towards his northern neighbours, who were the neighbours, on the other side, of Russia."

That agreement, entered into after long negotiation, was the agreement which Russia was deliberately breaking at the present moment, and which she had been breaking for many days. The agreement so accomplished and entered into by the British Government was relied upon by the British Government, although three times previously Russia had voluntarily given pledges to this country with respect to Central Asia, and had deliberately broken those pledges. In 1864 the Russian Forces captured Tohenken, in Turkestan, and defeated the Ameer of Bokhara. Prince Gortchakoff, on hearing of these successes, at once and voluntarily issued a manifesto to Europe in general, and England in particular, in which he declared that—

"The final point of Russian advance had been reached, fixing for us with geographical precision the limit up to which we must advance and at which we must halt."

That declaration could hardly have been considered by our Government and Parliament, before in 1865 Russia again declared war upon Bokhara, and captured the city of Tashkend. Prince Gortchakoff thereupon voluntarily issued a second manifesto addressed to Europe in general, and England in particular, in which he declared that the Czar had no desire to add further to his dominions. This despatch was scarcely considered by the Government and Parliament before the Russians again advanced, captured the town of Khojend in 1866, and annexed the province of Khokan in 1867. Again, another manifesto from Prince Gortchakoff declared that the limits of Russian advance had been reached. All these declarations were made voluntarily on the part of the Russian Government and were not called for by the British Government. In 1868 Russia again declared war against Bokhara, annexed Samarcand, and finally forced the Ameer of Bokhara to become a subject of the Czar. These were the three pledges which, prior to the negotiations between Lord Clarendon and Prince Gortchakoff, Russia had voluntarily given, and which she had deliberately broken. In the circumstances, the negotiations of 1869 to 1873 were begun and finished. He now came to what he might call the crowning act of treachery. While the negotiations were going on, and towards the close of them, the news came to England of a large Russian expedition which was being prepared for the conquest of Khiva. This caused great apprehensions in England, and in order to allay them the Czar sent a special Envoy to England—Count Shouvaloff—who arrived in 1873. He informed the Government of the present First Lord of the Treasury, through Lord Granville, who was then Foreign Secretary, that the expedition to Khiva was a very little one, consisting of only four and a-half battalions, and that its purpose was to punish acts of brigandage. He then declared in words afterwards embodied in a despatch from Earl Granville—

"Far from its being the intention of the Czar to take possession of Khiva, positive orders have been issued to prevent it."

At the time that Russia was giving this distinct and unsolicited pledge, what was the real nature of this very small expedition? It consisted of five columns of 12,000 men. General Kaufman was the Commander-in-Chief; Khiva was stormed and the whole territory of the Khan of Khiva was annexed. He did not hesitate to say that of all the duplicity and treachery of which examples might be found in the annals of diplomacy and international intercourse nothing exceeded this for blackness and perfidy. It was the greatest and most deliberate falsehood which was ever told by one great Power to another with which it professed to be in friendly relation. What happened? This state of things was so terrible that Lord Granville utterly collapsed; it was altogether too much for him. He wrote at once to Prince Gortchakoff, and he used language just like that which the Government were now using, and resembling that of the Prime Minister that afternoon. He said he "Saw no practical advantage in examining too minutely how far the Treaty arrangements are in strict accordance with the assurances of Count Shouvaloff."

Was there not a similarity between that and what was said now? The noble Earl at once expressed a hope of ar-iving at a frank and clear understanding regarding the respective position in Central Asia. Curiously enough, the Prime Minister had written an opinion upon the Khiva incident, showing how far he would go to meet the enemies of his country. In January, 1879, the right hon. Gentleman wrote a curious article well worth the attention of the House of Commons, which appeared in The Nineteenth Century, with the title of "The Friends and Foes of Russia." Speaking of the Emperor of Russia, he said—

"It is true that he gave to England assurances about Khiva which he has been unable to fulfil. The assurances were that positive orders had been issued to prevent the annexation of Khiva. But the military measures taken against the Khan apparently had in view the real necessities of peace and order in that region, from which plunder and kidnapping had been expelled. There is little in their accompaniment either of profit or of power, which would warrant the imputation of an unworthy motive. It is more just to ascribe the Emperor's original promise of entire abstention to an honourable anxiety for the friendship of England and as an over-sanguine expectation than to denounce as an act of bad faith a resort to force which has every appearance of reason and of justice."

That opinion was written six years after the occurrence, and therefore it had no effect upon the negotiations of the time. Prince Gortchakoff seemed to be greatly pleased at the attitude of the English Government, and it must have been almost more than he expected. He wrote back to Lord Granville a letter in which he expressed his entire satisfaction with the just view Lord Granville had taken, and reiterated the positive assurance that the Imperial Cabinet persisted in considering Afghanistan as entirely outside its sphere of action. He went on to add that the Imperial Government had no intention of organizing an expedition against the Turcomans. Now intervened the Emperor of Russia personally, and he told Lord Augustus Loftus—"Happen what might, the Imperial Government would never interfere in the internal affairs of Afghanistan." Then came the Emperor's visit to England, and Prince Gortchakoff wrote to Baron Brunnow in 1874, in order apparently to make things pleasant all round in England, that the order of the Emperor had been issued that no expedition should be undertaken in the direction of Merv—that was, against the Turcomans—in such peremp-tory terms that no local ambition would dare to take the liberty of transgressing them. Did the House know that at that very moment Prince Gortchakoff wrote that despatch to Baron Brunnow the Russian General in command in Central Asia was issuing a circular to the Turcoman Chiefs informing them that he had been appointed to supreme authority over the country between the Caspian Sea, Merv, and the Oxus, and summoning the Chiefs to come in and make their submission at Krasnovodsk? That pledge was violated, he made no doubt, with the knowledge of the Russian Government at the moment. Naturally enough, the English Government took the opportunity of calling the attention of Russia to the singular discrepancy which had taken place, and Prince Gortchakoff's reply was sublime. He said he could not comprehend in what way the incident could affect Great Britain. And yet this was a promise voluntarily given and deliberately broken. They then came to the year 1875, when a Conservative Government was in Office. Prince Gortchakoff wrote to Count Schouvaloff that the Emperor had no intention of extending the frontiers of Russia such as they then existed in Central Asia, either on the side of Bokhara or on that of the Attrek. In the same year the Emperor of Russia finally annexed the entire Province of Khokan. In 1878, when there was a great deal of friction consequent upon the Russo-Turkish War, the Russian Government voluntarily declared to the English Ambassador that all their former assurances in regard to Afghanistan had recovered their validity. That was in the month of September, 1878. In the month of November the Russian Government sent their Mission to Cabul. Then, in 1879, M. de Giers wrote to inform Lord Dufferin—

"In the most positive manner that there was no intention on the part of the Russian Government to go to Merv."

A few days later M. de Giers again wrote to Lord Dufferin conveying the—"Express approval by His Majesty (the Emperor) of the assurances he had given as to the non-advance of Russian troops on Merv."

A fortnight later the Emperor himself

"Was pleased to assure Lord Dufferin that there was no intention of the Russian troops advancing on Merv."

Then he came to the year 1880, when

Lord Randolph Churchill

the present First Lord of the Treasury and Lord Granville returned to Office. In 1881 was effected the final conquest of the Tekke Turcomans; the whole of the territory was annexed by Russia, and the railway was concluded to Kizil Arvat. Curiously enough, he found by a comparison of the dates that at the very moment when the Tekke Turcomans were thus conquered, and their territory annexed, the First Lord of the Treasury, his Indian Secretary, and his Viceroy were engaged in destroying the last remnant of the railway between Quetta and Sibi, and offering the rails for sale in the Indian markets as old iron. Then they came, in 1881, to the communication from Baron Jomini to Mr. Wyndham, British Chargé d'Affaires, when the question of the boundary of Afghanistan was raised. Baron Jomini said—

"That their furthest point now was Askabad, but that General Skobelev had discovered some very fertile country further south, where a complete state of disorder existed; that there was Sarakhs also to be considered; that it was not Persian, and it would be necessary to establish some form of government there as elsewhere."

What was the nature of the position at that moment? It was entirely changed from the position of affairs in 1869 and in 1873, when the Duke of Argyll, and even Mr. Disraeli himself, said that he had no objection to Russia advancing to a given point. In 1881 they had a greatly increased knowledge of the designs of Russia; they were aware of General Skobelev's plans; they had in their hands the compromising correspondence of Russia with Cabul; and they had also a distinct movement forward on her part towards Afghanistan. Well, in 1882, Lord Granville wrote to Sir Edward Thornton—

"The friendly relations between England and Russia had rarely, if ever, been on a better footing;"

and he suggested

"an agreement between England and Russia and Persia for the settlement of frontier now undefined."

But the Russian Government by that time took a very fair estimate of the British Foreign Secretary, and did not make the smallest attempt to conceal their contempt for any suggestion that he made. Count Lobanoff intimated, in reply, that the boundary between Russia and Persia was a question between those two States, and that England had no right to interfere. He also subsequently intimated that he was instructed to say his Government acknowledged the continued validity of the agreement between Prince Gortchakoff and Lord Clarendon, by which Afghanistan was admitted to be beyond the sphere of Russian interference. There was some laughter on the part of the Home Secretary when he (Lord Randolph Churchill) attached some importance to that agreement between Prince Gortchakoff and Lord Clarendon; yet the Russian Government acknowledged its validity only two years ago. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Hear, hear!] But they were breaking it now. If the Home Secretary would allow him to hand to him across the House the despatch in which that agreement was set forth with the boundaries of Afghanistan he would find that the Russian Army had long ago passed those boundaries. He challenged any Minister to deny it. Lord Kimberley himself had admitted it in the House of Lords. He said, then, that they were attempting to negotiate now with a Government which deliberately violated the agreement into which it had entered and the continued validity of which it acknowledged in 1882. The Home Secretary would perhaps take part in that debate, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would attempt to sustain his view by argument. Lord Granville and the Secretary of State for War had an interview with the Russian Ambassador in March, 1882, and being together he supposed that they became courageous, because they insisted on the right of England to have a voice in the determination of the boundaries of Persia; and the Ambassador replied that that matter concerned Russia and Persia exclusively. Lord Granville again collapsed and wrote a despatch, in which he said he saw no objection to the matter being settled between Russia and Persia. That was in March, 1882; and then the news reached England that on October 28, 1881, the Russian Colonel had concluded a Convention with the Elders of Merv preparatory to their submission to Russia, although, on the 18th of June, 1881, M. de Giers and Baron Jomini had stated to Mr. Wyndham that "there was no question of negotiating a Treaty with the Merv Turcomans." On Feb. 15, 1884, Sir Edward Thornton telegraphed from St. Petersburg in the following terms:—

"His Imperial Majesty has determined to accept the allegiance of the Merv Turcomans and to send an officer to administer the Government of that region."

There all their official information ended. And what was the nature of that information? It was a series of pledges voluntarily given, and deliberately broken, a long and uninterrupted tissue of treachery, fraud, and falsehood. Now came the question of the Boundary Commission. The Prime Minister said that he thought that it was first of all suggested by Russia. All they knew was that it was arranged between the two Governments that a Boundary Commission should meet on the spot; that we were to send our Commissioner, and the Russian Government were to send theirs; and they knew that Sir Peter Lumsden went hoping to meet the Russian Commissioner, and found no Russian Commissioner, but found a hostile Russian Army advancing with drums beating from Sarakhs. Sarakhs, Pul-i-Khisti, and Penjdeh had all been rapidly occupied, and Herat now at any moment was admittedly within the grasp of the Russian Army. All these proceedings which he had endeavoured rapidly to summarize to the House had occupied a period of 20 years—from 1865 to 1885—during eight of which the Conservatives had been in Office, and during 12 of which the Party of the right hon. Gentleman opposite had been in Office. But, curiously enough, the chief and worst features of all these Russian advances had taken place under the Administration of the First Lord of the Treasury and Lord Granville. It was important, therefore, to recall the recorded views of the First Lord of the Treasury as to the Russian advances. All these things were being negotiated upon now by Her Majesty's Government; they were called upon to place an immense Vote of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government, and, therefore, he would say that before they hastily and rashly gave that Vote of Confidence it was not without importance to recall the views of the First Lord of the Treasury himself. It was supposed that at one time the First Lord of the Treasury attached a great deal of importance to the Komaroff incident. He had grave doubts as to the genuineness of that opinion of the First Lord of the Treasury, because he remembered another similar incident that took place in the Khivan campaign of 1873—an incident similarly in the nature of an unprovoked aggression, but widely different in its far greater ferocity, cruelty, and treachery. It had been a terrible incident—one of the most awful things, perhaps, that had ever stained the history of conquest by any State—the extermination of the tribes of the Tekke Turcomans by General Kaufman, after Khiva had fallen. Curiously enough, the First Lord of the Treasury had written an elaborate article containing a most ingenious and powerful defence of that proceeding. It had appeared in The Contemporary Review in 1876. In that article of the First Lord of the Treasury there was one opinion with regard to Russia and Asia—and he attached great importance to it, because it was in writing and was undoubtedly within the knowledge of Russia and her Ministers—in which the Prime Minister had said—

"I know of no reason why Afghanistan and Herat should not for an indefinite time separate Russia from Indian Asia; no reason for imputing to Russia an ambition of aggressiveness which, in my opinion, is not less absurd than guilty; no reason for believing, but every reason for disbelieving, that if that odious imputation is to be made and also to be verified, and if a military contest were to arise, her means of conducting it are either superior or even equal to our own."

Now to come to the year 1880, when the First Lord of the Treasury, as the Leader of the Liberal Party, had gone down to contest Mid Lothian. He found that the Prime Minister's opinion in 1880 as to the Russian advance was to this effect. Speaking at West Calder, he had said—

"I have no fear myself of the territorial extensions of Russia in Asia, no fear of them whatever. I think the fears are no better than old woman's fears."

The old woman alluded to had been Lord Grey; at least, it had been supposed so at the time. In the fifth Mid Lothian speech, a few days later, the First Lord of the Treasury described one of the causes of the Afghan War as—"Absurd jealousies of your own with respect to schemes from Russia which are impossible and impracticable."

Perhaps the Prime Minister or some Member of the Government would explain, if that were his opinion in 1880, why the House of Commons was now asked for £11,000,000 to defend the interests of India against schemes which were "impossible and impracticable?" That had been in 1880, and undoubtedly their knowledge had increased. Between 1880 and 1884 they might think that the First Lord of the Treasury would have altered his opinion; but no; his last recorded opinion was to be found in his second progress in Mid Lothian last year. In his second speech, again, alluding to the late Afghan War, the Prime Minister talked about it having been caused by—

Lord Randolph Churchill

"That supposed ambition of Russia about which your susceptibilities are sometimes acted upon."

Would the First Lord of the Treasury say, if that were his opinion in 1884, whether the Vote of £11,000,000 was an attempt to practise upon the susceptibilities of the unfortunate Radical Party opposite? He wanted to know how, in the face of all that historical description of the advances of Russia, and the recorded opinion of the highest authorities, the Government and the First Lord of the Treasury had the face to ask the House for £11,000,000, without vouchsafing to Parliament the slightest information; but, more than that, how the First Lord of the Treasury had the courage to lay down the opinion that the Vote of Credit, under all these circumstances, was not a moment for bringing the Government to book? He thought he had shown reasons why the House of Commons should place no confidence in any declaration that had been made by the Imperial Government of Russia, and why he thought Parliament could place no real confidence in the Advisers of the Crown. But when they remembered other incidents—the famous declaration in the Speech from the Throne that the Government would maintain the authority of the Crown in South Africa, and that that authority had not been maintained; the declaration that the Government would rescue General Gordon, and that General Gordon had not been rescued; the declaration only a few months ago that Her Majesty's Government intended to smash the power of the Mahdi, and that that power had not been smashed, and was not to be smashed; the disgraceful and degrading incident of how Her Majesty's Government had led that poor little protected Government of Egypt into a horrible muddle, and had forced that poor little Government to wallow in the gutter before France, and had gladly associated themselves in that act of humility—when they remembered all this in connection with the incidents specially connected with the Russian advances, it was impossible for them to repose the slightest confidence in Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Northampton and others might perhaps say to him—"Why are you dragging up all these questions? You want to inflame the situation—"["Hear, hear!"]—you want war; you belong to the War Party." ["Hear, hear!"] He was sure that those cheers would come. All that he could say was that such an accusation would be a very wrong one, a very foolish one, and a very superficial one. His object in recalling all this to the notice of the House of Commons—an object which he had had before he came down to the House, and which had since been greatly strengthened—had been to show the impossibility—the hopeless impossibility—of providing for the security of India by any agreement with Russia. They might make any agreement with Russia that they chose; but the security of India must be sought for by other methods and other ways. Those methods and those ways did not necessarily include war. As a general rule, war was a pastime of fools who had nothing better to do; but actual war was rarely contemplated, much less resorted to, by persons of intelligence, experience, and seriousness. But as to the security of India, he would indicate only a few of the methods by which it could be provided for. It could be provided for, in the first place, either by the improvement and perfection of our Frontier, by the negotiation of powerful alliances, and by the tightening of the bonds of union and of common action between England and her Dependencies, or it might be provided by the concentration of inexhaustible and irresistible defensive resources. There were many other methods; but what he feared was this—that these methods would all be neglected and postponed in the extravagant—perhaps purposely extravagant—attention which was being given to a little sandy strip of desert and the paltry skirmish between two barbarian Chiefs. If these were neglected or postponed, he knew that great and incalculable damage would accrue to the Empire. In the last speech he ever made the late Lord Beaconsfield said that the key of India was London—that it lay in the resources of the English people. In one sense Lord Beaconsfield was wrong, or it might be that he was only half right. He agreed that the key of India was not at Herat nor at Penjdeh, or in the hands of General Komaroff or of Sir Peter Lumsden; but it was not altogether London in the sense Lord Beaconsfield supposed. The key of India was in that House—on the Treasury Bench—in the hands of those right hon. Gentlemen upon whose decision it would depend whether the key should be turned and the lock opened, or whether the door should be for ever bolted and barred. He should be glad if he might make one short concluding observation with regard to India itself, which was so closely and so inseparably, and he might say so anciently, connected with the events now under the consideration of Parliament. It was very bad form, indeed, for any man to go to a country, pass a certain time there, and then come forward and think he was empowered and entitled to prophecy or lay down the law in any way about the condition of affairs in that country. He had made a careful effort to avoid any imputation of that kind; but, at the same time, he might say that he did not think it possible for any human being of ordinary intelligence to go to India under the extraordinary advantages which it was his high good fortune, for some reason or other, he did not know what, to enjoy, and to be brought into contact with all the great personages of the land, Native and European, and to hear what they had to say, without arriving at some fairly accurate general conclusion, some fairly reliable estimate, as to the British position in India. Well, that being so, if he might put the case before these qualifications, he would say hastily and without any doubt, whether it was possible Confidence it was had not visited India, an-ance to recall the Majesty's Govern-Lord of the Treasury, in-than the weakest the moment we showed the faintest indications of relaxing our grasp. It was his good fortune to hear from an Indian official one of the finest descriptions of the Mutiny he had ever heard. He was told how the Government, which appeared so strong, so durable, so splendid, so elaborate, and so terrible, was in the space of 24 hours rolled and crumpled up like a scroll of paper, so completely did it disappear that no man might know that any Government had ever existed there before. [Cries of "No!"] That was the description given him by one of the highest officials in the North-West Provinces of the state of that part of India. ["Oh, oh!"] Would the right hon. Gentleman who derided him—

Mr. GLADSTONE: I said nothing.

Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was alluding to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Would he deride him when he told him that the gentleman to whom he referred was no less a person than Sir Alfred Lyall? As we were then so we were now. Our Government in India was still a most magnificent machine; but it lived on nothing but character and credit. In addition to that, there were many difficulties and dangers in the way of India. He did not know whether Her Majesty's Government was aware of it, but discontent of a most serious kind existed in the Indian Army owing to the pay, and, in a great measure, to the impossibility of Native soldiers rising to any rank above that of a subaltern officer. In the second place, many of the Indian Princes had great grievances against the Calcutta Government, some of them legitimate, and more or less well-founded. All had gone on for a long time neglected by the Government. Then there was an extraordinary political movement going on all through India, a movement which was copying with wonderful fidelity the most perfect forms of organization such as were dear to the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and which had for its object the acquisition by Natives of a much larger share in the Government. That was one of the ith that he co for anyone who

 at the

from one part to another, producing what we had never before had to deal with in India—a novel and formidable solidarity and unanimity in Native thought and action. In addition to that was the Native Indian Press, conducted every day with more ability, knowledge, and discretion, increasing in circulation, owing to the very system of education provided, but which would by no means conceal the knowledge of facts which the more obedient English Press would suppress. Those were among the dangers to which our rule was exposed in India. He believed that every one of them might be successfully met if we emerged from the present crisis with an increased sense of security and with credit undiminished; but he felt sure that all these difficulties and problems would assume gigantic proportions and become insoluble and unmanageable if the result of these negotiations with Russia terminated in humiliation for England and in diminished security in India. He knew perfectly well how very powerless one Member of Parliament was against a great Government; and he knew well how powerless, even from numerical weakness, was the action of a united Party. That being so, it was not his intention to make even an appeal, for he was too weak; but he would make a supplication, couched, if they wished it, in any terms, however humble, which their dignity demanded, because he felt earnestly upon it. He implored Her Majesty's Government in dealing with this crisis, if it were not too late, which he feared it was—this crisis which, he believed, if wisely and properly treated, might turn out one of those great opportunities which occurred rarely in the life of a nation—he implored them in dealing with this crisis to allow two thoughts chiefly to prevail. In the first place, to keep a vivid memory for the past perfidy of Russia and a clear and unclouded view of her present attitude and position; and, on the other hand, to think only of the interests of our Indian people and of the immeasurable duty which we owed to them. If these thoughts only were to animate their minds and guide their actions, he believed that even Her Majesty's Government at that hour, late though it was, might effectually protect and preserve the honour and dignity of the Empire.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in moving to reduce the Vote by the sum of £4,000,000, said, he could not help sympathizing with hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were led to think last Monday that the Premier was going to begin a policy of adventure, but who now found that peace was practically assured, and who thereupon assailed the right hon. Gentleman with a number of questions which, in reality, were a protest against peace. It seemed to him that the noble Lord was angry both with Conservative and Liberal Governments, because they had not made war with Russia whenever Russia made the slightest approach within thousands of miles of India. Certainly the noble Lord had not by his speech done anything to further good feeling between Russia and this country by speaking of Russia's treachery, fraud, and falsehood. For his own part, he rejoiced greatly that the war cloud had been dissipated, and he was never more satisfied than when he heard the observations which fell from the Prime Minister. At the same time he had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would conclude his statement with an intimation that the whole of this Vote would not be required. It was because the right hon. Gentleman had not done so that he proposed his Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech on Monday last, said that it was not in accordance with precedent that a Vote of this nature should be discussed, and he quoted three cases. The first was the China War; but we were actually engaged in war with China. The next case was that of 1870; but then there was no question of our going to war. The third case was that of 1878; and here he did not think the Prime Minister proved his point. In 1878 they were engaged in negotiations with Russia, and there was a certain tension in their relations. That was precisely the case now. If the Prime Minister was justified in opposing the Vote in 1878, they were equally justified in opposing the Vote on this occasion. He thought it would be far better to put this money to objects—such as the building of iron-clads and the strengthening of coaling stations—which would be of permanent advantage to the country. What, he asked, was at the bottom of this dispute? It was their old friend "the road to India." They had always been in a state of semi-craze with regard to the Russian advance on India. This led them into the Crimean War, and this it was that led Lord Beaconsfield to spend large sums of money in 1878, and this was at the bottom of their whole Egyptian policy. In India it was the same. It was often said that if you wanted to avoid war you must prepare for war. That was true as a general proposition; but it did not appear to be absolutely true in regard to negotiations. If the object to be sought was not of sufficient importance to justify a war being waged for it, then a Vote of Credit for military preparations was not necessary. He was not going into the present dispute. It was to be referred to arbitration. The noble Lord had used very strong language. He said it was a base and cowardly surrender on the part of this country. Why the reference of the matter to arbitration should be a base and cowardly surrender he could not see. He had all along considered the matter mere border fray. We had not sufficient facts to come to a proper conclusion, and he felt it would be monstrous to go to war in such a case. He did not care sixpence whether the arbitrator decided in favour of this country or of Russia, so long as the matter was fairly decided. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to be exceedingly indignant that the delimitation of the Frontier was to take place in London instead of on the spot; but what did it matter so long as the dispute was finally settled? It did not signify, so far as India was concerned, whether the debatable land belonged to Russia or Afghanistan. Nor did he think it mattered much whether Herat belonged to Russia or Afghanistan. The late Government proposed to give up Herat to Persia, and in the Guarantee to the Afghans to protect their territory Herat was specially excepted, as it did not belong to the Afghans. It ought to be distinctly understood that though we had given a pledge to Afghanistan that pledge was not reciprocal; and, as far as could be learnt, the Afghans were not prepared to allow our troops to occupy their country even in the event of war. The Ameer had accepted our pledges and our money; but he was quite unable to control his own subjects. As to the Afghans, they were utterly untrustworthy. Sir Lepel Griffin, who knew them well, said he had met only two Afghans in his life whom he could trust, and they probably deceived him. It would be far better for them to stand on their own Frontier. The military men of India were of opinion that a sounder and safer boundary they could not have than at the Bolan Pass; and he should like to ask what possible chance the Russians would have if they defended that Pass? He, therefore, hoped that the Government would take this opportunity of reviewing the whole position of the Afghan Frontier, and arriving at a clear and specific understanding as to what that Frontier was, and of withdrawing from those pledges to the Afghans which could give this country no possible strength. It was said that Herat was the key of India; but, in his opinion, it would be better if we were to place it out of our consideration altogether, and to do our best to preserve our own Frontier. The Ameer was not a very warm friend of ours. The Afghans themselves would oppose resistance either to us or to any other Power that attacked them. What they desired was that they should occupy an honourable position of independence between the two Powers of England and Russia. They did not wish to be in any way mixed up in our quarrels, and so long as neither of us interfered with them they would be perfectly satisfied with the friendship of both Powers. We had pursued an alternative policy of fighting them and giving them money without obtaining their friendship. He would be inclined to let the Afghans negotiate as much as they pleased with Russia and to take as much of their money as they could get, because he was certain that they would be no more friendly with Russia than they were with us. The noble Lord had talked a great deal about the loss we should sustain in the public estimation of India if we were to allow Russia to take possession of Herat.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked that he had said nothing of the kind.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he thought he had heard the noble Lord talk about the cession of Herat resounding through the bazaars of India. In his opinion, however, the Indian people looked to their own self-interest, and probably out of the 250,000,000 in India not 5,000 cared one straw whether we were in or out of Herat. Sir John Lawrence had expressed an opinion that our proper course was not to advance our troops beyond our present Indian Frontier, but to put our house in order by giving the people of India the best government in our power and by consolidating our resources. In discussing this matter we should not lose sight of what would be the interests of India. Sir Peter Lumsden had stated that if we were to occupy Herat it would cost India £3,500,000 a-year, which would alienate them from our rule, and do infinitely more harm to that rule than the Russians could possibly do in the vicinity of Herat. He thought the noble Lord and his Friends would find that the country was with the Prime Minister in his anxious desire for peace. Of course, in London drawing rooms and London music halls there might be shouts for war; but that was not the opinion of the operatives all over the country, who knew that the money for war, thrown in the first instance upon incomes or what they liked, came eventually out of their pockets. The operative classes would be as patriotic as any in the defence of their country; but they could not understand a war for a few acres of steppe, or because there was a party border raid between Afghans and Cossacks; nor could they understand how, after spending £20,000,000 to fight the Afghans, we should spend £100,000,000 more to fight for them. He was at a meeting in the East End the other day. He took the chair, and spoke in favour of the candidature of Mr. Howell, a labour candidate. It was a large meeting, and the room was filled by intelligent operatives, and when the speakers protested against the war every single man in the room was with them. The noble Lord would find that was the view which the operatives throughout the country would take of the question. In proposing to reduce the Vote he did not wish to reduce the £4,500,000 for service in the Soudan, because, as it was to be used mainly for the purpose of getting the troops out of that country, it could not be better employed; neither did he desire to oppose the £2,500,000 for naval preparations, as he thought it very possible that their Navy might require to be strengthened; but he should move to reduce it by the £4,000,000 which it was proposed to spend upon military objects for the purposes of a war with Russia. He did not know how many hon. Members would vote for his proposal; but at all events he intended to take the sense of the House upon the point. Believing as he did that the Afghan dispute was not worth a war, whether they came to an arrangement or not, he thought he was only logical in moving that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £4,000,000.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£11,000,000," in order to insert "£7,000,000," — (Mr. Labouchere,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That £11,000,000 stand part of the proposed Resolution."

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he thought the House could not fail to have been struck with the extraordinary contrast between the two speeches which had just been delivered. The speech of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was couched in tones of extraordinary levity, while the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), on the other hand, spoke with a sense of deep responsibility. No one could listen to the speeches of the noble Lord, since his return from India, without feeling how deeply he had been impressed with the responsibilities we were under to that country. The noble Lord had not urged that we ought to go to war with Russia or should occupy Herat; but he said that, in the present circumstances in which we found ourselves, we must not be satisfied solely by making emotional speeches. What we ought to do in this matter was to pursue a firm and consistent policy. The House had felt very deeply the absence of information with regard to this Afghan question. He regretted very much that the Government had not thought fit to give the House earlier information with regard to the course they were pursuing. He greatly doubted the wisdom of the course which the Government had adopted in withholding that information. It would have been far wiser in their own interests for the Government to have taken the country into their confidence. He did not mean that the Government ought to have informed the House day by day of every step in the negotiations they were carrying on with Russia; but, at all events, they should have confided to the House the general aim and object of their policy. The people of this country had known that the English Government had addressed to the Government of Russia a demand for the withdrawal of the Russian troops from the debatable territory, and they had heard with some astonishment that that demand had been allowed to lapse. They had seen the advance of the Russian troops from position to position, until they had occupied nearly every inch of the debatable ground; then they had seen a Commission, originally proposed by Russia and accepted by this country, sent out for the purpose of delimiting the Frontier between Russia and Afghanistan; they had seen that Commission allowed to spend five months in absolute idleness; and they had seen that, whereas our Government, in the first instance, insisted that this question must be settled on the Frontier itself, now, after all, practical questions arising out of the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier were about to be settled in London. He did not think that this country could afford to allow this Commission to kick its heels in Afghanistan any longer, and to go on awaiting the good pleasure of the Russian Government, or to be made simply the instrument for registering a foregone conclusion. The speech of the Prime Minister last week hardly touched at all on questions of permanent interest affecting the security of the Frontier of the North-West of India. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the main subject was the incident at Penjdeh. Still, although that was undoubtedly important, it was only an incident in the great question at issue between England and Russia. Referring to that incident, the right hon. Gentleman spoke, as it seemed to him at the time, in a tone worthy of the occasion. He was, therefore, surprised to find that a week afterwards the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House to announce that that matter was to be brushed on one side by being submitted to arbitration. They were told, forsooth, that one of the conditions attending upon arbitration was that gallant officers on either side were not to be put upon their trial. That was a concession to Sir Peter Lumsden—a man who in most difficult circumstances had endeavoured to do his duty, and who had the entire confidence of the country. But the right hon. Gentleman had made it exceedingly difficult for anybody to understand what it was that was to be referred to arbitration. He had not told them how the arbitration was to be enforced. Supposing that the friendly Power decided in our favour, the right hon. Gentleman had not told them how the award was to be enforced. Supposing that the friendly Power decided that the Russian Government had broken the agreement, fought the Afghans, killed several hundreds of them, invaded the debatable territory, and advanced on country which was Afghan territory, how was reparation going to be made? As far as the Prime Minister had put the facts before the House, they had an indefinite reference, and would have a practically useless award. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) told them that he did not care which way the arbitration went, and he did not think it mattered much. Arbitration was being used to get rid of the question altogether; but what would be the effect in India and in Central Asia when it became known how utterly useless had been the solemn demand made by us for reparation?

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say there was a demand for reparation.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he understood that a communication had been addressed to the Russian Government with respect to the Penjdeh incident, expressing to them our belief that an act of unprovoked aggression had taken place. Certainly the Prime Minister said that in the House of Commons, and he presumed that the right hon. Gentleman had also addressed that statement to the Russian Government. Such being the case, what would be the effect upon the people of India and upon the tribes on the Afghan Frontier when they found that that demand had been practically allowed to lapse? Because this arbitration meant nothing else but that. This reference to arbitration was simply a roundabout way of getting rid of an awkward incident and other matters which remained to be adjusted between the two Governments. If a settlement were made, what security had we of a permanent character against the recurrence of these things? If the result should be merely a patched-up truce that could not last more than a few months, it must be a preliminary to future troubles in an aggravated form. The time had come when they could no longer overlook the repeated breach of the assurances given by Russia against future advances — breaches which took place almost before the ink was dry. The truth was that the only peace which we desired to see, and which we ought now to obtain, was one possessing some elements of permanence; and such a peace could only be of a permanent character if it imposed, in a definite and distinct form before all the world, a limit to the advances of Russia. In order to attain that end he did not believe for a moment in an alternation of hot and cold fits on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He did not believe in a whining indignation against Russia one week and a complete surrender the next. The experience of the past justified not only a preparation at the present moment, but also a preparation for the future, whatever the result of this settlement might be. The constant apprehension of Russian advances was ruining the finances of India, and it would put them into a position absolutely intolerable. The only way to avert the difficulties now before us, and the only way to make a settlement of a question that was vital to India, was by adopting a firm and definite resolution, by taking upon ourselves a policy which was not for the moment, but which was destined to establish firmly the settlement of all the difficulties that now existed, and which no squeezing, no amount of diplomatic pressure, and no threats of military action could induce us to alter or destroy.

MR. ONSLOW said, he was somewhat surprised and alarmed at the statement of the Prime Minister. The question at issue was not so much one between England and Russia as between England, Afghanistan, and our subjects in India. He and others had during last Session brought the question before the House; but the Government treated it with neglect. When Sir Peter Lumsden's departure was announced to the House many Members urged that he should go on his Mission with definite views, and that it was useless to send him as Commissioner unless all the preliminaries had been arranged. The House was informed that the arrangements had been completed, and that Sir Peter Lumsden would within a reasonable time meet the Russian Envoy. They all knew how that expectation had been disappointed. The right hon. Gentleman ought to put himself in the position of the Ameer and the English Commissioner. When Russia occupied Merv the Prime Minister promised the House that if, owing to this circumstance, diplomatic action should arise the House should be informed. The Government ought seriously to have taken the question into consideration at that time, and to have come to a final arrangement with Russia. The Under Secretary for India last July expressed a hope that the Commission would begin its work in October. He thought at the time the expectation was too sanguine, and it would now seem that Russia was befooling us. Since that time they had had no information, and they had not been able to ascertain whether any written agreement existed between this country and Russia that the Russian Envoy should meet Sir Peter Lumsden. If not, Sir Peter Lumsden ought never to have been sent, and the Government ought to have seen that Russia never intended to carry out the arrangement. In 1881 the noble Lord who was then Secretary for India expressed himself thus—

"Russia knows now that the present Government holds Afghanistan to be outside the sphere of its influence."

The noble Lord also said that any interference on Russia's part with Afghanistan would mean a rupture of the friendly relations existing between England and Russia. The Government were now frittering away the words of the noble Lord, and it would seem that they were prepared to yield on all points. What would the people of India think of such a policy? What would the Ameer say? It was known that our Afghan ally had had a satisfactory interview with Lord Dufferin. He had left Lord Dufferin on the most amicable terms; but he ventured to say that if the Ameer had known that the Government had not intended to take most serious notice of the aggression on Penjdeh, he would not have left the Viceroy in the amicable spirit he had done. When the people of India became aware of the action of the Government, he believed an enormous amount of dissatisfaction would be created, and that, notwithstanding the great loyalty which had recently been displayed by the Rajahs and the people of India, that loyalty would now be severely tested. If we finched in the slightest degree from any of the promises made by Lord Dufferin to the Ameer of Afghanistan, if we showed to the people of India and to the people of Afghanistan that there was some hesitation about the action we should take in support of the Ameer, our credit would be vastly shaken in that country. The advance of Russia on India had latterly come upon us with appalling rapidity. It was said many years ago that it would be impossible for Russia to reach Merv in this generation, owing to the natural obstacles which lay in her way. Not only did Lord Lawrence think so, but many other equally distinguished men. Now, however, we must accept the advance of Russia upon Merv as an accomplished fact. She had, indeed, gone a great deal further than Merv, and it was no use saying that she was to stay her advance where she was at the present time. The question was where we should draw the line; and unless we put down our foot firmly and said that no further advance would be tolerated, this country would quickly lose the affection, not only of the people of India, but of the people of Afghanistan. It had been stated that Penjdeh and the territory where Russia had established herself was not Afghan territory; but he contended that all the maps and all the intelligence they possessed on the subject led them to the conclusion that Penjdeh had always been tributary to Herat, and that Herat had formed a portion of Afghanistan for many years past. Indeed, the people of Penjdeh had been in the habit of paying tribute to the Ruler of Herat; and all those concerned in the administration of our Indian Provinces did not doubt that Penjdeh and the adjacent territory belonged to the Ameer of Afghanistan. The Prime Minister in 1880 had told the people of this country wherever he went that there was no fear of the advance of Russia. He had told the people of Mid Lothian that so long as we had the supremacy at sea there was no fear of the attacks of Russia; but did the right hon. Gentleman believe that, even if we had now that supremacy at sea to which he then referred, Russia would not be able seriously to cripple our power in Afghanistan? His own opinion was that this unfortunate incident could have been avoided if the Government had exacted from Russia pledges in black and white, and had not been content with a simple verbal arrangement before Sir Peter Lumsden went to Afghanistan. If the Government had obtained from Russia a pledge that whatever boundary was fixed she would abide by it, that would have been the best means of solving this complicated question. The Prime Minister had made many statements regarding the foreign policy of this country, and none more remarkable than those which he enunciated during the Mid Lothian campaign. In the course of that tour he said that—

“The great duty of a Government, especially in foreign affairs, was to soothe and tranquillize the minds of the people.”

Did the right hon. Gentleman think that he had soothed and tranquillized the minds of the people by his policy in regard to this boundary question? Every morning the newspapers contained some startling incident, which was well calculated to upset all notions of tranquillity; and this state of things would continue to exist so long as the Prime Minister remained in power. Whatever might be the result of this affair there was one fact which would remain patent to everyone, and that was that the Government had created a permanent addition to the burden of the taxpayers of India. The whole of our military system in India would have to be re-organized. We should have to build fortresses and other appliances for the protection of the Indian Frontier; and the important public works which had been promoted by successive Viceroyas would be brought to a standstill because the national defences would have become the primary consideration. The policy of the Government, for the time, at all events, had interfered for years to come with the progress of those useful public works which the Government of India had been prosecuting. The Prime Minister had been a lover of Russia in bygone years, and he had been equally prominent in his hate of Turkey. He had described Turkey as “that fabric of iniquity;” but he contended that if we were to be successful in stemming the tide of Russian aggression in the East, it could only be done by having the Ottoman Power on our side. He hoped that this question might be settled without going to war; but he hoped that, however short-sighted and culpable had been the action of the Government, still we had not yet arrived at such a state of affairs which would justify the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, when he said that the present proceeding of the Government would be the ruin of our Empire in India; still, if we flinched one iota from any promises made by Lord Dufferin, and if we showed that there was some hesitation about the action we should take as to our ally the Ameer, then if India was not ruined, our credit would be vastly shaken in the country, our possession of it would be imperilled, and the prestige of this Empire would be lost.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 29: Majority 50.—(Div. List, No. 151.)

Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that, before speaking upon the question which was now uppermost in the minds of hon. Gentlemen, he should like to say a few words on that portion of the Vote which related to the Soudan. It was now just 13 months since General Graham's Force achieved two striking and sanguinary victories near Suakin. After those successes, the road to Berber was fully opened, and the fate of the Soudan rested entirely in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. It only required a little courage on their part, and, perhaps, a little extra expense for transport, to secure the safety of Khartoum, the rescue of General Gordon, and to prevent those scenes of massacre and agony which had prevailed ever since. The opportunity was, however, lost. There was a little Radical agitation, Ministers' hearts failed them, and General Graham was recalled in haste, the consequence being that the Soudan then became once more the scene of rebellion and anarchy. Now, the state of affairs at the present time was much the same as existed 18 months ago. Osman Digna's tribes had again been defeated, the road to Berber was once more open, and the Government exhibited the same dangerous inclination to abandon the country which had then such melancholy results. He did not propose that the cream of the British Army should be kept in the neighbourhood of Suakin and Berber; for he believed that the whole difficulty might be overcome by having the necessary duties performed by means of Indian troops. If, however, it were thought undesirable to send out more Indian troops, they might have recourse to General Gordon's own recommendation and send out Turkish soldiers under British officers. He really could not understand how Ministers could go back on their own statements as the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for War had done. Speaking at Bath, some few months ago, the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Sir Arthur Hayter) proclaimed that the Government were determined not to rest until our standard was placed on the ramparts of Khartoum, and until Gordon was either rescued or revenged. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, speaking only two months ago, said—

"A lesson must be taught, not only to the people of Africa, but to the whole world, that the policy of the British Empire is not to be reversed by the single act of a traitor in General Gordon's camp. . . . We owe something to the people of Egypt, for whose affairs we are responsible, and can it be supposed that so great an encouragement could be given to the forces of anarchy, which are opposed to civilization as it exists in Egypt, without inflicting a heavy blow upon all the prospects of the regeneration of that country? We owe something, not only to the people of Egypt, but also to other Powers who have interests in Egypt. We owe something to our Ally, France, which has interests in Egypt. We owe something to our Mahomedan subjects. We also owe something to our Indian Empire. What would the Mahomedans of that Empire think if they beheld the spectacle of British civilization retreating before a barbarous form of Mahomedan fanaticism? Then, we owe something to every one of our own Colonies which are brought into contact with savage races; and we owe something to every Colony in the world to which the name, the credit, and the honour of England are dear. . . . That would be. . . a new departure and a new step of a momentous and most disgraceful character."—(3 Hansard, [294] 1702-3.)

After that, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) failed to see how Ministers could again go back upon their declarations of a determination to establish a stable Government in the Soudan, and yet still retain Office. A new departure had been taken—a step of the most momentous and disgraceful character; for the Government were reversing the policy which they announced but a short time ago; and he was surprised that the noble Marquess could any longer retain his place among them. The policy of “scuttle” and of abandoning the Soudan to anarchy and slavery was, in the words of the noble Marquess, disgraceful to the lowest degree, most humiliating, and cruelly unjust to the people of Egypt, who were left in a state of anarchy, and liable to be severely dealt with by the Mahdi or his chief officer, Osman Digna. We owed something to the Soudan, something to Egypt, and something to the Mahomedan world; therefore we ought not to leave that country to the pandemonium we had inflicted upon it. Her Majesty’s Government had spent over £20,000,000 in Egypt and the Soudan, and they had made a needless sacrifice of something like 60,000 lives. They had thrown away every British interest, and sacrificed the rights of the people of Egypt by giving them up to a Multiple Control, and now they found themselves bound to submit to such a humiliation as no Great Power had endured for many years. He could have imagined what would have happened if France had treated this country in the life of Lord Palmerston as she had treated it now. And now he would make a few observations upon a subject which was attracting universal interest at this moment. It was evident, from the statement of the Government to-night, that they had grasped at what they considered a settlement of the Afghan Question, which was extremely discreditable and humiliating to this country, and which practically meant the surrender of all that they had been contending for during the last eight months; and he should be very much surprised if it did not lead to further compromises and concessions, without even in a minor degree contributing to the security of India, which it was the evident intention of Russia to wrench from our grasp. The statement of the Prime Minister showed that the Government had decided to put up with the affront offered to the Mission of Sir Peter Lumsden, whose work had been taken from him to be carried on by the feeble Cabinet in London, who did not even know the meaning of the arrangement into which they had entered. That Mission might as well never have gone to Central Asia, because its strongest recommendations had been despised. They had been kept waiting for six months for their Russian Colleagues, and now they were told that the decision was to be taken out of their hands. He should be very much surprised if events did not show that the position of Penjdeh, which had obtained unusual importance by reason of the dispute between the two countries, was abandoned to Russia. Was there ever an instance before of a Government being unable to inform the House of the meaning which they attached to the reference to which they had agreed? By their unwillingness to submit the action of the officers to trial, they were putting Sir Peter Lumsden on the same level as General Komaroff, whose action had been described by the Prime Minister as an unprovoked aggression. The Government had not actually considered the question whether the word “Sovereign” included the President of a Republic, as well as a Sovereign in the ordinary sense. He hoped the arrangement did not mean that the railway should not be completed to Candahar. There were three points which were essential for a due understanding of our position with regard to India and the Russian advance. The first was that the Russians had made up their minds and intended to have British India, if they could get it. That had been the aim of their policy for many years. There was no other object worthy of the immense efforts they had made in Central Asia. The corrupt and aggressive Russian bureaucracy looked upon India in much the same light as Blucher did upon London when riding through the streets, he exclaimed—“Mein Gott, what a city to sack.” The second point was that British India could only be safeguarded by British courage, arms, and skill, and by kindly and resolute statesmanship. British India was only to be protected by British pluck and British bayonets, and it would be the height of folly to trust its defence on the Afghan Army. Great reliance was placed upon the friendship of Afghanistan. Its friendship was, no doubt, better than its enmity; but the Government which placed its confidence in the friendship of Afghanistan would be guilty of an act of gross folly. At any moment the Ruler might be bribed into the support of the Russian Power. The third point was, that both in a military and political point of view, it was absolutely necessary—in fact, vital—to keep the Russian Forces out of Herat, and, as far as possible, from the Indian Frontier. Placed near the Indian Frontier, Russia would be a perpetual source of annoyance and danger to India. She would be able to intrigue in India, and however well we had governed that country, there were within it ambitions and dissatisfied feelings which would afford ample scope for Russian intrigue. If we allowed Russia to obtain a secure position on the range of hills which dominated the Indus, she would be able to attack us whenever we were hampered by war. He did not say that our line of defence ought to be at a great distance from India; but he did say that we ought to prevent the Russians from obtaining Herat. Herat would be a splendid base for accumulating Russian Forces for attacking India. The Government should therefore fortify Herat in the strongest possible manner, occupy it with British Forces, and make it a strong outpost of the Indian advance. Then came the great question of the possession of Candahar. There was no doubt that Candahar should be turned into a fortress of the first class. It might be impossible just now to place an English garrison there; but, at all events, the Government were bound to complete the railway with the least possible delay, and to make such an arrangement with the Ameer that, in a few days, a large number of troops could be conveyed to Candahar. They had been told that the abandonment of that place by Her Majesty's Government secured to us the friendship of the Afghans; but it was ridiculous to suppose so, for, to his mind, it was the real cause of the present depressing war-cloud, and he would not recommend any Government to place reliance upon the friendship of the Afghans in the matter of the defence of our Indian Empire.

Had Her Majesty's Government held Candahar, and completed the railway laid down by Lord Beaconsfield in the direction of that city, our position there would have been so superior that no Russian Force would have dared to approach the Frontier of Afghanistan. The abandonment of Candahar was now costing this country millions of pounds; and as years went on it would cost England and India millions and millions in ever-increasing proportion, unless we were prepared to abandon the most precious Dominions of the Crown. There was in this morning's papers a very suggestive and, to some extent, painful warning from India. They were told how the people of that country were looking with anxiety to the position of Her Majesty's Government, and how they regarded the question of Penjdeh as a very important one, from a military point of view, for the protection of Afghanistan. In view of what had happened, the future of Penjdeh, as bearing upon the defence of India, was regarded as critical. Russia, in that part of the country, had committed a breach of faith, had invaded Afghanistan, had broken her solemn engagement of March 17, and had attacked our allies, defeated them, slaughtered them, and chased them from their possessions. All this had been done with a motive so obvious that no one but the craven occupants of the Ministerial Bench could possibly be blind to it. Russia had taken up her present position by fraud and force; and now Her Majesty's Government had meanly accepted a miserable compromise, the meaning of which they did not know themselves, or, at all events, could not put into intelligible language. Now they saw that the Power which had been advancing thousands of miles, while this country had been stationary or retreating, had gained her point, and England had given way to Russia's military power. A Russian newspaper spoke of the attack on Penjdeh as a happy accident which would neutralize the importance of the conference between our Viceroy and the Ameer, and that view would be taken by the people of India. The facts worthy of our attention were that the Russians were in positions that dominated Herat, and which would be a splendid base for an attack on India, and that the Russians had invaded Afghanistan and defeated our allies. For the past 20 years England had made no practical advance in Asia. Within that period Russia had pushed onwards hundreds of miles towards our Indian Frontier across the Khanates of Central Asia, and from the Caspian Sea to Herat. We now stood at the very crisis of our fate. Within the next 12 months the future of our splendid and beneficent Empire in the East would have been decided. The decision rested now with the resolution of our statesmen and the courage of our people. It was for the English nation and their Leaders now to determine whether the 250,000,000 of their fellow-subjects in India, who now enjoyed peace, security, just laws, and good government under the British flag should continue to prosper and progress, or be handed over to the blighting tyranny and extortion of the tyrant of Poland, the devastator of the Caucasus, and the butcher of the Turkomans, to the Ruler of a country which might be described as the scourge of humanity. The British interests involved in the retention of India were enormous and vital. An annual trade to the amount of over £100,000,000 depended upon it. Our whole Eastern commerce was at stake. Employment for hundreds of thousands of energetic Englishmen rested upon our Indian Empire. The cataclysm, financial and political, which the loss of India would cause to this country was too appalling for contemplation. It would involve ruin to thousands of families; it would mean the reduction of our wage-fund by at least one-fourth. That was not a prospect which Englishmen could regard with equanimity. It would be worth undertaking almost any sacrifice and any effort to safeguard our precious Indian Empire. As he had said, there was only one way in which India could be protected, and that was by British bayonets in sufficient force, backed up and directed by vigilant and resolute statesmanship. Do not let the Government be led away by the desire to patch up an arrangement, in view of a General Election, to agree to such a surrender as had been indicated that evening.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the noble Lord who commenced the debate (Lord Randolph Churchill) in his speech protested against the Prime Minister having deprecated the Vote of Credit as being a somewhat doubtful and questionable occasion for entering upon the general policy of the Government. He (Mr. Trevelyan) was bound to say that the speech of the noble Lord, interesting though it was, did not disprove the dictum of the Prime Minister, and the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) confirmed that dictum. If those two speeches were directed to a practical issue, their object must be opposition to the Vote of Credit; and yet, if that was the noble Lord's object, why did he lay before the House, in such stirring terms, the extraordinary danger of trusting Russia and the extremely unprincipled character of Russian proceedings? for, if all that was true, was it the object of the noble Lord to say this was not the time for asking for an exceptional Vote to strengthen the naval and military preparations of the country? If the noble Lord seriously meant that Russia was a nation with which this country ought not to treat then he (Mr. Trevelyan) deliberately took issue, and said that was not the sort of language which ought to be used. There were such adjectives as "black" and such nouns as "falsehood;" and the noble Lord talked of Russia as the enemy of our country, and of a series of pledges readily given and deliberately broken. The noble Lord used words the only result of which must be to inflame the feelings of two nations which, in the interests of this country, in the interests of Europe, and in the interest of the civilized and uncivilized world, it would only be too well if they now could meet together on honourable terms. The noble Lord entered into an account of the shortcomings of Russia; but he would only follow him in respect of the Correspondence between Prince Gortschakoff and Lord Clarendon; and he said that Correspondence contained pledges which Russia had broken by its recent conduct. The essence of the Correspondence between Lord Clarendon and Prince Gortschakoff, to which the noble Lord alluded, consisted in the general description of a Frontier by the British Government. That Frontier was undoubtedly a Frontier which, in a general way, the English and Indian Government had had in their minds for a long time, and equally certain was it that it was a frontier which the Russian Government had in their minds in a general way. But it was also equally certain that the Russian Government had never had in their minds any accurate definition of the Frontier; and the advantage of the present situation, to be weighed against its many disadvantages, was that there was a golden opportunity of settling that question once for all, and the Frontier separating the two countries once defined would place England and Russia in such a position that neither country could, by a square yard, transgress those boundaries without committing a wrong against the other in the face of the world. If there was anyone who ought to subscribe to that doctrine of his it was the noble Lord, because the noble Lord told them he was not prepared to say that they were engaged in a worthy quarrel, if they were to fight over a few miles of barren desert, or over the question of which of two barbarian Chieftains (meaning by that the Czar of Russia or the Ameer of Afghanistan) was right in the course which his Generals had taken in an obscure affray. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), referring to the delimitation of Afghanistan, took exception to the fact of their undertaking to guarantee the whole of that country to Abdurrahman Khan. The hon. Member said that from that guarantee Herat should be specially excepted; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) maintained against the hon. Member's criticism that they were absolutely bound to guarantee Herat, just as they were bound to guarantee the rest of Afghanistan. At the moment when they entered into the guarantee, Afghanistan was, as a State, in great distress. There was a rival to the Ameer, and he was in possession of Herat; but none the less was Herat a portion of the old country, so to speak, of Afghanistan; and it was quite plain that the Ameer would have a very serious cause of complaint against them if, when his affairs were settled and he claimed the advantage of their guarantee of Afghanistan, they refused to include in it Herat. The hon. Member for Northampton spoke of the Afghans as being turbulent and unreliable; and that raised the real question of whether or not they were at that moment at issue merely as to some few miles of barren desert. He (Mr. Trevelyan) said they were at issue on a much larger question—namely, whether England and Russia in Asia were to be co-terminous, or whether they were to have another country between them. He could quite understand the argument that it might be better that the two countries should be co-terminous, putting aside the difficulties of arriving at that state of things; but if they were not to be so, and were to have another country between them, what sort of a country would they like to have? Would they like to have an unwarlike country with fertile plains—a country the diplomatically intriguing Natives of which were always anxious to be dragged in the wake of some larger Power; or would they rather have a country the Natives of which, as the hon. Member said, were turbulent and unreliable, but to be relied upon only in this—that they always hated and attacked the invader for the time being? The latter was the peculiar character of the Afghans, and that was the reason why, if they were to act, as the phrase was, as a buffer between two such Powers as England and Russia, as in the old days the high-spirited Swiss acted as a buffer between the House of Austria and the House of France—that was the reason why, in order to preserve the status quo, it was desirable to make such diplomatic efforts as the Government were making, and why the House should be asked to back up those efforts by rapidly passing the Vote of Credit in the confidence which he believed the House felt that it would be rightly used. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock went into an interesting account of the advances of Russia in Central Asia; and in listening to that account he (Mr. Trevelyan) was rather anxious to know what deduction the noble Lord would draw from it. If he drew from it the deduction that the Liberal Government before the present one, that the Conservative Government which intervened, or that the Liberal Government now in power ought to have gone to war with Russia in Central Asia, or for Central Asia, he entirely differed from him. It was after the Russian advances which the noble Lord had described that Lord Salisbury made use of the memorable expression as to reading history with the help of large maps; and it was after the most important of those advances that Lord Beaconsfield, during the existence of his Ministry, said that he was not of that school which viewed the advances of Russia in Central Asia as some people did; that Asia was large enough for the working out of the destinies both of England and of Russia; that, so far from looking with alarm upon it, he did not see why Russia should not conquer Tartary as England had conquered India, and that he only wished that the people of Tartary would gain as much advantage from being conquered by Russia as the people of India had gained from being conquered by this country. That was spoken long after the advance upon Khokhand. Those words of Lord Beaconsfield were, he believed, words of high wisdom; and if the English Government had listened to the well-meant but frightfully dangerous advice that was offered to it, the calamities in which they would have been involved would, he believed, have been far greater than any that had ever befallen the nation. The noble Lord had spoken of his visit to India and of his interest in that country. He (Mr. Trevelyan) himself boasted the same interest in India as the noble Lord felt. He hardly ever, indeed, had India out of his mind; and if they lost India he did not know that he should much care to be an Englishman. But if there was one prospect more than another that filled him with dread and horror, it would be that they should advance a British and Native Army from the Frontier of India into Turkestan, 1,200 miles; to advance it from those circumstances in which it could fight with military advantage into a country into which Russia could bring many more troops than we could do; because then, if disasters happened, a temptation might be offered to everything that was hostile to our power in India that could not be resisted, and, instead of defending India, we should run the greatest risk of losing it. The noble Lord did not approve of the manner in which the Government endeavoured to check Russia and to protect India, and the noble Lord himself mentioned three means of doing that. The first means that he named was alliances. Well, they had got the only ally who was of value on the spot. They had the alliance of Afghanistan, and he could not see that it became an hon. Member sitting on the Benches opposite to charge them with having neglected the alliance of Afghanistan, because, although he (Mr. Trevelyan) did not wish to make that a Party debate, he must remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that the principal objection entertained, rightly or wrongly, by their opponents to their policy in Afghanistan was that it alienated the Afghans as allies. The hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) talked of the fatal abandonment of Candahar; but where, he should like to know, would they be at this moment if they had not left Candahar? They would have had an immense line of communication to keep open, and they would have had on the flank of that line, constantly making irruptions against it, the most formidable guerilla enemy that they could find, he supposed, in Asia. For what was the character of guerilla forces? They might not be very formidable in pitched battles; but they were men who, after months and years of fighting, still continued carrying on warfare when their foes were tired. With regard to the Colonies, the noble Lord had said that we should conciliate them; but if he (Mr. Trevelyan) were to admit that they were guilty of all the shortcomings with which hon. Members opposite charged them, he would only exaggerate the loyalty of those Colonies who had declared that not only upon their own shores, but wherever the flag of England waved and the interests of this country were concerned, they would stand by us to the last man. The third method which the noble Lord had mentioned for defeating Russian aggression had been that we should also conciliate India. Although he had been very glad to hear those sentiments expressed by the noble Lord, he thought the picture he had given of the feeling in India was ill-timed and entirely overdrawn. He did not believe that the Indian Army or the Indian Princes were specially discontented now. On the contrary, he believed that during the last four years more had been done to conciliate Native feeling in India than had, perhaps, been done in any eight, or 10, or 12 years preceding; and if hon. Members would read the recent accounts of the loyalty of Native feeling, they would have to allow that it must be a most singular policy which, whilst unsound in itself, had produced such satisfactory results. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Eye to speak as he had done; they knew pretty well what he meant, and they knew pretty well what the noble Lord meant; but what he wanted to know was this—what did hon. and right hon. Members opposite mean to do on this occasion? He had listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), and he had been much struck by one sentence in which the hon. Member had said that the first time the British Government had shown symptoms of resolution the Russian Government had shown symptoms of concession. That he interpreted to mean that as soon as the Russian Government had seen on Monday last that this country was united, and that no Party spirit entered into their feelings on this question, that they were one nation and one Parliament, that then they had known that the time had come to make up their minds, and that there was a more satisfactory temper existing among them than some people in this country had feared. At that critical moment were hon. Gentlemen opposite now going to undo that good work? The hon. Member had said that the people of Central Asia did not understand this delay on the part of the Government. He (Mr. Trevelyan) thought that the people of Central Asia and of Central Europe too, and of all the capitals of Europe, would not understand the delay in carrying the later stages of this Vote, on which there had been so great an unanimity at an earlier stage. The hon. Member had spoken of putting gallant officers on their trial. He could not think that the hon. Member referred to Sir Peter Lumsden. Sir Peter Lumsden had not been in command of the Afghan Forces. What the hon. Member meant was, that the matter was between the two Governments, and not that it was between the servant of one Government and the servant of the other. In using those words, the hon. Member had not the slightest intention of conveying any reflection upon those officers who were at this moment with the Delimitation Commission. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad that the hon. Member accepted that interpretation. What was the meaning of arbitration? It meant that people arbitrated instead of going to war; that arbitration stood in place of that which was litigation between nations. As to the question who was to enforce the result of this arbitration, he took it that when two nations agreed to refer a question to arbitration, it meant that they were prepared to put that in the place of a more barbarous and fierce mode of settling the difficulty. He thought that he had gone through all the practical arguments which had been brought before them that night, and he would conclude by referring to the closing words of the noble Lord and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire. The noble Lord had said that they were to keep two things in memory; one was the previous actions and the probable policy of Russia, and the other was the welfare of India. The Government undoubtedly felt at this critical moment that in what was going on now they had to take into consideration the fact of Russia being a formidable and advancing Power in Asia; and most assuredly in what they were doing now they should be acting not only in the interests of this country, but perhaps even more—trying to do their best for India. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had wound up by saying that the only way by which they could protect the interests of this great country and of India was by adopting a firm resolution and taking up a definite policy. They had been told that they had adopted a different policy in 1878. He should not make any unbecoming allusion to the policy of this country in 1878; but it must be remembered that in 1878, to a very great extent, they on that side differed from the objects of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and they had explained in their speeches at the time how they differed. But he was certain that right hon. Gentlemen opposite did not differ from the present Government in their object, which was this. There was a very grave crisis on the Indian Frontier. Two armies were close to each other. The peace of the Frontier was very seriously threatened, and if the peace of the Frontier were broken the peace of very much more than the Afghan Frontier would be in very great danger. The object of the Government was to bring that state of things to an end at the moment, and to establish there a certain defined line which neither could pass without knowing that in passing it they were doing wrong, not only in the face of his immediate neighbour, but in the eyes of the whole world. That Frontier had not yet been defined and laid down in such a manner that it could not be mistaken; but under Providence he trusted and believed that if this nation were firm and cool and conciliatory—but not more conciliatory than it was firm—that result would be produced, and would be of the greatest benefit to India. He trusted and believed that the result of such a settlement would be in every way satisfactory.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Trevelyan) had congratulated himself on having replied to all the arguments advanced from the other side of the House, either by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), or by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) did not think that those who had been in the House during those speeches would join the right hon. Gentleman in his congratulations. The right hon. Gentleman had dilated upon the weakness of the noble Lord's military strategy; whereas the noble Lord had not said a word with respect to military matters. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he would not follow the noble Lord through his account of the Russian advances for the last 25 years, with one exception—namely, the arrangement between Prince Gortschakoff and Lord Granville in 1873—and the right hon. Gentleman had actually asked the House to believe that the arrangement then come to as to the borders of Afghanistan was not a definite one; but if the right hon. Gentleman took the trouble to refer to Lord Granville's letter, he would see that Lord Granville had in the most elaborate manner fixed the Frontier. The right hon. Gentleman had dilated upon the merits of Afghanistan as a most important buffer between England and Russia, and had compared its position to that which Switzerland once occupied between France and Austria. But he appeared to forget that Switzerland was an independent State in which neither France nor Austria had any rights of interference, or any share in the direction of its foreign policy. But was that the position which the right hon. Gentleman wanted Afghanistan to occupy between England and Russia? Did he desire that England should have no more rights in directing the foreign policy of Afghanistan than Russia? If that were his desire, he could only say two things—firstly, that he had abandoned absolutely the position taken up by every other Government on this question, whether Liberal or Conservative; and, secondly, that such an Afghanistan, so far from being a buffer between England and Russia, would be a standing menace to our Indian Provinces. The right hon. Gentleman had informed them that a war with Russia in Asia could scarcely be successfully conducted, so that it appeared that they were to understand that his Government were coming down to the House and asking them to entrust them with £11,000,000, telling them at the same time that, if those £11,000,000 were to be used for war, that war must end in disaster. Of that sum they were now asked to vote together about £6,500,000 for war preparations and £4,500,000 for the Soudan. Those £4,500,000 were absolutely wasted; not a single result of any sort or kind or description would remain from that part of the expenditure, except the butchery of a certain number of Arabs and the loss of a certain number of English lives. However ready they might be to grant the money for war preparations without objections, it was impossible to allow Supplies for the Soudan to be taken without severe criticism. He should, therefore, have thought that it would have been to the interest of Her Majesty's Government to do what the Conservative Party asked them to do, and divide the Vote into two, for they must be aware that if they lumped together Supplies demanded for such very different objects they would inevitably force upon the world the conviction that in the policy which this money was to further the Government were not supported by a unanimous Parliament. He trusted that these negotiations and this expenditure would end in a settled and durable peace—a peace settled on such terms that it would not be in the power of any unscrupulous Russian Government, if unscrupulous Russian Governments existed, or any undisciplined and disobedient Russian Commanders, if such existed, to disturb, when it suited them, the tranquillity of India and of Europe, and compel whatever Government might be in power to come down to the House of Commons and ask this country suddenly to impose great sacrifices upon itself. That was the kind of peace which they asked to be established; and he wanted to know whether the peace, the outlines of which had been sketched out to them by the Government, was or was not likely to be a peace of that kind? He had no desire to say hard words about Russia. It might be all his noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) had said it was, or, on the other hand, it might be all the Prime Minister had said it was in 1876. Whether Russia were honest or dishonest, the fact came out clearly and obviously that, whatever the motive or the cause might be, there was no more certain sign of an approaching Russian advance than a formal announcement by the Russian Government that no advance was intended. There was a curious correspondence between the policy of England and the policy of Russia; they appeared exactly to fit in with one another; because, whereas the plan of the Russian Government was always to make a declaration which they proceeded to break, the plan of the English Government was to make a demand which they proceeded to withdraw. The permanent peace which those on his side of the House desired must be made more difficult by anything in the nature of a surrender. Whether the battle-ground that now presented itself was a good one or not, it was the one deliberately chosen by the Government, and it was to that battle-ground the Indians would look; and if the Government now made any settlement which resulted in any district which they claimed as belonging to Afghanistan being given up to Russia, they would undoubtedly suffer in the eyes of all India, of all Afghanistan, and of all Europe for the loss of prestige which followed a great diplomatic defeat. He feared that, in the announcement made with respect to Russia and Afghanistan, the Government had added, or were about to add, one more to the many dishonourable retreats which they had forced upon the country during the past few years. Cheap dishonour might be tolerable; but he could not believe that the country would find tolerable a dishonour which cost £11,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down reproached the Opposition for their action that night; because, he said, it destroyed that appearance of unanimity which the action of the preceding Monday had produced. In defending the honour of the country he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) believed they would be one House and one nation; and if that night were a contrast to the last occasion on which the Vote was discussed, it was because, on the last occasion, they thought the Government had, for once, adopted a dignified and decided policy, and were about, for once, to shake themselves free from their old habits and inveterate traditions. If that night they were bound to divide the House it was because the results of the cross-examination to which Ministers were subjected at Question time was such as to convince them that in those expectations they had been deceived, and that they could no longer entrust to the occupants of the Treasury Bench the honour of this country or the safety of the Indian Empire.

MR. GLADSTONE: The evening is now fast advancing, and I think it may be for the convenience of the House that we should know what is to be the end and what is to be the upshot of this debate here. No declaration has been made of opposition to the Vote that is before us; at the same time, nothing has been said which would justify me in concluding that there should be no such opposition. The debate has been one of a somewhat unusual character, not sought by us—I may say not expected by us. The time for debating a subject of this kind, the time for bringing to trial the conduct of the Government—if so much as a show of impartiality is to be preserved—is when the information bearing upon the case is before the House. But Gentlemen like my hon. Friend who has just sat down (Mr. A. J. Balfour) feel no difficulties whatever from the absence of information. Their course is so easy in alleging that upon every occasion the Government has been wrong, and that upon this occasion it is wrong again, that, of course, to persons whose mental proclivities are thus directed, and who can arrive at their conclusions and give their verdict without the evidence, there is an immense satisfaction in getting rid of all the difficulties which the examination of the evidence involves in being free from all the responsibilities under which Ministers lie, and in having one planned formula, described by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, of universal condemnation of what has been done by the Government. The hon. Gentleman differs entirely from the estimate which I certainly had formed of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). For my own part, I am perfectly satisfied with the manner in which my right hon. Friend answered the arguments of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). The angry attempt which the hon. Member who has just sat down has made to impeach the sufficiency of that speech of my right hon. Friend has totally failed, because the only point he made was to ascribe to my right hon. Friend an argument which he had never used. The hon. Member said that my right hon. Friend's contention was this—that whatever diplomatic agreements were forced upon us by Russia we must accept; and why? Because he said my right hon. Friend had stated that to march an English Army 500 or 600 miles beyond the Indian Frontier would be disastrous. My right hon. Friend nowhere said that the British means of action were confined to a mode of proceeding so extreme, and he did not give the smallest colour to the argument imputed to him by the hon. Member. Why does the hon. Member say that the Government have abandoned the grounds upon which they were proceeding on Monday last, when he says, by a wonderful exercise of charity, he did stretch his understanding to the belief that for once we might have been right? It is not for me to enter upon that question, because I should be doing wrong if I attempted to make a mere verbal explanation pass current in this House as a sufficient ground for our action. For the present I will only say that there is not the smallest evidence, either in the possession of the hon. Gentleman or of the House, of our having altered our minds in one single particular since the Government, in my unworthy person, addressed the House on Monday last, when the hon. Gentleman says he believed that for once we might have been right. I hope we are still in a position to deserve the approval of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman says that what he wants is to have a final and permanent peace, and he is not prepared to be content with us unless we give him a final and permanent peace. Those are rather hard terms. I never heard, in politics, any mode by which, when a diplomatic difference arises, it is possible absolutely to guarantee permanent peace, except when one of the Parties is strong enough not only to subdue, but to annihilate the other. What he may fairly expect from the Government, and what I think the Government have laboured for, and not without effect, is that we should adopt the best means which, humanly speaking, are in the power of statesmen to adopt towards the establishment of a final and permanent peace. What are we doing? We are endeavouring to obtain, and I trust we shall obtain—although I do not think that the speeches of the hon. Gentleman opposite and of those who sit near him will help us much to obtain—I trust we shall, notwithstanding those speeches, obtain the delimitation of an understood and definite Frontier. The hon. Gentleman says that there is a Frontier already. There is no Frontier definite in this sense—in the only sense worth having—namely, that it has been traced out upon the ground, so that consequently you are in a condition to say—“By passing beyond that Frontier you have broken the covenant.” It is perfectly true that in a despatch of my noble Friend (Earl Granville), dated some considerable time back, certain Provinces are mentioned, which Provinces are assigned territorially to a particular jurisdiction. But those Provinces in Central Asia, what are they? Why, Sir, the Central part of Asia, not more than one generation ago, was totally unknown to the mass of mankind, and even to geographers; and even now, when we speak of Provinces in Central Asia, we do not speak of them as we would of any country in Europe, or even Provinces in India. You must have absolute delimitation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is in the despatch of Lord Granville absolute delimitation.

MR. GLADSTONE: I entirely join issue with the hon. Gentleman. Where are the terms?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: If the right hon. Gentleman will permit me I will read them. I can only do it by the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman. There is the absolute delimitation of the Frontier of Afghanistan which I did not like to trouble the House with this afternoon. There are four paragraphs in the despatch of Earl Granville to Lord Augustus Loftus.

MR. GLADSTONE: What is the date?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The date is October 17th, 1872. That despatch states—

“For your Excellency's more complete information I state the territories and boundaries which Her Majesty's Government consider as fully belonging to the Ameer of Cabul, viz.:—(1.) Badakshan, with its independent district Wakhan, from the Sarikal (Woods Lake) on the east to the junction of the Kokcha river with the Oxus (or Penjdeh), forming the northern boundary of this Afghan province throughout its entire extent. (2.) Afghan Turkestan, comprising the districts of Kunduz, Khulm, and Balkh, the northern boundary of which would be the line of the Oxus from the junction of the Kokcha river to the post of the Khojah Saleh, inclusive, on the high road from Bokhara to Balkh. Nothing to be claimed by the Afghan Ameer on the left bank of the Oxus below Khojah Saleh. (3.) The internal districts of Aksha, Seripool, Maimenat, Shipperjan, and Andkoi, the latter of which would be the extreme Afghan frontier possession to the northwest, the desert beyond belonging to independent tribes of Turcomans. (4.) The western Afghan frontier between the dependencies of Herat and those of the Persian province of Khorassan is well known, and need not here be defined.”

MR. GLADSTONE: I am obliged to the noble Lord for saving me the trouble of inflicting upon the House the four paragraphs he had just read. It is those four paragraphs that I mean. I put out of view the first and the second paragraphs. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh!] Does the hon. Gentleman who has interrupted me know anything of the subject? The first and second paragraphs have reference to parts of the country which are not now in question. That, I suppose, is a reason for putting them out of view. What does the fourth paragraph say? That the Western Afghan Frontier is to be between the Dependencies of Herat and those of the Persian Province of Khorassan. Where is the delimitation of the Dependencies of Herat, and who knows what are the Dependencies of the Province of Khorassan? What is the authoritative document to which reference can be made, when you are about to call another Power to account, and perhaps to subject it to war, for not having fulfilled its obligation? Then, the third paragraph which the noble Lord read has reference to the internal districts of Aksha, Seripool, Maimenat, Shipperjan, and Andkoi, whereas my argument had been that the districts were mentioned in the engagements, but that the mention of those districts was perfectly insufficient, because of those districts no legal, no historical, no conventional definition exists. Therefore, I go back to my point, and I say that there is now no Frontier of a definite character with regard to which one Power can bring another Power to account, and, bringing it to account, can require and exact of it the performance of a binding engagement. I think that it is a part of the wisdom of the statesman to endeavour to substitute a definite and carefully-traced Frontier for those vague and practically unintelligible statements, which are referable to no historical and no legal standard.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: It is Lord Granville's own despatch.

MR. GLADSTONE: Certainly; and what was Lord Granville engaged in? He was engaged in a preliminary process in connection with a most useful and important policy—namely, to obtain from Russia, where formerly there was no acknowledgment whatever, those general acknowledgments which, in the absence of anything more definite, would, at least, afford a general indication of the views of that Power. It appears to me that that is an ample justification of Lord Granville's despatch, and at the same time a perfect proof that it had nothing whatever to do with the question now before us, and does not, in the slightest degree, disprove the necessity of what we are now about. What is the doctrine of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who has come down here to instruct us in so high a tone and from so lofty a position? The hon. Gentleman says there was a Frontier already established from Sarakhs to Khojah Saleh, and that we ought to have adhered to it, and to have compelled the Russians to adhere to it, and that if the Russians had refused to adhere to that Frontier, we ought to have held ourselves justified in resorting to measures of force. That is the doctrine of the hon. Member for Hertford.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. GLADSTONE: I distinctly heard the hon. Member say that there was a Frontier to which we ought to have adhered exactly. If I have not stated accurately the Frontier which he meant, let the hon. Member correct my statement.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The Boundary Commission.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was not referring to the hon. Member. We are not always bound to speak to the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett). There are a great many occasions—perhaps, even to satiety—when we are; but at some times I may, I hope, claim the right of referring to another speaker. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford distinctly referred to another Frontier, and charged it upon us that we were abandoning territory which was secured to Afghanistan, if we had that Frontier. It was the foundation of his whole indictment against the Government. It was this abandonment of territory already secured to us which he said would be fatal to us in our predominance in India, and to our character and reputation generally—if, indeed, we had any left, for, in the view of the hon. Gentleman, what remains of our character and reputation is hardly worth considering. Now, Sir, I want to know whether the hon. Gentleman is really serious? He has got this Frontier of his own, and he says—“You are not justified in agreeing, on any terms, to any Frontier short of that.” I believe I am representing the hon. Gentleman accurately.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What I said was that we should entirely lose prestige in India by giving up land which we foolishly or not foolishly—I did not say which—had undoubtedly claimed for Afghanistan.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then what does the hon. Member recommend? Does he recommend us to give it up, or does he not? His speech was perfectly distinct, and it was to the effect that we should not give it up.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should not give it up by arbitration.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then let the hon. Gentleman, if he likes, make a Motion, impugning our proposal referring to arbitration what the Russian Government have agreed to refer to arbitration, and we will meet him on that ground. He has been encouraging us strongly in his speech to adhere to his supposititious Frontier. Well, Sir, it is useless to ask whether that Frontier was wisely claimed or not. What the hon. Member insisted upon is that the effect of not adhering to it will be ruinous.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Very serious.

MR. GLADSTONE: Only very serious? We were to lose our character in India—and I go a great way with him in thinking that the maintenance of our repute in India is a great strength, though I think that justice and equity are the instruments by which we should maintain it; but what I want to point out is this—the unwisdom, if I may venture to say so, of my hon. Friend in determining to settle all this question, spurred on by his animosity against the Government, in the absence of the Papers which will give him information. Observe what he has recommended. He recommends that we should adhere to this advanced Frontier in all circumstances. Suppose he were to find that the Ameer of Afghanistan himself was not in favour of adhering to it. Then I understand my hon. Friend to hold that it is the duty of this country, if need be by force—by policy in the first instance, but if need be by force—to claim for Afghanistan that which, on the supposition I have made—I am arguing entirely upon an hypothesis—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!]
—I am proposing to bring the hypothesis to a test of facts when the Papers are produced, whereas my hon. Friend's contention is that you ought to decide the matter without knowing anything about the facts. His contention is that we are bound to claim for Afghanistan a territory even though the Ameer might not claim it, even though he might, by the hypothesis, desire to be rid of it. Can the hon. Member be serious in thinking that upon a basis such as that the people of this country would condemn the Government? Sir, I am afraid that I shall not carry the assent of my hon. Friend to another proposition I am about to make. I have said that it appeared to me that we were bound to labour for a stable and permanent peace by the establishment, as one means of peace, of a definite and solemn covenant as to a Frontier capable of being traced and defined, which does not now exist. I do not appear to have the assent of my hon. Friend to that. There is another argument we ought to bear in mind, and to which I am afraid I shall not have his assent either; and it is that we can only secure a definite and solid peace by the establishment of good relations with Afghanistan, by respecting their independence, and the independence of the country, by consulting their feelings, and by observing towards them the strictest relations of honour. This is the purpose which we have borne in mind, and shall bear in mind, and which we think, in all the difficulties of the case, to be a capital instrument towards procuring a definite and sound peace. With regard to the previous speeches of this evening, I am quite content to fall back upon the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and, therefore, I shall not refer to some points which I confess appear to me to be extremely difficult points in the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). What I wish to do at the present moment is this—to point out to the House that, in our judgment, if they will allow me to say so, it would be a wise course if they will be disposed to go forward and sanction to-night the Vote for which we asked on Monday last. [Cries of "No!"] I respectfully claim it as my right and my duty to point out why it appears to me that that course ought to be taken. I may observe that until this Vote is reported we have not obtained the authority of the House of Commons to spend the money which it embraces. The Vote of the Committee is only a preliminary proceeding. I cannot say how much I was gratified by the unanimity and rapidity with which it was granted. I did not entirely expect what has happened this evening; but, at any rate, in addressing the majority of the House I must observe that in order to make the proceeding regular, and to enable us to spend this large sum of money, it is absolutely necessary that the House should give its sanction to the Vote of Credit which has been passed. We have no title, so far as my recollection goes—and I do not expect to be contradicted—to spend any part of the Vote of Credit until it has been reported to the House. This is the Vote which we were to have disposed of on Thursday night, had not circumstances, entirely accidental, prevented us from reaching this discussion on that evening. With respect to the policy of the Government, I cannot imagine the House to be so weak as to suppose that I should gain any advantage by attempting to flinch from a discussion of that policy; but I do put it confidently to the House, whatever the Vote may be, that though strong opinions may be pronounced and strong feeling manifested, no real progress can be made until the course of these negotiations is before them, together with their results. But I will venture to say this—as such severe condemnation has been so unhesitatingly pronounced—that I entertain the most undoubted assurance that when our case is before the country, and when the authentic Papers are produced, the opinion of the country will be that we have faithfully discharged our duties as Ministers of the Crown, bound to study the honour and interests of the nation. That is my anticipation. I am speaking only for myself. With regard to some of the sentences of reprobation which have been pronounced upon us this evening, the state of the case with regard to the Vote is, I admit, in some respects, peculiar. It has no effect until it is reported, and until we obtain the sanction of the House to spend a portion—I am afraid a large portion—of the money expressed in it. We asked for this Vote at a time when the circumstances of the case were in a certain degree, menacing in themselves. We stated that there was a case for preparation. That was the basis upon which our application for the Vote was founded. These preparations were proceedings on both sides. That is a matter of notoriety. I am not aware that, so far as Russia is concerned, any change has taken place, nor should I think that we were in the slightest degree entitled to expect that a change should have taken place at this moment. The fact is, that you cannot depend upon the first favourable turns in a negotiation which has many stages, and in regard to which it would be presumptuous to argue that because it is not now in a dangerous state it can never be in a dangerous state again. As men of sense, at the first turning of a favourable character opening out the first piercing rays of light into the gloom, you will not introduce fundamental alterations into your preparations. But perhaps it will be said—"What is the position of the House?" The noble Lord has said that a Vote of this kind is, in the highest sense, a Vote of Confidence. In part I agree with him, and in part I differ from him. It appears to me that in a great many cases there may be vital differences in the politics of the Government; there may be a Government to which you would entirely decline to give your confidence on general grounds, yet, in another respect, you would not hesitate to give them a Vote when it was demanded on grounds connected with the safety and honour of the country. Therefore, I would say to the noble Lord that he is not called upon, in being asked to give this Vote, to express his confidence in the Government. It is impossible to conceive a case of the Government of this country being prepared to acquiesce in the task of putting aside that Vote, and prepared, at the same time, to carry on the government of the country. Do not let it be supposed for a moment that I hold the absurd opinion that because the House has voted this sum in Committee, and I hope will proceed to ratify it by sanctioning it in the House, that I hold the House to have thereby given an unconditional right to the Government to spend the money. Very far from it; it is a conditional Vote. It is a Vote upon the supposition that it shall be found necessary for the discharge of engagements; but as regards everything prospective, it is meant to be a Vote conditional on the necessities of the case. Whatever Vote we may obtain from the House of Commons, we remain bound to render a strict account to the House of Commons when the House chooses to exact it; and whatever we spend prospectively under this Vote, so far, I mean, as the special preparations are concerned, we shall be bound to show cause for it, or be liable to censure if we fail to show cause. It is part of that high stewardship which belongs to an Executive Government, and which sometimes may be reposed in feeble or unworthy hands, but which, at the same time, you cannot separate from the function and the work and the very existence of an Executive Government. Unless you can get rid of it, and are prepared to put another Government in its place, there is no course so foolish as to cripple and discredit it in the case of a Vote of this kind; because, in doing so, you cripple and discredit the country. Observe, I carefully separate the case where you object to the Vote on principle. If you object to the Vote on principle, you are not only warranted in opposing it, but you are bound to oppose it to the length of displacing the Government, and undertaking the responsibility of governing the country. Of course, should events continue to run a favourable course, it would be our duty to study what we can do to save the resources which the House has so generously, in Committee, proposed to place at our disposal. We cannot think that the moment for resolving on a momentous change of that kind has already arrived, nor can that moment be judged of, in the first instance, by the House of Commons. That judgment must of necessity, from the nature of the case, be allowed to devolve on the Executive Government. I trust, Sir, that we shall receive the Vote sensible of the gravity of that charge. I am bound to say that, in my judgment, any appearance of hesitation on the part of this House to sanction the Vote of the Committee would be a very serious public evil. I do not undertake to say how far that evil might reach. I wish to speak in the language of moderation, and I say in that language it would be a very serious public evil. I do not object, in the slightest degree, to those sweeping condemnations of the Government which we have heard to-night. I regard them as a matter of course. Perhaps I am too much disposed to regard them as commonplace, and almost as truisms. I confess that is the aspect in which they sometimes come before me; but, however well reasoned they may be on this or on any other occasion, I shall not seek to evade them. I am speaking simply of the action of the House in the circumstances of the moment, when, happily, there has been a turn towards a favourable issue in the grave negotiations now going on between the two countries. I entreat the House not to derogate from the effect of what the Committee has already wisely and patriotically done. It will lose nothing by persevering in that course; and I must say I think even opponents would admit that if, with transactions of such difficulty and anxiety on hand, we cannot be trusted with this authority under the responsibility of the future judgment of Parliament, the sooner the House takes another step and releases us from all responsibility the better. I have not the smallest objection to the raising of that question. It is a question that has been raised pretty freely of late, about as often in the present Parliament as in all the Parliaments, 11 in number, antecedent to it in which I have had the honour of sitting. I do not object to lengthening the goodly catalogue of those indictments. By all means let it be done; but let it be done with knowledge; let it be done in circumstances which would, as any adverse or hesitating step to-night undoubtedly would, be a serious injury to national and Imperial interests.

MR. GIBSON: I hope everyone who takes part in this discussion will remember the gravity of the crisis in which the country is involved, and that the Prime Minister called upon us to do nothing at this time which would cripple or discredit the Government. But the right of hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, and, indeed, of all sections of the House, is plainly this—to watch earnestly and see that in every step and stage of the difficulty with which the country is involved the Government itself does nothing to cripple or discredit the country. It is our bounden duty carefully to ask for explanations, carefully to seek for information, and carefully, by every method in our power—by speech, by question, by suggestion—to elicit whether the Government themselves realize exactly what it is that they are doing. The Prime Minister has given us not too much credit—not more than fair and sufficient credit—for the way in which we met his proposal on Monday last. Silently, with rapidity and with unanimity, we gave him all he asked to strengthen his hands in the difficult crisis in which the country was placed. We did that because we knew it was right, and because we thought his language on that occasion was not unworthy of a Minister of a great country. But contrast that with the position to-night. We had a statement, of which the Prime Minister read every word, thereby giving increased significance to it from the fact that he read it. What was the character of that statement? I pass no final judgment on it now. The crisis is too important, the matter too urgent; the circumstances require too deliberate action on the part of those who are about to arrive at a responsible decision upon it to express any final opinion upon it now; but I do draw attention to the fact that the Prime Minister felt it was so grave that he plainly balanced every word, and considered every emphasis, in which he announced it to the House; and the right hon. Gentleman had hardly sat down when more Questions were asked in reference to it than were ever asked in regard to a statement like it. Why was that? When, on Monday, we were asked for this Vote, without question or hesitation we voted the money. To-night we had to hesitate. To-night we had to ask Questions, because it was plain to the minds of those of us most anxious loyally to strengthen the hands of the Government in this crisis, that there was matter for grave doubt as to whether the Government had themselves realized what they were doing. Have the doubts excited by the statement of the Prime Minister been removed by the speeches of to-night? Unquestionably they have not. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster made, as he always does, an interesting speech in reply to the speeches delivered in the course of the debate; but he did not utter a syllable to elucidate the meaning of the Government intention or plan. And so it was with the speech of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister got into discussions and explanations with my noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) as to what was said in the past. But as to what the Government intend now, as to their present arrangements with Russia, or what they think their present arrangements with Russia are, we are just as much in the dark as when the right hon. Gentleman made his first statement. Now, we are told that we can see the first piercing rays of light, and we are told that the Government intend to refer the whole matter to arbitration.

MR. GLADSTONE: This is the inconvenience of hon. Gentlemen not waiting to see the Papers. I said that in regard to the delimitation of the Frontier it was not for me to anticipate what the result would be.

MR. GIBSON: But we are asked to pass the Vote of Credit to-night, in the absence of the Papers, and without waiting for the Papers, and we are asked to do that upon the assumption that the Prime Minister has made a statement so full and complete as to obviate the necessity for the production of Papers. ["No, no!"] Therefore, I am entitled to say that the statement of the Prime Minister is one which calls for an earnest and an attentive examination before the House founds upon it a judgment as to the action it will take on the Vote now submitted to it. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) that we should adopt this Vote without delay. The Prime Minister told us to pass it without question; the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster told us that we should pass it with full confidence. We did so on Monday, because the Government treated the House to a statement and a method of utterance we thought not unworthy of it; but to-night the Government have spoken in a way open to such question, and doubt, and hesitation, that we cannot proceed with that rapidity and confidence which we are asked to display. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked a most extraordinary question. He says—"Where should we be if we had not left Candahar?" I will not go into that question now; I have no wish to raise a fresh debate and to wander into other points. I answer simply that we should have been in Candahar if we had not left it, and we should then be a great deal stronger in dealing with this question than we are now. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that this was a golden opportunity of settling matters once for all. But where does the right hon. Gentleman find anything that can lead the House to the conclusion that this is such a golden opportunity? Is there anything in the history of this question, or in the words of the Prime Minister, that shows us that this is a golden opportunity for settling these matters once for all? The circumstances are grave and momentous. Everyone on this side of the House desires to see a peaceful solution. We, on this side of the House, are desirous that there should be a peaceful solution, without the expenditure of money or of blood, but with the maintenance of the honour of the country. The Prime Minister spoke of a stable and permanent peace. I adopt those words. We would all desire that. It is because we are left in a state of doubt and anxiety on all these essential points that we ask for further information. I do not know what other Minister of the Crown will speak next; but I should like to put a few plain questions which have much disturbed our minds in the course of this discussion, but which are not conceived in a spirit or desire to put the Government in a difficulty. We are told—and the Prime Minister used the words twice, to show how significant he considered them—that the Government "have referred"—and it is the only thing they have referred—"any difference that may be found to exist as to the interpretation of the agreement of the 16th of March." I want to know what is the meaning of that? It is the one thing that is to be referred. When the Prime Minister was asked the question again as to what it was exactly that was to be referred, for fear he might be mistaken he himself picked out the words to read again to the House; and, therefore, the only solitary thing referred at this anxious time is "any difference that may be found to exist as to the interpretation of the agreement of the 16th of March." What is the meaning of that? What is the meaning of the sacred compact? What is the interpretation of the agreement that was made between England and Russia? This is the one thing to be referred to arbitration. But is there any reason to believe that Russia herself feels the smallest particle of uncertainty as to the meaning of that agreement? I have read the previous speech of the Prime Minister on the subject since this debate opened. There is not a word in that speech of the Prime Minister which displays the least doubt as to the interpretation to be put on the sacred covenant. Then, what is it that is to be referred? The Prime Minister, on Monday, indicated some circumstances that might be in dispute in a very different method, and with apparently a very different object, but never suggested that there was any dispute as to the meaning of the agreement. He used these words—

"We thought it our duty . . . to take it"—that is, the covenant—"as conceived in honour and good faith."

There was no question, therefore, as to what the conditions of the covenant were, but simply whether it was conceived in honour and good faith. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded—

"It was one of the most sacred covenants ever made between two great nations . . . and that if unhappily a deviation occurred there would be a generous rivalry between the two Powers to search it . . . and to exhibit to the world how that deviation had come about."

That shows that there was no dispute whatever on Monday last, or a vestige of doubt in the mind of the Government, as to the meaning of the sacred covenant; and the only point was that, if a deviation occurred, how that deviation was to be set right and put straight? The Prime Minister said further on Monday—

"All I say is this—that that woful engagement of the 30th of March distinctly showed that one party or both had, either through ill-will or through unfortunate mishap, failed to fulfil the conditions of the engagement."

There is no question there as to what the conditions of the covenant were, or any uncertainty as to its meaning. The only question is whether either or both parties, through ill-will or mishap, had failed to fulfil the conditions of the covenant. Then, I ask, what is it, in the name of common sense, the Government think they have referred to arbitration that was in doubt? I have shown that up to the very moment at which I am speaking there was nothing in the Ministerial statements which threw one shadow of doubt as to the meaning or interpretation of the agreement entered into, and yet that is the only thing that the Government have referred to arbitration. The information for which I ask, and which I am entitled to ask, is of the first importance. It underlies the whole question; and, I ask, is there anything else to be inferred, or has there been a mistake or a slip, or is there anything which the Prime Minister has insufficiently expressed? Is there anything that Ministers desire to supplement? I desire to point out that neither the Prime Minister, speaking at great length just now, nor the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—a perfect master of English—has supplemented in any way the matter to be referred to arbitration. Are we to suppose that the arbitrator, when found, is to decide whether a breach of the covenant by one or both parties has been committed? Is that the matter intended to be referred for his judgment? That is a plain question. Is it merely intended to state what the agreement was; is it intended to go into the breach of it; and, if so, is it intended that he should state who is answerable for such breach? Then I come to the further words of the Prime Minister, which are very remarkable in this connection. He says—"We do not wish to see gallant officers on either side put on their trial." I do not pretend to say what officers are meant; but I suppose the Government meant something when these words were put into the statement of the Prime Minister. I wish to ask whether the breach of the covenant is to be inquired into; and if inquired into, is any power to be given to the arbitrator to fix the blame direct, or to suggest reparation? That, I think, is a reasonable element in the discussion of the question; and, so far, we have received no reply to it. I have directed attention to the narrowness, incompleteness, and utter uselessness of the reference, and I think I am entitled to a plain answer. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that England was pledged to guarantee Herat and the whole of Afghanistan to the Ameer. Let me test this by another question. As far as we know, by the theory of the facts, the Government theory of Afghanistan is that Penjdeh is a portion of Afghanistan. Is it in support of that theory that the Government have agreed to refer the question to arbitration. Is that the form of guarantee to the Ameer that finds favour with Her Majesty's Government? The right hon. Gentleman says we are bound to guarantee Afghanistan to the Ameer. Is that satisfied by referring piecemeal, as Russia advances, the question of the Ameer's property in any part of his dominions? There is another matter I should like to clear up. We all know, through the usual source of public information, that the Government have several methods and several opportunities of stating their views. We have been favoured to-night with the statement read by the Prime Minister; but another of his Colleagues (Earl Granville) in "another place" has made a statement of an apparently different character, and presenting a meaning which certainly requires further elucidation. It is said, with regard to Russia, that Her Majesty's Government have agreed with Russia to submit the Penjdeh incident to full investigation. That is not the statement made here. It is an infinitely wider statement than that made here, and I have a right to ask if that statement is correct, and if not, in what particular it is incorrect? Also, which of the Ministers is going to clear it up, and to what extent?

MR. GLADSTONE: Probably the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not remember the words used, which I think were identical with those used "elsewhere"—that the two Governments have agreed to provide the means for a settlement of any differences between them arising out of the incident of Ak Tepe.

MR. GIBSON: That is merely translating the same thing into long Government language. It is very unfortunate that the Ministers representing the Government in the different Houses have explained the contention referred to arbitration by selecting language not identical. The statement "elsewhere" is certainly a wider statement, and it might mean a good deal more than what the Prime Minister said; but, on the other hand, it might mean less, or merely nothing, when subjected to the action of vigorous criticism. This language was used—

"Penjdeh will, during the negotiations, remain neutral, and the Russian Government has stated its readiness to consider the question of removing its troops should the Boundary Commissioners decide against them."

Here is a plain and tolerably distinct statement as to which the right hon. Gentleman, in this House, is absolutely silent. Well, the House of Commons is the body that votes the money, and it has the right, at all events, to as full a statement as that made "elsewhere," as to what the agreement entered into with Russia is. That statement of the Russian Government is open to this criticism. According to Lord Granville, the Russian Government would be willing to consider the question of removing their troops; but that is very different from saying that they will be willing to remove them if the award of the arbitrator is against them. At any rate, we have a right to have this important matter cleared up. A Minister of the Crown in this House ought to explain whether that statement was made "elsewhere," what is the foundation for that statement, and if it was made, what do the Government now believe was the agreement with Russia if the award should chance to go against their action at Penjdeh? I do not propose to go into any further discussion. My object in rising was simply to ask questions fairly conceived to the extent, as far as I could, of getting information to clear up doubts which very much obscure our minds at the present moment. The Prime Minister has said that we should have time to deliberate on this matter. I think that is not unreasonable. I should have been glad if the statement had been presented in a way that enabled us at once to grasp it, without difficulty and without doubt, in order to free our minds from anxiety. We have shown throughout this matter that we were not captious, and the Prime Minister has himself acknowledged it more than once. When we do ask questions not unfairly conceived, I think it should be taken that we are animated by an honest desire to obtain fuller information upon the points with respect to which we inquire. Unquestionably a vast change has taken place in this question by the statement to-day. It has been presented to us with an entirely different mouth, in an entirely different tone, in an entirely different form of language, and I repeat that I offer no final judgment as to the statement or its bearings. I have asked questions; I have pointed out the differences between the statements made here and "elsewhere;" I have pointed out how very narrow is the reference proposed to be made. I ask if the Government adhere to that narrow reference, or do they really intend it to have a wider bearing? I think I am entitled to an answer to the questions which I have put to Her Majesty's Government, and that the House is entitled to the information. I think the answer should be sufficient and clear, and that when it is given we should not be attacked for having asked for this information.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I shall be very happy to endeavour to answer the questions which the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson) has asked as far as I am able to apprehend them. The first point he asks, if I understand him rightly, is whether any other matters were to be referred to arbitration besides those mentioned by the Prime Minister at the commencement of this discussion? To that I have to answer very distinctly in the negative. There are no other matters to be referred to arbitration, and I think that answer is plain enough.

Mr. Gibson

MR. GIBSON: That is only interpretation.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My right hon. and learned Friend is a distinguished ornament of the Profession to which he belongs; but to-night, by his extreme over-technicality—I will not call it special pleading—he appears to me to have been engaged in one of the most difficult tasks of the Bar—namely, in endeavouring to set aside an award before it is made. I never heard more technical pleas urged against an arbitration, against the appointment of the arbitrator, against the terms of the arbitration, and against the award. The speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman contained admirable arguments to address to the Court of Chancery; but it was hardly an admirable speech as addressed to a Government in a great political crisis. One of the most remarkable things which he has charged against the Government was that in “another place” it had been stated that what was to be referred to arbitration was the incident at Penjdeh; and he said that that was a totally and entirely different question from that which was stated in this House as the matter to be referred. He does not allow even the possibility of the variation of a phrase, for I cannot suppose that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, with all his study of the question, can be ignorant of the facts. I should have thought that no one could have doubted that the phrases “the differences between them arising out of the engagement at Ak Tepe,” and “the differences arising out of the incident at Penjdeh” were absolutely identical. Anyone who knows the mere A B C of the matter will understand that the two phrases mean absolutely one and the same thing. That is my answer to the second charge of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. GIBSON: The “incident” at Penjdeh was not mentioned by the Prime Minister at all.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is what I say. I understand that the incident at Penjdeh was described in “another place” as the subject to be referred to arbitration; and I should have thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and everybody who knew anything about the question, would have understood, when the Prime Minister said that what was to be referred to arbitration was the differences between the two Governments arising out of the engagement at Ak Tepe, that the phrase meant exactly the same thing as if he had said “the incident arising out of the engagement at Penjdeh.” Well, that is the second point, as I understand the questions of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Then he objects to the statement in this House not having been identical with the statement made in “another place.” So far as that goes, I do not know what the statement made in “another place” was; but upon the special point to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers the two statements were precisely identical. It has been agreed, said Lord Granville, that the district of Penjdeh shall be neutralized during the negotiations; and the Russian Government have intimated their willingness to consider the propriety of the removal of the Russian outposts when the Commissioners meet. The Prime Minister also stated that that is the authentic state of the facts; and, as far as I have been able to carry the questions of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in my mind, I think I have given a complete answer to them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has entangled himself in his own subtleties, otherwise a very elementary acquaintance with the subject would have shown him that there was no difference at all.

MR. GIBSON: There were two other very important questions which I asked the right hon. Gentleman—namely, whether the question as to who had violated the agreement was to be referred to arbitration, and whether it would be open to the arbitrator to say what should be done with the party in fault?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I really did not think that that was a question seriously put, or I would have answered it before. Of course, as has been stated by my right hon. Friend, the arbitrator is to say what is to be the result of the arbitration. I will read the passage again, for I do not think it is possible to put the matter more clearly—

“Any differences that may be found to exist between the two Cabinets in regard to the interpretation of the agreement of the 16th of March, with a view to the settlement of the matter in a mode consistent with the honour of both States.”

Of course, the arbitrator is to state what is to be the result of the arbitration consistently with the honour of both States—that is, whether either State is to make an amende for what has been done; and, if so, how it is to be made. It is perfectly obvious, from the words used by my right hon. Friend, that it must depend upon the decision of the arbitrator. That is my answer to the further question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Then, what is our situation with reference to the whole question? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] I will tell the noble Lord. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says things are very much changed since Monday. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] Of course they are changed, and because they are changed the noble Lord gives expression to his vexation. It will be known to-morrow, in the country, what is the cause of that vexation. It will be known from the noble Lord's speech, because the noble Lord has made a speech to-night, which, if he had the responsibility of the Government of this country, would be absolutely incompatible with the peace of the world. He has used language of irritation, of provocation, and of insult to a great European Power. It is the change which has taken place that provokes the noble Lord, and makes him cheer in that violent manner my observation that there has been a great change since Monday. Yes, Sir; there has been a great change, because, as the Prime Minister said, there is a real prospect of peace, and it is to disturb and to destroy that prospect of peace that the noble Lord has made that speech to-night. It is not I, nor the noble Lord, who will judge that matter. It will be judged to-morrow, by the nation, who has laboured to keep the peace of the world, and who has laboured, if he can, to prevent that peace being accomplished. But, Sir, it is not of the noble Lord I will speak. We have heard very different language and a very different tone from those who are responsible for the conduct of the great Party which sits opposite, and who, if this Vote of Credit is to be refused or delayed, would be responsible for the conduct of the affairs of this country hereafter. And what, I ask—are they intending—what is the Party opposite intending, at this critical moment, when upon the delay of a single Vote may depend whether these negotiations may result in peace or war? [Oh, oh!"] Yes; the noble Lord is playing with fire to-night. It may be sport to him; but it may not be sport to a great many others. Therefore, the question which the House has to consider to-night is, whether they will, in what the Prime Minister has called the first rays of hope of a peaceful solution, take a course which may cloud and may destroy this hope, whether they will indulge in any policy which may involve the great calamity of war, and prevent the negotiations from resulting in a peaceful solution. Well, what is it that the Government announced to-night? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Surrender!] I hope that that remark of the noble Lord will be reported to-morrow. That is the language by which men, like the noble Lord, try to taunt and to irritate great nations into war. You may depend upon it that no man who has the responsibility of the conduct of affairs would allow himself to be provoked by taunts of that description. What we have proposed is, that with reference to the unhappy incident which occurred at Penjdeh, there shall be a fair and honourable arbitration, and that has been accepted by the Government of Russia. That, I think, is a highly favourable and highly honourable result to both nations. Is it that which the noble Lord desires should not go on? Is that what the noble Lord calls "surrender?" ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Lord assents. Then he declares against the reference of a question of that kind to arbitration. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] Well, that is the position distinctly taken up by the noble Lord and his Friends. Let us have no mistake about it. Then, what is the other question now at issue? That matter being disposed of by arbitration, the Government are prepared to go with the Government of Russia into a definition of the Frontier of Afghanistan. Is that what is objected to? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: In London.] The noble Lord objects to its being done in London. Is that the point? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] That is one of the points on which the noble Lord is prepared to go to war rather than to arbitration. The point upon which the noble Lord is going to have a European quarrel is whether the determination of the Frontier shall be made in Afghanistan or in London. Well, Sir, we are not prepared to go to war upon that ground. The noble Lord may, if he chooses; but I hope he will not have the opportunity. Let us see what are the points mainly put forward and clearly indicated by hon. Members opposite. I now turn from the noble Lord, who, happily, has not the conduct of these affairs. The question now is, how is the matter to be dealt with? That there is a fair and reasonable prospect of negotiation which shall establish not merely an honourable peace for the present, but a security of peace in the future, by the delimitation of a clear and intelligible Frontier, no man can deny. I say there is a hope and a prospect of peace; but it is not a certainty. It rests very much, no doubt, with hon. Gentlemen opposite to destroy these hopes, and to make that certainty impossible. They may so weaken the hands of the Government in the negotiations as to make the negotiations fail; but then they must, in that case, be responsible for the consequences of the failure; and they must be prepared to defend to the country and to Europe this position—that under no circumstances whatever will they have an arbitration; that under no circumstances whatever will they enter into a negotiation for the settlement of the Frontier. [An hon. MEMBER: In London.] That is the position hon. Gentlemen opposite must be prepared to adopt. An hon. Member says, "In London." I forgot to observe that they will have a negotiation; but under no circumstances in London. These are the only points, so far as I know, that have been challenged; but if hon. Gentlemen opposite are prepared to take up that position, what useful—nay, what safe purpose, would be answered by endeavouring to postpone the consideration of this question? If you are not prepared to say that under no circumstances will you have arbitration—that under no circumstances will you have negotiation in London—why should you endeavour, by a dilatory proceeding, or by weakening the hands of the Government, to throw that negotiation into danger, and make yourselves responsible for its failure? I hope that these considerations will prevail with hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that at this very critical moment—at a moment when there is a fair and reasonable prospect of a peaceful solution of this dangerous question—no man, upon whatever side of the House he sits, will take upon himself the grave responsibility of doing anything which may make that negotiation fail.

MR. CHAPLIN: Sir, three Cabinet Ministers have addressed the House this evening, and each of them has referred more or less to the speech delivered at the commencement of this debate by my noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). In the first two of those speeches I do not know that there is anything of which any Member of this House can complain. The Prime Minister referred to the speech of my noble Friend; but it was answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) in terms which I think all Members of the House will admit were of a fair and legitimate character. But we have also been favoured with one of those remarkable orations which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department sometimes springs upon the House at a moment's notice; and I ask the House to contrast the tone and character of that speech with the other two Ministerial comments on the statements of my noble Friend. Sir, I believe I am not guilty of an abuse of Parliamentary language when I say that a grosser series of imputations than those which the right hon. Gentleman addressed to my noble Friend has seldom been heard within these walls. The right hon. Gentleman said there has been a great change in the situation within the last few days, and that it is because of that change, and because that change points to the possibility of peace, that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock is filled with vexation, chagrin, and disappointment; and that, to the best of his ability to-night, from first to last, he has laboured to prevent the conclusion of peace between England and Russia. I take upon myself to repudiate and deny the gross and unfounded charges of the right hon. Gentleman; and I think that, when he made those charges, he was bound at least to adduce to the House something in the nature of, or which carried with it, the shadow of proof. What was it that my noble Friend said in the course of his speech? I heard the speech of my noble Friend from beginning to end—a speech which I think increases the estimation in which he is already held by hon. Members on both sides of the House—and I think the right hon. Gentleman must have felt, from the marked attention with which that speech was listened to, and the way in which it was received on all sides of the House, that the charges directed against him were totally unfounded. I have not been able to discover anything in the speech of my noble Friend to justify what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman. It is true that my noble Friend charged the Government with a base and cowardly surrender. I confess that that was also my impression. If I was wrong in my impression, whose fault is it but that of the Government, who refused absolutely to do that which the Prime Minister invited hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to do—namely, to see in print the statement which he made to the House this evening. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I spoke of the Papers that would be presented.] I beg pardon; the right hon. Gentleman also invited us to see the statement in print. Of course, we are most anxious to see the Papers. I myself asked this evening that this statement might be read a second time, and it was so read; but, notwithstanding that, I am not sure that I was able to completely grasp its meaning and effect. And I can hardly conceive it possible that any other Government but this would have taken the course they have taken in refusing to accede to the moderate, reasonable, and temperate proposal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis (Mr. Bourke) that the Vote of Credit should be postponed until, at any rate, we had had an opportunity of seeing the exact terms and language of that statement. But the Government have refused. And why? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department tells us that the delay of a single night would make the whole difference between peace and war. But, Sir, I thought we were engaged in negotiations. Are we, or are we not? I suppose that the right hon. Gentleman will not deny that we are engaged in negotiations; and in order to remove the alarm which the right hon. Gentleman feels I will quote a great authority—the Prime Minister. In 1878 the Prime Minister, in objecting to the Vote of Credit of that year, said—

“It is really an attempt to associate arms with negotiation. Now, permit me to say that such an attempt, by whomsoever made, is radically bad.”—(3 Hansard, [237] 947.)

I do not altogether accept the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, either upon that or upon a great many other subjects; but I suppose that the Secretary of State for the Home Department does. And, if so, what becomes of his contention that when we are, as at the present time, engaged in negotiations, the delay of a single moment may make the whole difference between peace and war? Sir, I only rose in order to repel the gross and unwarrantable attack made upon my noble Friend by the right hon. Gentleman. And I must express the opinion which is certainly entertained on these Benches, whatever it may be in other parts of the House, that nothing could be farther from the intention or desire of the noble Lord than the course which the right hon. Gentleman has imputed to him. But I should like to state, if I may do so with the permission of the House, what we on these Benches desire. In the first place, we want further information upon the whole of this question than we have yet received. It is all very well to appeal to us to have confidence in the Government; but how is it possible we should have confidence in a Government whose career, during the five years they have been in Office, we know only too well? I do not recollect any occasion, in connection with their foreign policy, on which we have not had to complain that that policy had lowered the character of the country, and had been humiliating to the people of England. Surrender after surrender has been made in all parts of the world; and I ask what guarantee have we that this Government is not ready again to purchase a patched-up peace on this occasion—it may be to save their own credit before the General Election—and to leave this question open and more aggravated than ever to be dealt with by their successors, upon whom they are certain to try to cast the whole blame for what has happened, or what may hereafter happen? Beyond the announcement on the part of the Government, which I admit was twice read to the House, we have had no information, and certainly that announcement was accompanied with very small assurances. Under the circumstances, I do not think it would be unreasonable on the part of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to ask the Government to assent to the adjournment of the debate, in order that we may have the opportunity of seeing in black and white, and carefully considering, the statement made to the House at an earlier period of the evening, before we are compelled to come to a decision on the present Resolution.

We do not, as I said on a former occasion, desire to do anything whatever to withhold from the Government Supplies. Whatever demands they make for the purposes of the country will receive our support. From the commencement of these proceedings, we have endeavoured to impress upon the Government the necessity of dividing this Vote under two heads. I have never wavered from that view of the case, and I am more than ever confirmed in it now; because if the prospects of peace, as we hope they are, and as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department will not deny, are so much better than they were a few days ago, there is great reason for hoping that the Vote may not in the end be required. In that case, it only remains for us to consider the question as to the money which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister told us was likely to be used in the Soudan. That is a question on which, on account of the many changes on the part of the Government, I have always maintained there is a great deal to be said. There are two questions which I should like to put to the Government to-night. The Government told us that the £4,500,000 asked for the Soudan might be available for other purposes; but that, in the first place, they asked for it as being likely to be spent in the Soudan. My first question then is, what are those objects in the Soudan for which the Government thought it likely that this money might be spent? And my second question is this—If it is to be available for other purposes, what is to become of those objects for which, in the first instance, it was thought that the money would probably be required? Now, upon that, up to the present moment, we have not had one single word of explanation from the Government. I may on another occasion go at length into that question; but I do not know that it would be of much use to do so now at this hour of the night, nor do I know that any Member of the Government would give the desired information, and therefore I ask the Government to assent to the Motion which I now beg to move, that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That the Debate be now adjourned.”
 —(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is quite unnecessary for me, after what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and myself, to say more than a single word. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Chaplin) must have anticipated that it would be entirely impossible for us to accede to the Motion for Adjournment. After the Vote obtained last Monday, we have no power to spend the money legally and regularly, and we ask now for the Vote which is necessary, in order that we may be so empowered. I could understand a Motion to challenge the policy of the Government on this point; but as to this Motion for Adjournment, we look upon it as being calculated to produce the most injurious effects in this and other countries, as tending to show that Parliament is doubting and uncertain, and we must, therefore, having regard to the whole of the circumstances, resist it to the best of our ability.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I should be very much surprised indeed if any person, either abroad or at home, on reading the proceedings of to-night, were disposed to think that a Motion for the adjournment of the debate on the question before the House showed uncertainty in the mind of Parliament as to supporting the Government in measures necessary to be taken for meeting a national emergency. But I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that this large Vote of £11,000,000 was brought forward last week with as little explanation as might have been expended on it had it been for the sum of £50,000 only. The right hon. Gentleman made hardly any allusion to that portion of the Vote which is intended for the Service in the Soudan, except to say that it was a large part of his policy that the Expedition in the Soudan should be made available for any part of the Empire. With regard to other matters—the special preparations we were asked to make—the right hon. Gentleman rested his case almost entirely upon the single incident of Penjdeh; and on that he made a most impassioned and eloquent appeal to the House, on the strength of which the House, without a single word of objection, voted the money asked for. Well, Sir, has there been the slightest change in the disposition of the House since then? If there has been, it is only due to the uncertainty with which we have listened to the explanations that have been given to us this evening. We are told that there is a great and important change in the situation. We think we are bound, considering the gravity of the matter; considering that it is one not for the present moment, but for all time—at all events, for the future of this Empire and for great national interests—to ask for time fully to consider and examine the proposals made. Some of our Friends on this side have endeavoured, by putting Questions to Ministers, to obtain a clearer view of the situation; but I can only say honestly for myself, and many of us on these Benches, that we think we ought to have an opportunity of considering these matters calmly, as they will appear when we read them over, and when we can compare them with the statements made in “another place,” and that we cannot go satisfactorily to a division until we have had that opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department said just now that my right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) was putting questions like a special pleader in the Court of Chancery; but the right hon. Gentleman might remember that my right hon. and learned Friend was dilating upon an incident of great importance, upon which several constructions might be put at a critical moment; and it is of the greatest importance that we should see that this very leading document, or whatever it may be called, is so drawn up as to exclude doubts upon points on which it is very undesirable that there should exist any doubts, and to make clear what it is important should be made clear. On the question of the Soudan, which is a large integral part of the Vote, I observe that not one word has been said, and we think it is essential that we should have some information as to what the Government intend to do in this matter. They are asking for £4,500,000 for the Service in the Soudan, in a manner which their recent mode of proceeding may altogether alter, and it is only reasonable that we should have some explanation on that part of the business. But I say also in regard to the special preparations, the circumstances in which we stand, and the great importance of preventing mistakes hereafter, render it very desirable that we should have a fair opportunity given for consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) complains that he has not received from the Government sufficient explanation on the matters under discussion; and I scarcely think that we have received from the right hon. Baronet sufficient explanation of the position which he and Friends apparently intend to take on the Motion made by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). Are they taking up this position—that they refuse a Vote for Supplies which we have asked for the safety, the honour, and the protection of the interests of the Empire until they have had an opportunity of discussing the policy which has led to the necessity of those Supplies being asked for? Why, Sir, the right hon. Baronet and his Friends profess not to be satisfied with the statement which has been made with respect to the arbitration between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of Russia. But that arbitration is only an incident in the long course of negotiations led up to by others; and I feel it is absolutely impossible for the House to give a judgment on our conduct in proposing or assenting to that arbitration until it has before it not only an explanation as regards the agreement itself, but also as to the precise nature of the facts and negotiations which have led up to it. I do not suppose that the Party of the right hon. Baronet opposite are going to be satisfied with the discussion as far as it has proceeded, but that they reserve to themselves full power to discuss our conduct during the whole course of these negotiations: that they will reserve to themselves the power to discuss the arbitration and the result that may be arrived at. But I do not suppose it will be to the advantage of the country to discuss our conduct in these respects until they have the Papers before them. Are we to understand that the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite is that they are going to withhold the Supplies necessary for the Public Service until they have had an opportunity of ascertaining all these points? Sir, in my opinion that would be a course most disastrous and most unfortunate to the Public Service. We have told you, this evening, that we believed an honourable settlement was possible, and, as we believe, the prospect of an honourable settlement of this question is now brighter than it was some time ago. But we have not told you, and we have not ventured to tell you, that all the questions at issue between the Government of this country and the Russian Government are settled, and the House knows very well that in the unfortunate event of such a settlement not being reached, the Forces of Russia are in a position in which they may menace, if they do not menace at the present moment, positions considered equally on both sides of the House to be of great importance to our Indian Empire. Well, are we going to be told that, because a portion of the House may feel some doubt as to our conduct in one part of our negotiations, they are going suddenly and immediately to give a vote the effect of which, if successful, would be to suspend the preparations which we have considered it necessary to make? I can say, as one of the Ministers charged with the measures which may be necessary to be taken under this Vote of Credit, that such a course as is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite would be one of the gravest inconvenience to the Public Service. The House is perfectly well aware that preparations have been going on, and are going on at this moment, both under my direction and under the direction of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. These preparations are being made in full confidence that Parliament will sanction the expenditure that is necessary for them. These expectations were justified by the conduct of the House on this day last week. But if we are to be told now that the House is going to suspend its judgment on this Vote, to postpone its consideration until it is satisfied on all the questions that have arisen as to the conduct of the Government of this country, then my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty and myself will be placed in a most difficult and embarrassing position, and a position that will certainly not be conducive to the good of the public. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has spoken of his opinion as to the policy of the Government in the Soudan. Well, Sir, if the difficulties in regard to our policy in the Soudan perplex the mind of the Opposition, I think it is to be regretted that attention was not called earlier in the debate to that part of the question, and that it was left to half-past 12 to put forward the statement that they want more information. My right hon. Friend has said that we shall not shrink from any examination which may be thought necessary, either in regard to the Soudan or the Russian negotiations. If the right hon. Gentleman likes to bring forward a Vote of Censure on the policy of the Government in the Soudan, or in regard to the Russian negotiations, we shall not shrink from meeting it; but the proposition which we have urged is this—that the Vote of Credit did not afford a convenient opportunity, in the interests of the country, to discuss the policy of the Government, but that that is a subject to be treated entirely and distinctly apart from the Vote of Credit. It is to the interest of the country, and not of the Government alone, that no backwardness should be shown in providing the Supplies that are considered necessary for the Public Service in certain eventualities.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) must have been quite certain, from the manner in which the preliminary stage of this Vote was given—namely, without the slightest discussion—that the proposals of the Government are not likely to be interfered with in the long run. [Laughter.] Well, if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department prefers any other words, I am willing to use them; but it seems to me that the Government should gather, from the unanimity displayed the other night, that there is no desire to embarrass the Government in this matter, and that there is not likely to be any opposition to the actual Vote itself. What we desire is that we should have an opportunity of fully discussing the question in its new aspect. The Prime Minister seems to have forgotten what took place on a similar occasion to this some years ago, when he and his Friends did not hesitate to delay the House four or five nights on the discussion of a Vote of Credit. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that not a farthing of this money will be expended until this Vote has been agreed to—until the Resolution has been passed; and upon that ground he presses the House to vote the money without delay. What we should like to ask the Government, however, is whether a great deal of this money has not been already spent? The speech of the noble Marquess who preceded me, who spoke for himself and for his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, must, I think, convince every person in the House that a very large sum of this money we are asked to vote has been already expended, and very properly expended, in making preparations. Therefore, the threat of the Prime Minister, that not a single farthing of this money could be spent until we had passed the Vote to-night, is utterly worthless and should not have been made. I say that after the statement of the Prime Minister as to this arrangement that has been entered into with Russia, we have a right to ask to be allowed to see the statement which the Prime Minister has made to-night in print, so that on future evenings we may be able to ask further Questions. The subject is one of the most vital importance to the country. The Prime Minister may rest assured that no one can feel that more than we do ourselves. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh at that statement; but it is only right that we should have a full opportunity for discussion. No unnecessary delay will be attempted on our part in order to delay the Vote. I repeat that we have a perfect right to see this statement in print, and to discuss it, because it may be quite necessary to ask further Questions when we have had time to consider what has been laid before us.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said that he was quite sure there would be no very great opposition to the proposals of Her Majesty's Government in the long run; and he (Mr. O'Donnell) could not help thinking that "the long run" was a very happy description of the operations of Her Majesty's Government throughout this affair. However, he need not say that it was not to enter upon the Main Question that he had risen, nor as an opponent even to the policy which Her Majesty's Government had sketched this evening. He was, however, in favour of the adjournment of this debate: amongst other reasons, he could not but think that on a question of such importance there ought to be due consideration for the opinions of the Representatives of Ireland, and he was not aware that any opportunity had been given to those Representatives to speak upon this matter. He agreed that, from an English point of view, very considerable harm might be done by the appearance of dissension being evidenced by a division on the present occasion. Let Her Majesty's Government consider that this debate was perfectly certain to be adjourned. What was the good of provoking an appearance of dissension on this question? If this debate was adjourned in consequence of the strong expression of opinion from the Opposition side of the House—if it was adjourned without any formal and regular opposition on the part of the Ministerial Party—there would be no particular attention paid to the opposition which had taken place, and certainly no interpretation abroad would be given to it of a character calculated to weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government still further. Then what was the good of pushing the opposition to an actual division? Of course, they knew that Her Majesty's Government would have a numerical majority. The Ministerial majority would support them, and only a small minority would vote in favour of adjournment; but it was clear that the adjournment would take place, because there was a sufficient number of Members in the House perfectly determined to have an opportunity of discussing the matter. He spoke upon this subject in no factious spirit—[A laugh—even though his observation appeared to have the effect of restoring the Secretary of State for the Home Department to his wonted equanimity. He trusted that if there was any more Business to be done to-night they might be allowed to go to it without being dragged through the useless and troublesome formality of a vote in the Lobby, which could have no effect upon foreign nations, except to expose the fact that Her Majesty's Government were opposed by a considerable section in the House. A more unnecessary act on the part of Her Majesty's Government he could not conceive. As he had said before, he did not speak on this question as an exponent of compromise or breathing time, or whatever else they might like to call it. He believed that there were strong grounds for the policy Her Majesty's Government had indicated; but whilst entertaining that belief, he was just as strongly opposed to any summary closing of this debate as any other hon. Member could be.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 181: Majority 67.—(Div. List, No. 152.)

Original Question again proposed.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Baron Henry De Worms.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I venture even now to make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government. I would really ask them to consider the position into which they are forcing us in this matter. We have no desire in any way to stop the Supplies that may be necessary to secure the honour and the interest of the country—we showed that to the fullest extent when this Vote was discussed in Committee. We understood at that time that Her Majesty's Government had, through the Prime Minister, deliberately announced a certain policy; we approved of that policy, and we granted Supplies without discussion. This evening we have had other statements. I do not say whether they are different or not; but to us they bear a very different complexion indeed. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) has found great fault with, I think, my noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who spoke of what had been said to us to-night as a policy of surrender. Well, Sir, I do not know whether it is a policy of surrender or not; but this I do know that it looked to us to be very like it, and what we desire in asking for the postponement of this Vote is that we may have, at least, one more occasion of debating this question with fuller knowledge as to what the policy of the Government really is. I do not, of course, want to go into that question now; but it would appear from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department that the whole circumstances that occurred at Penjdeh are to be referred to arbitration. Well, Sir, what were those circumstances? They were an unprovoked aggression upon our protected Ally the Ameer of Afghanistan. Has the Ameer, on whom the aggression was made—

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the right hon. Baronet that he is not entitled to go into the general question.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I merely desired to ask, Sir, whether the Ameer had consented to arbitration? But I will not pursue the subject. Hon. Members opposite appear very anxious to prevent any further discussion of the matter; and that, I think, is an additional reason why we should press on the Government our demand for a further opportunity of discussion, a demand which is very moderate indeed when compared with the five nights the Liberal Opposition exacted from us, under similar circumstances, in 1878. I do not want to trespass the limits which you, Mr. Speaker, have assigned to me; but I do protest against our being told that this debate cannot be adjourned, because it will interfere with the spending of the money which Her Majesty's Government have asked for. All that we ask is that the chance of further debate shall not be postponed until—probably weeks hence—the whole Correspondence is presented to Parliament. We wish a delay of a few days, that we may consider what has passed to-night, that the country may consider what has been said, that we may endeavour to elicit some further information upon the policy of Her Majesty's Government in Afghanistan, and that we may discuss and consider the bearings of their policy in the Soudan, which can now hardly be called a policy of action. We wish an opportunity of discussing the Vote of £4,500,000 for the Soudan, which we have not yet had, because we voluntarily abstained, on the statement of the Prime Minister, from bringing the subject before the House. I must say that if Her Majesty's Government refuse us this opportunity, they will take upon themselves the responsibility of refusing that which is the undoubted right of an Opposition.

MR. GLADSTONE: We have not been slow to inform the House that we did not refuse the adjournment and ask the House to proceed at once to a decision, except under a deep sense of a solemn public duty, and of the injury which would probably result to the great interests committed to our charge were an adjournment granted, and were the appearance of hesitation on the part of Parliament, which it would carry with it, to be manifested. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) might have deemed us exceedingly wrong in taking up that position; but he surely must have seen that, having taken it up, it was impossible for us to recede from it. We cannot, Sir, and we will not, place upon ourselves the responsibility of incurring risks of that kind. Now, the right hon. Gentleman says—"On Monday last you presented to us your policy; we were satisfied, and we voted the money; but to-night you have presented a policy with regard to which we are not satisfied, and, therefore, must have time to consider it." Sir, we have never presented to the House our policy. We have never professed to be able to place in the hands of the House the materials upon which alone it can satisfactorily or honourably to itself judge the conduct of the Government. On Monday night last, I expressly stated that I should say nothing except to go over the facts which I believed were notorious to the public at large; and, therefore, do not let it be supposed that it is a question of the presentation, sufficient or insufficient, of our policy. We have never professed to do it; we cannot do it until the transactions are completed. In that we are acting on a principle universally recognized. The mischief of repeated divisions of this kind is a very grave and serious mischief. We, the Government of the Queen, under our responsibility, tell the House of Commons that the consequences of opposition to this Vote, even under the form of moving the adjournment, which implies hesitation to the Vote, will be to imperil Imperial interests. Under those circumstances, we have no choice but to persevere in submitting to the House the confirmation of that opinion which has already, I regret to say, been voted by a large majority.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister says that if there is any hesitation in this matter it will look like hesitation on the part of Parliament. I wish to say that that would be a wrong and false impression. All we ask for is that more time should be given to consider the new statements made to-day. The Government have waited for a week since the day on which they received the assent of the House to their original proposal. The feeling of the House then shown was that of desiring heartily to support the Government, and to give such Votes as were required of it. That feeling, I believe, has not changed; but we know that important measures have been taken lately; we have been informed, to a certain extent, by the Government of what those measures are, and we are anxious in consequence to know what their real character is, in order that we may take care to see that the House and the country are not committed to that which may be dangerous in the future. But what is the answer which the right hon. Gentleman gives? He says—"We have never declared our policy." If the right hon. Gentleman has not declared his policy, and claims not to be bound to tell us his policy, he should not have told us so much as he has done. Last week, he made a statement as to what his wants were and as to the ground on which he was proceeding; and now he comes forward to tell us of the negotiations which are proceeding and which he hopes to complete and so place the matter upon a somewhat different ground on which it stood last week. We have no wish to oppose the policy of the Government, if we can understand it; but we wish to have a clear understanding as to it, and for that purpose we ask for more time and further opportunity of discussion. I do not think it is reasonable that this request should be refused; but, whether they refuse it or not, they must not misrepresent us as opposing the grant of money which is asked for, because that is not the case.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I only want to make one remark before the House goes to a division. The Prime Minister intends to persevere, and I gather from the words which have just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) that so do we. We shall see whether any majority is sufficient to override the legitimate wishes of 114 Members of the House of Commons. Now, I will give to the House a basis on which we can act, a basis which I defy any Member of the Government to say one word against. In 1878, the noble Marquess the present Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was Leader of the Liberal Opposition, and he resisted the Vote of Credit, and he resisted it on the very ground on which the Prime Minister has just furnished to the House. The Prime Minister said the Government had declared no policy to the House. As a matter of fact, I think they have; but that is what he says. Now, the noble Marquess, speaking on the Vote of Credit in 1878, said—

“It was a great and important principle that whenever a Government has appealed to Parliament for a Vote of Credit or for Supplies beyond the ordinary Estimates of the year, it has been in order to support some policy which has been formed and declared.”

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 111; Noes 169: Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 153.)

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had hoped that some Member of the Government would have himself moved the adjournment, after the result of the last division. He felt it his duty, under the circumstances, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Sidney Herbert.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the hon. Gentlemen who have voted with the minority cannot understand the position in which we are placed. They hold that it is their duty to ascertain, test, and prove the policy of the Government before they can vote this money. It is impossible, as I have told them, for us to lay our case before them until we are able to bring the Correspondence itself to such a condition that Papers can be presented. Those Papers will be our case. There is nothing that can be said in answer to questions to-day that can possibly place the case properly before you. Our case is upon the whole transaction and the whole Correspondence, and our conduct is according to precedent. I, of course, except cases where a number of Gentlemen are opposed to the Government and its whole policy or principle, like the case of 1878. The rule is that these demands are met by the House and granted by the House. As I have shown by a reference to the case of 1870, the trial of the conduct of the Government is taken apart from these Votes, which are deemed to be necessary in order to show both to the country and to foreign nations what are the intentions of the Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means when he speaks about opposing the Vote on principle. Whether you call the question now raised a question of principle or not, it is, at all events, a question of high policy, because it is a question of the steps to be taken to secure the safety of our Indian Empire. It is on that ground I want to know what the Government are pledging us to do by this matter of grant. It is because we recognize the very great importance of the question that we desire to have time to point out some of the difficulties and dangers we see or think we see in the course the Government are pursuing, and we hope to take this opportunity of doing so. We only ask an adjournment for a very short time—two days will be sufficient to give us the opportunity.

MR. GLADSTONE: I may explain that we cannot place our case before the House either to-night or in a couple of days.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must respectfully point out two considerations to the Prime Minister. He says that if it were possible to present the Papers, the Government would consider the propriety of our request for time. [Mr. Gladstone dissented.] Well, I will not insist on that. The Prime Minister said to-night that he thought he heard something fall from me; I thought I heard something fall from him; but, of course, if the right hon. Gentleman denies it, I will not press the matter further. Only two arguments have been urged against delay. One was that the money ought to be spent, and could not be spent until the Vote was passed. But the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War has told the House that it has already been spent. Therefore that argument can no longer be used. The other argument was that the hands of the Government would be weakened in the negotiations with Russia by the want of unanimity shown by the House. I think I can show the House how weak and fallacious that argument is—that Russia will raise her demands because she thinks that we are disunited. In what are we disunited? We are disunited because it is thought that the Government are giving too much to Russia. If there were a large minority who were practically Russian in policy, as the Opposition were in the last Parliament, I could understand that the expression of that Russian policy would weaken the hands of the Government. But the Opposition are now strengthening the hands of the Government, because the Government could say to Russia—"We cannot concede this or that point for if we do the unanimity we command in the House of Commons will be destroyed." So far from weakening the hands of the Government in these negotiations, I maintain that it would absolutely strengthen them.

MR. HEALY: I wish very respectfully to take the liberty of pointing out to the Opposition that they are scarcely going the right way of winning their demand from the Government. What I would do, is not to take so many divisions. I consider it a great advantage to an Opposition when they are able to debate a Motion for the adjournment of the House, or of the debate, and then, in spite of the New Rules, to discuss the Main Question. That is an undoubted advantage to the Opposition, which my Friends on these Benches never have. I would suggest that the Opposition should follow the course which has been successfully pursued below the Gangway, and that they should debate this question until the Government supporters have dropped away; and then, at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, they should take a division, and not till then.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I must congratulate hon. Gentlemen opposite upon the advice they have received from a proficient in the art of adjournment, and from so faithful an ally in the campaign. But there was one remark made by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) which was not elucidated by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). The hon. Member for Hertford said that the Opposition, in the course they were taking, were strengthening the hands of the Government in their negotiations with Russia, and that the Opposition were carrying on the campaign to-night because they objected to the Government yielding too much to Russia. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said I feared it was so.] I should like to know whether the contingent led by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan is actuated exactly by the same motive, and whether the two sections led by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) and the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan, acting in concert, are at one in their foreign policy, by which the hon. Member says they will be able to strengthen the hands of the Government in the negotiations? [Cries of "Order!"] I apologize to the House for leaving the question of adjournment; but I thought I was entitled to say what I have in reply to the hon. Member for Hertford, as I am anxious to know the exact views of hon. Members who are supporting this adjournment.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I think the right hon. Gentleman is not seriously anxious to terminate this discussion, for by the remarks he has made he has done much to prolong it for the next few hours. His speech was a deliberate challenge to Irish Members below the Gangway to get up in their places and say whether they agree with the right hon. Gentleman upon this matter; and this is the way in which responsible Ministers of the Crown, at this hour of the morning, waste the precious hours and moments of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department has challenged the Irish Members, who are never—to use a common phrase—as a rule very backward in coming forward to attack Her Majesty's Ministers. We have heard no substantial reason whatever, why the reasonable proposal now made should not be accepted. The Prime Minister went too far when he said we were challenging the whole of the Ministerial policy. We have done nothing of the kind. What we have said is that the statement of the Prime Minister was of so startling and so mysterious a character that it requires further elucidation than that which it has received during this debate. For that reason, and that reason alone, we ask for the adjournment, and I sincerely trust that the Government will consent to grant it.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that references had been made to what took place in 1878 during the course of the discussion, and he had since examined the report of the debate in that year on the Vote of Credit. He found that the Liberal Party on the occasion referred to, led by the right hon. Gentleman then on the Treasury Bench, occupied in the first reading of the Vote of Credit five nights, that the Prime Minister made a speech which covered 14 pages of Hansard, and that there was a further debate on the second reading on the Vote of Credit which also took up a considerable length of time. The Prime Minister made use of one or two sentences in the course of the debate which, with the permission of the House, he would like to quote. The right hon. Gentleman was opposing the Vote of Credit, and he said—

“It is asked for purposes in the dark, for purposes in the air, for purposes which are still behind the screen.”

Then there followed this remarkable addition, that—

“We have heard from Her Majesty's Government that probably the bulk of the Vote will not be wanted, and that the real object is to make us strong in the Council to be held.”

He might go on ad infinitum; but he would simply remind Ministers that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House—the present Opposition—had passed the Vote of Credit last Monday without a single criticism. Her Majesty's Government had waited a whole week before they brought forward the Report of the Vote, and that evening they confused the House with a statement so extraordinary and inexplicable that it would seem that they did not know their own meaning. Hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House now asked that the debate should be adjourned for two nights in order that they might be in a position to know the meaning and bearing of the momentous step to which Her Majesty's Government had committed the Empire. That was neither an extraordinary proposal nor an extravagant demand. They merely asked for an extension of time, and the plea that it was essential to the interests of the Empire that the Vote should be passed to-night was utterly absurd. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), as his hon. Friend near him had pointed out, had demolished that argument. The money was being spent, and he challenged any hon. Member to get up and say that the adjournment of the debate would in any way affect that. He trusted the Opposition would stand firm, and would not be intimidated by the hectoring manner just now adopted by the Prime Minister.

MR. D. DAVIES said, he hoped the Government would persevere and take the Vote that night, and he trusted that the Opposition would think better of the matter and allow the Vote to pass. In his opinion, if Her Majesty's Government had erred at all, they had done so in giving too much information to the House. He was convinced that if the debate were adjourned some mischief would result from it, and therefore he hoped the Government would stand by what they said and carry the Vote if they kept the House all night.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, to a certain extent he agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. D. Davies), that perhaps the Government had given too much information. The complaint of the Opposition was that the Government had a week ago given information of a certain character, and that to-night they had stated something altogether different. Under the circumstances hon. Gentlemen on those Benches wanted time to reconcile the two statements—that was to say, the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister when the Vote of Credit was introduced and taken, and the statement made that evening. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that it was the invariable practice for Votes of this nature to be passed without discussion; but he had not given the House any precedent for two entirely different statements being made by the Government on the same Vote. He believed he was stating the views of almost every hon. Member on those Benches when he said they had no intention of opposing the Vote of Credit.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, there was one remark which had fallen from the Prime Minister with which he believed the majority of hon. Members on that side of the House would be satisfied—it was that hesitation on the part of the House might have a very injurious effect. He was quite sure that hon. Members would appreciate the force of those words, because the many failures on the part of Her Majesty's Government had been clearly due to hesitation and timidity. The policy submitted to the House on Monday last was altogether at variance with the Ministerial statement of to-day. The Vote had been taken for the purpose of compelling the Russian Government to carry out their engagements entered into in 1873, and also on the 17th of last March. But the House was now asked to enter upon negotiations.

MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. Gentleman that the Question before the House is not the Main Question, but the Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," and to that, according to the Rules of the House, the debate has to be confined.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, he, of course, bowed to the ruling of Mr. Speaker. He was giving reasons why the Opposition were entitled to consideration at the hands of Her Majesty's Government in respect of the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

COLONEL NOLAN said, from an individual point of view he should describe the Prime Minister in this debate as having shown himself to be very firm, and the Leader of the Opposition very obstinate. There was a large number of hon. Members on both Benches, and as the debate seemed likely to continue for some time, he had to make the practical suggestion that it was impossible for a long debate to be sustained in the absence of proper Commissariat arrangements in the Lobby. He wished, therefore, that Mr. Speaker would give directions that the Supper Room should be kept open, as was usual in similar cases.

MR. RITCHIE said, he would ask the Government whether they thought that wrangling over the question of the adjournment of the debate was likely to strengthen their hands? The right hon. Gentleman could not but feel that, to say the least of it, there was a strong argument in favour of the Opposition having some further time for discussing this question—namely, that so far from there being any idea of weakening the hands of the Government, the object they had in view was, if possible, to strengthen them. He suggested to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it would not be possible to end this wrangle, and make arrangements to renew the debate at 4 o'clock to-morrow. No doubt, the Government would not necessarily have precedence to-morrow; but he thought it could be hardly doubted that no one would intervene to prevent the discussion being continued at the time named and brought to a conclusion. He trusted the Government would remove the necessity for further discussion of the Motion for Adjournment, which could by no possibility strengthen their hands.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 106; Noes 164: Majority 58.—(Div. List, No. 154.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BRODRICK said, that after the strong feeling shown by the Members of the Opposition in the three divisions in which the Government had had a decreasing majority, and the Opposition a corresponding increase in the number of those who supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, it was absolutely necessary for the convenience of the House that the Prime Minister should know that hon. Gentlemen on those Benches were prepared to pursue the course they had taken to the end. He sincerely hoped that the struggle would not be prolonged, seeing that it could have but one effect—namely, that of damaging the country still further in the estimation of foreign countries, and of still further discrediting the already damaged reputation of Her Majesty's Government in this matter. For his own part, he must say that the Members of the Opposition who had sat silent there and had heard the discussion had not heard one word from their side of the House indicative of a desire to act contrary to the wish of the Government in regard to the actual Vote in Supply. The contentions they had put forward had met with no reply from the Government except that of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, to which he (Mr. Brodrick) ventured to suggest that a sufficient answer had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour). He hoped that no further division would be taken; and he would put before the Prime Minister the fact that at that hour of the morning this controversy could only end in the Government being obliged ultimately to give way, in addition to the fact that the late Sitting would be chronicled and commented upon in every paper in the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Brodrick.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think it is much to the credit of the House or of anyone else to follow the example of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Brodrick) in expressing the great pain he feels on the present occasion. We also, and no doubt many others, feel great pain; but I do not know that it advances the case to allege it. The hon. Member says that the argument I used about giving a regular authority to the Government to spend money was entirely disposed of by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour). It is true that, in anticipation of the judgment of Parliament, before the question has been put to Parliament, it is frequently the duty of the Government in urgent circumstances to give orders; but giving orders is not spending money. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and laughter.] I believe that I am right in saying that no payment has been made by the Government under the circumstances in regard to which this Vote is now asked for. I believe there is no doubt about that. It is quite a different thing to proceed in anticipation of the Vote of the House, and where no opportunity has occurred to the House to give the Vote, and to proceed with money already voted. ["Question!"] I am coming to my point. Well, then, my duty is not merely to express my pain on this occasion, for that would make no one very much wiser; but my duty is to see whether there is any mode by which the essential part of the views entertained by both sides of the House can be met. Now, I understand—I have heard it from many speakers—that there is no intention to oppose this Vote. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: There is no pledge.] But the general tone of the debate has shown a disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to pass the Vote—they say they do not wish to oppose it. Well, what I propose is this. Let us have the Vote, as you do not wish to oppose it, and let us give you an early opportunity for discussion, which can be done in one of two ways. Which of these alternatives we should adopt I will not now discuss. One way will be to put the Order for Supply on the Paper for Thursday as the second Order. In that case, there will be an opportunity of raising a debate on this subject before going into Committee of Supply. That is one method by which the object desired could be attained. The other method—if there is no technical objection to it, and I should like to have a few hours to consider it—would be still more regular and appropriate—namely, that we should immediately obtain the Vote, which would enable us to bring in a Consolidated Fund Bill, and upon a stage of that Bill on Thursday the discussion could be had. I believe that, undoubtedly, in one of these two ways each side can attain its object. We shall get our Vote—a Vote which is essential to us, and which we require in the public interest—and you will have your discussion, which is the thing you want. We cannot produce our case until we are in a position to lay the Papers before the House, which we will do at the earliest possible moment. If you think the public interest demands further discussion, that can be had on the first day upon which it is possible for us to comply with the request.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has quite accurately expressed, I think, the general feeling on this side of the House. We do not desire to obstruct the Vote. We only desire to have an early opportunity of taking notice of and of discussing the important communication made to us at the beginning of the evening. As matters formerly stood, it seemed to us that our only chance of discussing the matter was on this Vote. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, however, has materially altered the aspect of affairs, and I should think his offer is one that can well be accepted.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the discussion is to take place in Supply, it must not be the first Order.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he will give an opportunity for this discussion on Thursday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, if we can manage it. I am not positive. I do not know that we can.

MR. RAIKES: It seems to me that the matter can be easily arranged if the right hon. Gentleman will put down Committee of Ways and Means as the first Order for Thursday. I presume that a Consolidated Fund Bill cannot be brought in in relation to this Vote until the money has been obtained in Committee of Ways and Means. I would suggest that we should have an understanding before the debate concludes to-night that the Committee of Ways and Means should be the first Order on Thursday. There can be no difficulty in fixing it, and the discussion could then take place at once.

MR. GLADSTONE: We bind ourselves to find an opportunity on Thursday.

MR. RAIKES: What I want to say is that any proposition to bring this matter on as a second Order on Thursday would be extremely inconvenient to the House. What we have been contending for, and what I venture to repeat to the Prime Minister with all consideration, because I have no wish to embarrass him in this matter, is the importance of having this discussion upon the first Order on Thursday.

MR. GLADSTONE: It will be so substantially, as it will be easy to put down as first Order a subject which will not occupy any length of time.

MR. BRODRICK: I shall be happy to withdraw the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that this Motion be withdrawn?

MR. O'DONNELL said, he wished to speak on that subject. He had understood that there was a serious opposition on the part of Her Majesty's Opposition to the Vote being passed to-night. It seemed, however, that after all the solemn declarations they had heard to the effect that it was a matter of principle that the Vote of Credit should be discussed, and that the policy of the Government should be explained before this money was granted, the Opposition would be satisfied with a Motion for talk's sake on Thursday next. He confessed that it seemed to him that the Front Opposition Bench had been trifling with the House. He had listened with great attention to the general arguments which had been brought forward, and which seemed to have completely changed the minds of the Opposition; and he confessed that, beyond the valuable and novel financial maxim that giving orders was not spending money, he was utterly unable to discover a single new light thrown by the Premier upon the subject. As he (Mr. O'Donnell) was a man of limited income, he only wished that the trading classes in general would accept this financial maxim of the right hon. Gentleman. Of course, deserted as the Constitutional Opposition had been by Her Majesty's regular Opposition on the present occasion, the only course he could take would be to object to the withdrawal of the Motion. It was very possible that the Irish Parliamentary Party would have something to say on the subject; but once more he must protest most strongly against all this discussion taking place to-night, and this picture of British disunion being held up to Russia, merely for the purpose of bringing forward a "talkee-talkee" Motion on Thursday next.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE NEGOTIATIONS.

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private Notice—Whether the proposal of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Afghan Frontier question is to be understood as one of mediation or of arbitration—that is, whether it is one inviting the good offices of a friendly Power, or one placing the question at issue in the hands of an irresponsible umpire, whose decision would be final?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, there are one or two Peers on the other side of the House who, I think, have not such a strong conviction as I have that no one is capable of putting Questions with greater authority or clearness than the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I entirely disagree with you.

EARL GRANVILLE: Therefore, I do not think it necessary, when the noble Marquess has put a Question one day, that some of his Friends should come to the rescue with another Question on the following day. To make it clear, at the same time I must say that I have nothing to add to what I stated yesterday; but as there is in the Question of the noble Earl something in the nature of censure upon what has been done, I should like to say that what has been done appears to me a very simple and honourable proceeding on the part of the States concerned. In private life I can conceive nothing better than that if two individuals have pressing matters of great practical importance to themselves, and supposing that a very disagreeable and regrettable incident has occurred which, to a certain degree, affects their honour, and on which they make counter statements and contentions—I think your Lordships will agree with me that it would be better to refer that question to the judgment of some friend in whom they may have perfect confidence to enable the matter to be closed with honour to both sides. That appears to me to be exactly what has been done in this case. The two nations were discussing a question of great importance—namely, the delimitations of the Frontier of Afghanistan—and a regrettable incident occurred which, rightly or wrongly, seems to affect the honour and interest of the parties concerned; and, instead of going to the ultima ratio, I think it is an honourable proceeding on our part to propose that reference should be made to the judgment of the Head of a friendly State, and I think it equally creditable and honourable to Russia that she should have concurred in that offer.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I must decline the office of universal Questioner which the noble Earl would confer on me; and after this competition between my noble Friend (Earl De La Warr) and myself, I confess that he has entirely carried off the palm. But I cannot for a moment attempt any competition with him, for he has got a longer speech out of the noble Earl than I ever succeeded in doing. He has not only done that, but he has obtained a revelation from the noble Earl of the fact which we have never heard before—that there are not only counter contentions but counter statements to be referred to the arbitrator. That throws new light on the matter. The only statements are those of General Komaroff on the one side, and Captain Yate on the other; and it appears that the truth or falsehood of those statements is to be referred to the arbitrator. I am exceedingly obliged to my noble Friend for having extracted that statement.

RAILWAY BRAKES—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it was their intention to take any steps this Session to make it compulsory upon Railway Companies to adopt efficient brakes in accordance with the regulations of the Board of Trade? He should not, he said, enter into details on this matter, as it had already, on more than one occasion, been discussed in this House. Two years ago, in consequence of the President of the Board of Trade undertaking to introduce a Bill dealing with the matter of brakes, he withdrew a Bill he had brought in dealing with that matter. Since then no steps had been taken by Her Majesty's Government to enforce the recommendations of the Board of Trade, which were accordingly, at the present time, disregarded by some of the most important Railway Companies in the country.

LORD SUDELEY said, that the answer which he had to give the noble Earl was that the Board of Trade could not undertake to promote any legislation during this Session in regard to railways.

PUBLIC HEALTH—CREMATION.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

The EARL of ONSLOW, in rising to call attention to the erection of a public crematorium at Woking and the cremation of a body there on the 26th March last, and to inquire whether Her Majesty's Government will carry out their expressed intention of using the powers which they possess in the matter for the discouragement of the practice; and what those powers are? said, that in 1874 the Cremation Society commenced to erect a crematorium at Woking. A Memorial, influentially and largely signed, was sent to the Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross) as a protest, and he intimated to the Cremation Society that any action on their part would be followed immediately by an attempt to test the legality of their proceedings. The Cremation Society then consented to defer any operations until the pleasure of the Home Secretary was signified. In the following year the present Home Secretary gave a very similar answer. But a case occurred in Wales some months ago, in which a Dr. Price cremated the body of a child, and legal proceedings being instituted against him, Mr. Justice Stephen expressed an opinion which was assumed to be in favour of the legality of cremation; but he laid it down that, even supposing cremation to be legal, it was only legal if so conducted as not to be a nuisance in the neighbourhood. In consequence of this decision a Question was again addressed to the Home Secretary, and he stated that it was still the intention of Her Majesty's Government to use the powers which they possessed in the matter for the discouragement of the practice. Since then the Cremation Society had so far completed their building at Woking that on the 26th of March they duly cremated the body of a lady. At present there were stringent regulations as to the burial of the dead; but inasmuch as the law never contemplated the burning of the dead, there were no laws whatever to regulate cremation. Their Lordships would feel that this was fraught with great danger, for cremation might annihilate all proof of foul play. The Cremation Society had, no doubt, certain regulations drawn up with a view to avoiding this, but these regulations had no binding force, and might be altered or abolished at any time. A Bill was brought in last year which proposed to make cremation a misdemeanour if done without the sanction of the Home Secretary; but it was not passed into law, and consequently there were no regulations whatever. There were 500 acres of ground at Woking devoted to the purposes of a cemetery, and not one-twentieth part of it had been so used, so that there was no necessity for cremation in that place. The inhabitants of Woking had been alarmed at the perfect immunity with which the cremation on March 26 last had been carried out, and still more so at a recent statement of Sir Spencer Wells, in which he intimated that the Society were now satisfied as to their legal position and were ready to receive bodies for cremation. This crematorium was one mile and a-half from any station and seven miles from any large town, and in a rather scattered portion of the parish of Woking, but it was surrounded by large public institutions. The unfortunate clergyman of the parish could see from his windows into the crematorium itself. There were other gentlemen in the neighbourhood to whom it was a great annoyance, and the feeling on the subject in the locality was very strong indeed. If the Government were anxious to encourage cremation, they had, not far from this place, a large portion of moorland which they might devote to the experiments of the Society. In answer to the Question he put the other day, the noble Earl said that the practice of cremation was so uncommon as not to require any legislation. He believed, however, that the time had now come when the Government ought to make up their minds. The inhabitants of Woking looked with aversion and disgust upon the erection of this crematorium, and they called upon the Home Secretary and Parliament to deliver them from the annoyance. He trusted that the Government would say under what restrictions cremation should be carried on, or give the inhabitants of Woking an opportunity of stating their objections to this crematorium. He begged to ask the Question which stood in his name?

The EARL of DALHOUSIE said, that he did not take any exception to the noble Earl's interesting speech; but, in answer to his Question, should have to repeat, in very much the same language, what he stated the other day, that Her Majesty's Government did not consider it any part of their duty to encourage or discourage the practice of cremation. As to the power which the Government had for dealing with the matter, the noble Earl had himself answered that question when he referred to the judgment given the other day by Mr. Justice Stephen. The Government had no power to interfere, and until the practice became so common as to be obnoxious to the people of this country, and they showed a more general desire to have legislation on the subject, it was not the intention of the Government to deal with it.

CHANNEL TUNNEL (EXPERIMENTAL WORKS) BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Amendment proposed, "That the Order be postponed until Tuesday the 12th instant."—(Mr. Webster.)

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he should like to know upon what ground the second reading of this Bill was to be again postponed? It had been put down upon the Paper for second reading once before and postponed, and he wished to know what reason there was why the discussion should not be taken now?

MR. WEBSTER said, he had moved the postponement of the second reading in the absence of his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster), who was unable to be present. He understood that the postponement had the consent of the parties interested.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, it seemed to him to be an extraordinary proceeding that this Bill should be put off in this way from time to time. To a great many hon. Members, who might admire the engineering skill displayed by the promoters of the Bill, it was a matter of great inconvenience to be obliged to come down to the House time after time at that early hour and sacrifice other important engagements in order to oppose the Bill, and then to find that its consideration was suddenly postponed. He understood that the President of the Board of Trade, who was absent at that moment, had decided upon giving a strong opposition to the Bill. If that was the case, why was not the right hon. Gentlemen now present, unless there were some strong reason to the contrary, in order to inform the House whether the Bill was to be discussed or not? This was not the first time that the second reading had been put off, and it would be a great convenience to those who had other matters to attend to if they could know when the discussion was really intended to come on, so that they should not be brought down to the House needlessly for the purpose of opposing the Bill.

MR. HICKS said, that as his name was down upon the Paper as objecting to the second reading of the Bill, he hoped he might be allowed to explain what he knew of this transaction. A fortnight ago he was told, at 20 minutes to 4 o'clock, that an arrangement had been come to with the President of the Board of Trade to postpone the Bill until that day; and two days ago he received an intimation from the promoters that they had again made arrangements with the President of the Board of Trade to put the discussion off until that day week. As an independent Member he could not himself refuse to accede to that arrangement; but he quite agreed with the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Hussey Vivian) that it was most inconvenient that a Bill of this character, in which a large number of Members took an interest, should be put off from time to time, and perhaps brought on in the end when hon. Members might not expect it. He must express a hope that it would now be clearly understood that under no circumstances would the second reading be put off again if it were now allowed to be fixed for that day week.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN remarked that as this was the second time the Bill had appeared upon the Paper, he did not think he would be doing wrong to move that the Order for the Second Reading be discharged.

MR. SPEAKER: That would be contrary to the usual practice.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN: Then I have no desire to press it.

COLONEL HARCOURT wished to say a few words upon the Bill if it would be in Order for him to do so.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman would not be in Order in discussing the merits of the Bill upon a proposal to defer the second reading until a future day.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND):— WORK OF THE COURT OF SESSION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is true that the work of the office of the Junior Lord Ordinary, which should be cleared from day to day, has fallen into arrear in consequence of certain Deputy Clerks of Session refusing to work during vacation; whether it is the case that, in consequence, the Junior Lord Ordinary, sitting in chambers, has been obliged to dispose of many cases without any clerical assistance; and, whether the Deputy Clerks of Session are, or are not, bound to discharge their ordinary official duties during vacation as well as during Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have not completed my inquiry into this matter; but so far as my information goes, it does not confirm the statements either that the work of the office of the Junior Lord Ordinary has fallen into arrear in consequence of certain Deputy Clerks of Session refusing to work during Vacation, or that the Lord Ordinary has been put to any inconvenience. The Deputy Clerks of Session have certain duties to perform during the vacation. They are necessarily not the same, nor are they so heavy, as their duties during Session; but I believe they are well defined by long established custom.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS; MANORHAMILTON UNION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the decision of the Local Government Board upon the claim of Mr. James Harte, candidate in the recent election for the Lurganboy Division, Manorhamilton Union, to have eleven proxy votes given for Mr. Thomas Conboy disallowed on the ground that the profit rents in respect of which the votes were given had been reduced under the Land Act since the proxy papers were lodged in 1881; also to have two other votes disallowed for incorrect filling up of paper; and to have allowed to the said James Harte two votes given for him by women occupiers who have paid the rates and been recognised as tenants for many years?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board are in communication with Mr. Harte, and await his reply to a letter they have addressed to him on the subject.

COMMITTEE OF PRIVILEGES — THE LOVAT PEERAGE — REMOVAL OF COFFIN PLATES FROM VAULT AT KIRKHILL.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to statements contained in The Dundee Advertiser and other Scottish newspapers concerning the alleged removal of coffin plates from the vault of the Fraser family in the parish kirkyard of Kirkhill, under the authority of Lord Lovat or his factor; whether, in view of the litigation now pending between Lord Lovat and a claimant to the Lovat peerage, and the fact that such coffin plates might be evidence of the pedigree of the claimant, such a proceeding is lawful; and, whether, having regard to the excitement caused by such proceedings in the North of Scotland, he will cause inquiries to be made as to the truth of such statements? The hon. Member added a further Question, as to whether the Lord Advocate was aware that Lord Lovat had taken this inopportune period to call a meeting of heritors, for the purpose of levelling the Kirkhill kirkyard in certain parts, and thereby disturbing graves and gravestones; and, whether he would take steps to induce Lord Lovat not to proceed further in the matter during the litigation now pending?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): My attention has been called to these statements, and I have caused inquiry to be made in regard to them. Briefly stated, the following appear to be the facts:—In the month of September last, Sir William Fraser, of Leadclune, asked Lord Lovat's permission to visit the vault in Kirkhill Churchyard, where a number of members of the Lovat family, including a grandaunt of Sir William Fraser, are buried. Lord Lovat granted the permission sought, and the fact that the permission had been granted was communicated to the minister of Kirkhill, who kept one of the keys of the vault, the other key, which was kept at the estate office, being at the same time forwarded to the minister. On 25th September, Sir William Fraser, accompanied by a gentleman, understood to be his secretary, met the minister by appointment at the churchyard, and, along with a blacksmith and a mason, went into the vault and examined the coffins. Sir William stated to the party that his chief desire was to ascertain whether Lord Simon, of the '45, was buried in the vault. In the course of examining the coffins, it was found that the plates on seven were lying loose upon the lids, the nails having become decayed, and the inscriptions on the plates were illegible, being covered with rust. I am informed that Sir William Fraser states that he did not direct the plates to be removed, but the persons in attendance understood that he did so direct, and it is certain that the plates were carried to the manse by the blacksmith and mason, and the minister, at Sir William's request, undertook to get them cleaned by a well-known jeweller in Inverness. A few days afterwards the minister took the plates to the jeweller, by whom they were cleaned, and also varnished to keep off the rust in future. They were afterwards returned by the jeweller to the minister, who, at the request of Sir William, had them fastened upon the coffins from which they had been respectively taken. Neither Lord Lovat nor anyone in his employment gave any authority for the plates or anything else in the vault being interfered with, nor had he or they any idea that any such thing was contemplated; and if Lord Lovat had been asked for permission to interfere with the plates, he would not have granted it. Lord Lovat only learned accidentally what had been done a considerable time afterwards. I have no information in regard to the last Question of the hon. Member, but I shall inquire into it.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the honourable Member for Leeds, Whether the Board of Works will apply the solution, which has proved so efficacious in preserving the stone of Cleopatra's Needle, to the Norman stonework recently uncovered by the demolition of the Law Courts at Westminster Hall?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: The solution applied to the stone of Cleopatra's Needle—the Indestructible Paint Company's stone solution—has not been tested for a sufficient length of time on that structure to enable a decision to be arrived at as to its efficacy. Moreover, the material of the Needle is of a totally different character from that of the stone work of Westminster Hall. Where the solution in question has been applied to defective pieces of the stone of the Houses of Parliament for test purposes it has not proved satisfactory. So far as can be judged, no solution will be necessary for the preservation of the Norman stone work of Westminster Hall if the proposed cloister building be erected to enclose it.

THE SCOTTISH ISLANDS—DEATHS IN THE ISLAND OF RONA.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, with regard to the two shepherds found dead in the Island of Rona, Whether the statement is true that they were placed in the island to prevent fishing crews from stealing sheep from thence, and that attempts at sheepstealing were made after they were stationed there; and, whether any steps were taken by the police or other authorities to verify, so far as practicable, the cause of death by examination of the bodies or otherwise?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The two shepherds were stationed in the Island of Rona to watch the tacksman's sheep. They went there in June, and were twice visited in August. In that month nine men landed on the Island and forcibly carried away five sheep and some tobacco belonging to the shepherds. The case was investigated at the time; but the men have not been identified. The Island, which is 40 miles from the Butt of Lewis, was inaccessible from the month of August till the 22nd of April. On that day the shepherds were found dead with their clothes on; one inside their house, and the other outside near the door. They had an ample supply of fuel and provisions. The bodies were buried without being stripped or examined. No marks of violence were observed. As soon as the case was reported a warrant to exhume the bodies was obtained by the Procurator Fiscal, and it will be executed as soon as possible.

DR. CAMERON asked when the order for exhumation was issued?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he would ascertain the exact date.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)— STATE OF THE RIVER LEA.

MR. JAMES STUART asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board, What steps are being taken to secure the immediate carrying out by the Tottenham Local Board of the sewage purification works in connection with the discharge of sewage into the River Lea, for which the Local Government Board have sanctioned the borrowing of the necessary money; what prospect there is of these works being completed before the summer; whether he is aware that Petitions to Parliament, setting forth the deplorable state of the River Lea from sewage pollution and the consequent danger to health, and praying for the speedy execution of the work, have been presented from 3,000 inhabitants of the neighbourhood, and from persons in the district using the river for purposes of recreation; and, whether, in the event of the purification works not being completed before the summer, he can say what steps the Local Government Board is prepared to adopt in case of the breaking out of an epidemic in the East of London consequent on the condition of the river?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have sanctioned a loan of £13,000 for works in connection with the sewage outfall of the Tottenham district with a view to the purification of the sewage before it is discharged into the Lea. We are assured by the Local Board that they will lose no opportunity of pressing forward the completion of the works, and that they will limit the time for their construction to the shortest practicable period. There is no probability, however, of the extensive works proposed being completed before the summer. In the meantime the Local Board will provide certain temporary pumping power. Two large new precipitating tanks have been completed. We are aware of the complaints as to the condition of the river during the dry season of last year; and we learn that recently, while a new sewer was being constructed, on two occasions one of the sewers broke, and until it was repaired the sewage found its way into the river. If the Local Board proceed promptly in carrying out the works proposed the Board do not at present see that they have any authority to interfere.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT—INSECTS INJURIOUS TO CROPS.

MR. RANKIN asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Agricultural Department has any reports or treatises upon insects injurious to crops, and especially to hops; and, if so, whether they have been published in a form suitable to farmers and hop growers, and can be obtained by the public?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Agricultural Department receive from time to time Reports from the United States of America and elsewhere containing information on insects injurious to crops; but there are not any Reports prepared by the Department itself dealing especially with the subject. I have given instructions that the Reports I have mentioned should be looked carefully through; and if it appears that we can extract from them Papers likely to be useful to farmers which could be laid in a small volume before Parliament this shall be done.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SURVEYORS' CLERKS.

MR. HEALY asked the Postmaster General, Whether there is at present employed in the Surveyor's Department of the Post Office in Ireland, as acting Surveyor's Clerk, an officer belonging to the London Office; is there no officer on the Irish establishment available or competent for the post; and, would the employment of an Irish officer effect a saving in the allowances paid by the Department to officers while travelling or absent from headquarters?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: An officer of the London Post Office is now employed as an acting surveyor's clerk in Ireland. At the time he was sent no officer on the Irish establishment could be spared and recommended for this duty. No appreciable saving would be effected by the employment of an Irish instead of an English officer, the allowances being the same. I may add that when recently I had occasion to appoint five surveyors' clerks in Ireland I selected five officers then serving on the Irish establishment.

POST OFFICE—ANNUITIES AND INSURANCE TABLES.

MR. RANKIN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will cause some simple and easily understood tables of Post Office Annuities and Insurance to be printed and placed in all post offices, so that comparatively uneducated persons may be able to learn the benefits offered by the Post Office?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that on the commencement of the Government Annuities and Insurance Act last year, the principal rules relating thereto, with simple illustrations, were circulated throughout the entire Kingdom, and are obtainable at any Money Order Office. A notice is exhibited at every office in which insurance and annuity business is transacted.

LIGHTHOUSES—BURNERS—SIR JAMES DOUGLAS'S BURNERS.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to his statement that Sir James Douglas, who had sold his patent rights in certain lighthouse burners for £5,000 in cash, and £25,000 worth of shares, had given the free use of the burners to lighthouse authorities, Whether it is true that he, or his Company, had restricted their manufacture to three English firms specially licensed for that purpose, and thus deprived the lighthouse authorities of the advantage of free competition, by public advertisement, in the purchase of these burners; and, will he say what sum each of the three licensees pays to the Company for this exclusive right to make these burners?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that there appeared to be an error in the statement attributed to him, as the figures should be £500 instead of £5,000. He had made inquiries from the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and they had informed him that there were only three firms who had any experience in the construction of these burners; but there were no such restrictions as those mentioned in the Question.

DISPENSARIES (IRELAND) ACT — DISPENSARY DOCTOR, SKULL DISTRICT.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the late Dispensary Medical Officer of the Skull District, County Cork, was also Medical Officer to the Constabulary of that district; whether, on his death, Dr. Shipsey, a man of long experience in his profession, was elected dispensary doctor; whether the County Inspector has appointed Dr. Sweetman, who has become qualified to practise medicine within the past few months, Constabulary Medical Attendant; whether this is contrary to custom; and, whether he will direct that Dr. Sweetman's appointment be cancelled, and that Dr. Shipsey be given the position?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Dr. Sweetman, who, I believe, was qualified at the time, was appointed Medical Officer to the Constabulary at Skull, on the occurrence of a vacancy in February last, and was then the only candidate. Dr. Shipsey, who has since been elected Dispensary Doctor, at that time resided at Dunmanway, over 27 miles away. It is not the invariable rule to appoint the Dispensary Doctors to these posts; but the Inspector General informs me that he understands Dr. Shipsey has recently taken up his residence near to some of the stations in Skull District, and he will consider whether it would not be advantageous to place these stations under his medical charge.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—THE CLERK OF THE SOUTH DUBLIN UNION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has come to any decision respecting the conduct of the Clerk of the South Dublin Union, in reference to whom a sworn information has been made, and who is alleged to have withheld the rate books from officials of the National Registration Association, while he allowed those of the Constitutional Club to obtain free access to them?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have to thank the hon. and learned Member for papers on this subject. The Clerk of the South Dublin Union denies the charges of partiality and neglect of duty made against him. The proper course appears to be that the person or persons considering themselves aggrieved should take proceedings to enforce the penalty imposed by Act of Parliament in cases of refusal to produce these books to parties interested. The mode of procedure is, I understand, a summary one, and the action of the Local Government Board would necessarily be guided by the result.

MR. HEALY: Why does not the Local Government Board hold an inquiry, as is usually done in such cases? Is there not a sworn affidavit on one side in this matter, and only the Clerk's word on the other?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: If this was an ordinary case of some misconduct by an official, that might be the proper proceeding; but, in this case, Parliament has laid down a specific mode of remedy, and that remedy ought to be adopted in the first place; and if in the course of such proceedings anything is proved against the Clerk, then it will be for the Local Government Board to take action.

WOODS AND FORESTS—THE FOREST OF DEAN.

MR. ACKERS asked the junior Member for Leeds, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to drain the deep gales of the Forest of Dean, and so bring into active working the great mineral wealth of this Crown property, and by so doing afford employment to a large number of persons, so desirable in this time of depression and scarcity of work?

MR. HIBBERT (who replied) said: The deep gales are in the hands of private owners, whose interests therein are of the nature of real estate, and whose tenure of them is conditional on the observance of certain regulations, one of which requires the owners to open and work the gales within a limited time. In these circumstances, the Crown obviously cannot undertake to spend money on drainage. The Crown, however, desires to see these gales developed, and with this object a Bill was presented last Session dealing with the subject; but this Bill, though approved by the gale owners, received no actual support from them, and had to be withdrawn. The hon.

Member is probably aware that various conflicting local interests are involved in this matter, and that there is not yet an agreement of local opinion upon it.

INFIRMARIES (IRELAND) ACT—DONEGAL INFIRMARY, LIFFORD.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How the County Donegal Infirmary at Lifford is maintained and managed, and to what classes of patients it is open; also, if John M'Sweeney, of Gweedore, who obtained from the medical officer of the Gweedore district, on the 26th of March, an order for admission to the Lifford Infirmary, and who is unable to travel, has yet been conveyed to the Infirmary; and, whether the conveyance will be provided?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board have not yet received replies to the specific inquiries they thought it necessary to make on this subject.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PROTECTION AT KILMOON, CO. CLARE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If an extra force of four constables, stationed at Kilmoon, county Clare, about fifteen months since, for the protection of a man named Gardner, who had taken a vacated farm, is still maintained at Kilmoon, although the farm in question has been unoccupied for months, and there is no one who can be said to be in need of protection; and, whether the extra force will be now removed?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The farm in question is not unoccupied, and protection is still considered necessary. The force is not an extra one.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — MR. HAMILTON, RESIDENT MAGISTRATE, ARMAGH — SALARY AND ALLOWANCES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the annual amount of the salary and allowances of Mr. Hamilton, R.M. Armagh; and, by how much they exceed the ordinary annual amount of salary and allowances to resident magistrates in Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Hamilton is in receipt of a salary of £800 a-year, and the ordinary allowances of a first-class Resident Magistrate—namely, £100 a-year commuted forage allowance, and £8 a-year for postage and stationery. His salary exceeds the ordinary salary of a Resident Magistrate of the first class by £125 a-year.

MR. SEXTON: Why, why?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The hon. Member did not ask me that.

MR. SEXTON: Then I will ask you to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE DEFICIT OF 1884-5.

MR. GORST asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any provision is made in the Budget for the deficit of £1,050,000, caused by the excess of expenditure over revenue in 1884-5; whether this amount has been added to the National Debt in the shape of Exchequer Bills or Bonds; and, whether any provision has been, or will be, made to pay off the floating debt thus created?

MR. HIBBERT (who replied) said: My right hon. Friend, in his Financial Statement, said that the deficit of 1884-5 had been taken out of the Exchequer balances, and in giving the amount of debt reduced in that year he subtracted the reduction in the balances. He also said that it was proposed to take power to issue for the amount of this deficit Unfunded Debt if it should be found necessary. The whole operation will be explained in the Treasury Minute which my right hon. Friend promised to lay on the Table.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked when the Minute might be expected?

MR. HIBBERT said, that it was being prepared, and would very shortly be laid on the Table.

WAYS AND MEANS — INLAND REVENUE—THE NEW BEER DUTY.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What amount of taxation falls upon hops per hundredweight at the present rate of Beer Duty; and, what will be the equivalent Tax under the proposed new Beer Duty?

MR. HIBBERT: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the Question. The Inland Revenue Board have had no knowledge of the quantity of hops used in the production of beer since the repeal of the Hop Duty in 1862; and there are, therefore, no means of calculating the amount of taxation that falls upon them.

MR. HICKS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, prior to the year 1880, the duty on malt was 21*s.* 8*d.*; whether, by the Act of 1880, a duty was imposed on beer equal to 25*s.* on a quarter of malt; and, whether it was now proposed to impose a duty on beer equal to 29*s.* on a quarter of malt, being an increase of about 16 per cent, in addition to the increase in 1880?

MR. HIBBERT: The actual duty on a quarter of malt before 1880 was 21*s.* 8½*d.*; but this was not the only tax on beer which had to be considered in fixing the rate of the Beer Duty, such as the brewers' licence. Malt was only taxed because it was a component part of beer, and occupied a similar position to sugar, which was and is taxed when used in brewing, though the general Sugar Duties have been repealed. In 1880 the Prime Minister estimated the total relief actually given by the repeal of the Malt Tax at 24*s.* 6½*d.* per quarter. The annual brewers' returns show that the Beer Duty at 6*s.* 3*d.* per barrel was almost exactly equal to this amount. The increase in the Beer Duty now proposed will make it equal to about 28*s.* 5½*d.* per quarter.

MR. ALLSOPP asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What was the rate of the incidence of the Malt Tax on a quarter of barley before the abolition of that Tax; what is the equivalent Tax on a quarter of barley at the present rate of the Beer Duty; and, what will be the equivalent Tax under the proposed new Beer Duty?

MR. HIBBERT: I answered an absolutely identical Question yesterday put by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon. The old brewers' licence was practically a Beer Tax. There is no necessity now to use malt.

MR. HICKS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, How it is that the Duty on worts of a specific gravity of one thousand and fifty-seven is stated in the Resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to be 7*s.* 6*d.* whilst in his Statement on Friday it was understood that he named 7*s.* 3*d.* as the proposed Duty?

Mr. Hibbert

MR. HIBBERT: If the hon. Member will look again at the Resolution he will see that he is under a misapprehension. the rate of duty on home-brewed beer having been fixed at 7*s.* 3*d.* per barrel. He has probably looked at the 10th Resolution, which relates to the Customs Duty on imported beer, instead of the ninth, which imposes the new duty on beer brewed in the United Kingdom.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—"THE DEATH DUTIES."

MR. W. H. SMITH (for Lord GEORGE HAMILTON) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it has been the general practice of the Inland Revenue to levy any Death Duty on a tenant's interest in the occupation of agricultural land in Ireland when inherited or acquired by bequest; and, whether his alteration of the existing Death Duties will interfere with the present practice?

MR. HIBBERT: I presume that the right hon. Gentleman refers to tenants' interests under the Land Act of 1881. Such interests are regarded as portions of the personal estates of the tenants, and are now chargeable with Probate Duty, and also, like ordinary leaseholds, with Succession Duty. But inasmuch as personal estates under £100 in value are exempt from Death Duties, many such interests are not taxed at all; while, if the whole personal estate does not exceed £300 in value, as a general rule a single payment of 30*s.* covers all Death Duties. No charge at all will be made in these cases, which must be very numerous. The rate to be added to the Succession Duty will not apply to any property which is subject to Probate Duty; and, therefore, the tenants' interests in Ireland which pay Probate Duty will only be affected by the proposed legislation in two particulars—namely (1), if the owner of such an interest possesses it absolutely he will pay a Succession Duty based on the capital value of the interest itself instead of his own life interest in it; (2) he will pay the duty by four yearly instead of eight half-yearly instalments.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE HIGHLAND CROFTERS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Lord Advocate, If his attention has been called to the statement that fifteen Crofters, who voluntarily surrendered themselves to the authorities at Portree, on a charge of deforcing a sheriff's officer at Waternish, were, while in prison at that place, served with notices of eviction; and, whether such a proceeding is regular or lawful?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): It is the case that the crofters here referred to came to Portree in obedience to citations which had been served upon them to appear on a charge of deforcing a Sheriff's officer at Waternish. I understand that summonses of removing were served upon two of them in prison, and upon another immediately after he came out. I cannot say that the service was illegal; but it is, I believe, generally regretted that the occasion of the men having surrendered themselves to justice was chosen for this proceeding.

TURKEY—THE BRITISH EMBASSY AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What arrangements have been made for the diplomatic representation of this Country at Constantinople pending the arrival of Sir E. Thornton?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir W. Hay White, Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the King of Roumania, is temporarily in charge of the Embassy at Constantinople, and has been specially accredited to the Sultan as Envoy Extraordinary ad interim pending the arrival of Sir Edward Thornton, who is unavoidably detained for the present at St. Petersburg. It was necessary to make this provisional arrangement, as Mr. Wyndham, the previous Secretary to the Embassy, who has discharged the duties of Chargé d'Affaires with great ability, and to the entire satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government, was required to proceed to Belgrade to take up his appointment as Minister there.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—POLICE DISTRICT OF JOHNSTOWN.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to, or any report received from the local constabulary, concerning extraordinary proceedings that have recently taken place in the police district of Johnstown, in the county of Kilkenny, that is to say, that Mr. Den. Keatinge, of Woods-gift, a deputy lieutenant and magistrate of the county, is in occupation of certain holdings surrounding his demesne from which the tenants have been evicted some two or three years ago; that the boundary fences of the same are in a very defective condition, rendering them liable to the trespass of stock; that Mr. Keatinge and his son, Mr. Maurice Keatinge, holding a Commission in one of Her Majesty's Regiments of the Line, together with a large posse of bailiffs, proceeded from their residence about midnight to those holdings, and dis-trained certain donkeys, goats, and sheep trespassing thereon; that they escorted those animals to the various residences of the owners, and knocked violently at their doors about one o'clock a.m., some of whom were thus coerced to pay the regulation trespass fines then and there to this local justice, and others, not having cash in their houses, remained indoors, whereupon a large and continued uproar ensued, and the doors of the dwelling-houses were battered and defaced, and, in some portions, smashed in; that especially the residence of the National school teacher of Grane, Mr. Maher, was similarly visited, and trespass for donkeys demanded; and that, owing to the difficulty of arousing the sleeping inmates, shouting and screeching and other noises were made use of, to the disturbance and terror of the inhabitants of the entire locality, extending over a considerable area, and finally the teacher himself was assailed in abusive language, and threatened with eviction; and, whether, even if such distresses are held legal, such unusual mode of proceeding, fraught with danger to the public peace, and adopted by a justice of the petty sessions district in which these dwelling-houses are situate, will be brought by the Executive under the notice of the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:

I am informed that the facts of this case are very much exaggerated in the Question. It appears that Mr. Den. Keatinge is in possession of some evicted farms on which cattle frequently trespass. On the night in question he visited the farms, accompanied by his son and two herds, and seized some sheep and donkeys which were trespassing. They then, as the law requires, proceeded to deliver them to their owners, who, in most cases, paid the usual trespass. They knocked several times at the door of the schoolmaster, who owned one of the donkeys, and failed to get a reply; but there was no such battering or breaking of doors, nor any such disturbance or abusive language, as is alleged in the Question, and the proceedings do not call for any notice.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—THE FREE FORCE.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, when the Royal Irish Constabulary Distribution Bill has received the Royal Assent, the Government is prepared to issue instructions to the proper authorities in relation thereto, that, wherever the "free" force is found insufficient (as is alleged by the local officials as to Kilkenny county) for the ordinary working of the several police stations, steps shall be taken to inquire into the propriety of some consolidation of the same, or otherwise, so as to have the extra force reduced altogether, or to a fair normal standard for each county; and, whether, in the event of an extra force being still deemed necessary for mere ordinary service, the Government will be prepared to provide that the expenses of the same shall be defrayed from the same source as the expenses of the "free" force, originally calculated upon the assumption that it was sufficient for the ordinary requirements of such county?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The effect of the new Distribution Bill will be that it will raise somewhat the number of the free force to be allocated to the counties. Where this number has to be exceeded, the cost of such excess will fall in equal proportions upon the county and the Imperial Exchequer. The Irish Government will continue to use every endeavour to secure that no extra force of Constabulary beyond the free quota is stationed in a county, and to keep such extra force, where necessary, at the lowest possible number. As the Government have to bear half the cost of any extra force, they are not likely to require a larger one than they consider absolutely necessary. It is, of course, within the power of the localities to give the Government very material assistance in their efforts in this direction.

EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION)—THE NILE FORCE.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the officers and men of the 1st Royal Sussex regiment, quartered at Abu Gees, have been compelled to do fatigue duty in the heat of the sun, and that many cases of sunstroke have occurred in consequence; and, whether such duty was absolutely necessary, or whether it would not have been easily performed in the mornings and evenings?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have received no Report whatever from the Nile in any way confirmatory of the hon. and gallant Member's Question.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked if the noble Lord would make inquiry?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If the hon. and gallant Member will communicate to me the information he has received, I will see whether it is desirable to make inquiry.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—SPAIN AND THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the proposed arrangement with regard to a reduction in the Duties upon Spanish wines will have the practical effect of binding this Country to maintain reduced Duties in the particular case of Spain, while no similar obligation exists as regards our relations with any other Country; and to inquire whether it is proposed that we should receive any advantage from Spain in return for this concession, or if we are to obtain nothing beyond the removal of certain special disadvantages to which Great Britain alone has been subjected?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not think I can add anything to my answer of yesterday to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), which the hon. Member will see fully answers the Question he has placed upon the Paper.

MR. MAC IVER said, he had referred to the answer, which simply referred him to certain Papers. He wished to ask whether the facts were not as stated in his Question?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the Papers to which he referred the hon. Member gave a full as well as a short answer.

MR. MAC IVER inquired if the noble Lord would have any objection to state whether the facts were not correctly set out in his Question?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I would refer the hon. Member to the words which I used yesterday. In these International questions I think it would be very objectionable, and, indeed, dangerous, to use different language on different days. I gave, in reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), a statement which I had prepared with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, showing the general effect of the arrangement which we had entered into with Spain in regard to the Commercial Treaty; and I do not think it would be advisable that I should to-day give another version merely because the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) is dissatisfied with the words which I used yesterday. If the hon. Member will kindly refer to these words he will see that they fully cover the ground of his Question.

THE SUEZ CANAL COMMISSION.

MR. PULESTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can conveniently give the House any information as to the progress of the Suez Canal Convention; and, whether it is true that it has been decided to allow each Power to have two ships of war to be stationed permanently at each end of the Canal?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Pending the deliberations of the Conference at Paris, it would not be convenient or customary to make any statement with regard to these proceedings.

CURRENCY—GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE—THE CONFERENCE.

MR. PULESTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to the approaching Conference of the Cotin Union, and to the fact that Mr. Secretary Bayard has instructed the United States Representatives at the European Courts to state that—

“The United States Government are willing to agree upon a common rate of value of gold and silver for coinage purposes whenever the European Governments are prepared to unite, with a view of securing an unlimited coinage, and making both metals a legal tender upon a ratio to be agreed upon Internationally;”

and, whether such a representation has been made to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether he can state what action is to be taken in the matter?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I am not aware that any representation has reached Her Majesty's Government. Any decision of Her Majesty's Government with regard to currency questions rests with the Treasury, and not with the Foreign Office.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state what is the present position of the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill in another place?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have no information on this subject which is not accessible to the hon. and learned Member; but I believe the Bill in question is under the consideration of a Select Committee.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government, acting on the advice of Lord Wolseley, have reconsidered their determination to evacuate the Soudan, and intend to revert to their former policy of smashing the Mahdi?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer to that Question would be simply to this effect—that instructions have been given to Lord Wolseley, in conformity with the declaration made in this House on the 22nd of April, in laying the Vote of Credit on the Table, and that we are in communication with Lord Wolseley and Sir Evelyn Baring as to the measures requisite for carrying into effect those instructions.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—THE LATE MR. F. POWER.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any recognition (as in the case of General Gordon's family) to the family of the late Mr. Frank Power, who performed important duties to the British Government at Khartoum, and who subsequently lost his life in attempting to leave that city at the request of General Gordon, and in company with Colonel Stewart?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the hon. Member will kindly allow me, I will answer this Question. The matter is under the consideration of the Government, and I have already been in communication with some hon. Members of the House on the subject. I shall be very glad also to communicate with the hon. Member.

BRITISH EMPIRE—THE NATIVE PRINCES OF INDIA.

MR. PULESTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to give official recognition, as in the case of the Australian Colonies, to the conspicuous loyalty of the Native Princes and Chiefs in India who have offered men and money to the Indian Government for the protection of the Country against Foreign aggression?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have made inquiries of my noble Friend the Secretary of State, and I understand that he has, by command of the Queen, desired the Viceroy to convey to the Native Princes and Chiefs of India Her Majesty's warm impression of their friendly and loyal conduct.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—RECALL OF SIR PETER LUMSDEN.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to recall Sir Peter Lumsden to London during the proposed arbitration and the discussion of the Afghan frontier; and, whether, if so, he will be commissioned later to complete the work of delimitation?

MR. GLADSTONE: In consequence of the decision that communications in reference to the main points of the Afghan Frontier should be carried on in London, there is a change in what will be required in the qualifications and character of the officer whose services will be required on the spot. Communications with Sir Peter Lumsden have taken place; and, I believe, in conformity with his own views, he has been informed that it is desirable that both he and Colonel Stewart should come home to London forthwith.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In the course of the statements made yesterday, in this House and in the other, with respect to the negotiations with Russia, the right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated that it was the intention of the Government to lay certain Papers on this subject without delay on the Table of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say "without delay."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think those words were used; at all events, they appear in the newspapers this morning.

MR. GLADSTONE: They were not used by me.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I understood the statement, whatever it was, not to refer to the whole of the Correspondence—of course that would be very voluminous—but to Papers connected with the immediate subject of the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman. It would be extremely convenient if the House were put in possession of these particular Papers before resuming the debate, and I would ask whether they can be in our hands before Thursday; and, if not, whether the debate might not be postponed for a few days to enable the House to obtain them?

MR. GLADSTONE: Unless my memory grossly deceive me, I never made an engagement to lay the Papers on the Table without delay. I think I may have said that there would be no unnecessary delay, and, further, that I was in hopes that no very long time would elapse before they were in the hands of Members. I had no idea of separating one part of the Papers from the other, nor, so far as I could see, would it be possible to give an adequate impression of this important matter without producing the whole Papers. We certainly are not able, depending as we are upon communications and transactions with foreign Governments, to give the House adequate information upon the subject until we have arrived substantially at a certain stage of the proceedings. We are not in a position to promise the Papers by any particular date. It would be deceiving the House were I to pretend that we could do so. With respect to the debate on Thursday, and its postponement, now that the Vote of Credit has been reported there is no matter of public importance that would issue on that; and we are quite willing to be governed by the convenience of the House at large and pay attention to what may be desired by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the date of resuming the debate.

MR. ONSLOW: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if we are to understand that Sir Peter Lumsden himself desired to be recalled, or that the initiative step recalling him was taken by Her Majesty's Government? May I also ask, if Sir Peter Lumsden and the gallant Officer next to him are to be recalled, whether the troops with them are also to go back to India, and by what route?

MR. GLADSTONE: I need not tell the hon. Gentleman that these proceedings are not matters immediately under my notice, and that I have no record in my own possession of the order of details. I believe what I said was in strict conformity with the facts; but as to the order of priority of the arrival of Sir Peter Lumsden's communication and the decision here, while my impression certainly is that the communication was received from Sir Peter Lumsden to the effect I have described before the decision here, yet I will not bind myself on that subject, as I had no Notice that this Question was to be put. If the hon. Member will put the Question on the Paper I will be glad to give an answer.

MR. ONSLOW: With regard to the troops who are with the Mission as well?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will find that out; but it is a matter more for the Under Secretary for India.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Yesterday the right hon. Gentleman gave us to understand that there was an Agreement under process of arrangement between this country and Russia, and part of it was the transfer of the discussion of the Frontier from Afghanistan to London. That was a portion of the Agreement which we understood from the right hon. Gentleman was in process of negotiation, but which has not yet been completely settled. I wish to know whether this part of the Agreement—the settlement of the delimitation of the Frontier—is now considered to be settled, or whether it awaits the final settlement which will take place on the whole Agreement; and, if so, whether Sir Peter Lumsden is to be recalled before the whole of the matter is completed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I never intended to convey that the arrangement to carry on the communication in London was a formal document. It is part of the communication between the two Governments, and it is agreeable to the views of the two Governments. Of course, if it be desired, we can ascertain the dates of any formal proceeding in relation to that matter; but it is not included in any document, and consequently I do not think the Question of the right hon. Gentleman requires any specific answer.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I should like to ask, in the first place, with regard to the Papers, whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the last official document produced to this House is dated in July last, a telegram from Sir Edward Thornton announcing the occupation of Merv; whether, with regard to Papers which relate to events that are past and over, such as Papers relating to the original despatch of the Mission and the Papers relating to the demand addressed by the English Government to the Russian Government in November last, that the Russian troops should retire—whether those Papers cannot be without loss of time laid before Parliament? In the second place, I should like to be allowed to ask whether, if Sir Peter Lumsden and his Staff and escort are to be recalled, the Government will have any sources of knowledge whatever as to the movements of Russian troops on the Afghan Frontier; and, thirdly, whether it is not the case that in the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier the Ameer was directly represented on the Staff of Sir Peter Lumsden, and whether the Ameer will be directly represented if the delimitation is settled in London?

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the third Question, I am afraid I cannot answer it with the requisite accuracy unless I have an opportunity of making inquiries; but there is no doubt we did think, at the early stage of the proceedings, that it was material that those connected with Afghanistan should have an opportunity on the spot of urging what they thought fit in regard to the Frontier; but the state of affairs has greatly changed in that respect, and since the interviews between the Ameer and Lord Dufferin the matter has assumed a different aspect. With regard to the noble Lord's second Question as to the withdrawal from the country of those persons connected with the Frontier Commission, the order sent has been strictly, I think, in the terms in which I stated it—namely, that it was desirable that Sir Peter Lumsden himself and Colonel Stewart should come home at once. I did not say that that order requires the withdrawal of all persons connected with it. With respect to the Papers, it is not for me to say, but for my noble Friend, whether it is possible to make any division of those Papers; but I must confidently state this opinion, that it is not possible to give to the House Papers out of which it could form an effective judgment unless these were brought down not only to the point at which we now stand, but to a further point which, I believe, will be rapidly reached, and which I trust and hope will enable us to place Papers on the Table within a short period, and give the House the opportunity of taking its own course.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: It was stated the other day that Mr. Stephen was on his way to England, and I understand that Sir Peter Lumsden and Colonel Stewart are also recalled. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the negotiations that are to be carried on in London for the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier will be postponed until these gentlemen have arrived in England, and are able to take part in advising Her Majesty's Government on this important subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not prepared to say that we are not sufficiently in possession at the present time of the advice of Sir Peter Lumsden, which is of the greatest importance in consequence of his accurate knowledge of that country. We are in possession of that advice as far as regards the work that has to be done in London. When I formerly spoke in the House, I stated that it was estimated that Mr. Stephen would require three weeks to reach London; but I find from recent information that the time will be shorter, and our anticipation is that he may reach London on Monday next.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me asking a further Question. Having understood from him that Mr. Stephen was in possession of very important information and a useful map, I should wish to ask whether those negotiations will be postponed until Mr. Stephen arrives with that information and that very useful map?

MR. GLADSTONE: The communications that we have about Mr. Stephen are very brief indeed. They are telegraphic communications, in one word. My own impression certainly is that Mr. Stephen is the bearer of important information; but that that information relates especially to all the facts and minute details connected with the engagement at Ak Tepe. I have no reason to suppose that it has been part of Sir Peter Lumsden's object to send to us any particular information as to the points of the Frontier.

MR. CHAPLIN: I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether General Komaroff is to be recalled as well as Sir Peter Lumsden from the Afghan Frontier; and, if Sir Peter Lumsden is recalled, by whom is the delimitation to be traced out on the Frontier, which, I think I am right in saying, the right hon. Gentleman informed us last night was an essential part of all these transactions?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no relation whatever between the case of Sir Peter Lumsden and that of General Komaroff. General Komaroff is the Commander of the Russian Forces. Sir Peter Lumsden has been engaged in the discharge of a civil office, for which he had the qualifications of great knowledge and experience. It would be an entire mistake to say that Sir Peter Lumsden has been recalled, because the sense conveyed by that word would not be borne out by the facts. The desire that your Representative should repair to the Metropolis in given circumstances need not in any way bear the sense of what is commonly understood by a recall. As to the latter part of the Question, care will be taken to appoint fit persons to delimit the Frontier. There will be no difficulty whatever in appointing fit persons. Of course, Sir Peter Lumsden has had other agents under him who are quite capable of discharging that important but, as I hope, not very difficult duty.

MR. ONSLOW: I should like to ask whether, considering that all the arrangements for Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission were made in this country, the Government will seriously consider the propriety of repaying to India the very heavy cost of this Expedition?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is hardly in the nature of a Question, and as to the preamble I am not prepared to answer it. The hon. Gentleman founds himself upon a statement that the body of certain arrangements have all been made in this country. I am not at all prepared to admit that that is the case, and I cannot consent to raise a subject of this kind in answer to a Question.

EGYPT—SUPPRESSION OF THE "BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN."

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT: I wish to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the words of the expression of regret with which Her Majesty's Government have associated themselves with the Government of Egypt to the French Republic; and whether, for the purpose of comparative philology, he will print in the same Paper the apology of the Prime Minister to Austria and of Earl Granville to Germany?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's Question does not come within the ordinary limits of Questions?

EGYPT (THE MILITARY EXPEDITION) —THE NILE FORCE—CONDITION OF THE TROOPS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State for War had been called to a statement which had appeared in The Standard with regard to the condition of the troops at Debbeh?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have seen the statement referred to as to the troops at Kurat near Debbeh. The statement must have been written from two or three weeks ago, and I trust the inconvenience then described has since been abated. On the 24th of April Lord Wolseley reported that nearly all the troops were in huts, and on the 1st of May Sir Redvers Buller telegraphed that the whole were under cover, meaning, I suppose, something better than tents. I do not understand the reference to unlined Bell tents. Indian tentage for 13,000 men is up the Nile, so that there should be a good reserve in hand.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked what was the percentage of sick? He understood that it amounted to 10 per cent of the troops.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that it was impossible for him to calculate exactly what the percentage of sick was. It was probably higher than four; but he had no reason to think that it was as high as had been suggested.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked, in the event of the debate arising out of the Vote of Credit being postponed to Monday, What Business would be taken on Thursday?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if to-day and Wednesday the House was able substantially to dispose of the Registration Bills he should propose to proceed with the Seats Bill on Friday. On Thursday the adjourned debate on the sum, not the Vote of Credit, would be taken; but if that were postponed until Monday the Army Estimates would be taken on Thursday. In the other case, the Army Estimates would be taken on Monday as the first Order.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REGISTRATION (OCCUPATION VOTERS) (re-committed) BILL.—[BILL 140.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Hibbert, Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

COMMITTEE. [FIRST NIGHT.]

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SIR MASSEY LOPES, in rising to move—

"That this House, while desirous of facilitating in every way the Registration of Voters, is of opinion that, inasmuch as the preparation of the Register for Parliamentary Elections is a matter of National rather than local concern, the expenses connected therewith should not be imposed on ratepayers in counties and boroughs, and levied in respect of the occupation of a single description of property," said, he had placed this Notice on the Paper, as he thought the subject was very important and would probably give rise to serious discussion. He had purposely given the Government some days to consider their response; but the response of the Attorney General the other day was eminently unsatisfactory. It amounted to this—that because some injustice was perpetrated on the boroughs in 1867 a much larger injustice should be imposed on the counties in 1885. This did not appear to him to be either legal or equitable. It was virtually saying that, in the view of the Government, injustice, frequently repeated, became justice, and that a wrongful act, if it was only repeated, established a right to do wrong. He did not think he could admit that principle. Circumstances had very much altered since 1867. In that year the local rates for England and Wales only amounted to £16,000,000, whereas in 1884 they amounted to £30,000,000. This was an increase of 87 per cent. The rates for the United Kingdom amounted in 1867 to £20,000,000, and in 1884 to £35,000,000. This was an increase again of 74 per cent. The debt was now becoming almost as formidable as the National Debt. In 1872 it amounted to £74,000,000, and now it was £170,000,000—an increase of 150 per cent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day made an appeal to the House, and referred to the great difficulty he had in providing for increased National Expenditure. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether ratepayers were not also taxpayers, whether they did not pay their fair quota to Imperial taxation, and whether local burdens were not something beyond and beside what they had to pay for Imperial taxation? He would also like to ask the right hon. Gentleman what the justification was for imposing further burdens upon real property? There never was a time when there was so much difficulty for all who were connected with the land in paying ordinary rates and taxes. There were thousands of acres in this country at present uncultivated, and not likely to be cultivated again. There were thousands of acres to be had without the payment of any rent, but simply by the payment of rates and taxes. Liberal Governments had always been in the habit of relieving Imperial taxation by imposing additional local charges for national objects. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had imposed an Income Tax of 8*d.*, and he must be aware that an 8*d.* Income Tax on real property meant a 1*s.* Income Tax. The First Minister of the Crown told the House in 1853 that a 7*d.* Income Tax was a 9*d.* Income Tax to the owners of real property. The owners of real property—that was, of houses and lands—paid at least 25 per cent more than the owners of any other description of property, whether personal, or trade, or professional. This was a matter which ought to be taken into consideration. The owners of real property paid upon their gross rents and not upon their net receipts. He had no hesitation in saying that there was no owner of real property—certainly no owner of land—who ever received 7½ per cent net; and sometimes it was far less than that. The First Minister of the Crown stated the other day that it was not the duty of the Government, in considering a Registration Bill, to take into account the incidence of the particular charges which such a measure involved, and he declined all responsibility. That was an extraordinary doctrine. It amounted to this—that the Government was to submit measures of reform, and, at the same time, to ignore the Ways and Means by which those measures were to be carried out. It was quite true that most of the social and moral reforms of the 19th century had been handed over to the local rates; and the Prime Minister did not think it necessary to provide for those things from Imperial taxation, but thought they should be charged on real property. The right hon. Gentleman also said, the other day, that the Consolidated Fund was supported, in a great measure, by the labour of the country. He maintained that that was a fallacy and a delusion. It might be a very specious and plausible argument; but it had no foundation. Was it not a fact that the labourer—namely, the poor man—necessarily paid no indirect taxes at all? If he chose not to drink beer or smoke tobacco, there was scarcely any tax that the poor man paid. He might evade and escape almost all such taxes, but if he lived in a house or a hovel he could not escape local rates. That might not be right; but it was a fact that he could do it; and it was a great injustice that he should be called upon to maintain pauperism, to pay for roads he scarcely ever used except to walk upon, and to make provision for police, and so on. As to the Amendment, he would ask the House to consider whether the exercise of the franchise was a national or a local responsibility? If, as he contended, it was a matter of universal and national benefit, surely it was not just that the owners of real property should be called upon to pay the expenditure consequent upon it. The expense was a legitimate charge upon Imperial funds. With regard to the cost of Parliamentary registration, he found that the charge in England and Wales was first imposed upon the rates in 1843. That was previous to the abolition of the Corn Laws, and land then enjoyed exceptional privileges. In 1845 the expenses amounted to only £20,000. In 1868 it rose to £39,000, and the effect of the new registration under the Franchise Act of 1869 brought it up to £71,000 in that year, an increase of 82 per cent. This was a very good criterion of what would probably be the increased expenses under the Bill now before the House. At present the cost of the registration of voters was £102,000, besides a charge on the county rate of £13,000. It would be difficult to estimate what the cost would be under the present Bill. It must certainly be far greater than it was in 1869. He had no hesitation in saying that, what with the expense of the Clerks of the Peace and other charges, the cost on the English rates alone would be nearly £100,000, and in Scotland and Ireland a corresponding amount. The registration in boroughs was comparatively an insignificant matter, and simply involved journeys from house to house, as the population was concentrated within a small area. But it was a much more difficult task in the country, where long distances had to be travelled, and frequently on horseback. Nearly every Session of Parliament brought additional duties to the officers, and especially to Clerks of the Peace engaged in registration. He had been informed by a Clerk of the Peace in Devonshire that with his present staff it would take about three months of hard work, up to 10 or 11 at night, to complete the Register. There were now 29,000 on the Register, and his friend calculated that the number would be from 75,000 to 80,000 under the new Act. The work could not be done without extra assistance of a good and reliable character. He had no doubt that in many other counties the increase would be just as considerable. They had been told that the addition to our local charges would be infinitesimal; but it was not so much a question of amount as of principle. It should be borne in mind how the rates had increased. There was, for example, the education rate, which they were faithfully promised should never exceed 3d. in the pound. He believed that the average in England and Wales was 1s. in the pound, with a prospect of becoming greater and greater. That was why they opposed any addition to the rate, because they had had many promises, none of which had been fulfilled. He would recapitulate some of the promises which had been held out to them during the present Parliament. In 1881 the Government said—"We are about to consult Parliament on the whole subject of the incidence of local taxation in a comprehensive manner." In the Royal Speech of 1882 they were told that Parliament would be invited to consider the proper extent and most equitable form of contribution from Imperial taxes in relief of local charges. In 1882 the Government again pledged themselves in the most solemn manner, upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Somerset (Mr. R. H. Paget), to deal with the whole question. On that occasion they only saved themselves on a division by five votes. In 1883 the hon. Member for South Leicestershire urged that no further delay should take place, and then the Government only had a majority of 12. The House would not forget that 31 Liberal Members, on the following morning, signed a Memorial to the Government to do precisely what they had voted against being done on the night before. Two of those Gentlemen were the present Under Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler), and the Secretary to the Local Government Board (Mr. George Russell). On that occasion the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert

[First Night.]

[First Night.]

Grey) moved an Amendment that relief should be given by the transfer to the Local Authorities of revenue proceeding from particular taxes. They all agreed in that. It was an excellent way of giving relief; but when were they going to get it? Nothing more had been done by the Government, who had merely trifled with the House. The hon. Member for South Northumberland said, on that occasion, that if the Government should not have solved the question before the termination of the present Parliament, Liberal candidates would not meet with a very cordial reception from their constituents at the next General Election. On a subsequent occasion the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) moved a Resolution deprecating further delay, and obtained a majority. But, notwithstanding their defeat, the Government had ever since ignored and disregarded the whole question. It was trifling with the House of Commons to treat it as the Government had been doing, shunting the matter from one Session to another. They had given the most solemn promises and the most sacred pledges that the question would be taken in hand by them; but the ratepayers, instead of getting any alleviation of their burdens, had had fresh burdens imposed upon them. They were to have an increase in the Death Duties, which was the only indulgence they had had. In bringing this question forward, he wished to include Scotland and Ireland as well as England. The question was one which affected not land only, but house property also; indeed, the latter more than the former, inasmuch as houses were rated at £125,000,000, whereas the assessment on land was only £66,000,000. The question was all the more important, as those who lived on the land were never in a more depressed condition than at the present time. He felt it to be his duty, as strenuously as he possibly could, to urge that demand, and protest in the strongest manner against any addition to the local rates. He should most unhesitatingly take the sense of the House upon this subject, because he thought it was only right that ratepayers in counties and boroughs should know who were in favour not only of perpetuating, but of aggravating, a grievance which the House of Commons and the country had admitted to be unjustifiable, unreasonable, anomalous, and indefensible. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. PELL said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Amendment, and was glad that his hon. Friend (Sir Massey Lopes) was going to take the sense of the House upon it. It had been said that these charges fell upon the occupier; but he (Mr. Pell) was prepared to prove that they could be shifted from the owner to the occupier. If the owner of a house, foreseeing the increase in local charges, should attempt to raise the rent in order to enable him to meet that increase, the answer might be that the tenant could not afford to pay the increased rent and would leave the house. When an owner of property contemplated the erection of houses he was forced to consider what rates might be levied on it; and when they were likely to be heavy he either built inferior houses or charged such a rent as would cover the rates. The result to the tenant was that he had either to pay a larger rent than would have been imposed but for the rates, or that he had to live in an inferior house. The poor man was thus affected injuriously by every charge added to the rates by that house. The Government appeared to be in a temporizing mood. They had not asserted that the charge was peculiar to real property, and that, therefore, it ought to be met by real property; but, frightened by the action taken by the House upon the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway, they proposed to aid the local rates in what they called the worst possible form—namely, by a subvention of 2*d.* a voter. Upon what principle were they acting? Was it only their intention to give a sop to Cerberus, or did they really wish to proclaim the opinion that the local ratepayers were not fairly treated, and that the Exchequer ought to bear some portion of the charge? Whichever might be the case, they must take the consequences of their act; and he trusted they would be such as the Government would remember. It was a curious thing that in dealing with this question the Legislature appeared never to have been guided by any principle. The 6 Vict., one of the leading Registration Acts, gave effect to the notion existing at the time that a person who claimed the vote should pay for his claim—in other words, that the vote was not, as the President of the Board of Trade might say, a natural right. One shilling was accordingly paid to the overseer by the claimant upon every claim. Afterwards, however, the Legislature got into the easy way of putting every charge upon the rates and relieving the individual, and this portion of the Act was repealed. The Government had stated that in connection with the Death Duties they intended to impose upon the successor to every owner of real property, who would necessarily be a ratepayer also, a very large and rather terrible charge. The present, therefore, was a very fitting opportunity for striving to obtain justice for the ratepayer in a diminution of the burdens now imposed upon him. He regretted that the question of local taxation, as compared with Imperial taxation, had not been settled calmly and coolly before then, and that it should be necessary to raise it when time was so valuable; but the subject had so often been postponed that it would not be right to let the present opportunity pass by. If this question was not settled now, Members below the Gangway opposite, who were so desirous of posing as philanthropists, would be encouraged in their demand that expenses of all kinds should be paid out of the rates. One of those hon. Gentlemen had, he believed, a Bill before the House which went beyond the proposition to put voters on the Register for nothing, while another was desirous of paying the candidate's expenses entirely out of the rates. He doubted, however, if hon. Gentlemen would stop even there; and he should not be surprised some day to see it proposed that the Members of the Cabinet should also be paid out of the rates. He hoped that those hon. Gentlemen who by their speeches in the House last year appeared to give some support to the views of his hon. Friend, and who, when they reached the country, went still further, and expressed such warm admiration for those who desired to relieve the ratepayers, would stand by the opinions they then expressed, and record their votes with his hon. Friend; thus rendering a great service to the ratepayers as well as obeying honestly the convictions within their breasts. He trusted that his hon. Friend would press his Amendment to a division, and that those upon the Register would notice how they were treated by their Representatives.

Sir Massey Lopes

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, while desirous of facilitating in every way the Registration of Voters, is of opinion that, inasmuch as the preparation of the Register for Parliamentary Elections is a matter of National rather than local concern, the expenses connected therewith should not be imposed on ratepayers in counties and boroughs, and levied in respect of the occupation of a single description of property," — (Sir Massey Lopes,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that the hon. Baronet who moved the Resolution had raised three distinct questions, which were outside the question before the House. In the first place, he raised the question of the general incidence of local taxation; in the second place, the relationship of taxation as between capital and labour; and, lastly, the question as between taxation on real and on personal property. These questions might be brought to bear more or less, no doubt, upon the question immediately before the House; but they did not touch upon the Resolution of his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, nor had they shown that that proposition was not a fair and adequate one to make under the special circumstances of the case. He did not feel disposed to accept the figures which the hon. Baronet had given to the House as being strictly correct. The incidence of local taxation between real and personal property, he quite agreed with the hon. Baronet, was most unjust and most unfair. There was no part of our local and social administration which was more radically unsound than the incidence of our local taxation. He did not mean to say that it did not press most unfairly upon occupiers of land; but what he contended was that it pressed more unfairly upon tradesmen in the towns. So far, he was perfectly agreed that it was the duty of the Government and of the House to take up this question at the earliest possible time, and to take it up broadly and boldly, and not in a nibbling sort of way, which would have the effect of relieving one class and not touching the larger class of residents in the boroughs, who had just as much right to complain. The hon. Baronet stated that the local taxation of this country some few years ago amounted to £16,000,000, and that now it was about £30,000,000. He did not know from what statistics the hon. Baronet had cited; but he would give the House statistics from the latest published Returns of the Local Government Board. Those Returns showed that the local taxation of this country now stood, in round figures, at £28,000,000, and that 10 years ago it stood at £18,000,000, giving a clear increase of £10,000,000. The years to which he had referred were 1872-3 and 1882-3. How was that taxation apportioned? From the debate in that House it would seem that it was levied exclusively upon the occupiers of land. Of the taxation of last year, £5,500,000 was raised by the Metropolis; £10,500,000 in the municipalities, £10,000,000 in mixed urban and rural districts; and only £2,000,000 in purely rural districts. Of the increase of £10,000,000 which had taken place in the last 10 years, £6,500,000 had fallen upon the urban ratepayers; £1,250,000 upon the Metropolis; £1,250,000 upon the urban and rural ratepayers; and the only addition to the purely rural taxation of this country in the last 10 years had not been much more than £500,000. Under these circumstances, whatever grievance there might be in the rural districts, it was far stronger in the municipalities and towns of this country. With reference to this special grievance, which was always occupying the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite, there was one rate which they regarded with peculiar disfavour—the School Board rate. But what were the facts? That rate last year produced £1,750,000, of which amount £700,000 was raised in London, £550,000 in the municipalities, and the balance of the entire amount was charged upon the rural districts. In dealing with this question of local and Imperial taxation, and of the unfair extent of local taxation, they must recollect that the large amount of the latter was levied upon towns, which were subjected at the present time to Imperial taxation, the amount of which hon. Gentlemen opposite were entirely and absolutely ignorant. The average county rate in England last year was not quite 3½d. in the pound, and the average poor rate was only 2s. in the pound. He should like to know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite were familiar in the rural districts with local rates of 7s., 8s., and 9s. in the pound, with which people in the town were familiar? Where was there a large rural district paying a rate of 7s. 6d. in the pound? Then the hon. Baronet also raised the question of the relative proportion of taxation as between property and labour, and he told the House that no labouring man in this country need pay any indirect taxation at all. Of course, if they reduced the labouring man to a mere machine, if he was to have no enjoyment in his monotonous life, and to be deprived of the enjoyment which others so lavishly partook of, he might escape the great bulk of taxation. But it was too late to say that a labouring man must not drink tea or beer, and must not smoke tobacco, and that he must live upon bread and water, and pass the day in one unvarying round of toil, and be content to live in that state of life to which it had pleased a wise Legislature to call him. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware of the fact that one of the most frequent purchases at the present time was the purchase of a pennyworth of tea. The largest business which some grocers did was the selling of pennyworths of tea to working men's wives; and for every penny a labouring man's wife put down upon the counter she put down a halfpenny for the Imperial Exchequer; for every shillingworth of tobacco purchased by a labouring man 10½d. went to the Government. Of course, the labouring man ought not to smoke—[laughter]—he was quite aware of that. Then, again, 2d. out of every 1s. which he paid for his beer went to the Exchequer; and that was now to be increased. He was quite prepared, when the proper time came, to prove that the Imperial taxation of this country pressed unfairly upon the industrial population, that property did not pay its fair share of taxation, and that the reforms in our future fiscal system would have to be conducted on the principle of placing further burdens upon property and less taxation upon industry. Another question was raised by the hon. Baronet—namely, that of the taxation which should be levied upon real as contrasted with that which should be placed upon personal property. That was a very broad and wide subject, and, as the hon. Baronet had intimated, it would be fully and fairly discussed when the whole question of the Death Duties came before the House. Some of them thought that real and personal property, as far as Imperial taxation was concerned, were not upon the same level, and that real property ought to be put upon the same level as personal property. So far as local taxation was concerned, personal property did not bear its full share. A calculation had been made upon this subject, which calculation he thought was too unfavourable so far as the working classes were concerned, and by giving it to the House he would be rather quoting against himself; but he would read the figures in order that the House might see the relief given to local taxation and the expenses of Imperial taxation as they affected the working man. It was calculated that of Imperial taxation two-fifths fell upon industry and three-fifths upon property, and that of local taxation five-sixths fell upon property and one-sixth only upon industry. If, therefore, they transferred payment from the local to the Imperial taxes, they would relieve the working man to the extent of 3s. 4d. in the pound and put upon him a burden of 8s. in the pound. How did these questions practically affect the question before the House? The hon. Baronet admitted that the legislation in 1867 did wrong in putting the expense upon the boroughs. That legislation was the legislation of the Conservatives, and there was no proposal at that time to charge the expense upon the Imperial fund. The action taken by the hon. Baronet implied that the Government were making a new proposal, and that they were for the first time imposing new burdens upon the local rates. The fact was that the cost of this legislation had never been borne by the Imperial Exchequer but by local rates, and the Government were simply proceeding upon a principle which they found in force. If hon. Gentlemen opposite had the courage of their convictions they should propose that all the cost of registration should be taken off local rates and put upon Imperial funds. Somebody, however, must pay the Imperial taxes; and the more they subsidized the local rates, the more they increased the Imperial taxation. The number of county voters was to be increased by something like 1,000,000, the numbers being raised from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000. At the present time the only item that appeared in the accounts locally published as representing the cost of registration was the item of £12,572. That, the only item which the counties paid for this purpose, was something like a rate of one-tenth of a farthing in the pound. That was not a great grievance to begin with. He should be told that he had forgotten the overseers, and that they and their expenses were paid out of the poor rate. But what was the work that was now to cost so much? The overseers had practically to make out but one new list. The ownership voters would remain as they were before. The £50 voters would remain precisely as before. The £10 voters were precisely as before. The list of householders would be the new list. The overseers made out that by simply copying the rate-book. There was no difficulty about it, if only the rate-book itself were properly made out to begin with. It was simply so much copying work and nothing else. If Local Authorities were lavish and extravagant in paying overseers, the Government could not be held responsible for that. The additional labour would be thrown upon Clerks of the Peace, who would have to arrange and classify the lists, to send them to the printers, and to correct them. He admitted there would be an increase of the work thrown upon the Clerks of the Peace. All the labour in respect of the existing registration of voters was paid out of the £12,500 a-year he had named. Assume the works to be doubled, and there would be a claim for £25,000. The Government had proposed to make a grant of £20,000. At present the expense was something like 3d. per name. At this rate the new list would cost £28,750. As the Government were proposing to give an extra £20,000, the cost would be instead of £12,500 only £8,750. Therefore, the Government grant would be equal to a contribution of £3,750 in aid of the rates. The Committee took some evidence as to the expenses incurred. A Clerk of the Peace in one of the largest counties said that the work was done, including the printing, at a cost of 6s. 6d. per 100 names. It was proposed to allow 1*d.* per name, or 8*s.* 4*d.* per 100. It would be a strong measure to import this question of the incidence of local taxation into so small a matter as the registration of English county voters, and practically to throw out the English Registration Bill, and so produce a state of things in which the work could not be done within the limited time. Admitting that there was a strong claim for some relief of local taxation, it would be admitted that the boroughs were entitled to their share of the relief, and that there would have to be an investigation of their claims. This was a premature and unfair way of raising the question. It did not enable the House to come to a fair and just decision. They were fighting one issue, and talking about another. He did not believe the House would be prepared to interfere with the work of registration for the purpose of dealing with the question of local expenditure and taxation, and, therefore, he hoped they would decline to support this Motion.

[First Night.]

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) who had just sat down, and it was a fresh proof that everybody connected with the Government was always ready with all sorts of excuses for not dealing with the question of local taxation, as it affected local rates. The hon. Gentleman stated that it was a very inconvenient time for bringing on the question; but he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) thought that they should avail themselves of every opportunity to call attention to the vast importance of the whole subject. The Government had always put them off with evasive answers on the question of local taxation, and when the Conservatives had won a victory on the subject, the Government had treated them with sovereign contempt. The Under Secretary, who had just spoken, stated that the sum asked for registration was only a farthing, or a trifle in the pound.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The tenth of a farthing.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT, continuing, said, a Friend near him had stated that the new registration would cost £200,000, and the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had estimated the cost at £102,000, and, if that was so, he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had a right to complain of the additional burden that was being placed upon local rates. He knew that the rural districts had suffered most severely, the small towns as much if not more severely than the rural districts, from local taxation; and they were always asking when the promised relief in local taxation would take place. The Prime Minister, in a speech to his tenants, had said that the question of the Death Duties would not be dealt with until that of local taxation had been settled, and put them as a set-off against relief to be given to local taxation when Local Boards were introduced.

MR. GLADSTONE: Will the hon. and gallant Gentleman give me the reference of that speech?

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he would try if he could not find it. The right hon. Gentleman always asked for a reference. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) recollected the speech very well. It was the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman recommended the growth and production of jam, that more dairies should be established, and that more milk should be produced. It was a speech the right hon. Gentleman made at Hawarden. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the question of the Malt Tax. [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman laughed, and, therefore, he saw that he recollected it.

MR. GLADSTONE was understood to say that he had not made any reference to the Death Duties in the speech referred to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman were always kept preserved, and it was, so far as he remembered, in a speech delivered to his tenants, and, if he chose, he could find the speech that he referred to; and if, after having made the search, it was proved that he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was mistaken, he would apologize to the House and to the right hon. Gentleman. But accepting the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as he had given it, they were to have, in the dying days of this Parliament, the Death Duties put upon real property; while, with regard to this question, local taxation was only to receive temporary relief, and the permanent solution of the question was to be left to the new Parliament. If such a question was to be left for the new Parliament, how much more expedient would it be that the new Parliament should be left to deal with the graver questions of the Death Duties? That would be more rational than legislating upon them at the present time, simply because the Government were in pecuniary difficulties, and were compelled to increase taxation. The new list of voters would greatly increase the labours of the overseers, and they would not like to do it without special remuneration. A Parliamentary election was an Imperial question, and ought to be treated as such. The hon. Member might be returned for Wolverhampton, but he was a Member of the Imperial Parliament. To-day the hon. Member had spoken only for the Government, but on this question he would yet have to speak as a Member of the House of Commons. A great cry was now raised in the country in favour of encouraging the class of small proprietors of land. Only that day he had found that in Wales, through the inclosure of commons, there had been a large number of persons who had, out of their savings, purchased little properties, and every additional halfpenny of taxation put upon that class would be so much to their detriment. They were a class who were endeavouring to do their duty as responsible citizens honourably; and surely they ought to be relieved as much as possible from the extra local taxation placed upon them by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He believed that the £20,000 proposed to be given for this year was wholly inadequate to the requirements of the case. When he remembered how many men there were rolling in money, and having investments in this and in foreign countries, who paid little or nothing to the taxation of the country, but who were fond of propounding nostrums as to the land, he said let them purchase a large quantity of land, and they would see what the burdens upon it were. Then those who were interested in land might feel that they had advocates of their cause, and it would be recognized that the burdens now pressing on land were very hard to bear.

Mr. W. FOWLER said, he felt great sympathy, as the Under Secretary for the Home Department also said he did, with the Motion before the House, and agreed that it was certainly to a large extent an Imperial matter. But the hon. Baronet opposite had not the courage of his opinions; he ought to take that burden off the inhabitants of towns, about which he was so solicitous, if it was to be taken off those of the counties. They might by that Resolution stop that Bill, but they would not alter the law; and there was no clause in the Bill in regard to boroughs at all. If the proposal before them raised the whole question, he should have considerable sympathy with it; but he thought that the money which the Government offered would provide what was required for the present year, leaving the matter to stand over till another year, when the whole question of local taxation would be dealt with. Therefore, while thinking it was a great hardship that local burdens should be placed almost entirely on one class of property, he considered that the House ought to pass that Bill and to accept the offer of the Government.

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD said, it was because he believed that the present system of local taxation was injuriously affected the owners and occupiers of property in towns as it did those in the country that he felt a sympathy with the proposal of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes). If anyone looked at the Domesday Book they would find that a very large proportion of the owners of land consisted of men who owned less than one or two acres. Therefore the landed interest did not simply comprise the great proprietors, but a large struggling class, on whom they ought not to impose unjust burdens. It was urged that that was a very small point on which to raise the question of local taxation; but if they did not call out when a small additional piece of injustice was piled on their backs, they would never have an opportunity of raising the main question. They were told to wait till Ministers brought on the question of county government; but if they did that they might wait one, two, or three years before they received any redress for a crying grievance. In the United States of America he was informed that every citizen was assessed, an account was taken of his income from all sources, and local taxation was levied on that income just as they levied Income Tax for Imperial purposes. In passing the present Bill they might as well have a measure of justice done; and he did not see why an injustice should be permitted to go on even in that particular instance.

Mr. HENEAGE said, that if the Government had intended to throw the whole expense on the rates he should have gone entirely with his hon. Friends opposite; but he thought that the Government had now, by their proposition, met the question very fairly. That was not an expense which, to the same extent, was likely to rise again before the question of local government and local taxation was dealt with; and he did not think that any Government could stand even for one year in another Parliament if it did not seriously undertake to deal with that question. If he were returned to the next Parliament, he should himself, if necessary, press it upon their attention. But the point now to be considered was whether the proposition which the Government had made was a fair and adequate one. No one had tried to tackle the figures of the Under Secretary, and he thought that the proposition of 2*d.* per name was a very fair one. Of course, if Quarter Sessions increased the salaries of their clerks, there might be an additional sum to pay, and there was the danger of magistrates not taking the same trouble to keep down expenses if everything was paid by the State. It must also be remembered that the people of boroughs had to pay towards Imperial taxation as well as other people, and not having a subvention, they did not get anything towards their own registration. As a matter of fact, the boroughs were really paying towards the registration of the counties. Under all the circumstances he hoped that the House would accede to the proposition of the Government, which he would, for his own part, support as a fair and adequate one.

Mr. R. H. PAGET said, that the idea of subventions leading to extravagance was an erroneous one. Such an assertion was, in his opinion, utterly destitute of truth. He thought that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) in his speech had considerably underrated the extra amount of work that would be thrown upon the overseers. The hon. Gentleman had seemed to fancy that it would be a mere bagatelle, that they would merely have to write down the names. He would ask the hon.

Member whether he had consulted the Attorney General upon the subject as to his view of the extra trouble given to the overseers by this Bill? It was serious and difficult work, and, in addition to that, in some ways, it would be new work, and the overseers would certainly be entitled to ask for additional remuneration which would represent a considerable sum. That was an amount which they could not leave out of their calculations. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton had in his figures called attention to what he had considered the smaller amount of additional taxation which had been laid upon land in comparison with that laid upon house property. But had the hon. Member considered that it was all a matter of assessment? From year to year the rentals of land were becoming reduced, while, on the other hand, those of house property were increasing. That circumstance ought clearly to be taken into consideration in connection with this comparison. The Under Secretary in giving them his figures as to the incidence of the education rate had entirely forgotten the voluntary schools subscriptions. Speaking from memory, he thought he would not be far wrong in putting this amount down as exceeding £600,000 a-year, which was really a burden on the land, because the moment these subscriptions ceased, down would come the Authorities and tell them that they must have a School Board. The money had to be found from one source or another, and these voluntary subscriptions must, therefore, not be left out of the account. With regard to dealing with the whole question, he thought that the Government had repeatedly neglected to carry out the wish of the House, disregarding the majorities which had been again and again given against them on this question. The difficulties of agriculture were greater than last year; and it was no exaggeration to say that at the present moment there was more inquietude among the farmers of England, despite of reduced rents and all that had been done, than there had been for years past.

Mr. SPEAKER said, it was his duty to inform the House that the debate had shown a tendency to wander from the immediate question, which was the preparation of the registers with respect to Parliamentary elections. With this observation, he should leave the hon. Member to conclude his speech.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, there was a difficulty in confining the discussion to the narrow points raised by the Resolution. The remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had extended to the larger field of local taxation, and it had been his (Mr. R. H. Paget's) object to show that this was a proper moment for partially redeeming the promises of Parliament with regard to relief from the burdens of local taxation. They asked that no further expenses for registration should be imposed on the local rates. The Government had come down with £20,000; but he wished they had been a little braver, for it was necessary that this entire subject should be dealt with broadly and widely.

MR. CROPPER said, he thought that there was a material difference between the present demand and the previous occasion when the House had affirmed the principle of granting relief from local burdens. The general principle of relief was affirmed on former occasions; now the Government had met the demand by offering to provide a subvention as compensation for the extra amount of work required from county districts. The real grievance rested with the heavily-rated boroughs, which would not receive the subvention. However, he should vote against any further extension than was proposed by the Government.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had not intended to take any part in this debate; but after what had fallen from hon. Members opposite, he felt compelled to say a few words. He more particularly referred to the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler). He hardly thought that the Resolution could have been read by hon. Members opposite, who said that it proposed to relieve counties and did not affect boroughs. The Resolution affected both equally. It sought to grant relief to boroughs by declaring that these burdens should not be imposed on ratepayers in counties and boroughs and levied on a single description of property. A rich or a poor man who held property in land and houses paid all the cost, while certain wealthy persons in the same neighbourhood whose means were drawn neither from land nor from houses paid nothing at all. That was what they were fighting against. This was a national and not a local concern, and it had already been recognized that where it was a national concern the ways and means should be found out of the national income. What did the Resolution propose? That the expense of this national concern should not be imposed on the ratepayers. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) seemed to say that the expense of the whole registration was so great that the Government could not listen to the proposal for a moment. But the hon. Member tried to show that the expenditure was only one-tenth of a farthing.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that was the existing expenditure.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was the increase that was objected to. The injustice of the existing state of things was admitted, and the burden ought to be thrown on the national funds. It was the only way to make the burden fall equally on all. Where was the remedy to be found? Whenever this question was brought forward someone of more or less authority on the Government Bench was always ready to get up and urge that this was only a part of a larger question which the Government would deal with, and that the question must wait until the larger subject was dealt with; but the larger question had never been approached. The present Government had been in Office for five years, and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had made local government one of the great questions in his speeches when contesting North Lancashire, and yet matters seemed exactly where they were five years ago. But the ground taken by his hon. Friend was a very intelligible one; it was that if the Government could not find time to remove the grievance, at least no new national charges should be thrown on the local rates. Then it had been urged that the Resolution would stop the Bill; but he altogether denied that. Of course, there was no saying what the Prime Minister would do if it was passed; but there was nothing in the Rules of the House which would make the Resolution any impediment to further procedure with the Bill. In conclusion, he would implore the Government not to leave the question in its present state. In his opinion, the £20,000 offered by the Government was a mere sop, and would leave the boroughs untouched.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite had said that this was a question in which boroughs were as much interested as counties. He thought the Under Secretary for the Home Department had proved that boroughs were a great deal more interested than counties. The right hon. Gentleman opposite supposed that borough Members were not alive to the extraordinary charges made upon real property in the boroughs. They were alive to it. They could present a case to the House as strong as, if not stronger, than county Members could present for relief, because there had been a depreciation of property going on for many years in the boroughs as well as in the counties. But borough Members held that this was not the opportunity to raise or satisfactorily settle so large a question as that of local taxation. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had been discussing a sentimental grievance, because the burden upon the counties was not to be increased under this Bill; but, in consequence of the compromise proposed by the Government, it would be in all probability some thousands of pounds less. He was curious to understand how it was the Tory county Members took so much interest in the burdens on the boroughs after having been silent upon the subject since 1867. He believed, speaking as the Representative of a large constituency, and as knowing something of the feeling of a group of boroughs within a few miles of his own constituency, having jointly an assessment as large as that of the counties of Devon and Sussex, that they were opposed to its discussion on an occasion so altogether inadequate as the consideration of the Registration Bill. Let the counties bear the burden for 18 years, as the boroughs had done, before they cried out. He thanked the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) for the speech he had delivered, and he warned hon. Gentlemen connected with the landed interest of the inexpediency of raising questions in regard to local taxation. Hitherto the landed interest had had great authority, and almost a monopoly of power, in both Houses, and they had framed loans and imposed taxes as suited themselves, regardless of the interests and feelings of the ratepayers. A great change had come over the feelings of the people of this country. It was likely that in the next Session of Parliament a good many of these questions would arise, and it was a policy of great shortsightedness on the part of the right hon. Gentleman opposite to anticipate the coming day by raising these discussions.

MR. HOULDSWORTH said, that if any apology were needed for his addressing the House he thought he should find it in the expression of surprise by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) that no Member representing a borough had spoken in support of the Motion. He was not concerned to deal with the Motion at large, and he would be ruled out of Order if he attempted to speak on the larger question of the incidence of local and Imperial taxation. He was not even concerned after the speeches already made to deal with the question of the counties. He desired to represent the condition and the claims which boroughs had upon the Government, especially in view of this Motion. They had before them the proposal of the Government. That proposal seemed to proceed on two assumptions. One was that there should only be relief where additional expense was incurred, and the other was that no additional or special expense was put upon the boroughs at the present time. He maintained that both of these propositions were unsound. It was not only in cases where additional expense and additional work were thrown upon the officers charged with the duty of registration that relief should be given from Imperial taxation, and additional expense was thrown by the present Reform Act upon the boroughs. He was very glad to hear the sympathetic remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department, with regard to the incidence of taxation in boroughs; and he thought he might take his figures and his arguments to show that the incidence of taxation was quite as severe upon the inhabitants of boroughs as it was upon those in the counties. He was very glad that the principle, at any rate of relieving taxation for a purpose of this sort, was affirmed by Her Majesty's Government in the proposal which they had made. There was evidently nothing in principle against assistance to taxation for the purpose of registration; and it would seem to him strange if any principle opposed to such relief could be stated, for this certainly was an Imperial question. He had heard some remarks made with regard to the importance of local expenditure being under local control, and he thoroughly subscribed to that principle; but this was not a question where much difference could be made in expenditure in different places. He could understand that argument being used when the representation of localities was more unequal; but the ground was completely taken from that argument now, when the great mass of the people were voters, and when they had very nearly approached to equal electoral districts. He would put before the Government the fact that they in boroughs had under this Reform Act some additional work and expense as regarded registration. Hon. Gentlemen opposite might suppose it was not a very large increase, still it was very substantial. He would remind the House that most, if not all, boroughs had enlarged boundaries, which drew a number of county voters into the boroughs, thereby causing additional work and expense. If relief were to be given at all in this matter it ought to be given permanently and not temporarily. In every borough it would be found that a very large proportion—some 10 to 20 per cent—of those who appeared on the overseers' list had no business to be on the Register at all. It was, no doubt, very desirable that work of this sort should be done economically; but the first thing to be considered was that it should be done as perfectly as possible. He had heard it argued that if the expenses of registration were transferred from the locality to the Imperial Treasury there would be a great deal of extravagance. He did not quite see why this should be the case, and he did not think that extravagance would take place. It did not appear to him that, if the Local Authorities did their work properly, they would have very much control over the expenditure. They might, of course, give their officers a large amount of salary; but if the latter did their work perfectly there would be a certain sum which could be easily ascertained paid per voter, and this sum might be granted by the Treasury to the various boroughs. The Government had proposed 2*d.* per vote in counties; and he would undertake to say that it would be easy in boroughs of different sizes to form a scale of the sums necessary for registration from year to year, and that sum could be transferred from the Imperial Treasury. On these grounds he ventured to urge strongly upon the Government the case of the boroughs. The time had arrived when, both in counties and boroughs, the expenses connected with this important work of registration ought to be transferred to Imperial taxation, and thus the political Parties who were at present doing a great deal of that work for the country would be relieved of it, while there would be no longer an opportunity afforded of giving one-sided registration to a political Party.

MR. DUCKHAM, said, that he should support the Motion of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) on principle. He considered that there could be no object more completely national than that of electing Members of the House of Commons, whose duties were to deal with the whole interests of the Empire; that being so, he felt that the cost of registration of voters should be treated as a national question, and not be imposed upon the already overburdened ratepayers. It had been argued by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) that, hitherto, the registration fees had been paid exclusively by the boroughs; and, since it was not objected to by the ratepayers in the boroughs, upon the passing of the Reform Bill of 1867, no alteration should now be made. He (Mr. Duckham) felt that it was not a question for the rural more than the urban ratepayer; both had hitherto borne their share of the burden; it had not fallen exclusively upon either. But about the year 1867 the poor rate appeared to be considered as the most elastic means of raising money, and almost every conceivable burden was placed upon it; but that did not justify its continuance. He considered that the time was come when real property should be relieved from burdens for national objects. Hon. Members had talked as though the lists of borough electors having been made out, no further expense was incurred; but that was not so, there was an annual heavy expense incurred. He was glad to know that the Government admitted the principle for which he contended, by their offer of 2*d.* per head registration for the counties; but he failed to see how such an arrangement would satisfy the ratepayers in boroughs. He would instance that there were now many old boroughs disfranchised, and many new ones constituted. The disfranchised boroughs were added to the county electorate; their registers would not be altered, beyond corrections; yet they would be entitled to receive from the National Exchequer a registration fee of 2*d.*, whilst the fees for registration in other existing boroughs and the newly enfranchised boroughs would be borne by the ratepayers. He argued that such an anomalous state of things could not be considered to be a fair and equitable adjustment. It was not the case that subventions were extravagantly spent. He was himself Chairman of the Ross Highway Board, and could assure the House that the expenditure was now quite as economically conducted as before the main road grant of £250,000 was paid. He therefore earnestly appealed to the Government to treat the question on the broad principle, and make such an adjustment as would be acceptable, because equitable to all alike.

MR. WHITLEY said, he could not have believed that any borough Member in the House, on whichever side of the House he sat, could vote against the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon, for if ever there was a case which interested those who were Members of boroughs, he ventured to think it was the Motion which had been brought forward so ably by his hon. Friend, and there had been no answer to the argument which his hon. Friend had brought forward. The only argument which had been advanced had been the old argument of delay. He would be very willing indeed to rest the case of the boroughs on the speech they had just now heard from the Under Secretary for the Home Department. On that speech he thought he proved the position that whatever might be the position of the counties the boroughs lay under a great disadvantage. Everyone who was acquainted with boroughs would know that local taxation had increased in every way, and must be of opinion that what followed in the great towns was closely connected with the increase of local taxation. At the present time, in his own city, which was divided into nine divisions, there was an immense amount of property that paid taxation. There was, undoubtedly, a lot of property occupied, so that people paid rent without rates. It was one of the most fertile subjects which could well occupy the attention of the statesmen and philanthropists of the future; but he wanted to know why the House should not avail themselves of the present Bill, in order to bring their grievances before the Government, and in order to impress upon the Government the great importance of forthwith giving whatever measures of relief they could in the position they were placed in? He thought they were very hardly placed indeed. The Government opposed the course suggested by the hon. Member for Dudley (Mr. Sheridan), because the country was not granted relief in 1869, and put that forward as a reason why they should not have relief now. He might point out that much had occurred since 1869. Local taxation had increased, and had increased very much, and what was a slight increase at that time had become an intolerable burden at present. How were they to deal with these things unless they took advantage of the present Bill? Government proposed to make some relief—small and quite inadequate. They proposed to give relief to Ireland, and at the same time acknowledged that the burden of taxation pressed most heavily on cities and boroughs, and yet they refused to boroughs the relief they proposed to give to counties. Let him refer to the speech made the other day by the President of the Poor Law Board, that they would meet the case by giving relief to Ireland, that they would give a certain measure of relief to towns, but not to boroughs. The only reason was this, that it was an old taxation, and that it was an old borough, and therefore upon that ground alone he justified the refusal to give to boroughs any relief at all. Would that bear investigation? If, upon the statement of one of the Ministers that night, the burden of taxation was heavy on boroughs—if they had been long-suffering and patient, was that patience and long-suffering to be thrown in their teeth, and were they to be told on that account that they were to have no relief at all? "But," said the right hon. Gentleman, "I believe the boroughs will not unfairly have an increase of taxation." He (Mr. Whitley) was sure his right hon. Friend and those who sat opposite were entirely in error. There would be a very large amount of increase of taxation. Look at the divisions in Liverpool. There was one division almost entirely taken out of the county, and why should they not have some measure of relief in that division? It was a totally unfair position that they, as Members for boroughs, and their constituents were placed in if the Government would not give way, and grant them some measure of justice. They complained that they were unfairly treated by the measure now before the House by the relief the Government had proposed, and he could not conceive it possible that any Member for a borough could fail to agree with him that in the course the Government had taken they had taken an unfair course with regard to the boroughs. He believed this question of local taxation was a very important one. The Speaker had ruled—and properly ruled—that the House could not, on an occasion like this, go into another subject than that before the House. That was the old, old story—that in the far future some remedy might be applied; but why should they defer it to a future day? They had been promised long, long ago that liberty which they claimed at present, and they had a right to claim it at the hands of the Government. The Government were going to increase taxation. They professed to do all in their power to reduce their local taxation. They admitted that it was a great and a growing evil. In every speech they heard from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the grievances of local taxation. Boroughs were growing in every direction; and yet, whenever the opportunity came, and whenever there was any hope given of obtaining some relief, they were always met by the old, old cry, "We are not able." That was the position they were in. They had heard of the large increase of taxation that had taken place, especially in the towns, and it was going on to an intolerable extent. The case which he brought under the notice of the Government was—"While you are endeavouring to offer some dole, some slight relief, to the counties and to Ireland, you deny to the boroughs of England, the cities of England, and the villages of England, that relief which they thought they have a right to demand at the hands of the Government." He had heard, from time to time, most touching speeches from the other side with regard to the increase in the number of peasant proprietorships. He represented a city where the working classes held by far the largest portion of the land in the city. Their holdings extended in every direction. Were the Government going to free these working men, and yet ruin the working classes by giving them proprietorships in name only, and by imposing upon them this oppressive amount of local taxation? He did hope and trust that when the right hon. Gentleman opposite rose he would be able to say that the Government had reconsidered their position, and that they were not prepared to sit still and hear their Colleagues admit the very facts he was endeavouring to press upon them, and yet to refuse that relief which they had a right to demand. If they did not do so he trusted that all the borough Members would have the courage of their convictions, and, no matter on which side of the House they sat, come forward and carry the Motion by a large majority.

MR. HARRIS said, he rose to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon. The speeches that had been made from the opposite side of the House contained no arguments, and were it at the power of the hon. Baronet to exercise a right to reply to them, he would have but little trouble in doing so. In the first place, he imagined that his hon. Friend would say that the proposals of the Government were totally inadequate; and, secondly, he would argue that as these registration charges were recurrent that a small grant for this year only was no proper attempt to meet the case. It was quite true that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had endeavoured to persuade the House that the temporary subvention now proposed was, in fact, more than the extra cost of the registration would be;

[First Night.]

but if that were so, how easy was it for the Government to grant all that the hon. Member who proposed this Amendment had asked for. Then we should know how we stood. At present it was all doubt and uncertainty, and the calculations of this side of the House were widely different to those of the Government; in fact, hon. Members on this side of the House regarded the offer as simply a sop preceding a General Election—a sop which would not give offence to the supporters of the Government, but at the same time would by no means meet the case. He admitted that this grant ought to be made to boroughs as well as to counties. Most of the previous speakers had laid stress on the heavy burdens incident to the agricultural interest, and he agreed to the full in all they had said. Agriculture in this country was undoubtedly burdened in a manner that no other business would for one moment allow. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton had given statistics which would go out to the country, by which he maintained that the amount of local taxation incident to purely rural property was only about £2,000,000 per annum; but this was totally illusory. The mixed urban and rural property was admitted by the hon. Member to bear a further burden of £10,000,000 per annum, and some land used for agricultural purposes likewise fell into the category of "urban," being within the limits of boroughs. Careful calculations had been made by agricultural experts as to the amount of local taxation borne by the agricultural land of England and Wales, and these resulted in an almost unanimous agreement that the proportion belonging exclusively to farms amounted to £7,000,000 sterling per annum; but this was not all, for in hundreds and thousands of parishes the school rate, instead of being included in the assessments, had been made a voluntary rate which did not enter into the published accounts of local rating. Then, again, the land had to bear the support of that most useful institution called the National Established Church—an institution which he trusted would long fulfil its useful functions, but whose benefits were certainly not confined to the farming interests. These charges, added to the Imperial charges, such as land tax and other Imperial burdens, brought up the taxation on the produce of land to such a point as no hon. Gentleman opposite, who was not directly concerned in the cultivation of land, would believe possible. The hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) said, in his speech, that landowners had much to learn and much to unlearn, and that it was dangerous for them to approach these subjects seeing that the feeling was to place much heavier burdens on agricultural land than it now bore. He was not at all afraid of the threats of the hon. Member for Bradford. He would be only too glad as a yeoman farmer, which he was, to compare his position as to taxation with that of the hon. Member for Bradford. The hon. Member for Bradford bought his raw material—wool—free from all duties or taxes of any sort. He (Mr. Harris) as a farmer got his raw material by the employment of labour and science upon the soil; but by the mode of rating adopted in this country this raw material was taxed up to the hilt. Again, he, as a yeoman farmer, had to compete with men in the United States, who had the advantage of the raw material extracted from rich virgin soil comparatively free from taxation or burdens of any sort. From statistics which he had most carefully collected in the United States he could assure hon. Members that the taxes on corn production in the United States did not amount to one fourth part of what the burdens other than rent in this country amounted to. Seeing, then, what a fierce competition was now going on between the farmers in the two countries, could it be wondered at that the Representatives of the British agriculturists should band themselves together as they were now doing to resist all increase in their burdens? Comparing, then, his position with that of the hon. Member for Bradford, he would first say that the manufacture of food should not be put in a worse position than that of cloth; in fact, if the two be considered, that the food was the more important of the two. Secondly, if the hon. Member for Bradford enjoyed legislation which gave him his raw material of manufacture free of taxation, the farmer ought to enjoy the same benefits. Thirdly, the raw material which the farmer used being English raw material, while the raw material of the Bradford manufacturer was almost all produced abroad, was an additional reason why the home produce should be freed from taxation. He knew well that hon. Gentlemen opposite would reply that there would be a danger of such relief going to the landlord. He (Mr. Harris) had no landlord, and he failed to see why he should be unfairly taxed because other persons chose to have landlords, or because landlords chose to have tenants. The fact of the matter was that landlords, tenants, and labourers were all interested in this matter. What affected one affected all. The burdens had now advanced to that extent on the industry that land was being abandoned, and the poorer land of this country would rapidly go out of cultivation. The industry was, in fact, being strangled. He had read a most interesting speech a short time since, made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain), where he compared the taxation of himself and that of the agricultural labourer. The right hon. Gentleman had discovered that he was only paying 3½ per cent in taxation on his property, which evidently consisted mostly of personalty, whereas he tried to prove that the agricultural labourer was in an indirect manner paying 7 per cent. Other investigators had, however, conclusively shown that the agricultural labourer was only paying 4½ or 5 per cent. He (Mr. Harris), as a farmer, thought hon. Gentlemen would be rather surprised when they heard what he was paying. Taking his profits by agriculture for the last 10 years, and reckoning no rent for his land, he found that he had paid more than 30 per cent on the net income which he had received. What agriculturists asked for was that such wide anomalies should be promptly rectified. In France, although local taxation on land was less than in this country, the farmers had found that they could no longer succeed against foreign competition with such exceptional burdens, and they had induced the French Government to return to Protective duties on corn and meat. He did not suppose that many Members in that House would support the same policy in England; but if we were to be without Protection, it was all the greater reason for our being placed in such a position as to be able to hold our own against the foreigner. As far as the principle was concerned, the boroughs had an equal claim with the counties for relief; but the agricultural interest being far more necessary to the country than any other, the counties had really a superior claim.

Mr. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that the House was not discussing an abstract Resolution, but an Amendment upon a specific point in the Registration Bill.

Mr. HARRIS said, he was sorry if he had offended against the Rules of Debate. What he intended to show was that agriculture could not bear any additional burdens at the present time. The responsibilities of the owners of agricultural land in this country at the moment were unusually great. The system of agriculture was undergoing great changes, and the outlay required for new buildings and various other improvements was very large. Any proposal of an increased taxation was, therefore, most impolitic from a national point of view. Speeches such as they had heard from the hon. Member for Bradford were too common. They induced a want of confidence which prevented the outlay of money in our own country. Was it likely that men of property would chose to sink their money in improvements at home if they knew that these improvements when made were to have heavier taxation put upon them? Would they not naturally prefer to invest their capital in countries that had some regard to the maintenance of the industry of agriculture? In conclusion, he regarded this proposal of the Government as the last straw which break's the camel's back. It might not amount to a very large percentage of additional burden; but he set himself against all additions to the burdens falling on industry from a national as well as a farmer's point of view, and he heartily supported the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon.

Mr. ROUND said, that he desired not to give a silent vote upon the question under discussion, but to add his protest to those of other speakers on the Conservative Benches who resisted the proposal of the Government to throw even a portion of the expenses of registration upon local ratepayers. He knew the amount in question was not considered large; but he contended for the principle, that charges of a national character should not be imposed upon one description of property only—namely, houses and land. He was glad to hear the hon. Member the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department say that the general incidence of local taxation was most unfair, as, indeed, many other hon. Members and right hon. Members on the Government side had frequently declared; but what he wanted was to see those hon. Members act up to their words and vote that the present system of local taxation was unfair. So long as new charges were imposed upon the rates, and such expenses as those of registration were continued to be charged, so long were they perpetuating a system which they admitted to be unfair. The whole community—and not one portion only—should bear the expense of such charges as registration. He represented an agricultural district which had suffered as much as any other county from the continued depression, and though other causes had mainly contributed to bring about the serious losses which occupiers of land had sustained, the incidence of local taxation had pressed most heavily upon them, and they felt it more keenly as it was an evil which the Legislature could have done much to remedy. Large landowners might be represented on the Government Benches; but he believed that small landowners and occupiers were specially interested in this question of local taxation, and it was on their behalf he appealed. The Under Secretary of State for the Home Department had admitted the large increase in local rates which had taken place in the last 10 years; and though he (Mr. Round) was well aware the large proportion of this was due to the towns, he reminded the House that the increased burden of the rates fell very heavily upon occupiers of land in agricultural boroughs; they often had to pay 3s. or 4s. or more per acre, and for matters from which they derived very little benefit. He well remembered the Resolution passed by the House of Commons in 1870, when a large number of Liberal Members assisted Sir Massey Lopes. He could not understand why such a different feeling should animate the Liberal Party now, when those who suffered from recent continued agricultural depression put in their just claims, and he hoped that some at least would, upon the present occasion, help by their votes to bring about the desired result.

[First Night.]

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he would call the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite to the tendency of the proposal before the House. The Amendment had a tendency in the direction of manhood suffrage, for if the expenses of Parliamentary elections and registrations, and other similar expenses were to be charged upon the National Exchequer, it might well be argued that it was no longer fair that the possession of a vote should be dependent upon the possession of property or a connection with it. It was well known that the main part of the work to be done under the Bill would affect counties, and, therefore, he regarded the inclusion of boroughs in the proposal before the House as somewhat delusive. He feared that if such a proposal were agreed to, the cost of registration would be increased. That would be the probable result if the cost were for the future defrayed out of Imperial funds. The only way to insure economy in connection with the expenses of elections was to make the localities defray them. If the House were to proceed to impose charges connected with Parliamentary elections upon Imperial taxation, the day might not be far distant when there would come a demand for the payment of Members. Hon. Members opposite, by their action that evening, were paving the way for the making of such a demand. He hoped that the expenses of Parliamentary elections would in the future be paid by the localities themselves.

Mr. ECROYD said, that there was no desire on the Conservative side of the House to obstruct any measure for the registration of voters; but if they had not raised this question they would have lost an opportunity of protesting against an injustice, and would have provided some excuse for the continuance of that injustice. The vote to be taken that evening was one which would greatly affect taxpayers, for it related to an important matter of principle. The growth of local burdens not only threatened the prosperity of owners of property, but also the success of our industries. If they found that in a matter of this kind, which was national in all its bearings, the charges were to be paid out of local taxation, Members would be neglecting their duty if they did not try to prevent it. He regretted that so much of the debate had been spent in drawing a distinction between land and other kinds of property, and between dwellers in the towns and in the country. He thought that to-night they were fighting the battle of the ratepayers, not only in the agricultural districts, but equally in the boroughs. The county of Lancaster was cut up into 23 divisions, and all knew that 15 or 20 of these were urban and industrial in character. Yet they were as much concerned in the matter of the debate as the most purely rural districts in the Kingdom. The Under Secretary for the Home Department had told them that the incidence of local taxation on land and buildings was most unjust. He thanked the hon. Member for that admission; but it would be much more satisfactory if the Government, who were so slow to relieve them of this injustice, would abstain from increasing it. The tendency of all their legislation this Session was directed to its exaggeration, and not to its remedy. The pressure of charges of this kind was a most serious matter. So far from the agriculturists feeling it in the heaviest degree, he believed the Under Secretary for the Home Department was correct when he said that those engaged in the industries of urban and suburban districts felt the pressure still more heavily. This was one element in that system of handicapping our own industries for the benefit of foreigners, which had already been carried in this country to the verge of ruin. Unless those who made large fortunes in connection with foreign trade, such as bankers, merchants, and speculators, were made to pay their share of Imperial charges, it would be impossible for our industries to survive. He was sincerely thankful to his hon. Friend for having introduced this proposal, and was glad that it would be carried to a vote, so that the country might have an opportunity of seeing who were endeavouring to serve its industries, and who were throwing them over.

MR. STORER contended that this question of the cost of registration was more a matter of local than Imperial concern. Members living in counties and boroughs could see that this was an opportunity not to be missed of bringing before the Government the fact that a check must be placed upon the imposition of more burdens on the rates, and that those burdens should be placed not upon real property alone, but also upon personal property. It was all very well for the Government to dangle before the House, year after year, the promise that they should have a Local Government Bill shortly; but that Bill never came, for either they were engaged in a war, or there were rumours of war, or they were employed in evading war, or other things, that they had no time for passing such a Bill. He hoped the ratepayers would see that their interests were better attended to in future Parliaments than they had been in the past, and he thought they would probably desire to have a different Government to carry out their wishes. This was the last straw on the camel's back. The agricultural labourer was at present the victim of a new tax, the education tax, which ground many of them to the dust, and he had no doubt it produced a similar effect in the boroughs. And now the labourer was to have another new tax imposed on him, in the shape of an additional beer tax. He considered that the time had arrived when a protest should be made against such a proceeding.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that he disputed the statement of the Under Secretary for the Home Department that this was an inopportune occasion for bringing this matter before the House. If the Government had acquainted themselves with the principle upon which those who represented the interests of the ratepayers invariably acted, they would have known that whenever local burdens were about to be increased by any Bill, they threw themselves into the battle. The Under Secretary had made what he might call an academical admission; he had said that the present system of local taxation was radically wrong. Well, they were tired of academical admissions and academical Resolutions of the House. Twice during the present Parliament the House had passed a general Resolution that relief should be given to the ratepayers; but they had obtained no relief at all. Now was an opportunity, not for making a profession of faith, which, without works, was vain, but for actually granting a means of relief. By that test the sincerity of the Government was to be proved; but the Under Secretary declared that they should wait for a more convenient season, that the wrong they complained of was "but a little one," and, availing himself of the plea of the old sinner, he excused himself from applying a permanent and effectual remedy on the ground that it was an "old" wrong. The old and sound foundation of their argument was that the incidence of taxation on land and houses had for a length of years been disproportioned to the incidence of taxation on other classes of property. By the last Return of the Local Government Board placed on the Table of the House, the yearly expenditure derived from rates on land and houses was £50,000,000, and the debt secured on that property was £160,000,000. Such figures spoke for themselves, and needed no comment. How were they to deal with that tremendous sum total, which had grown to its present dimensions in the present generation? Why, by reducing it in the same way as it had been accumulated, by degrees. The householder and the freeholder had been overtaxed by burdens gradually imposed. Let them gradually reduce or remove them. The townsman, not less than the countryman; the shopkeeper and the artizan, not less than the farmer; the labourer and the freeholder were the parties interested in that reform. By the compromise they had offered, the Government admitted the principle of their contention. But was the compromise a fair one? Ireland was to receive £10,000, England only £20,000. The "capable citizen" of England was to be registered at 2*d.* a-head, the "capable citizen" of Ireland at 5*d.* a-head. Was that fair? Instead of £20,000, £200,000 was required for England alone. He would wish, however, to say a word not only against the paltriness of the amount, but against the manner in which partial relief was proposed to be granted. If a subvention was to be resorted to, let the Government give a good round sum like £500,000. But he objected altogether to subventions. They caused extravagance, and they tended towards a dual control. If, as was admitted, the business of registration was an Imperial business, let the Government take the whole thing into their own hands, let them do it wholesale through the agency of the Local Government Board. He would say one word in conclusion, not on the relative incidence of rates and taxes on one class of property or another, but on the actual, visible, and notorious effect of the increase of the rates upon the social condition of the people. Heavy rates meant high rents, and high rents meant the overcrowding of the dwellings of the poorest, and heavy rates meant also diminished wages, or, in other words, a smaller loaf for a hungry family.

Mr. AOKERS supported the Amendment, and said he would not have done so had it not embraced boroughs as well as counties, a fact of which the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) did not seem to be aware. He would read a resolution which had been passed that day by the representatives of 58 local Chambers of Agriculture at a meeting of the Central Council. That resolution declared that the offer of the Government to vote £20,000 was altogether inadequate, and therefore the Council supported the Amendment now before the House. Other resolutions bearing on local taxation were also passed, and would be laid before the House on the discussion of the Budget Resolutions. He rejoiced that Ireland had been treated more generously, he would not say with full justice; but that was no reason why England should not have fair play. It was not the original intention of the Government to give anything at all. The subvention having been offered, the question was whether it was adequate or fair, and he submitted that it was neither. There would not be the slightest difficulty in making payments to overseers through the Clerks to the Unions. To do that would not be giving the Local Government Board any more trouble than they had now. The excuse given for not attempting a permanent settlement of this question now was scarcely becoming in the mouth of a Government who could ask Parliament for £100,000,000; a Government that was equal to that might very well have dealt with this question of local taxation. It was not the power but the will that was wanting. The President of the Local Government Board had stated that it was impossible to say what the charges were; but the Under Secretary for the Home Department had no difficulty in stating that they would be £12,500 a-year.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

That estimate, however, he believed to be very much under the mark. It comprised only one portion of the expenses. Did it not mean simply the expenses of the Clerks of the Peace? He believed that that was all the hon. Member meant. If that was all, it was a small proportion only of the expenses which had to be borne. The £20,000 promised might be better than nothing, but it would not stop agitation. It seemed to have always been an inconvenient time for the Government to deal with the question of local taxation, and the Parliament would expire while the ratepayers were starving. The Government would have to go to the country without one of their pledges on this subject being fulfilled. Let the question be treated, not as a question between town and country, not as a question between one class and another, but let it be put upon the broad principles of equity and justice, and then the time might come when, instead of speaking for the future, they might act for the present.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, it had been assumed that the proposed subvention of £10,000 to Ireland was a liberal one which would be accepted gratefully. Of course, it was a large sum as compared with that proposed to be given to England; but it would not be accepted as a settlement of this question or as a sufficient relief to local taxation. They were told that it was inconvenient then to bring the question of local taxation before the House; but it seemed to him that every fair question which they on that side brought forward was inconvenient to the Government from some cause or other, and it was exceedingly difficult to find a subject with which to confront them affecting local rates or the welfare of the industrial classes which the Government did not attempt to shelve in favour of foreign policy, of which during the present Parliament they had had more than enough. The House was told that it was a very small sum of money that was involved in the present case; but, even if that were so, it was necessary that they should be wary and watchful to prevent any addition being made to the local imposts that were now crushing to the ground not only the rural population, but the working men of the towns.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON observed that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon had laid down the principle involved in that Motion very simply and distinctly. He had shown that the registration of Parliamentary voters was an Imperial matter, and that it ought to be paid for out of Imperial funds. The charges connected with the elections of Boards of Guardians or of Town Councils, being local in their character, were defrayed out of the rates; but the charge which the House was now discussing was properly a national one, and it ought not to be thrown on the local rates. If any justification were needed, apart from the importance of the subject, for the Motion of the hon. Baronet, it would be found in the speech of the Under Secretary for the Home Department, who spoke for the Government. For the hon. Gentleman admitted frankly and generously the grievous injustice of this local taxation on real property, and he had heard very different language used from that side and from the Treasury Bench, where every sort of argument had been used to put aside the settlement of the question. But when the Under Home Secretary went into facts and figures—he hoped the hon. Gentleman would excuse him for saying that he seemed to get beyond his depth, for he told the House that in purely rural places the amount was only £2,000,000, and had increased by only £500,000 in 10 years. Well, that was 25 per cent. But did the hon. Gentleman know how many purely rural Unions there were in England that were un-mixed with urban districts? Why, not more than about one quarter of the whole number, those being where the assessment was the lowest. Therefore, like many others, he had given these statistics without the practical knowledge, and naturally he had been misled. Then he said—"But in urban districts the rates are sometimes 7s. in the pound, whereas in rural places they are seldom half that." Why, they never contended that this was a rural question. They had uniformly insisted that the town ratepayer was equally taxed unjustly and grievously; but, whereas the town ratepayer was paying on one-sixth of his income, the farmer was assessed at double, and that was where it fell so heavily on him. Then the hon. Gentleman said if a poor man bought a penny-worth of tea he had to pay half that in taxation. That was a mistake. He only paid a farthing, or one quarter, in taxes, as the tax on tea was 6d. in the 11b. But the point immediately before the House was the injustice of charging an Imperial purpose on the local rate. If this were for local or municipal purposes it would be different. It was the principle they were contending for that night, not the amount, and just let the House consider the tendency of these things. For years, until the question was taken up in this House, it was the custom of Chancellors of the Exchequer to lighten their Budgets by throwing charges on the rates. He remembered, for instance, in his own county an attempt of the Government to charge Militia infirmaries on the rates, and when it was successfully resisted the answer was that they had induced other counties to do so. If they allowed this additional sum to be imposed upon them now, they would have the President of the Local Government Board some two or three years hence pointing to what they had sanctioned in that case, and making it a precedent for further action in the same direction. It was, moreover, very impolitic to leave the question of local taxation unsettled. He did not know if such a course as deliberately disregarding a vote of the House on this question, as the Government had done, was unconstitutional and unparalleled; but he was certain it was very inconvenient for any Government, and they would probably find it so, in getting the fag end of the Session turned into a local taxation debate. Such Bills as this would be disturbed and aggravated by the question. Such questions as the Budget would be disturbed, or perhaps upset by it; and such questions as police superannuation would probably be dropped altogether on this account, as the Rivers Conservancy Bill had been. Ministers told them they were going to give them a Local Government Bill, when matters of that kind would be settled; but the House might have to wait four or five years longer before such a promise was fulfilled, and meanwhile the oppressive burden of local taxation would be continued, and probably increased. Last year a Government of London Bill was brought in which was to be the basis for county government, and the whole question of relief to local taxation was sedulously and deliberately excluded from the provisions of that Bill. How could they believe in the sincerity of the Government after that? Then they were told by a Cabinet Minister of a plan for creating large Provincial Building Societies, and that was to take the place of giving the ratepayers representation on the County Board. And that was the way they were put off. The House and the Government must not be surprised if they found themselves now beset by this question, nor if the forecast of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) came true, and they found this question settling for them some of the elections next autumn.

Mr. GREGORY said, he thought that in the discussion which had taken place upon this subject the real question had been lost sight of. This was not exactly a question of local taxation, but a question whether the cost of registration should be thrown upon local funds. It was a question of national, and not of local concern. In the great Reform Bill of 1832 provision was made for the revision of voters' list by Revising Barristers and their payment by the House; but no provision was made for the overseer, who in connection with electoral lists had very important work to do in connection with the Revising Barrister, and, in fact, had to act as his assistant. The overseers made the returns to the Revising Barristers upon which the electorate was founded, and surely the preparation of these returns was a matter of national concern. Many hon. Gentlemen had, no doubt, mounted to-night the hobby of local taxation, which was a very good one on the proper occasion. Local taxation was a fair topic for discussion and consideration indeed. It had been admitted by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) that local taxation was at present on a very unsatisfactory footing. He (Mr. Gregory), however, considered that the present question was one which should be treated upon the larger and broader ground; it was a matter involving Constitutional principles and election of Representatives to Parliament, and it was, therefore, a matter for Imperial consideration. On that ground he would venture to support the Motion of his hon. Friend. He thought that, in his able speech, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton had underrated the duties and responsibilities which were thrown upon the overseers by the Registration Bill. It had been said that in making out the new lists all that the overseer would have to do would be to turn to his Registers. But that was by no means all that he would have to do, because he would in many cases have not only to see who was already registered, but who was the occupier in possession to be brought upon the Register. The questions of the lodger and service franchise, again, could not be settled by merely looking at the Register; the overseer would have to make inquiries as to who were entitled to vote. In rural districts there would be many houses rated to the farmer, but occupied by his servants, and all this would have to be found out by the overseer. It was, however, upon the larger Constitutional questions that he proposed to support this Motion.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY maintained that in the case of both the lodger and the service franchise claims must be made by the persons who wished to be put upon the Register; and, therefore, it was not the case that the overseer would have to ransack the whole of his parish. He thought that the political activity of the people themselves would be amply sufficient for this. Hon. Members opposite had always prided themselves upon being opposed to centralization in matters of local government. There was a serious danger involved in putting these expenses upon the Imperial Exchequer. Those who had to pay the money must finally have the appointment of those who were paid; and if they gave effect to this Resolution they must recognize that the appointment of these officers must come into the hands of the Central Authority. The appointment of the overseer, and, where necessary, of an assistant overseer, was now in the hands of the ratepayers in vestry, and in many parts of the counties the people clung to this right, and considered it a matter of the greatest importance. They made it a matter of local Party contests and Party interest. If they were now going to place the charge on the national taxes they were putting it in the hands of the central political government; and he thought that it was unwise that this matter should be put in the hands of officers who were to be appointed as well as dismissed by the Central Authority. That was not his idea of local self-government. In the case of prisons and police, where hon. Members on the other side of the House had clamoured for State aid, State control and State regulation had followed. With regard to the question of trying to shift the burdens from the ratepayer, he entirely sympathized with those who thought that the present area of taxable property was not wide enough for local purposes, and he would be glad to see it extended. There was a strong democratic movement in favour of increasing taxation on land. Those who were in favour of the Amendment had treated the question as an occupiers' question, and not as an owners' question. But they would lose a great deal of popularity with the farmers if they adopted that tone in the country, and would only tend to increase the feeling which was growing up in favour of reviving the old Land Tax of 4s. in the pound.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he must protest against the idea that land was not sufficiently taxed already. There was no class in the country which had felt the increase of local burdens more than the landowners. If some of the Gentlemen opposite were to invest their money in land they would soon change their tone. Burdens ought to be fairly distributed among owners of property of all kinds, and an undue proportion ought not to be laid on the shoulders of landowners, as would be the case if the Amendment were not carried.

MR. HICKS said, he failed to discover that any valid reasons had been adduced by the Government or their supporters for resisting the hon. Baronet's proposal, especially as no demand was made for the reduction of taxation. Had the proposal included such a demand there would be some force in the arguments of hon. Members opposite; but such was not the case—they were simply resisting an increase of local burdens. In 1883, 31 Members opposite who had voted with the Government afterwards petitioned in the same sense as the Amendment. If he was not mistaken, the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was among them. From the first time he had attended meetings of the Central Chamber of Agriculture this question had been a subject which engaged their attention. He had contended that it had been not only a question for counties, but for boroughs also, and not for ratepayers in England only, but for the whole of the United Kingdom. He hoped that hon. Members would, regardless of Party, vote against the proposed increase to the local burdens not only of England, but of the United Kingdom at large.

MR. P. A. MUNTZ said, that hon. Members had heard many statements which were intended to lead the House to believe that the Opposition only recognized the agricultural interests of the country, and that the landed interests paid scarcely any taxes. He could but attribute those statements to an absence of knowledge on the part of Gentlemen who had used them. He contended that agriculture was more highly taxed than any other industry in the Kingdom. There were great quantities of land which were wholly unproductive, but upon which the taxation, amounting to 3 per cent, was levied. That was a hardship to which the manufacturing interest of the country would not be willing to submit. The question was whether they should permit any increase of burdens already too heavy. As for himself, he was glad to support the reduction of local taxation as far as possible. He had the greatest sympathy with all local taxpayers, whether they were in the boroughs or in the agricultural districts; and hon. Members might rely upon it that in the coming elections this question would have a very important bearing upon the results.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, he wished to call the attention of the House to a form which had been received by the inhabitants of St. George's Hanover Square, but which no one could understand. It was stated on the form that those failing to fill it up would be liable, under the Representation of the People Act, to a fine of 40s. In the House itself he had not been able to find a single Gentleman who knew how the form was to be filled up; and he, therefore, asked how were the people to whom it was addressed to know what to do?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought it strange that they had had no expression of opinion on this subject from the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke). They had heard a very able speech from the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who, he was sure, every Member of the House would congratulate upon having a seat on the Ministerial Bench. But he did not think that the Office held by the hon. Member enabled him to speak with sufficient authority on behalf of the Government proposal. This question had been discussed in a very different frame of mind from that in which it was discussed upon the Irish Registration Bill the other night, when the Prime Minister appeared to elevate it to the highest regions of Constitutional importance, appealing to hon. Members, as guardians of the Constitution, to aid the Government in resisting the proposal of the hon. Member for Galway. The right hon. Gentleman said that proposal was one which would lead to the corruption of the House of Commons, and that it was illegitimate in principle; but this evening all that had been forgotten, and the Government had accepted the principle that some of the registration expenses should be defrayed by the Treasury. They had, therefore, to discuss, not a great question of Constitutional principle, but whether the proposal of the Government on this matter was, as it had been stated to be by the Under Secretary of State, a fair and adequate proposition for the settlement of this question. The hon. Gentleman told them that they were contending about a sum no larger than one-tenth of a farthing in the pound upon the assessment of the county ratepayers in England. Was that, he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) asked, a fair and adequate proposition for the settlement of this matter as far as England was concerned? Upon the first blush of the case it was not, because, whereas the Government intended to grant £10,000 to Ireland, they only proposed to give £20,000 towards the same kind of expenditure in England, in spite of the enormous excess of work to be done owing to the larger population. He did not say that £10,000 was enough for Ireland; but he did say that if it was not more than enough, £20,000 could not be a fair and adequate proportion in England. His hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had explained that under the provisions of this Registration Bill, coupled with those of the Franchise Act, a very large amount of extra work must necessarily be thrown upon the overseers and assistant overseers, for which work it was only just and fair they should receive adequate compensation. The right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board suggested the other evening that it was impossible to give that compensation, because the remuneration of the officials for this work was mixed up with other kinds of payments for the preparation of jury lists and other matters, and one class of payment could not be separated from another. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) wished to point out that in every Local Government Board Report there was a heading setting out what the registration expenditure amounted to for the whole Kingdom during the year. That Return was composed of certain items, and it would be perfectly possible for those who sent the items in to state what would be a fair charge to make for this registration work. He did not think, with some hon. Members, that the payment out of national sources for registration work would interfere with the independence of the officials. He submitted that the proposal of the Government was neither fair nor adequate, and he was astonished that it merely applied to Clerks of the Peace in counties, and gave nothing whatever from national sources for boroughs in respect of similar work to that done in the counties. What he thought one of the best parts of the Motion of his hon. Friend was this—that he looked at this question fairly as regards both boroughs and counties. That raised the question whether the whole of the expenditure, or only the increased expenditure which was thrown on the rates by the registration of this year, was to be borne by the Treasury? He was not contented with the argument that this expense had always been on the rates, as he believed it had been thrown on the rates from the carelessness or idleness of the House of Commons of the day. It had been stated that the Government were following the principle adopted in 1867. He did not think it necessary to go back upon that time. He was not one of those who were responsible for the Act of 1867, as he had only then the responsibility of a private Member. But if an injustice were done in 1867, that was no reason why it should be repeated now. It seemed to him that the payments in respect of registration ought in justice to be made a national charge, and not a local one. He did not know whether they would be told that they ought not to raise so large a question on this Bill, which only professed to apply the existing Registration Law to those who were entitled to the franchise under the Act recently passed. It should be borne in mind, however, that Her Majesty's Government had not scrupled to deal in the Irish Registration Bill with a matter of at least as great importance. The point of difference was not a very large one as between Her Majesty's Government and those who sat on that side of the House. The principle was conceded to them, for the Government had agreed that a certain portion of these expenses should no longer be charged upon the rates. When that principle was conceded, the question of how much was merely a minor affair. Their contention was that the registration of voters who were to return Members to that House, being, as his hon. Friend the Member for East Sussex said, a national affair, the expenditure for it ought to be paid for from national sources. They asked Her Majesty's Government to deal justly and fairly with this question. They did not ask the Government to give them a shilling more in England in proportion to the work to be done than it was proposed to give in other parts of the United Kingdom. He hoped they would not hear from the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board a repetition of some words which fell from the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, to the effect that if this Amendment were carried it would destroy the Registration Bill. Her Majesty's Government had not paid such attention to the votes of the House on questions of local taxation as to lead them to believe that they would take such an exaggerated view of the carrying of an Amendment of this kind. He trusted that if the Amendment were carried the Government would postpone further proceeding with the Bill until they had reconsidered the matter; and that, after having reconsidered it in a spirit of fairness, they would inform the House that they were prepared to accede to the Vote which had been given, and to pay from national sources that which was justly a national charge.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would admit to the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) that this Amendment was one which was to be expected, and that the debate which had taken place upon it was one which they might reasonably think hon. Gentlemen opposite, with their opinions upon this subject, would raise on a Bill of this kind. He would go further, and would thank right hon. Gentlemen opposite for having given them, in Committee on this Bill, Notice that they intended to raise the question. The Amendment, however much it might be regretted by those who did not agree with the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, was, he admitted, one which it was quite fair for them to bring forward. He knew that there was no desire on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to obstruct the Bill; but if he excepted the speech of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), he must say that, in his opinion, a great deal of the debate had been of a thoroughly discursive kind. Indeed, much of it had been in the nature of a reconnaissance in force on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, just as if some hon. Members had been rehearsing in advance the speeches they intended to deliver in the course of a few weeks' time on the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The speech of the right hon. Baronet was, however, of a different kind, as he had dealt closely with the subject. The right hon. Baronet complained that the Government had treated Ireland on a different system and in a more liberal manner than they were treating England. But, as the right hon. Baronet was aware, Ireland possessed a wholly different system of registration to that which existed in England; and it was impossible to apply, in the case of Ireland, the same proposals that were applicable in the case of England and Scotland, though they greatly desired to do so. However, he might point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, in 1868, the Conservative Government made a proposal with regard to Ireland, and gave money for registration purposes in that country, while they made no proposal whatever in regard to England and Scotland. Therefore, he thought it hardly lay in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends to reproach the Government with treating Ireland more favourably than they had treated England and Scotland. At the same time, when that matter of greater favour being shown to Ireland was mentioned, he might observe that no speaker had reminded the House how very large the increase of voters in Ireland was. It was even greater in the Irish boroughs than it was in the Irish counties. To estimate the total increase of the voters in Ireland was rather difficult, but it would certainly be over 500,000; and that was a consideration which ought not to be lost sight of in the comparison which hon. Members opposite had instituted. The consideration of the Irish case from the Government point of view led them to the result which they had arrived at, and which hon. Gentlemen opposite failed somewhat to appreciate. They had to look to the fact, in the first place, that additional labour and the additional charge would be caused in the course of the present year by the Bills now before Parliament. In the case of Ireland, there was no doubt that additional labour would be caused, and additional charge occasioned. He thought that the language of the right hon. Baronet was a little strong in relation to his political Friends beside him, when he spoke of the apathy, and used similar epithets respecting the conduct of Parliament in 1867 and 1868. In those years an enormous increase was made to the cost of registration; and the right hon. Baronet's political Friends made no grant whatever for the increased charge occasioned in respect of registration in England or Scotland—the only thing they did was to give a grant of some £5,000 or £6,000 to meet the additional cost of registration in Ireland. That was a fact they were bound to comment upon and to remind the House of. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) was very wrath with the Government of that day for its neglect, although, to some extent, he was a sharer in that neglect, as he had a seat in the House. So great was the increase in 1868 as to double the charge for registration, yet no contribution was made except to Ireland, and that only of a temporary character. It was now said that Her Majesty's Government was repeating the injustice committed against the boroughs in 1868. But the proposals now made involved no increase in the expenditure in boroughs, the increased expenditure was only in counties; while, on the other hand, in 1868 there was a large increase in the expenses of registration in boroughs. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon, as well as the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down, had argued that registration was a national question and not a local question, and ought to be dealt with entirely out of national funds. For his part, he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had never been able to see how hon. Members opposite drew the line between what they called "national" and what they called "local" charges. He had heard nearly every charge called "national" which at the present time pressed upon the rates. That description applied to highways, to poor rates, and other charges of a like character; and he failed to see what were local charges in the opinion of hon. Members opposite. He agreed with the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) that it was impossible for the State to take upon itself all these charges they called national, without entirely breaking down the fabric of local self-government of which they were so proud. He would not discuss this part of the question further, but would only ask hon. Members belonging to the Conservative and Constitutional Party whether it was not an old Constitutional doctrine that the return of Members was a local question, and whether the history of representation of communities in Parliament did not show that throughout the history of this country representation had been looked upon and treated as a local matter, so much so, indeed, that in former times Members were paid wages by their several constituencies? The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon had proposed, and the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who spoke with so much knowledge and authority on this question, had seconded, the proposal, now made for the first time, that the whole charge of registration should be borne by the State, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire had now given his countenance to that proposal. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought he was right in saying that was the first time that that proposal had been brought before the House in a formal shape. It had been contended that the proposal made by the Government to give a subvention conceded the principle for which hon. Members opposite contended; but that argument told both ways, and the hon. Baronet should be satisfied with the victory he had gained, and that, for the first time, Her Majesty's Government was proposing to make any contribution by the State towards the expenses of local registration in England and Scotland. Her Majesty's Government made the proposal, vainly thinking that it would meet the views of hon. Members opposite; but, unfortunately, it had been rejected with something like scorn. He should have thought that the hon. Baronet would have been satisfied that the principle for which he contended had been, to a certain extent, conceded, although in a temporary manner, and that he would have contented himself to treat it as a precedent on which to base similar proposals on a future occasion. Very wide questions had been raised by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd), who had argued with very great ability that the charges on local rates ought not to fall upon one description of property only. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) could only say that, on that side of the House, they also agreed in that view. They had distinctly stated that they agreed that there should be a division of these charges, and that the tax ought not to fall upon one description of property alone; and there was not, therefore, any difference of opinion between the two sides of the House on that question. But hon. Members said that they had never been able to introduce Bills to give effect to these principles. He would only say that, in their opinion, if legislation were now allowed to progress at the same rate as legislation did in 1869, 1870, and 1872, those Bills would have passed into law a long time ago. The House was aware that the Government had actually framed, and put into shape, a Bill embodying their proposals on the subject; but it was a Bill of such magnitude that, in their opinion, at the present rate of progress it would take a whole Session to pass the Bill. How the last three Sessions had been consumed the House was aware, and it was unnecessary for him to speak. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton) had told them that in lieu of a Bill the Government might grant a subvention of £500,000 until they were able to introduce the Bill. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was bound to say that the knowledge they hitherto gained of the effect of subventions in swelling and augmenting local charges did not make them regard subventions with any favour. He could not conceive any practice more calculated to swell the amount of local charges than the assumption of them all by the State. If that proposal were accepted, and if all these charges were assumed by the State, they would grow in a very short time to the large sum which had been mentioned by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes). The right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said that the proposal made did not meet the case of the overseers' expenses. In making that statement, the right hon. Baronet only followed the words of his statement. He said that the Government proposed to contribute something approaching to the whole county cost which was incurred by a small number of officers easily known and got at. These officers were accustomed to render accounts; and it was towards their expenses it was proposed to contribute a sum very considerably exceeding what those expenses had been hitherto, and falling not far short of what they would reach in the future. As he stated yesterday, the Returns of the expenditure lumped together the expenses of Parliamentary registration and municipal registration, and the printing of jury lists, and it was exceedingly difficult to separate these items. Up to that time he had found the difficulty insuperable. Passing that by, the main position of the Government was, that they could not be parties in the last year of this Parliament to propose to take the whole charge of registration on the State as a permanent charge. Therefore, they could not accept the proposal now made. If they were to make a temporary proposal now with regard to overseers, it was his belief that the acceptance of this proposal would plunge the State in a very large expenditure indeed, and that the proposal was one which was almost, if not entirely, unworkable. There were between 700 and 800 parishes in which there were hardly any voters at all, the numbers varying from one to five. There were between 1,100 and 1,200 parishes in which there were from 6 to 15 voters. There were between 2,000 and 3,000 parishes in which there were from 15 to 25 voters. There were between 4,000 and 5,000 sets of overseers who would have each of them to deal with fewer than 25 voters. There were 16,000 sets of overseers in all. In a vast number of parishes it would be necessary to deal with these sets of overseers in respect of a small number of names and absurdly trifling sums. Consider what would be the cost and trouble attending that proceeding. At present the expenses were certified by Revising Barristers who, in many cases, had insufficient data to go upon. There was uniform system of certifying that expenditure, and the methods varied in an extraordinary degree. Any attempt to make direct payment to the 15,000 or 16,000 sets of people would involve enormous labour. They would have to be paid by means of orders on the Postmaster General. Many of them kept no banking account, and they would have to get their orders paid through a banker or directly in London. It had been said that they might be paid by ordinary Post Office order; but the difficulty was that in many cases receipts would never be returned, and without receipts the accounts could not be audited. Therefore, the difficulty of dealing with 16,000 sets of people was one which the House could hardly realize, however simple it might appear to be. By the plan of the Government all these difficulties were avoided. Each parish contributing to the county rate would have to meet a precept for a less sum. In his belief, if the State met all the expenses, the result would be great extravagance; but in any case the Government objected to putting the charges upon the State in the last year of this Parliament, and they had made a temporary proposal which was workable, and which would afford a certain measure of relief. If the State assumed all these charges, they would fall upon Imperial funds, to which it had been shown the labouring classes contributed in an undue degree. They were not prepared to take that responsibility in the last year of this Parliament. They believed they had met the Opposition half-way in making this temporary proposal. They had gone far beyond any proposal previously made to the House, and they could not go beyond it.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the conclusion he drew from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and indeed from the proposals he had submitted to the House, was that until these later days of the present Session the Government had paid no attention whatever to the difficulties that lay before them and the country in regard to this Registration Bill. When he (Mr. Selater-Booth) first saw the measure, it was his opinion that such was the case; and though the right hon. Gentleman now said that it was fair on the part of the Opposition, and was only to be expected on their part, that they should raise this question, it was clear that the Government had never faced the question, and had never expected that it would be raised, and that it was owing to indolence, carelessness, and forgetfulness that they had put aside the subject of the registration of the new voters, a subject, he ventured to say, of great difficulty, and which was as worthy of the attention of the Government as the admittance of the new voters to the franchise. The right hon. Gentleman had at the last moment, in consequence of what had recently occurred, made a proposal which very fairly met the expenses incurred by County Authorities through the agency of the Clerks of the Peace in making up the Poll Books, and he trusted that the precedent would be followed on future occasions. He was not prepared to say that the £20,000, or whatever the sum was that was to be repaid to the County Authorities for making up the Poll Books, would not be an adequate sum; but the registration of these new voters would involve very serious and difficult duties on the part of the officials, and he thought that the Local Government Board, if any Department of the State should have known that to impose duties on unpaid officers without providing statutory remuneration for their services was to run their heads against a stone wall, and to take a course which was certain to result in confusion and disappointment when it came to actual working. He was satisfied that it was too late now to do much, if anything; and he had no doubt that the registration of the new voters in the year now coming would be a chaotic mass of confusion, and that it would take many years to set right. It must be remembered that overseers, as a rule, were persons of very moderate business capacities, and that in all important places their duties were performed by assistant overseers—officers who were paid for their services. In the larger parishes, where the duties were performed by paid officials, some capacity might be reckoned on; but even as regarded this system of officers, he would point out that there were duties provided for under this Bill which ought never to have been placed upon such persons by Parliament without a statutable right to recover from the State a remuneration for the duties. It was not merely the preparing of a reprint or a copy of the Rate Book that was required of the officers; but they were required to ascertain the names and residences of all the voters, a most difficult and laborious subject of inquiry, and one which, he ventured to say, ought not to be left at the hazard of the more or less perfunctory discharge of duties by unpaid officers, but which should be entrusted to Clerks of Guardians or some officials appointed for the purpose. Then there were most elaborate Returns to be collected from owners of property and occupiers. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen would take the trouble to look at the Notice Paper on Thursday next. They would there see some questions propounded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) which would show the absurdity of providing for the enfranchisement of a large number of new voters without taking timely and sufficient measures for their registration. The Registration Bill, as it came down from the Select Committee, was very much improved from the condition in which it was when it originally went before that body. It contained a power to call for Returns. If the Bill contained those absurd proposals, he contended that it was not a proper measure on which to base the initiation of this enormous mass of new voters into the electorate of the country.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That is not in the Registration Bill, but in the Representation of the People Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there were very many provisions in the Registration Bill of equal perplexity and difficulty. How were the electors to be got at in county districts, and how were the electors in the service franchise to be registered? Most of those matters had been dealt with in the Bill in a haphazard manner. They should all have been properly provided for by the establishment, not only of a system by which the overseers should do the work, but of means for remunerating them and providing solicitors and others to aid them. The duties of Revising Barristers would be as nothing compared with the duties which this Bill would impose upon the officers; and sufficient funds ought to have been provided to enable the overseers to obtain the assistance of solicitors to aid them in their work, and to get on the Electoral Roll the enormous mass of people admitted to the franchise by the County Franchise Bill. Nothing of the kind had been attempted. The Bill was an attempt to introduce into the framework of the law a new measure, by means of numerous references to obscure and antiquated Statutes, which probably no overseer had ever seen or heard of. The methods of reference observable in the Bill were resorted to by draftsmen when they had not the time or means of framing a new project applicable to the new circumstances under which they found themselves. He would do the Select Committee the justice to say that they had done their best to improve and elaborate the framework of the Bill which he said was so antiquated; but they had been unable to make it perfect. They had added to it a series of instructions to overseers which he was afraid would only result in making confusion a thousand times more confounded. How the overseers were to carry out the instructions given to them in the Bill he was really at a loss to conceive. He wished to discriminate between the charges thrown on the rates through the agency of the Clerks of the Peace, and those thrown on the localities by the agency of the overseers. As to the first, he was satisfied with the proposal of the Government, provided it was understood that it was to be a precedent to be followed till Parliament should devise some different manner of registration. As to the second, it touched an inherent blot in the registration of the people, and it was impossible to say so late in the day how it was to be remedied. Why had not a money clause been incorporated in the Bill, providing for the expenses of this new, and complicated, and difficult process of registration, which were certainly not in justice to be imposed upon the overseers? Why had not the Government provided for the expenses that would be incurred in respect of the overseers? It was quite evident that the Government had paid no attention to the Registration Bill until the last moment, and that they had not had time to frame a new provision of law which would be satisfactory and would meet the case. It was evident that now, at the last moment, having been unexpectedly defeated on this point when it suddenly arose in connection with the Irish Bill, they had awakened to the difficulties of the situation, and endeavoured at the last moment by a sop in the shape of £20,000 to throw dust in the eyes of the House, and make it appear that they had done all that was necessary to meet the justice of the case. He was not at all concerned with what had occurred in 1868. The question now raised had assumed a much more acute form since those days. It was not until the year 1872 that his hon. Friend the Member for South Devonshire (Sir Massey Lopes) obtained his well-known and famous majority; but since that time, and within the last three or four years, the question of rates had assumed a much more acute form. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had shown very clearly, in a way that he (Mr. Selater-Booth) had very often shown himself, that the burdens on land in the aggregate were not increasing in a rapid ratio, but were, in fact, almost at a standstill. But a charge of an equal amount in actual money upon land, valued and rated as it now was, was five times as great as it was in 1868. If everyone would study the Returns in Schedule A of the Property Tax they would see that, whereas 20 years ago the value of land was half as much again as the value of house property, the reverse was the case now, and house property was worth 25 or 30 per cent more than land in England. That reduced the apparent injustice of the rate on landed property; but it did not at all follow from that that a similar rate on landed property was not very much heavier than it was in those days. At all events, be that as it might, the question had now fairly come before them; and they had an opportunity of resisting, however small an increase, still an increase, upon the rates—of resisting the proposal to throw upon the rates a charge for public services. It might not be a serious charge in itself, but taken in the aggregate those charges came to a serious amount, and even this charge might prove to be a much greater one than the House thought. He thought the House was justified in taking the opportunity presented to it of putting its foot down upon those charges. The matter evidently had not been sufficiently thought out, and was one which ought to have received much greater attention from Her Majesty's Government.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that he must apologize to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) for interfering in the debate, as this was an English Bill. But he should like to recall to the memory of the House—and he thought that word was permissible in debate at the present time—how Ireland had been mixed up in this Bill. They were told that the fate of the Irish Bill very largely depended upon that of the English Bill, and therefore Irish Members had a great interest in this English registration measure; and he thought he (Colonel Nolan) had put a question to the President of the Local Government Board after that announcement had been made, as to whether this money for Ireland would cover the cost, not of registration, but of the expenditure defrayed by the Poor Law Unions? The answer was that that was a question to be discussed on the Bill itself, and not at the present time. That being so, he did not see how an Irish Member could help recalling this matter, and putting a few facts before the House. The first fact he would put before the House was the extraordinary statement of the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, who had opened the debate that night. He had said that they were only disputing about a 10th of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the pound upon burdens imposed upon the rates. He (Colonel Nolan) had distinctly heard the hon. Member say that, and he should like very shortly to put one or two figures before the hon. Member to test the accuracy of his statement. The Union to which he (Colonel Nolan) belonged had a valuation of £70,000, and 1-10th of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ on that valuation would only amount to £8. $\frac{1}{2}d.$ was only a 1,000th part of £1, so that 1-10th of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ would come to £8 on a valuation of £70,000. Did the hon. Gentleman mean to say that in a Union, with a population of 40,000 people, £8 was sufficient to do the whole work of the registration? It was impossible, and utterly absurd.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: What I said was that the present cost for registration expenses is £12,500, which is only 1-10th of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the pound on the county rates. I made no reference to Ireland at all.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he did not believe the hon. Member had been so particular in his statement in his speech. It was true, the hon. Member had been speaking upon the English Bill; but he had not specially confined himself to the English counties. There could be no doubt of what the hon. Member had in his mind; but, at any rate, he (Colonel Nolan) did not think that would affect his argument. He wanted to show that the hon. Member had based a large part of his argument on the fact that this rate would be so small that it would not amount to more than 1-10th of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ In Ireland it would amount to a good deal over $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the pound, which was an appreciable amount. It was not a large sum in itself, but taken together with other rates $\frac{1}{2}d.$ became an appreciable sum. He could give further statistics to show that there was a stronger case even than that. Let them take the case of Clifden Union as an average case. There there was a valuation of nearly £14,000, and a population, he thought, of some 30,000. The rate would there, of course, be very much more than $\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the pound. Probably $\frac{3}{4}d.$ in the pound would be required, so that the question was really of much greater importance than the Under Secretary's statement would appear to make out. He would not say that the hon. Member had fallen into a mistake; but he had omitted to point out that his statement did not apply to Ireland. The fact was that in England five-sixths of local taxation was paid by property, while in Ireland it was just the reverse, five-sixths being paid by occupiers, or, if not five-sixths, at least considerably more than three-quarters. The hon. Member, he thought, had rather undervalued in his argument the relief which would be afforded by the removal of these burdens of Imperial taxation to the ratepayers, because he had said that the poor people paid to the Imperial taxation, and the rich people paid to the poor rates. The very reverse was the case in Ireland. A great many people who contributed to the poor rates in Ireland were poor—as poor as they could be without being actually paupers. He had no hesitation in saying that if they called together 100 people paying £7 or £8 rent every one would say that he would rather pay the Imperial taxation than local taxation, because they could avoid paying Imperial taxation. They could, for instance, avoid drinking the very dear whisky, and therefore avoid paying the old taxation and the new impost which it was proposed to put upon that article. He did not say that they would do it—he did not believe they would—but they were not bound to pay this taxation on whisky, because they were not bound to buy that commodity. They were bound to pay poor rates, however—they could be prosecuted if they did not. He had another objection to putting those charges upon the poor rates, and it was that they were converting an unpaid body of officials into tax-gatherers. Those officials ought to be paid. He had great respect for the Poor Law Guardians, and he did not think that those gentlemen, who took the trouble to attend the Poor Law Board for the benefit of the locality with which he was connected, and of the poor, should be turned into tax-gatherers. It was found necessary, from time to time, on Boards of Guardians to prosecute poor people for not paying the poor rate. He need not say that that was a most troublesome and disagreeable duty; but it was one which they undertook, because they knew that if they did not compel each person who was liable to pay, a much greater burden would be imposed on other poor people. But now the Government were taxing them not only for medical relief and relief of other kinds, but also for gathering the taxes. He did not think a volunteer body, as the bulk of the Poor Law Guardians were, should be called upon to perform this duty. If they were called upon to discharge it, it would make them dislike their work, and the result would be that it would not be possible to secure the best men on the Boards of Guardians. Those gentlemen did not wish to be tax-gatherers for Imperial purposes. As to calling this money a subvention, for his own part he would not use any such phrase. He looked upon it as an Imperial tax that they were forced to collect. The Government were forcing an Imperial burden upon them, and were not rating them for a local purpose. The purpose was strictly an Imperial one. He did not wish to delay the House very long; but before he sat down he wished to say this one thing to the Prime Minister—that he congratulated him on having refrained from taking up an inflexible attitude on the subject. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown the good sense of the great statesman in reconsidering the matter, and in showing that he could bend to the popular voice, and to an expression of an opinion on the part of the House. Whichever way hon. Members went, he thought they ought to be obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, and to thank him for having taken the first step towards helping them to throw off those local burdens, which were not for local, but for Imperial purposes.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he quite agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) earlier in the evening, that this question might be kept within a small compass, and it was only in the way of endeavouring to bring it within a small compass that he ventured to address the House on this occasion. The point to which they should direct their attention in regard to the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) was, first of all, whether the registration of voters was of National or Imperial importance. On this they were told from the other side that they, on the Conservative Benches, ought to consider that their representation was local rather than national. He begged to say that he entirely differed from the hon. Baronet who said that; and he could not consider that the localization of the Member rendered the representation itself, and consequently the registration, other than a national matter. Taking it that registration was of national, rather than local importance, he would ask what it was that they had now to discuss? It was simply the quantum which was to be paid by the nation; it was too late now to discuss the question of principle. They, on the other side of the House, had entirely conceded the principle. They had conceded it when they said—"We will give you £20,000." If they said they were going to give away only as much as 1*d.* for the registration of voters, the principle was conceded—the raising difficulties as to how overseers were to be paid, and how receipts were to be taken from them and given in as vouchers, was beside the mark, because the Government, by granting this sum, had said—"We consider the registration of voters of national rather than local importance; and we will, therefore, give you £20,000 towards the cost of it; and we believe you will be able so to distribute this money that we can take from you who receive it the proper vouchers." The whole argument as to the difficulty of fixing the amount which was to be paid by the State, therefore, fell to the ground. The Conservative Members were, consequently, right in their contention that the justice of the case demanded that the sum paid by the State should not be fixed at £20,000, but should be either more or less, as the case might be—should be absolutely the sum the registration of voters cost. Supposing in regard to any other matter a claim was made for an allowance of money, the Government examined closely into the claim to see whether a certain sum was required. If more was required it was given, if less the amount was reduced. Why not do the same in connection with this matter of registration? Why should a lump sum be paid—why should not an exact claim be made—why should they not ascertain the precise cost and pay it? The right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) said—"Oh, but we are only making this allowance for this occasion, and we do not want, in the last year of an expiring Parliament, to tell you what will be the sum you will have to pay in future." But that was precisely the time at which payment should be claimed from the Government, there being a great expense about to be incurred in respect of a great national requirement. The Government admitted the requirement to be a national one—this enormous extension of the franchise. The Conservatives agreed that this extension should take place, and as registration had to be provided for, and as the operation would be extraordinary and expensive, they said, fairly enough—"Pay the ratepayers not a limited sum, but the exact sum that this registration will cost." The principle being admitted, and the question being simply as to the amount of detail to be got over, the Conservative Party in all justice said—"Do not put in the way difficulties as to the amount of money to be allocated; but, on proper proof made to you of the amount expended, allow it, and do justice to the ratepayers."

MR. WARTON (who was received with loud cries for a division) said, it was not his fault, but his misfortune, that he rose at this period of the evening. For at least two hours he had endeavoured in vain to catch Mr. Speaker's eye. He had risen many times earlier on, knowing the subordinate position he held in the House as a mere back seat Member, and not wishing to obtrude himself amongst the mighty ones who generally wound up important debates. But even though he was only a back seat Member, he must say that observations had been made by hon. Members opposite which had reached his Bench, and one of the hon. Members to whose speech he particularly wished to refer was the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). That hon. Member had committed—if he might say so with great respect—a contrary error to that he (Mr. Warton) had himself committed. He had risen too early in the debate. He had said that the Motion of the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) was not supported by any borough Members. Now, if the hon. Member had waited a little longer he would not have been able to say that, because, after he spoke, they had had the hon. Members representing the very important boroughs of Manchester, Liverpool, and Preston all joining in the prayer uttered by the hon. Baronet. It was easy for an hon. Member to get up early in a debate and say that no borough Member had spoken; but no doubt the hon. Member for Bradford would now be prepared to withdraw what he had said when he heard such important Members as the Members for Manchester, Liverpool, and Preston urging the case as strongly from the borough point of view as county Members had urged it from the county point of view. Another hon. Member who sat on the opposite side—the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold)—had used most extraordinary arguments until he was checked by Mr. Speaker—the arguments that the Motion before the House had a tendency towards manhood suffrage and the payment of Members. If Mr. Speaker had not checked the hon. Member, no doubt he would have gone through all the other points of the Charter. But one important argument the hon. Member used was that representation was only connected with one species of property. For his own part, he held, and he had always been of opinion, that if any kind of property made a man better than his fellows as being of more intelligence, that property should confer a vote; and that had been the opinion of the Liberal Party until, he was sorry to say, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), by the adoption of the phrase “fancy franchise,” destroyed that very sensible proposition. But he (Mr. Warton) would not take up further time by alluding to the speeches of those hon. Members. He would confine himself to the proposition before the House. Now, he thought the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), in that pretentious style which was so often adopted by Ministers now—and against which he (Mr. Warton) begged leave most heartily to protest—said, “I think it right that you should bring this matter forward; I do not complain of the language you have used; I think you are very good little boys.” He (Mr. Warton) must protest against the spirit which dictated such words as those. He held that it was not right, nor proper, nor decent in a Minister of the Crown to tell the Opposition that, forsooth, he did not complain of what they had done. It was not for the right hon. Baronet to criticize what they had done. As to the Motion before the House, it was a matter of the greatest importance—it was a matter of importance for the reason that it was laying down a broad general principle which was only just beginning to be acknowledged by the Government. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had said that this was a national question; and if they only looked at the first few lines of the Amendment they would see that that idea of a national question was the most prominent idea in it. But when they looked at the last line, which said that the rate was to be “Levied in respect of the occupation of a single description of property,”

Mr. Warton

they saw that there was admitted into the debate the question what kind of property it was on which the rates were levied. What kind of property? [“Divide!”] When they considered that it had been held by all competent judges that real property had now far more burdens upon it than it ought to bear, and, moreover, when they considered that under the Budget which was put before them the other day real property was to have an additional burden never yet imposed upon it—and one which had been hitherto kept away from it because it was considered it ought not to bear it—added to its existing burdens, it was imperative that this new rate should be levied on personal property. They had had the usual excuse—if it was an excuse—which the Government put before them. They had had the scheme of County Government put before their eyes. With the tremendous majority the Government had had—a majority commencing with considerably over 100—they had not been able in the course of five years to bring in a County Government Bill. He believed that no such Bill had yet been drafted; he believed there was no scheme for County Government in the archives of the Government. But it suited the Government to make the excuse that a Bill would be brought forward, and that was the excuse with which hon. Members had been met. That was the argument of the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board. The argument as to the overseers—that it would be impossible to get receipts from them—was an unworthy argument. He would ask whether it was or was not the custom of those who received money by Post Office Order to signify the same by signing their names at the bottom of them? He should have thought that that fact would have been within the knowledge of the right hon. Baronet, and that that receipt would be held sufficient for all practical purposes. It seemed, however, that that was not enough to satisfy the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Gentleman had argued very feebly; for, after all, what did the right hon. Baronet's argument come to? They were told that the rate would be 2*d.* per head. Well, he had heard of a weak argument being described as "twopenny-halfpenny argument;" but here the argument was no more than a "twopenny" argument. As a matter of fact, he did not think the Government were right as to the 2*d.* per head, for the £20,000 was not to apply to the whole 2,400,000 new electors to be admitted to the franchise, but only to the new electors of Great Britain; therefore, the amount would be something more than 2*d.* per head. They were told by the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Cropper) that there was always a great deal of extravagance attendant upon what were called subventions. It was possible that there might be extravagance in connection with some subventions; but he would ask with confidence whether it was possible for there to be extravagance in this case? Was it possible for the overseers to increase their claims? It seemed to him impossible for them to do it. The Government knew very well what the charges ought to be. [Cries of "Divide, divide!"] amidst which the hon. and learned Member resumed his seat.]

[First Night.]

"And the first fourteen days after the said twenty-fifth day of August shall be substituted for the first fourteen days of September."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Amendment as to revision).

MR. R. H. PAGET proposed to leave out "and seven," in line 13, and insert—

"But in the case of a Parliamentary county not less than ten."

Seven days' notice would be quite insufficient in the case of counties, because all papers were not of daily circulation. Many of the chief county papers were only of weekly circulation; and, therefore, it would be impossible to give any adequate notice if it were confined to seven days. He had been strongly urged to move the Amendment, and he did so with the only view of insuring that there should be an opportunity for sufficient publicity.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 13, to leave out the words "and seven," and insert the words "but in the case of a Parliamentary county not less than ten."—(Mr. R. H. Paget.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and seven' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this matter was mentioned in the Select Committee, and the conclusion arrived at was that seven days' notice was preferable to 10. The Revising Barristers only wished for seven days, and the Clerks of the Peace were satisfied with such a notice. Notice was given to the Clerks of the Peace in advance, and they, of course, would take care to give sufficient notice. It was wished to economize time as much as possible, and all those who had practical knowledge of the subject were content with seven days' notice.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing if the Attorney General was satisfied that seven days' notice was sufficient.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON proposed to omit the word "each" in line 13, and insert "such." "Each" implied a choice between one or more; but here there was only one Court mentioned, and, therefore, what was the use of employing that word?

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 13, to leave out the word "each," and insert the word "such."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'each' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) preferred the word "each," as it would cover every Court. "Such" would refer to nothing.

MR. WARTON remarked, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman would condescend to note the meaning of the word "each," he would find it implied that they had already a reference in the same sentence to more than one Court. "A" would do just as well as "such;" but "each" was not sufficient. If he withdrew the Amendment, would the Attorney General accept "a"? "A Court" appeared in line 12.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): No, Sir; I prefer "each."

Question put, and agreed to.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment made:—Page 4, lines 4 and 6, after "lists of," insert "voters for."

MR. R. H. PAGET proposed to leave out "consecutively," in page 4, line 26, and insert "continuously." His object in proposing that alteration was to make it clear that in the enumeration of the numbers in each polling district the numbers should be made "continuous" throughout. "Continuously" had been suggested as a more correct definition of a series of voters.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 26, to leave out the word "consecutively," and insert the word "continuously."—(Mr. R. H. Paget.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'consecutively' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this was really a matter of taste. He had always understood that "continuously" was applied to time rather than to material subjects. He thought that "consecutively" would be the better word to use, but he had very little feeling in the matter.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. H. PAGET proposed to leave out the words "to be entered," in line

TELLERS.

Thornhill, T.

Winn, R.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: After the division which has just been taken, I would venture to express a hope that Her Majesty's Government would reconsider this matter before proceeding with the Bill. We have no desire, as was very fairly admitted by the right hon. Baronet the President of the Local Government Board, to interfere with the progress of this measure; but I think that the vote which has just been taken is one of very considerable significance. It shows that there is a very inconsiderable majority against the proposition of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon; and surely it is a case in which, under all the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government might make some concession to what has been shown to be the opinion of so very large a minority of this House.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with respect to concession, I may say that there never was a case in which a Government went to a greater length, considering the views it entertained, in order to meet the views of those opposed to it. We have made our concession; we have failed to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and we have failed also to obtain from them any concession in return. The Government having made its concession, the House has sanctioned the course they have taken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the position which the Government has taken up is one which, no doubt, they consider to be fair and reasonable; but, on the other hand, it has not satisfied—I will not say hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—but those who take an interest in the question of local taxation and the burdens cast upon the localities. The right hon. Gentleman cannot conceal from himself the significance of the very narrow division which has just been taken; and it is only fair, I think, that the Government should reconsider the position in which that division places them, and that they should consider what course they will take in regard to further proceedings in relation to this Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have no further announcement to make upon this subject. What has fallen from the right hon. Baronet would be perfectly appropriate if the majority had been reversed.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Alteration of dates).

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, the object of the Amendment he was about to move was to prevent loss of time in the Revising Barristers' Courts, occasioned by wrangles over the sufficiency of claims and notices of objection in respect of the names of divisions of counties which were likely to take place if the Bill did not contain a provision of the kind which he proposed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, after sub-section (1), to insert the following sub-section:—"Where, under 'The Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885,' any division of a Parliamentary county or borough shall have received any alternative name, it shall be sufficient, under sub-section (1) of this Clause, that any notice of claim or objection should refer to one only of such alternative names."—(Mr. H. G. Allen.)

Question proposed, "That the sub-section be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, there were two objections to the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal. In the first place, there was no such statute as the Redistribution of Seats Act, 1885, as that Bill had not yet become law, and they could not, therefore, legislate upon it. Secondly, if the hon. and learned Gentleman chose to treat that Bill as an Act, there was in it already a clause which would make the Amendment entirely unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Motion of Mr. R. H. PAGET, the following Amendment made:—Page 3, line 5, leave out "sections nine and eleven," and insert "section nine."

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—Page 3, line 5, leave out "eleven," and insert "nineteen;" line 9, after "occur," add—

[First Night.]

"And the first fourteen days after the said twenty-fifth day of August shall be substituted for the first fourteen days of September."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Amendment as to revision).

MR. R. H. PAGET proposed to leave out "and seven," in line 13, and insert—

"But in the case of a Parliamentary county not less than ten."

Seven days' notice would be quite insufficient in the case of counties, because all papers were not of daily circulation. Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. R. H. PAGET proposed to leave out the words "to be entered," in line

Committees; and had commenced at 12 o'clock; and he thought it would be working them a little too hard to attempt to make further progress with this Bill at 25 minutes to 2 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he thought it had been understood that they should finish the clause they were on and Clause 5 before reporting Progress; but as the hon. and gallant Baronet had made the Motion he would not propose to go any further.

MR. BIGGAR: May I ask what is the Business for to-morrow?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): The intention at present is to proceed with this Bill first, and after that with the Report of the Irish Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be deferred till to-morrow."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Upon that I would take the opportunity of asking the noble Lord opposite (Lord Richard Grosvenor) if he can tell us what arrangements will be made as to Business for the next two or three days? I understood the Prime Minister to say that the discussion on the Vote of Credit might either be taken on Thursday, in which case the Army Estimates will be taken on Monday, or on Monday, when the Army Estimates will be taken on Thursday. We think it would be more convenient to take it on Monday. In the event of that arrangement being made, I think, as the Prime Minister said, the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken first on Monday. That would afford an opportunity for the discussion mentioned the other day.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: The Orders of the Day to-morrow will be very much in the same position as they were on the Paper to-day; and on Thursday, in accordance with the arrangement made, and with the right hon. Gentleman's wish, we propose to take the Army Estimates. The Business of Friday must depend upon the way we get on with Business in the meantime.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The second reading, then, will be taken on Monday?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: Yes.

MR. HEALY: In case the Irish Bill is not finished to-morrow, when will it come on? The English Bill will take a great deal of time.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: That will be a matter for consideration.

MR. HEALY: Will it be taken on Thursday?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; not as first Order. If it should be convenient to finish it on Thursday night we should be very glad to go on with it then.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: When do you expect the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill to come on?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: On Friday or Tuesday. It will depend, to some extent, on the progress made to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (POOR LAW) (NO. 8) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, under the provisions of "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867," as amended by "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868," and extended by "The Poor Law Act, 1879," relating to the Township of Kendal, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL and Sir CHARLES DILKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 158.]

WAYS AND MEANS.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at half after One o'clock.

through all the lists in the case of each name.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that that altered the matter.

MR. WARTON said, they had already provided for the question being put to the voters as to whether or not they had votes in more than one division, so that there was not much danger of a person voting twice over; and he should think there would be agents representing both Parties at each revision sharp enough to see that voters' names did not appear in more places than one. If they read this by the light of the next sub-section (b), they would see that it was throwing on the voter an amount of trouble which ought not to be thrown upon him.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Preston withdraw his Amendment?

MR. TOMLINSON: Yes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to move, in page 4, line 36, to omit the words "Parliamentary county," in order to insert "county division." He wished to point out that they had counties at large and divisions of counties, and both were Parliamentary counties. There was no limitation in their description, although the word "Parliamentary" was to apply only to county divisions, keeping up that difference between counties at large and Parliamentary counties. He apprehended that what was meant in the clause was county divisions.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 36, to leave out the words "Parliamentary county," and insert the words "county division."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Parliamentary county' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the hon. and learned Member was somewhat late in bringing forward this Amendment, because the form and description to which he took exception had already been adopted 12 times. It had hitherto escaped the vigilance of the hon. and learned Member; and it was, therefore, now too late. He would point out to the hon. and learned Member that these phrases were mentioned in the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill.

MR. WARTON: In what section? He had read the Bill as carefully as the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he did not remember the expression "Parliamentary county" at all in it. As to his not having noticed this expression in any previous part of the Bill, it was not his fault that it escaped his vigilance. It was not his duty to amend the form of the Bill. The Attorney General himself should have noticed the matter before. It was not his (Mr. Warton's) duty to correct the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): It may not be the hon. and learned Member's duty to correct the Bill; but it is my duty to see that we use consistent language in it. We have used this phrase to which the hon. and learned Member objects over and over again.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that he would draw attention to the fact that there was a definition of these terms. "Parliamentary county" was a term clearly defined in page 11 of the Bill to mean—

"A county returning a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, and where the county is divided for the purpose of such return means a division of such county."

It was a term of art, and he did not at present see any better phrase.

MR. WARTON said, he must only confess that he had not seen the definition the hon. Gentleman referred to; but at the same time he did not think it made the expression any more convenient. He thought they should put in the Bill exactly what they meant. There were no Members to be returned for counties except those who represented county divisions.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes; in the case of Rutland.

MR. WARTON: That is a county in itself; therefore, I suppose this will not apply to it.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, it does.

MR. WARTON: Then I withdraw.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought that this would be a convenient time for reporting Progress. They were in the House until 3 o'clock that morning, or rather yesterday morning, and he and others had been at work on Committees; and had commenced at 12 o'clock; and he thought it would be working them a little too hard to attempt to make further progress with this Bill at 25 minutes to 2 o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he thought it had been understood that they should finish the clause they were on and Clause 5 before reporting Progress; but as the hon. and gallant Baronet had made the Motion he would not propose to go any further.

MR. BIGGAR: May I ask what is the Business for to-morrow?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): The intention at present is to proceed with this Bill first, and after that with the Report of the Irish Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be deferred till to-morrow."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Upon that I would take the opportunity of asking the noble Lord opposite (Lord Richard Grosvenor) if he can tell us what arrangements will be made as to Business for the next two or three days? I understood the Prime Minister to say that the discussion on the Vote of Credit might either be taken on Thursday, in which case the Army Estimates will be taken on Monday, or on Monday, when the Army Estimates will be taken on Thursday. We think it would be more convenient to take it on Monday. In the event of that arrangement being made, I think, as the Prime Minister said, the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken first on Monday. That would afford an opportunity for the discussion mentioned the other day.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: The Orders of the Day to-morrow will be very much in the same position as they were on the Paper to-day; and on Thursday, in accordance with the arrangement made, and with the right hon. Gentleman's wish, we propose to take the Army Estimates. The Business of Friday must depend upon the way we get on with Business in the meantime.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The second reading, then, will be taken on Monday?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: Yes.

MR. HEALY: In case the Irish Bill is not finished to-morrow, when will it come on? The English Bill will take a great deal of time.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: That will be a matter for consideration.

MR. HEALY: Will it be taken on Thursday?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No; not as first Order. If it should be convenient to finish it on Thursday night we should be very glad to go on with it then.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: When do you expect the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill to come on?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: On Friday or Tuesday. It will depend, to some extent, on the progress made to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDER (POOR LAW) (NO. 8) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order of the Local Government Board, under the provisions of "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867," as amended by "The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868," and extended by "The Poor Law Act, 1879," relating to the Township of Kendal, ordered to be brought in by Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL and Sir CHARLES DILKE.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4 (Amendment as to revision).

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, he had given Notice of his intention to move, in page 4, line 36, after "county," to insert "or borough," the object being to provide that when the name of a person appeared to be entered more than once as a Parliamentary voter on the list of voters for the same Parliamentary county "or borough," the Revising Barrister should inquire whether such entries related to the same person; and, on proof that such entries did relate to the same person, should retain one, and erase the others. He failed to see why any distinction should be drawn between the cases of the counties and of the boroughs in this respect. Duplicate voters in boroughs entailed considerable expense and difficulty, and, in some cases, led to endless confusion in perfecting the Register. Although he hoped his Amendment would be accepted, he had no wish to waste the time of the Committee, especially as his hon. Colleague (Mr. Picton) had an Amendment upon the Schedules, which would come on later, and which, if adopted, would answer the same purpose, and probably involve less trouble in altering the clauses of the Bill. He trusted that the matter would be fully discussed, and it was in order to afford an opportunity for such a discussion that he had placed his Amendment upon the Paper. If, however, it was the desire of the Committee, he would withdraw that Amendment now, so that the discussion might be taken upon the proposition of his hon. Colleague.

MR. PICTON said, that, before the Amendment was withdrawn, he would like to add a word to the statement of his hon. Colleague. He thought there ought to be some explanation from Her Majesty's Government as to the reason why this difference had been introduced between the counties and boroughs.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that there is no Question before the House. If the hon. Member desires to move the Amendment pro forma, he can do so.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, in moving an Amendment, in page 4, Sub-section 9, to leave out paragraph (b), which was as follows:—

"The said person may select the entry to be retained by notice in writing delivered or sent by post to the revising barrister at or before the opening of the first court at which he revises any of the lists in which any of such entries appear, or by application made by such person or on his behalf at the time of the revision of the first of such lists," said, the question raised here was one of selection; and his object in moving the Amendment was to provide that, in the case of counties as well as of boroughs, the Revising Barrister should have no option but to select, in the first instance, the place of abode in connection with which the name of the voter was to appear on the Register. In cases where the voter possessed a plural qualification, the name would be restricted to the first place of abode mentioned in the Register.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, Sub-section 9, line 40, to leave out paragraph (b).—(Mr. Arthur Arnold.)

Question proposed, "That paragraph (b) stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry that he could not accept the Amendment of his hon. Friend. He did not see why a county voter should not be allowed to continue to do what was invariably done now in reference to the counties—namely, to select the place for which he would be registered.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that that was only done in the case of municipal elections.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was done in Parliamentary elections also. He did not see why, if a person had a freehold in one part of a county and a dwelling-house in another, he should not select the place at which he desired to vote. For instance, it might be more convenient to vote at his place of business than at his place of residence; and he saw no reason why the county voter should be deprived of the privilege of selection.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in moving in paragraph (c) of the same clause to insert the word "only" after the word "one," in order to provide that "one only" of the entries first on the list of ownership voters, if unobjected to, should be retained. In one sense, the Amendment was a verbal one. It dealt with plural entries where no selection was made by the voter, and he proposed to insert the word "only" in order to avoid any future difficulty.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 6, after "one," insert "only."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That that word be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the next Amendment he should propose was in order to carry out the view of the House, when the Bill was in Committee, in relation to the boroughs. He proposed to omit, after the words "ownership voters," the words "and unobjected to;" and he intended to move a similar Amendment in the next paragraph of the clause. He also proposed to add, at the end of the clause, an affirmative paragraph to provide that if any such entry to be retained was objected to the Revising Barrister should not finally erase such entry until the objection to the entry to be retained had been determined by him in favour of the voter.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 7, leave out "and unobjected to."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived; words left out accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 8, leave out the words "neither of the entries is," in order to insert the words "all or none of the entries are,"—(Mr. Attorney General.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. WARTON said, he did not rise to make any captious observation, because he approved of the Amendment; but he thought his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General ought to express a little more clearly what his meaning was. The explanation already given by the hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be satisfactory to his own mind, and to several hon. Members opposite; but it did not sufficiently explain the exact object of these Amendments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had desired to deal with the Bill in a practical way, as a matter of business; and he thought he had explained that the object of these Amendments was to get rid of a difficulty which was now experienced in dealing with double entries. His object, in this particular instance, was to alter the dual into the plural.

Question put, and negatived; words left out accordingly.

Question, "That the words 'all or none of the entries are' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 10, leave out "and unobjected to."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That those words be there omitted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 13, at end, add "and if any such entry to be retained is objected to, the revising barrister shall not finally erase any other entry until the objection to the entry to be retained has been determined by him in favour of the voter."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

[Second Night.]

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. WARTON said, he objected to the extreme haste with which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was rattling through the Bill. He wanted to know, before a final erasure took place, how many times the process of erasure was to be gone through? Was it intended, first of all, to strike out the name, then to hear objections, and after that was there to be a final erasure? Who was to determine whether the erasure was final or not? He wanted the hon. and learned Attorney General to explain what the meaning of the Amendment was. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman take this ground—that a Committee had been sitting somewhere else to settle the clauses of the Bill, and that, although they had done the best they could, they had placed a very unsatisfactory Bill before the Committee? ["Oh, oh!"] If hon. Members were not to be at liberty to raise a question or object to the wording of the Bill, of course this proceeding was altogether a farce; and it would be better for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say so than for his supporters, whenever an hon. Member rose, to endeavour to groan him down.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could assure his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Warton) that he had no wish to withhold any explanation, or to abstain from answering any question that might be put to him. The object of his Amendment was this—Provision was contained in Clause 5 by which the Revising Barrister received power, in the case of duplicate entries, to retain one entry for voting purposes, and to place against the others a note to the effect that such person was not entitled to vote in respect of that particular qualification. But it was considered desirable that the Revising Barrister should not erase the qualification finally, because when the ownership vote was reached it might be found that it was objected to, and the consequence might be that the name of the voter might be struck off from the ownership vote after it had been previously struck off for another qualification, the result being that the voter would have no vote at all. Therefore, what was proposed to be done by these Amendments was to reserve to the Revising Barrister, on reaching the first entry, the power of withholding his signature to the entry, so that his final judgment would not be conclusive until he had heard any objection which might be raised to the ownership vote. The simple object was to preserve the name of the voter upon the Register.

MR. TOMLINSON asked how a provision of this kind would work in conjunction with Sub-section 6 of Clause 4, which provided that—

The revising barrister should, if practicable, complete the revision of the lists of the parishes in one polling district in a Parliamentary county, and transmit the same to the clerk of the peace of the county, before proceeding to revise the lists of any parish in another polling district."

The Revising Barrister was to transmit the list to the Clerk of the Peace before the revision was finally completed and the entries finally settled; but if he complied with that provision, how was he to reserve any final judgment as to erasing the name from the list?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Gentleman would look at the wording of the sub-section he would see that the Revising Barrister was, "if practicable," to complete the revision of the lists. These cases would not occur very often, and it was only right, when they did occur, that the Revising Barrister should make a note, and not finally sign the Register until it had been completely determined how the voter's name was to appear upon the list.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. Tomlinson) would be satisfied with the explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It seemed to him (Mr. E. Stanhope) that these Amendments would afford great protection to the voter, whose name might otherwise be struck off, although he was fully entitled to be on the Register.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he had no objection to the Amendment; but he would like to know how the Revising Barrister would follow out his instructions for dealing with the polling districts? It seemed to him that the two things were inconsistent, and that it would be necessary to keep the polling district Register by itself, and to keep the names of all the voters upon it, until the revision was completed.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that if the hon. Member opposite (Mr. R. H. Paget) would look at the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General he would see that the point he had raised did not occur. There was to be an actual objection which the Revising Barrister proposed to entertain; and in that case any other qualification was not to be struck out until it was rendered positively certain that the name of the voter would appear upon the Register in connection with one qualification or the other. This was altogether a provision for the protection of the voter.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the proposal was made, no doubt, for the protection of the voter; but he wanted to know how it would work practically, when the question came to be dealt with by the Revising Barrister? Was the Revising Barrister to keep a list of names, and to make up the Register from that list? He thought it would be impossible for the Revising Barrister to retain all the names in his mind.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the provision dealt with voters who were objected to, and the Revising Barrister would have a list of objections before him.

Question put, and agreed to; words added accordingly.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, in moving as an Amendment, at end of clause, to add—

“When it appears to the local authority having power to assign polling places in a Parliamentary borough divided into divisions that for the convenience of the voters it is expedient to direct the holding of a revision court in all or any of such divisions, the said authority may direct the revising barrister to hold a revision court in all or any of such divisions,” said, that he intended to press this Amendment upon the acceptance of the Committee by every means in his power. Its object was to enable the Local Authority, in the case of divided boroughs, to direct that the Revising Barrister, whenever it appeared to be for the public convenience, should hold his Court in all or any of the divisions. The Committee would see that by Sub-section 4 of the clause a somewhat similar power was given to the Local Authorities in counties. The matter was simply one of public convenience. The only difficulty which could possibly occur was in the position of the voter who had more than one qualification. But that was a much smaller objection than might be supposed. He had carefully looked through the list of voters in his own borough of Salford, and he was surprised to find that fewer than 100 voters out of a total of 24,000 had duplicate qualifications. Therefore, that question did not assume anything like the same proportions as the question of the general public convenience. He had consulted the Conservative Members for Manchester and Liverpool, who sat on the opposite side of the House, and hon. Gentlemen sitting on that side for Bradford and other places, and they quite concurred with him that the adoption of this Amendment would be for the public advantage.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 13, at the end of the Clause, to add the words “(10.) When it appears to the local authority having power to assign polling places in a Parliamentary borough divided into divisions, that for the convenience of the voters it is expedient to direct the holding of a revision court in all or any of such divisions, the said authority may direct the revising barrister to hold a revision court in all or any of such divisions.”—(Mr. Arthur Arnold.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he thought that was the wrong place to insert the Amendment. If inserted at all, it ought to come after Clause 5. Clause 4 dealt with the counties; but this Amendment did not refer to the counties at all, but only to the boroughs. His only desire was to see the Amendment inserted in the right place.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he would be quite ready, if his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would make the suggestion, to propose the Amendment later on; but the clause they were now discussing was entitled “Amendment as to revision.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, apart from the question of place, he would ask the Committee to consider whether this provision ought to be accepted at all. In the first place, the Bill was simply intended to assimilate the registration of householders in counties with the registration of householders in boroughs, and it was not intended to effect reforms in the Registration Law. There were a great many Amendments which would occur to most hon. Members of the House as capable of being introduced into the Registration Law; but the present Bill had not been brought in for the purpose of making it a means of effecting such reforms, which reforms must be dealt with at a future period, and very likely upon a more comprehensive scale. Therefore, the Government did not propose to deal with the question of improving the registration system, except so far as it was involved in the proposals contained in the Bill. The Amendment, if adopted, would give a wide expansion to the power of the Local Authority. At present, the Revising Barrister in any of these boroughs—take the borough of Salford, for instance—held his Court in the Town Hall, or some other public place provided by the Local Authority, and no complaint had hitherto been made that the voters were required to travel too far.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he believed that great objection was felt on the part of the voters to the position in which they were now placed in that respect.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the voter would not be placed under any further disadvantage by the Redistribution Bill than he had now to contend with. He would only be required to go to the same place. It had been thought a great advantage to have the revision concentrated in one place, so that they could have all the officers in attendance who were able to give the information that was necessary for the guidance of the Revising Barristers. Surely that advantage would become still more important when they were establishing separate Parliamentary divisions in the same borough. For instance, an officer from Division A would not know whether a particular voter was also going to vote in Division B; but if the officers of both divisions were brought together, the officer of Division A would be able to say—"We have got the voter's name down already, and, therefore, he must not be placed in Division B." In that way the Revising Barrister obtained valuable information. But if they were going to hold each revision of a division separately, and to require the officer for Parliamentary Division A to appear in one Court, and for Parliamentary Division B to appear in another, it would be impossible to obtain any community of information. What was required was some central place, where all the officers could meet in order to advise the Revising Barrister. The Revising Barrister himself, of his own knowledge, would not know whether a man occupied a particular house or shop or not; but the parish overseer would know, and if the parish overseers were brought together they would be able to see that the same man was not placed on the Register in regard to separate qualifications. He believed that that was the practical view which the Revising Barristers took of this subject. Their feeling was that, if the Amendment were adopted, it would take away from them the opportunity of obtaining the information they wanted; and, as a matter of fact, they would be called upon to carry on their inquiry in each division without having in their possession the special information they required. There were one or two other practical questions which would also have to be considered. Of course, there was nothing more important than to give as little extra work as possible to the Revising Barristers. The adoption of the Amendment would certainly involve a waste of time. The Revising Barristers would have to make appointments at each of the Revision Courts; but they would not be in a position to know how long the sitting at each would last. For instance, they might go to one Court and find the work over, at the end of a morning sitting, or in half-an-hour, and for the rest of the day they would have no work to do. On the other hand, the sitting at a particular Court might be much more protracted than they had anticipated, and all the arrangements for completing the work, or for attending elsewhere, would be disorganized. A great waste of time would be involved in the one case, and in the other the Revising Barrister would not be in a position to discharge his duty properly on the following day. These, of course, were practical matters which must be dealt with. The Revising Barristers felt very strongly upon them, and had earnestly pressed that no arrangement should be made which would cut their time to waste, especially this year, when it would be most desirable, owing to the exceptional circumstances of the case, that they should hold their Courts and complete the revision on the best information they could obtain in the shortest possible time. There was one other practical question which was worth consideration. The Revising Barristers had to provide the Revision Courts themselves. They had not only to find them, but to pay for them. It would, therefore, be not only more advantageous, but less expensive, to go to a central hall in Salford; but if, as it might be in the case of Salford, the Revising Barrister were required to hold seven Revision Courts, instead of one, he might be required to sit at some hotel, or some building, which was not a public institution. His hon. Friend made no provision for such a state of things, nor did he suggest where the Courts should be held. As had already been pointed out, Sub-section 4 gave to the Local Authority in counties power to hold a Revision Court in a town near the division, which might be just over the borders of the district, the object being to study the convenience of the voters. There was another reason why he was unwilling to accept the Amendment. He was afraid there might be Local Authorities who would be governed by political feeling; and they might have a Local Authority in one borough saying to the Revising Barrister "You shall do this," and another saying "You shall not do it." Upon the Select Committee they had the assistance of hon. and learned Gentlemen who had been Revising Barristers. The matter was carefully considered, and, after full discussion, it was decided not to introduce a clause in the direction of the Amendment of his hon. Friend. It was necessary to concentrate in one place the information from all divisions required for the guidance of Revising Barristers; and it would involve needless delay, inconvenience, and extra cost to multiply the Revision Courts.

MR. HOULDSWORTH said, the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Attorney General) had very properly placed before the Committee the objections from a Revising Barrister's point of view; but what the Committee had to consider was rather the convenience of the voters in connection with the registration work, so that the Register might be ultimately rendered as perfect as possible, and the work done with the least possible inconvenience to the voters. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman must know that the great difficulty in revising the Register was to induce those who had to appear to come up to the Court at all; and he presumed that the object the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had in view, in making this proposal, was that the voters should be placed in a position in which they could attend and make their claims before the Court of Revision, or appear in order to substantiate their claims when their names were objected to. He (Mr. Houldsworth) thought the hon. and learned Attorney General had not quite understood the object of this provision. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to suppose that it was intended to deal with the revision list for one division in one particular neighbourhood, and that nobody else should appear from any other district; and it was imagined that if more than one Court was held the Revising Barrister would be deprived of the general information which he would receive if the Court sat in a central position. But there was no reason why the officers who were required to supply information could not as easily attend each Divisional Court as the Central Court. It appeared to him that it was a question between the Revising Barristers and the officers on the one hand, and the great mass of the electors on the other; and as the number of those who would have to attend in order to substantiate their claims was much greater than the number of officials who would be required to give information, the balance of advantage was certainly in favour of providing for the convenience of the voter rather than of the officer. If he thought there was any practical difficulty in the way he would not press the Amendment. But he could corroborate what the hon. Member for Salford had stated—that it was felt to be a great grievance to be required to travel for a considerable distance—perhaps from two to four miles—to the Revision Court, thus wasting a great deal of time; whereas, if the revision took place in the immediate district, the loss of time would be considerably less, and the general convenience much greater. It was only a permissive clause, and he trusted that the hon. and learned Attorney General would consider it favourably. If any difficulty arose, it might be provided for upon another occasion; but his own impression was that if the Amendment were once adopted the difficulties which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Attorney General would disappear.

MR. MELLOR said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to one objection which, to his mind, was a serious practical difficulty. It was this—that the Revising Barrister had to settle his Courts, and to announce them beforehand, so that all the sittings of the Court were fixed when he went down to hold the inquiry. When a Revising Barrister began to hold his first Court in a large borough, he might find that he had a great deal more to do than he had anticipated, and that he had allowed only one or two days for the completion of work which would last three or four days. It was altogether impossible for a Revising Barrister, holding his Court in a large borough, to tell beforehand how long he would be required to sit. Therefore, if the Amendment moved by the hon. Member were adopted this difficulty would arise. The Revising Barrister would have to fix his first Court at a particular place—say, a Town Hall—and he would have to make appointments for that day. He would also have fixed a Court in another part of the borough for the next day; and the effect would be that, if the first inquiry was protracted, he would find that it was not possible to finish the first list on the first day, and a long interval would have to elapse before he would find himself able to return and take up the list again. The consequence would be that he would have to adjourn the Court until some indefinite period, and a number of people who had been summoned to attend would be put to the greatest possible inconvenience, and the time, not only of the voters, but of the officers, would have been wasted. The next day the same difficulty would occur again, and the Revising Barrister would then find himself, from day to day, in a position never to be able to finish anything. In addition to the public officers, a considerable number of voters would have been brought to the Court at great personal inconvenience and expense. He trusted that his hon. Friend would withdraw the Amendment, and he hoped his hon. Friend would not refuse to listen to his (Mr. Mellor's) suggestions, simply because he happened to have been a Revising Barrister. He had endeavoured to deal with the matter only from a practical point of view.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he sympathized with the views which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) and the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth). He thought that, in this matter, they ought to consult, not only the convenience of the Revising Barrister, but also that of the voter; and he believed that, in some cases, the convenience of the voter would be best consulted if an inquiry were held in each separate division. But, at the same time, he felt the force of what had been urged by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General as to the convenience of central sittings, and also the difficulty of entertaining in the present Bill proposals that were in the nature of reforms, rather than the mere assimilation of law, which it was the object of the Bill to secure. He was afraid that the only way of preventing duplicate entries upon the Register was to have all the officers together in one place. The Amendment certainly went beyond the province of the Bill; and he was afraid, if they were going to set to work to amend all the defects of the Registration Law which now existed, the scope of the Bill would have to be materially extended. He thought it would be better to try and limit the measure to the exact purposes for which it had been introduced.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, it was somewhat unfortunate for Her Majesty's Government that every hon. Member who had spoken against his proposal was, or had been, a Revising Barrister. As far as the evidence of Revising Barristers was concerned, he had no hesitation in admitting that the Revising Barristers, as a body, would be against his proposal. They would not like to be under the direction of the Local Authority, even in the case of a great borough like Manchester; but his contention was that they ought to be. In Manchester and Salford there were seven Town Halls, so that there would be no difficulty in finding public buildings suitable for the purposes of the Revising Barrister. The hon. and learned Attorney General objected to the proposal on the ground that it was somewhat beyond the scope of the present Bill. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) maintained that it was exactly within the scope of the Bill; because it was consequent on the passing of the Redistribution Bill and the division of great boroughs into separate constituencies. The Attorney General had pointed out that the voters would be in no worse position if the Amendment were not passed; but what he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) wanted was to place them in a better position. He agreed with the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Houldsworth) that the voters generally would derive great benefit from the adoption of this provision, and that they would be prevented from being required to walk, as was constantly the case at present, from two to four miles in order to support their qualification. A further argument in favour of the Amendment was that it was permissive and not compulsory, and there was no possibility of its being put in force where it would not be for the convenience of the voters. Where it was for the convenience of the voters, it would undoubtedly be put in force; and he thought it was a matter of the highest importance that the Local Authority should possess this power.

MR. TOMLINSON said, there was one point in the remarks of the hon. and learned Attorney General which had not been alluded to by previous speakers, and he did not think that it had been properly met by those who supported the Amendment. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had spoken of that borough having three Town Halls. [MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: Manchester has four.] There might be a borough divided under the Redistribution Bill which had no public institution whatever in the second division, which would answer the purpose of a Revision Court. If, therefore, the Revising Barrister was required to hold a Court in a division of that kind, there ought to be some provision to secure that the Local Authority should provide a place in which to hold the extra sitting. It ought to be the duty of the Local Authority to provide a place of meeting, and not of the Revising Barrister.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that as yet no answer had been given to a most important objection to the Amendment which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General—namely, that in the absence of information at the Divisional Courts electors might get placed on the list for two or three divisions. Before the Committee went into the Lobby, he would be glad if his hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), or somebody who took the same view, would answer that objection, which was certainly a most formidable one.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the objections advanced by the hon. and learned Attorney General and his right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) upon that matter would be as apparent to the Local Authority as the Revising Barrister. The Amendment had been opposed chiefly from the Revising Barrister's point of view. Surely the practical considerations which had been put forward would be appreciated quite as much by the Local Authorities as by the Revising Barristers. His (Mr. Arthur Arnold's) contention was that the chief matter of importance was the convenience of the public officers and the voter; and he was sure that his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) would have full confidence in the Local Authorities that they would only pay regard to the public convenience. He had already stated to the House that, on looking through the list of voters for the borough of Salford, he found that the duplicate entries were very few indeed; and he had no doubt that, if his right hon. Friend would examine the list for the borough of Bradford, he would find that it was in a similar position.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that he was not a Revising Barrister, he had never been one, and never expected to be; but he was the Representative of a large borough, which was to be divided under the Redistribution Bill, and he thought the arguments which were put forward by his hon. and learned Friend and the Attorney General were sound and practicable. He thought that, so far as the balance of convenience was concerned, there might be some advantage if they could bring the Revising Barrister to the voter's own door. But they had to deal with a limited amount of time, and there was another provision which the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) had overlooked—namely, the possible protraction of the business of the Divisional Courts, which might, if the Amendment were adopted, much delay the completion of the Register for the borough of Salford and Manchester.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD remarked, that the course he had suggested was adopted in Salford the year before last.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that it was done by the Revising Barrister for the convenience of the voter, and the Revising Barrister was a local gentleman who understood the working of his own Court. The main question for the consideration of Parliament was to prevent duplicate entries. They were introducing a new system now, and what might have been of trivial importance before, when the voter could only vote for two Members, became of much greater importance now that the borough was divided into a large number of divisions. It now became of the utmost importance to prevent a man from finding his way upon the Register for more than one division, in which case he might possibly be tempted to vote for each. He thought the balance of convenience was against the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. HOULDSWORTH thought that the difficulty raised by the Government in regard to duplicate votes was fictitious, and that the district Revision Courts might be so arranged as to have the agents and the officers of each part of the borough in attendance at the same time. All of them could go to each of the districts in turn, and the same information would, in that case, be before the Revising Barristers in each district division as in the central division. He did not see, therefore, that the adoption of the Amendment would create further difficulties in the case of duplicate entries.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) and the hon. and learned Attorney General thought that the Revising Barrister's inquiry should be held in one Court for two or more divisions. His (Mr. Illingworth's) opinion was, that if a borough were divided into three divisions and three distinct Courts were held, the officers would be in precisely the same position as if they had to wait in a Central Court until the lists for the second or third division were taken. In his judgment no inconvenience whatever would arise. If the Revision Courts were held in different parts of the borough, what would happen? Simply what happened now. When the Revision Court was held, the voter had to support his claim when his turn came; and the uncertainty as to when the name would be called would be greater in a Central Court than if the Court were held in different districts. The convenience of the voter would certainly be better consulted by adopting the Amendment; and it was quite possible for the Revising Barrister to make arrangements with the overseers to be present at the Court held in each division. It would be just as necessary for the overseers to attend in the one case as in the other; and, therefore, he saw nothing in the objections which had been raised to the Amendment.

MR. MELLOR said, that having been a Revising Barrister, and being one no longer, he was able to take the position of an impartial witness. The Revising Barristers had to consult and did consult the convenience of the voters; but, notwithstanding what had been said by hon. Members who supported the Amendment, he believed that its adoption would create serious practical difficulties. The point referred to by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) was a very serious one indeed. When he was a Revising Barrister, one of the most difficult things he had to do was to ascertain, in cases of alleged duplicates, whether the name objected to was really a duplicate entry or not—that was to say, whether it was the same man whose name appeared on the Register more than once. This was a very difficult matter to decide, because it sometimes happened that there were a dozen or twenty persons who had the same name. Of course the Revising Barrister was told at once that these were duplicate entries, and that it was the same man who had three or four separate qualifications. The Revising Barrister had to examine the evidence most carefully, and to satisfy himself whether the entries related to the same man or not; and it was really a very difficult thing to do. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) said there was no difficulty about it; but he (Mr. Mellor) was convinced that unless the Revising Barristers took the utmost care in this matter a good many persons would run the risk of losing their votes. He was glad that the matter had been pointed out by the hon. and learned Attorney General, and that the right hon. Member for Bradford had added his objection.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he had only asked for information on the point.

Mr. MELLOR maintained that in order to make certain, and to prevent an act of injustice being done, it was necessary to bring into Court all the officers who were connected with the parish. They were all summoned to attend the first Court held by the Revising Barrister; but if the sitting of the Court was broken off, as it was liable to be if the proposed Amendment were adopted, the Revising Barrister would find it impossible to give notice beforehand where he was going to hold his Court next. The result would be that there would be in Court on the first day a great number of persons who would necessarily waste their time, including, in some cases, the officers of different parishes; and then the Revising Barrister would have to adjourn the Court to some uncertain day, because he would not be able to tell when he might be able to get back again. He would then have to go to another Court and to get these important parish officers to go about with him; and, perhaps, through carelessness or some other cause, many of those who had wasted their time on the first day would not be in attendance on the next, and complaints would consequently be made. By that means the Register would get into confusion. His hon. Friend the Member for Salford had suggested that the Revising Barristers did not understand the matter, and that it was only the Local Authority who did. He thought it might sometimes be assumed that those who had had personal experience knew best; and he was sure that the Revising Barristers, as a rule, made it their first consideration to consult the convenience of the voters. He believed that if the Committee adopted this Amendment, a large amount of confusion and uncertainty would be occasioned by the Revising Barrister never being able to see how much of the business could be got through in a particular day. In these days of railways, tramways, and omnibuses, it would not be much to ask a working man to travel two or three miles in order to substantiate his claim to the vote. Voters in the counties had to travel much greater distances, and they did not complain. It was even in the power of the Revising Barrister to give costs if he thought that persons had been improperly objected to, and in such a case as this they were fairly entitled to costs. He hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment. This year the Revising Barristers would have to do three or four times the amount of work they had ever been called upon to perform before, and they had already expressed their willingness to do it.

Mr. ARTHUR ARNOLD: That will not be the case in the boroughs.

Mr. MELLOR said, that in regard to those boroughs which had been divided it would be found that the work had been largely increased. He was very sorry, for his own part, that his hon. Friend the Member for Salford had not been a Revising Barrister, so that he might have sat in one of these Courts and have become acquainted with the difficulties which had to be contended with. He hoped that when his hon. Friend went back to Salford at the time of the next revision, he would go down to the Court and see how the work was managed.

Mr. TOMLINSON hoped that if the claim was agreed to the Committee would agree to insert in it a Proviso making it the duty of the Local Authority in the case of divided boroughs to provide proper places for the holding of Revision Courts.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, the objection which had been raised to the proposal was fairly met by the answer that the overseers would attend at each Revision Court. After all, the Amendment was merely permissive. It would not be adopted in many boroughs, and he should be glad if the Government would see their way to make it possible to carry out the proposal of his hon. Friend.

Mr. TOMLINSON asked if he would be in Order in moving the Amendment he had suggested after the ^{main} amendment which was about to take place.

[Second Night.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 77: Majority 33.—(Div. List, No. 157.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Provision as to double entries in boroughs).

MR. HOULDSWORTH moved, as an Amendment, after "voter," in line 33, to insert—

"Any person who is entered more than once as a Parliamentary voter may, in pursuance of sub-section fourteen of section twenty-eight of 'The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878,' select the entry to be retained for voting by notice in writing in the form given in the Schedule to this Act, and such notice shall be delivered to the revising barrister at the opening of the revision court for the borough."

"Any person on the list of voters may object to the name of any person being retained for voting purposes on any list of voters in respect of more than one qualification, and the revising barrister shall hear and determine such objection; and, if the person objected to does not appear, or has not selected the entry to be retained for voting in manner prescribed by this Act, the revising barrister shall deal with such entry as directed by sub-section one of this present section."

The hon. Member said, the simple object of his Amendment was to provide definite forms in two cases, one being the case of objection to a duplicate vote, and the other the case of selection of qualification. He drew the argument for the necessity of this from some remarks which had been made by an hon. Member opposite upon the last clause; and the provision was rendered necessary owing to the difficulty the Revising Barrister now experienced in getting proper proof of duplicate qualifications, and of the identity of individuals. In some cases the names of persons appeared on the list who were relations, while in others they were not relations at all; and the consequence was that very great care was required in deciding whether the name was that of a really valid voter or not. It was well known to those who had to work the registration system that there was great difficulty in getting voters to attend to the application made to them, requiring them to bring proof of their identity or to substantiate their claim. His object was to provide a definite form of objection which might be sent to the man who was objected to, on the ground that he had more than one qualification. If this were not done, he did not see any provision whatever in the Bill, as it stood, which would protect a man who was on the Register from being taken off, on the ground that he had a duplicate vote. He failed to see that there would be any protection at all unless some provision were made that the objection should in every case be sent to the voter. He noticed, in the Bill in regard to counties, that there was a provision for selection; but he was not quite sure that there was one in regard to objection, and his object in providing this form of objection was to secure that every man whose name was more than once on the Register should have an objection sent to him, in order that he might be able to take the proper steps, by appearance or otherwise, to prove whether he had been really duplicated or not. Now that there was to be a system of selection, it appeared to him that great confusion would be created unless some definite form were provided which the Revising Barrister could have presented to him, and which, when duly signed, he would accept as evidence of the selection of the voter. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would be good enough to tell him how, under the Bill, the principle of selection would be exercised? There was nothing in the Bill, so far as he understood it, which enabled him to see exactly how it would work. He could understand that if the voter appeared personally before the Revising Barrister and said that he preferred to have his name upon the Register as being qualified for such-and-such a place, that that would be sufficient, or that it might be sufficient if the agent produced a letter from the voter. All that he would get by establishing a distinct form of selection would be to enable the Revising Barrister to get through his work much more easily, and to provide a form which would have a little more authority about it. The strong point was to protect the voter against being taken off, when it might not be really a duplicate entry at all.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 33, after "voter," insert—
"Any person who is entered more than once as a Parliamentary voter may, in pursuance of sub-section fourteen of section twenty-eight of

"The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878," select the entry to be retained for voting by notice in writing in the form given in the Schedule to this Act, and such notice shall be delivered to the revising barrister at the opening of the revision court for the borough.

"Any person on the list of voters may object to the name of any person being retained for voting purposes on any list of voters in respect of more than one qualification, and the revising barrister shall hear and determine such objection; and, if the person objected to does not appear, or has not selected the entry to be retained for voting in manner prescribed by this Act, the revising barrister shall deal with such entry as directed by sub-section one of this present section."—(Mr. Houldsworth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said there was, under the Act already in force, the power which the hon. Member suggested; and under the present Bill Sub-section 9 of Clause 3 made this provision for counties by notice being given in writing. As proposed by the hon. Member, he thought the provision would be very awkward, because the voter would lose the advantage given him by the present Act of Parliament. The voter now could write a note to the Revising Barrister and select the occupation vote; and if the Revising Barrister was satisfied with the genuineness of the handwriting it would be sufficient. In counties that was so. The Revising Barrister would communicate with the voter, the voter having written to him—"I give you notice that I wish to remain on the list for that qualification." The hon. Gentleman wished to go further, and proposed a form which he (the Attorney General) could not accept, and which he thought the Committee would see was unadvisable. The hon. Gentleman proposed, however, two forms, one of which was a form of objection. A person might go before the Revising Barrister and say—"This person must not have this qualification because he is on the Register for another." Her Majesty's Government had considered this, and he (the Attorney General) had framed a clause dealing with the notices of objection; but they found it was so complex, casting the burden upon the voter, that he had abandoned it. But by Clause 16 the Committee would see, if they inserted this form in the Schedule, they would render the proceedings taken invalid if that form had not been used; whereas it was provided that disregard of a formal instruction should not invalidate. He should have no objection to meet the hon. Member's views in the proper place by inserting his form of objection. He could not, however, insert it in the clause under notice.

MR. HOULDSWORTH said, his object, as he had stated, was to protect persons from having objections made against them which did not properly apply to them. Under the Bill any person could object to any other person on the list for what seemed to be a double qualification; the name of John Jones, for instance, might appear twice, but the individual in one case might be another person altogether from the individual in the other. His proposal was that a form of objection should be sent to every person whose name was more than once on the Register in order that he might take steps, by appearance or otherwise, to prove, if necessary, that he was not a duplicate voter.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked if he was correct in understanding that the law would be that if a man had two qualifications—say, one for his residence in one division, and the other for his warehouse in another division—he would be registered for his house, unless he claimed to vote in respect of his warehouse; but that it would not be obligatory upon him to attend in person to make that claim—that it would be sufficient for him to write a letter which would satisfy the Revising Barrister?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. Gentleman had correctly stated the effect of the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Saving as to registration of burgesses and voters in parishes in municipal boroughs) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Clerks of the peace and town clerks).

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he wished to state very briefly his reasons for proposing the alteration embodied in the Amendment he was about to move to this clause. He was aware that there was great need for speed in the matter of this Bill, and, therefore, he did not wish to cause a moment's unnecessary delay. He would point out that Bills were rarely delivered by the Queen's printer's earlier than three days after the Royal Assent had been given to them; and, therefore, according to the clause, Clerks of the Peace would only have, at the outside, four days in which to issue the precepts to overseers. Those precepts were very lengthy, as the Committee might observe by reference to the Schedules of the Bill; they were not yet settled; but it would be obligatory on every Clerk of the Peace to issue, within seven days after the passing of the Bill, the whole of those lengthy precepts to every overseer in their respective counties. In the case of large counties, with 500 parishes, it would be impossible to comply with the provision of the clause in its present form. The mere printing of the precepts would take a considerable time. He repeated that he had no desire to delay the Bill, but wished to make it a practicable measure. He readily acknowledged that the work of the overseers was full of difficulty, and that they wanted plenty of time; and he was glad to find that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who the other night regarded this as a mere matter of simple copying, had been thoroughly converted on this point; but, in order to afford time to Clerks of the Peace to perform their statutable duty, he would move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 10, leave out the word "seven," in order to insert the word "ten,"—(Mr. R. H. Paget,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'seven' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, so far as he was concerned, he should be perfectly willing that the Clerks of the Peace should have 10 days instead of seven in which to issue the precepts; but the Government had very carefully considered the point, and seeing that the additional time proposed to be allowed to them must come out of the time in which the overseers had to perform their duty he could not accept the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that although he agreed with his hon. Friend

(Mr. R. H. Paget) that an extension of the time allowed to Clerks of the Peace under the clause was desirable, he felt, at the same time, that it would not be advisable to hurry the overseers in the performance of their duties.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he was glad to hear that both the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), while opposing the Amendment, had recognized the fact that further time was necessary for the Clerks of the Peace. He was aware that the duties of the overseers were difficult, and he did not wish to deprive them of a single day, nor did he wish to detain or divide the Committee on his Amendment. But if it were correct, as he asserted it to be, that in certain cases as many as 500 precepts would have to be issued, then he said that Clerks of the Peace would be unable to comply with the words of the Statute.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I suggest that we should give the Clerks of the Peace a clear week of seven working days, and I am prepared to substitute "eight" for "seven," in order to secure that.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he was glad to secure for the Clerks of the Peace another day, and would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment, in order to move an Amendment in conformity with the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 10, to leave out the word "seven," in order to insert the word "eight,"—(Mr. R. H. Paget,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'seven' stand part of the Clause."

MR. WARTON asked whether it was a fact that the overseers had already acted under the provisions of Section 9 of the "Representation of the People Act, 1884," by sending occupiers the form of notice contained in the 3rd Schedule to that Act? The Committee would observe that Form A, in page 59 of the Bill, had been copied with minute correctness from the 9th section of the Act of 1884. The two forms were identical. If the overseers had already acted under the 9th section of the Act of 1884, then there would be more time magistrates had done all they could to carry out the spirit of the Act; but, on the whole, he thought it would be better to put in the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he understood that the object of the Bill was to make it possible for a voter to pass from his district to the polling place; but if that were so, other considerations must be taken into account besides mere distance. Special arrangements were necessary in cases where Party feeling ran very high. In some towns in the North of Ireland—Newry, for instance—where political feeling was very strong, the polling place was always put in the Orange district. He trusted that in such cases something would be done to arrange that each district—the Orange and the Catholic—should be provided with a separate polling place, in order that the voters of each Party would be able to record their votes in safety.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was a question for the Local Authorities.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, would it not be possible to introduce a provision in this Bill which might afterwards be transferred to the Irish Bill making it compulsory, on requisition by a certain number of electors, that the Authorities should provide polling places in districts where it would be perfectly safe for the voters to go?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Local Authorities already had the power to arrange the polling districts as they thought right.

MR. PELL said, it appeared to him that they were now entering into very complicated matters. What were they to measure? Where they to measure the high road? And supposing there was a ferry, was that to be measured also as the boat travelled, or were they to take the nearest cut across the river? What was meant by the hon. Member's Amendment? He did not wish to place obstacles in the way of the voter; but he did not think that any practical inconvenience arose under the present system, and it appeared to him that they were introducing complications into the working of the Act.

MR. HENEAGE said, he did not desire to press his words, if any hon. Member could suggest any that would be better. What he meant to provide was that the distance should be measured along the ordinary road travelled in getting from the residence to the polling place. He had received a great number of suggestions on this subject, and he knew that in some districts great inconvenience was caused by the present state of affairs. It was shown, in one case, that the distance was between eight and 12 miles to the polling place.

MR. WARTON said, he would like to know what number or qualification a voter should have in his possession. He had been before the Courts on several occasions, and in all cases the Judges had made it plain that the distance must be measured as the crow flies. If the Court said that, they would be flying in the face of the legal mind, and he had practically settled the question. He allowed this loose Amendment, the question would be "What is a road and what is a distance?" It was as if they were to have a distance measured as the crow flies. If they had the actual distance measured, it would be the same as the distance measured by the road. This Amendment would be a door to all sorts of confusion. It was a road and what was a distance? The distance must be the distance measured by the road. If they once went to the question of the way round, they would be measuring themselves into all sorts of confusion. The Amendment seemed very absurd and opposed to common sense decisions.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, in spite of all the recent decisions of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) had referred to, he would like to say that the County Councils limited themselves to the distance measured by the road, but had acted in the same manner in the case of the hon. Member (Mr. Heneage).

MR. SEXTON said, he would like to point out the point advanced by the hon. and learned Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had been misapprehended. He was referring to the towns in Ireland and learned Gentlemen. He had no confidence in the Justices of the Peace in Ireland had no confidence in the Justices of the Peace. He believed they would be able to provide places as inconvenient as the National Party.

Government, therefore, if the Corporations in Ireland could not be allowed to have some voice in the matter of arranging the positions of polling stations, or if the power of the Justices could not be modified in some way?

MR. BIGGAR said, that, at the last General Election, he was at a particular polling place in Ireland, and he found that some of the people who lived within a short distance, instead of coming there to record their votes, had to go to another polling place five or six miles distant. He did not know if this had been wilfully arranged, or if it was the result of gross negligence, but it had given rise to much inconvenience, and in cases where there was great political excitement it was calculated to prevent opposing parties registering their opinions. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would adopt some means for influencing the Local Authorities. In the case of Newry, the Authorities were, of course, the county magistrates, and it was notorious that the county magistrates did not belong to the popular Party in Ireland; and he thought, in order to encourage people to give their votes, it would be better if the Government would give attention to the recommendation of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton).

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. HENEAGE, the following Amendment made:—In page 9, lines 20 and 21, leave out “and may.”

MR. HENEAGE said, he wished to move an Amendment, the object of which was to provide that the magistrates residing within the county districts should be the authority to regulate these polling places. The suggestion he made had been acted upon by the Quarter Sessions in Somersetshire already voluntarily; and he thought his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. R. H. Paget) would tell them that it had been working well. What they in Somerset had done voluntarily he proposed to make compulsory. He proposed that the Court of Quarter Session, instead of sending this subject to a Committee of magistrates of the whole Quarter Session, should appoint a Committee in each electoral division of magistrates residing in the division, and that they should sit as a Court to arrange this question of polling places. This, however, was not so much a question for the Government as for the Committee itself, and therefore he would appeal to the Committee generally to support his Amendment. He hoped he should get the support of the two Front Benches; but, in any case, he strongly appealed to those magistrates in the House who had had a great deal of experience with regard to local self-government. There was one case he should like to bring before the Committee. It was in South Lincolnshire, where the Quarter Sessional areas of Kesteven and Holland overlapped with regard to the Parliamentary county divisions. What he desired in this case was that the two Courts of Quarter Session should each appoint Resident Magistrates to act as a committee to decide the question as to the positions of the polling stations. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 22, at end, add the following sub-section:—“(4.) Where a parliamentary county is not co-extensive with one county quarter sessional area, the court of quarter sessions having jurisdiction within such parliamentary county shall, within one month after the passing of this Act, for a committee of all the magistrates acting for and residing in the said parliamentary county, who shall hold sittings within the said parliamentary county, and take into consideration the division of such parliamentary county into polling districts, and hear applications for and assign polling places to such polling districts in such manner as may make the districts conform with the enactments relating to the division of counties into polling districts, and measuring the distance therein mentioned along the nearest road, so as to meet the convenience of electors in recording their votes; the report of such committee shall be entered upon the records of such court or courts of general sessions, who shall make orders thereupon according to the respective areas of such parliamentary counties within the jurisdiction of the said courts.”—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he hoped the Committee would not entertain the proposal made to them by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Heneage). It was objectionable on several grounds, which he would very briefly indicate. In the first place, it produced a feature which was entirely unnecessary. The powers of the Local Authority were ample to deal with the matter as it now existed;

magistrates had done all they could to carry out the spirit of the Act; but, on the whole, he thought it would be better to put in the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he understood that the object of the Bill was to make it possible for a voter to pass from his district to the polling place; but if that were so, other considerations must be taken into account besides mere distance. Special arrangements were necessary in cases where Party feeling ran very high. In some towns in the North of Ireland—Newry, for instance—where political feeling was very strong, the polling place was always put in the Orange district. He trusted that in such cases something would be done to arrange that each district—the Orange and the Catholic—should be provided with a separate polling place, in order that the voters of each Party would be able to record their votes in safety.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was a question for the Local Authorities.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, would it not be possible to introduce a provision in this Bill which might afterwards be transferred to the Irish Bill making it compulsory, on requisition by a certain number of electors, that the Authorities should provide polling places in districts where it would be perfectly safe for the voters to go?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Local Authorities already had the power to arrange the polling districts as they thought right.

MR. PELL said, it appeared to him that they were now entering into very complicated matters. What were they to measure? Where they to measure the highroad? And supposing there was a ferry, was that to be measured also as the boat travelled, or were they to take the nearest cut across the river? What was meant by the hon. Member's Amendment? He did not wish to place obstacles in the way of the voter; but he did not think that any practical inconvenience arose under the present system, and it appeared to him that they were introducing complications into the working of the Act.

MR. HENEAGE said, he did not desire to press his words, if any hon. Member could suggest any that would be better. What he meant to provide was that the distance should be the distance along the ordinary road which would be travelled in getting from the voter's residence to the polling station. He had received a great number of letters upon this subject, and he knew that in some districts great inconvenience arose from the present state of things. It was shown, in one case, that 200 voters were between eight and 12 miles from a polling place.

MR. WARTON said, he did not care what number or quantity of letters the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Heneage) had in his possession. This matter had been before the Courts on various occasions, and in all the decisions the Judges had made it perfectly clear that the distance must be measured as the crow flies. If the Committee altered that, they would be flying in the face of the legal mind, and what the Judges had practically settled. If they once allowed this loose Amendment to be put in, the question would at once arise—"What is a road and how are you to define it?" It was clear that if they were to have a distance at all they must have the actual distance and nothing else. This Amendment would open the door to all sorts of confusion as to what was a road and what was not. The distance must be the distance and nothing else. If they once went into the question of the way round, they would land themselves into all sorts of difficulties. The Amendment seemed to him to be very absurd and opposed to all the late decisions.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that in spite of all the recent decisions which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) had referred to, he was obliged to say that the County Justices had not limited themselves to so narrow a view, but had acted in the spirit of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage).

MR. SEXTON said, he thought that the point advanced by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had been misapprehended. He was referring to the towns in Ireland. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had great confidence in the Justices; but they in Ireland had no confidence in them, and believed they would make the polling places as inconvenient as they could to the National Party. He would ask the Government, therefore, if the Corporations in Ireland could not be allowed to have some voice in the matter of arranging the positions of polling stations, or if the power of the Justices could not be modified in some way?

MR. BIGGAR said, that, at the last General Election, he was at a particular polling place in Ireland, and he found that some of the people who lived within a short distance, instead of coming there to record their votes, had to go to another polling place five or six miles distant. He did not know if this had been wilfully arranged, or if it was the result of gross negligence, but it had given rise to much inconvenience, and in cases where there was great political excitement it was calculated to prevent opposing parties registering their opinions. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would adopt some means for influencing the Local Authorities. In the case of Newry, the Authorities were, of course, the county magistrates, and it was notorious that the county magistrates did not belong to the popular Party in Ireland; and he thought, in order to encourage people to give their votes, it would be better if the Government would give attention to the recommendation of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton).

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. HENEAGE, the following Amendment made:—In page 9, lines 20 and 21, leave out “and may.”

MR. HENEAGE said, he wished to move an Amendment, the object of which was to provide that the magistrates residing within the county districts should be the authority to regulate these polling places. The suggestion he made had been acted upon by the Quarter Sessions in Somersetshire already voluntarily; and he thought his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. R. H. Paget) would tell them that it had been working well. What they in Somerset had done voluntarily he proposed to make compulsory. He proposed that the Court of Quarter Session, instead of sending this subject to a Committee of magistrates of the whole Quarter Session, should appoint a Committee in each electoral division of magistrates residing in the division, and that they should sit as a Court to arrange this question of polling places. This, however, was not so much a question for the Government as for the Committee itself, and therefore he would appeal to the Committee generally to support his Amendment. He hoped he should get the support of the two Front Benches; but, in any case, he strongly appealed to those magistrates in the House who had had a great deal of experience with regard to local self-government. There was one case he should like to bring before the Committee. It was in South Lincolnshire, where the Quarter Sessional areas of Kesteven and Holland overlapped with regard to the Parliamentary county divisions. What he desired in this case was that the two Courts of Quarter Session should each appoint Resident Magistrates to act as a committee to decide the question as to the positions of the polling stations. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 22, at end, add the following sub-section:—“(4.) Where a parliamentary county is not co-extensive with one county quarter sessional area, the court of quarter sessions having jurisdiction within such parliamentary county shall, within one month after the passing of this Act, for a committee of all the magistrates acting for and residing in the said parliamentary county, who shall hold sittings within the said parliamentary county, and take into consideration the division of such parliamentary county into polling districts, and hear applications for and assign polling places to such polling districts in such manner as may make the districts conform with the enactment relating to the division of counties into polling districts, and measuring the distance therein mentioned along the nearest road, so as to meet the convenience of electors in recording their votes; the report of such committee shall be entered upon the records of such court or courts of general sessions, who shall make orders thereupon according to the respective areas of such parliamentary counties within the jurisdiction of the said courts.”—(Mr. Heneage.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he hoped the Committee would not entertain the proposal made to them by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Heneage). It was objectionable on several grounds, which he would very briefly indicate. In the first place, it produced a feature which was entirely unnecessary. The powers of the Local Authority were ample to deal with the matter as it now existed; and when that was the case—when they had an authority having entire control and knowing exactly what it had to do—he could not see why a change should be made. Now, what was it that was proposed? The Bill provided that the Court of Quarter Sessions should assemble within one month, and having assembled they would, if the Amendment were accepted, proceed to form as a committee all the Justices residing in the division. The words of the clause were—

“Alone or jointly form a committee of all the magistrates acting for and residing in the said parliamentary county.”

They would therefore get a committee consisting of 50, or 80, or even 100 Justices; but no provision was made for assembling this monstrous committee. His experience was that if they wanted work to be done, and done well, the Court of Quarter Sessions must select the men, and make the committee as small as possible. In Somerset, they had already set up committees for each of the seven divisions into which the county was to be divided by the Redistribution Bill. They had formed committees by taking two of the Justices from each of the Petty Sessional divisions comprised in every one of the seven divisions. They knew their work; they had already got to work—in fact, by the end of the present week their work would be done. It was entirely unnecessary; indeed, it would hinder, instead of help the work, to appoint the vast committee now suggested, with nothing to direct it—no head, no centre. The 47th section of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act provided for the revision of the polling districts; that revision could be thoroughly well done under the existing system. He believed the plan of the hon. Member would cause delay and difficulty, because it would produce committees too large for practical work. It would be a very unfortunate thing if the Committee were to adopt this proposal.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he joined with his hon. Friend (Mr. R. H. Paget) in thinking that this clause was not required. He was satisfied that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) could, supposing it was necessary, bring up, on Report, much better words, because to make the large committee proposed would be the very worst thing that could be done, and even opposed to the interest which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) really wished to serve. His (Sir Walter B. Barttelot's) county (Sussex) was a very typical county, because, for all practical purposes, it was divided into two counties. Two of the new Parliamentary divisions overlapped the present boundaries; there were two divisions, each of which took in a portion of East and West Sussex. Now, it would be most unwise to hamper the Court of Quarter Sessions, because what was it that those Courts—for there were two Courts in Sussex—always did? They appointed the best and smallest committees that they could select; and when they had anything to do which affected the interests of both divisions of the county, they had always appointed joint committees to act together. If they showed their mistrust of the Courts of Quarter Sessions to do their work properly by accepting the present Amendment, they would strike a great blow at the administration of the county business throughout the country. The proceedings of the House of Commons afforded a very proper precedent in this matter, because the Report of every Committee was brought up to the whole House for its sanction. He was certainly of opinion that the committee appointed to assign the polling districts of a county should submit their report to the general body of Justices. The clause now proposed was quite unnecessary, and, therefore, he trusted it would be rejected.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had proposed this clause with the double object of dealing with a particular case and also of making an amendment of the law in all counties. As to the general question, he (Mr. E. Stanhope) had made certain inquiries, and he was bound to say his Friends did not approve of the proposal. His Friends were of opinion that the machinery proposed would not be suitable for the purpose in view, and that it would be much better to leave the matter to the Court of Quarter Sessions, who had hitherto had no difficulty in dealing with it, and who would not have the smallest difficulty under the altered circumstances in dealing with it. He, therefore, hoped his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would not accept the Amendment. If the hon. and learned Gentleman did accept it, he would find his action very bitterly opposed by many Members on the Opposition side of the House. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) had no doubt the hon. Member for Great Grimsby raised a very special case when he mentioned Kesteven and Holland. But surely Kesteven and Holland, with their two Courts of Quarter Sessions, might appoint a joint committee which would be able to deal with all the matters in that respect. He was not quite certain whether, under the existing law, that could be done; but on Report words could be brought up to give the Courts of Quarter Sessions in question all the power they needed. On the general question he should be sorry to see the Amendment accepted.

[Second Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was glad to hear his hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage) say that this was not a question for the Government, but one to be settled by the Committee itself. It was essentially a question for the decision of the county Members themselves. He understood that the Amendment was intended to apply not so much to small counties as to large counties. It had been determined that, wherever it was possible, local knowledge should be brought to bear on this matter; and he certainly was of opinion it would be better that polling districts should be mapped out by magistrates living in the district rather than by strangers.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, that what they had done in Somerset was to get a committee for each of the new divisions composed of men from every locality, so that the local knowledge brought to bear upon the matter was complete. There was no area of any size in the divisions that was not thoroughly represented.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it had been said that in many counties there was only one committee. He could well understand that under such circumstances there might be found a want of local knowledge which would be somewhat curious in the formation of polling districts. There was a great deal to be said in favour of his hon. Friend's (Mr. Stanhope's) proposition, presuming it was properly worded; but he (the Attorney General) had to ask himself what was the best course to take in regard to this Bill. As far as he understood, the majority of the county Members were opposed to the clause. He should be very sorry to take a course which would be contrary to the views of those Members; and, therefore, whilst he thought there was much to be said in support of the clause, he was afraid he must vote against it, leaving, of course, hon. Members of the Committee to vote as they pleased.

MR. BULWER said, that his practical experience as a magistrate in the county of Norfolk led him to the conclusion that the proposition of the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) was entirely unnecessary. In the county of Norfolk they had two Courts of Quarter Sessions; but they did not interfere with one another, and the county had been divided for many years past into three representative areas. What the magistrates did was to appoint small committees throughout the county to map the county out into polling districts. Their propositions were submitted to the Court of Quarter Sessions, and adopted, modified, or rejected, as the case might be. No difficulty in the present system was found, and he presumed no difficulty whatever would be found under the extended franchise. As he read the clause of the hon. Member for Grimsby, the Committee to be appointed were to be paramount in the matter; they were to submit a report, and the Court of Quarter Sessions were to act upon it. Supposing that he and the hon. Member for Grimsby were magistrates in the same county, and both appointed on the committee, and that the committee mapped the county out into such and such polling districts. When the committee presented their report, the hon. Member, though he differed with the majority of the committee, could not object to anything that had been done, but all he could do as a member of the Court of Quarter Sessions would be to act upon the report submitted. His (Mr. Bulwer's) great objection to the clause was that it was quite unnecessary. Most of the county Justices were practical men of business and intelligence, and could be safely trusted to arrange proper polling districts. Now, there was a very important matter to which he wished to call the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. When the Redistribution Bill was before the House, he (Mr. Bulwer) and several other hon. Members endeavoured to obtain separate representation for the Isle of Ely, and he pointed out on that occasion the great difficulty which would arise under the present arrangements. The Isle of Ely had a separate Court of Quarter Sessions and a separate Commission of the Peace—that was to say, the magistrates of the Isle of Ely had no jurisdiction in the county of Cambridge, and the magistrates of the county of Cambridge had no jurisdiction in the Isle of Ely. By the Redistribution Bill, the Isle of Ely was divided into three parts. Of course, no difficulty would arise as regarded the Northern part, which was altogether in the Isle; but difficulty would arise in the case of the other two divisions. Some portions of the Isle were in the Eastern Division of Cambridgeshire, and other portions in the Western Division of the county; and many of the Isle of Ely magistrates who had jurisdiction in those portions were not voters. They did not live within those political areas. Many of those magistrates who did live in those areas had no jurisdiction in the Isle of Ely. Now, who were to arrange the polling places in those districts? He saw nothing in this Bill to deal with the difficulty he had pointed out. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would give his attention to the matter.

MR. ACLAND said, that as a county magistrate, he did not agree that all county magistrates were opposed to this proposal. He thought there was some necessity for the proposition of his hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage). The number of voters whose convenience had to be consulted had very largely increased, and therefore it appeared to him there was increased necessity for not only actual intimacy of acquaintance with the neighbourhood, the convenience of which had to be met on the part of those appointed to arrange the polling districts, but also for confidence by the electors that such intimacy of acquaintance existed. The proposal of his hon. Friend was precisely that which was most calculated to secure both these results, and therefore he hoped his hon. Friend would go to a division.

MR. HENEAGE said, that many objections had been taken to his proposal. One was the large size of the committee. Of course, he could not tell what was the case in other counties; but in his own county the committees in every case would not exceed 15 or 20. Their difficulty was to appoint a committee of 12 or 13; and having sat on every committee in the county for the last 18 years, he knew from experience that it was rarely that half-a-dozen or seven magistrates met together. It very often happened that the magistrate who was selected to represent a particular district—a district it might be in which a matter of interest cropped up—was not present. If the difficulty which hon. Members seemed to have with regard to large committees could be obviated by forming small committees, instead of committees composed of all the magistrates, he should be willing to meet their views in that respect. Indeed, if the Committee would accept the clause, he should be only too glad to see it improved in every possible way by the Government on Report. He really could not understand why the magistrates in the different electoral divisions were so much distrusted. There was another question which had been overlooked. It was said that county Members were opposed to this proposition. Were county Members the only persons to be consulted in a matter of this kind? He should have thought, now that Parliament had made large additions to the electorate, the voters were the people whose convenience ought to be consulted. He should certainly go to a division, and be very glad of any support he got. He only wished he could have the support of the two Front Benches.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not oppose the Amendment in any Party spirit—this was not a Party question—and he would not have said a word upon it if he had not thought it was a purely practical question. County Members had a right to speak upon it, because they had great experience in the management of local affairs of the kind. They had had large experience of the increased number of polling places under the late Act. Hitherto, gentlemen had been chosen to fix polling places who had peculiar local knowledge. He quite agreed with what had been said as to the difficulty of getting members of large bodies to come together. When comparatively small Committees were appointed, the members made it a point of honour to attend, and they set about the business with only one object in view—namely, to do it as well as they possibly could. The work of the Clerk of the Peace would be of great advantage in this matter. The Clerk of the Peace in Lancashire had always been found of the greatest possible use in matters of this kind. He had great knowledge of the localities, he had the maps of the different districts in his possession, and therefore his assistance was of great value. Then, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) thought the body they would have, if all the magistrates were to form the committee, would in many cases—in his own county, at all events—be extremely unwieldy, and they would not arrive at any more satisfactory conclusions than a small committee would—a committee composed of a certain number of each side of politics. Then, again, he did not think the Court of Quarter Sessions should be altogether excluded from any part in the settlement of the matter. If the matter was to be referred to them, they must have a voice in it. That would take up some time; and, therefore, he could not help thinking that the hon. and learned Attorney General had done wisely in saying that the Committee saw practical difficulties in the way of the acceptance of this proposition.

MR. ACLAND said, he would suggest that the words "all the," in the fourth line, should be omitted, so that the Court of Quarter Sessions might appoint a large or small committee as it thought fit.

MR. HENEAGE said, he was willing to adopt the suggestion of his hon. Friend.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he wished to point out the practical difficulty in which the Committee stood. This was an Amendment which ought by right to have come up as a new clause. Then, on the question that it be read a second time, they could have considered whether they would accept the principle involved, and if they had agreed to do that they could have discussed it line by line and put it into shape. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) admitted that the Amendment was full of errors in drafting; he did not present it to the Committee as an Amendment so neatly and carefully drawn as to be worthy of acceptance. They would get into endless difficulty if they attempted to deal with the matter on the present stage. Besides, the Amendment appeared on the Paper in one form, and had been submitted to the Committee in another form. Indeed, he did not think the Committee knew exactly in what form it was presented to them. He followed the clause as read by the Chairman, and he noticed that several omissions were made. He was unable, hastily, to see what the effect of the omissions would be. What he was particularly desirous of pointing out to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was that by this Amendment an entirely new principle would be set up. There would be set up a small Court of Quarter Sessions or a series of little Courts. His hon. Friend (Mr. Heneage) used the word "Court" again and again; he said the committee was to be considered as a Court, was to sit as a Court, and the Court of Quarter Sessions was not to have any authority over it beyond that of approving of what it did. He (Mr. R. H. Paget) ventured to say that the system they had employed in Somerset under the present law concurred with the wish of the hon. Member. In Somerset they had gone so far as to desire that their committees should be open; having settled for themselves a scheme, they announced by advertisement in the paper the day and the hour on which the committees would sit to receive suggestions from the public. They had adopted for themselves an admirable set of rules; but, at the same time, the Somerset people did not wish to press their system upon other counties. All they desired was, that they should be allowed to do what they considered best for themselves. The adoption of the Amendment would strike a great blow at the discretion of Local Authorities, for it would introduce uniformity which would be extremely objectionable. As well as for the reasons he had given, he objected to the Amendment on principle. There had been no unreasonable opposition to the Amendment; it was not a necessary Amendment, it was a contentious Amendment; it was badly drawn; it even appeared on the Paper in a shape in which would be great temptation to personation. Considerable safeguards would have to be adopted, and a great deal of extra labour would have to be imposed on the Revising Barristers. No doubt, the clause, if properly worked out, would be of great benefit to the class of voters to whom the hon. Member had referred, and he should be glad to assist the hon. Member in carrying it if he could; but he would ask him, considering the course which had been taken in reference to other Amendments, and the course he would still have to take for the assimilation of the registration in the counties to that of the boroughs, not to press it.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, that after the appeal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and also after the ray of hope he had thrown out that, at some future time, a Bill would be brought in dealing with the inconvenience he had pointed out, he would withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ACLAND said, he was now a little in doubt as to what he should do in regard to the Amendment which stood next on the Paper in his name, dealing with "claim to vote at nearest polling place to voter's residence." His object was to secure the completest possible poll of occupation voters. The clause said—

"Any person entitled to be registered in respect of an occupation franchise in a district of a county may, by notice in writing, delivered to the overseer of his parish before the fifteenth day of July, claim to be registered as entitled to vote at any polling place which may be nearer or of more convenient access from the occupation in respect of which he is entitled to be registered than the polling place of the district in which the parish or part of a parish in which he resides has been included.

"And such claim once made by any such person shall, if allowed by the revising barrister, hold good from year to year so long as the place of residence of such person shall remain unchanged."

He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would look favourably upon the proposal. He had limited it as to time, so that it should mean as little increased labour to the overseers as possible. He need hardly say to anyone acquainted with the rural districts of the country that it would be quite impossible for labour to be employed in various farming operations to the polling place nearest. It was also notorious that great many localities were not 100 voters. I do the best they could with loyal intention to meet the wishes of the inhabitants of the places where labourers were included in parishes having three miles away from those labourers. At the same time there might be polling districts much more convenient to the labourers than those which did not know whether there was a defect in the drafting which rendered it impossible for the hon. and learned Attorney General to accept it; but he did not think other means could be taken to attain the object he had in view, and was convinced that there was some such provision; and he was ready to fall in with a suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman and which he was satisfied would produce the desired effect. There were many hon. Members who would support him in his desire; but it was necessary to go to a division ultimately necessary.

New Clause (Claim to vote at nearest polling place to voter's residence) (Accland,)—brought up, at 4 o'clock.

Motion made, and Quorum called. "That the Clause be agreed to."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (HENRY JAMES) said, that he had been good enough to make a suggestion, and if he would do so he would support the clause. They should not waste time on the matter. An Amendment (Attorney General) had been proposed of the last new clause, which he could not accept. An Amendment, which was of a different character, though it came from a supporter of the Government, was now before the House, and was open to the same objection as the last one. I am ready disposed of. I am within the scope of the would not discourage his hon. Friend entirely; but certainly the sub-section as now drawn would have to be discussed at great length in respect to detail. He appealed to the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Amendment now, and if, after consultation with others, he could bring up a clause on Report to meet his view, especially with regard to the particular case of Kesteven and Holland, to do so.

MR. HENEAGE said, that after the appeal of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), he did not see what else he could do but withdraw the Amendment. He would consider the matter and bring up a clause on Report, and he hoped that in the meantime hon. Members would turn their attention to the subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (As to expenses in case of divided county jurisdiction).

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 9, line 29, after “Acts,” insert “or this Act;” and in page 10, line 6, after “Acts,” insert “or this Act.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 15 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, he wished to move the following new clause, to be inserted after Clause 9:—

(Voter may select his polling district.)

“Any person whose name shall appear in the list of voters of any parish or township in and for any Parliamentary county, shall be at liberty to make his claim before the revising barrister to vote at the polling place of any district within the same Parliamentary county; and every such person shall make his claim in writing under his hand, and such claim shall be delivered to and verified before the revising barrister holding his court for the revision of the list of voters in which the name of such person shall appear as aforesaid, and it shall then be lawful for the said barrister to insert in the said list, against the name of such person so claiming as aforesaid, the name of the polling place at which such person shall be registered to vote; and such person so registered shall be admitted to vote at every contested election for the said Parliamentary county at the said last-mentioned polling place and not elsewhere.”

This was, he ought, in the first place, to say, merely an extension of a principle which had been already laid down in 1843. By the provisions of the measure passed in that year, it was enacted that if voters had a qualification in one polling district and resided in another polling district, they would be at liberty to select either as the place in which to record their votes. It was provided that even if a voter was not within the polling district, but outside the county altogether, he might be allowed to choose the polling district at which he might prefer to vote. The clause he proposed simply carried that principle a little farther, and, if accepted by the Committee, would enable the voter to choose whichever polling place might be the most convenient, whether he resided in the district from which he took his qualification, whether he resided in the county in which he had his qualification, or whether he resided outside the county altogether. He might say that the clause would chiefly tend to the convenience of those who lived in the North, and in the more mountainous parts of the country, where the population was extremely scanty, and where polling places could not possibly be brought within three miles of each elector without violating the law as to 100 electors being necessary to form a polling place. In these places, at the present time, it was very hard for a man to find himself 10 or 12 miles from his proper polling place, and yet to have, just over the hillside, it might be only two or three miles away, a polling station at which he could easily record his vote. On these grounds, he begged to move the insertion of the clause.

New Clause (Voter may select his polling district,)—(Mr. J. W. Lowther,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this was one of a class of Amendments which he thought would be an improvement in the general law, but which did not come within that which was the scope of the Bill—namely, the assimilation of the borough and county registration. He would ask his hon. Friend not to press the clause on this Bill, for, in populous places, like Accrington, where they could not expect the different agents to know every person who came to the poll, there would be great temptation to personation. Considerable safeguards would have to be adopted, and a great deal of extra labour would have to be imposed on the Revising Barristers. No doubt, the clause, if properly worked out, would be of great benefit to the class of voters to whom the hon. Member had referred, and he should be glad to assist the hon. Member in carrying it if he could; but he would ask him, considering the course which had been taken in reference to other Amendments, and the course he would still have to take for the assimilation of the registration in the counties to that of the boroughs, not to press it.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER said, that after the appeal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and also after the ray of hope he had thrown out that, at some future time, a Bill would be brought in dealing with the inconvenience he had pointed out, he would withdraw the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ACLAND said, he was now a little in doubt as to what he should do in regard to the Amendment which stood next on the Paper in his name, dealing with "claim to vote at nearest polling place to voter's residence." His object was to secure the completest possible poll of occupation voters. The clause said—

"Any person entitled to be registered in respect of an occupation franchise in a district of a county may, by notice in writing, delivered to the overseer of his parish before the fifteenth day of July, claim to be registered as entitled to vote at any polling place which may be nearer or of more convenient access from the occupation in respect of which he is entitled to be registered than the polling place of the district in which the parish or part of a parish in which he resides has been included.

"And such claim once made by any such person shall, if allowed by the revising barrister, hold good from year to year so long as the place of residence of such person shall remain unchanged."

He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would look favourably upon the proposal. He had limited it as to time, so that it should mean as little increased labour to the overseers as possible. He need hardly say to anyone acquainted with the rural districts of the country that it would be quite impossible for labourers who might be employed in various most important farming operations to attend other than the polling place nearest their residences. It was also notorious that there were a great many localities in which there were not 100 voters. Let the Authorities do the best they could, with the most loyal intention to meet the convenience of the inhabitants of all districts, yet he was certain that there would be many places where labourers would be included in parishes having voting places three miles away from the residences of those labourers. At the same time, there might be polling places in other districts much more convenient of access to the labourers than their own. He did not know whether there was any defect in the drafting of the clause which rendered it impossible for the hon. and learned Attorney General to accept it; but he did not know what other means could be taken to carry out the object he had in view. He was convinced that there was a necessity for some such provision; but he should be ready to fall in with any plan the hon. and learned Gentleman might propose, and which he was satisfied would have the desired effect. There were, he knew, many hon. Members who agreed with him in his desire; but he did not wish to go to a division unless it was absolutely necessary.

New Clause (Claim to vote at nearest polling place to voter's residence.)—(Mr. Acland,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member had been good enough to ask him to make a suggestion, and had said that if he would do so he would withdraw the clause. They should not occupy much time on the matter. After what he (the Attorney General) had said to the Mover of the last new clause, it was obvious that he could not accept the present Amendment, which was of the same character, though it came from so stalwart a supporter of the Government. The clause now before the Committee was open to the same objection as that already disposed of. It did not come within the scope of the Bill.

[Second Night.]

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said, he hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see the advisability of providing in the future that all boundaries of polling districts should be conterminous with the boundaries of parishes. In many counties, such as that he represented, there were detached portions of parishes more than three miles from the parent parish that would be outside the polling district, and it would be very hard for a voter living in such detached parish to have to go four or five miles to poll; whereas if he were allowed to poll in another district, the difficulty would be got rid of.

MR. ACLAND said, he did not wish to press his Amendment against the desire of the hon. and learned Attorney General; but, at the same time, he would put it to the hon. and learned Gentleman, whether there was not some other means by which the object in view might be attained? Could not some Amendment be brought up on Report? The condition of the labourers in certain parts of the country was very different to the condition of other people. There were operations they had to attend to, and could not leave without loss to their employers. He was certain the Committee were with him in his desire to give to these labourers the most convenient access to the poll possible, and he was sure such access would not be given by the Bill in its present form. If some Amendment could not be inserted in this Bill, some indication should be given by the hon. and learned Attorney General as to the mode in which the desired result could be attained.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he was not only desirous that the object the hon. Member (Mr. Acland) had in view should be carried out, but that it should be carried out in this Bill. He did not at all agree that the matter was one outside the scope of the Bill. It was necessary that the voters enfranchised by the Act passed last year should be placed in such a position as to be able to exercise the privilege conferred upon them. If the hon. and learned Attorney General would consider the matter carefully, he would see that the Amendment was one which should be agreed to.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped the Committee would not overweight the Bill. They had already imposed duties enough on the overseers; in fact, he was not sure that these officials would be able to get through the work they had to do.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that no one wished to prevent a voter from recording his vote—no doubt, every Member of the Committee desired to see every elector come to the poll. The Government, at any rate, had shown that this was their desire by passing an Act for the extension of the hours of polling to 8 o'clock at night. With regard to labourers being unable to leave their employment in certain seasons of the year, it would not be inconvenient for them to vote—in November and December, for instance—when elections were most likely to take place. He hoped this would remove the objection of the hon. Member (Mr. Tomlinson), who declared that whatever was done in this matter should be done in the Bill.

MR. ACLAND said, he would withdraw the Amendment; but, at the same time, would express a hope that when the general amendment of the Registration Law was entered upon, the hon. and learned Attorney General would give a favourable attention to the proposal he (Mr. Acland) had now submitted.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MARUM said, he begged leave to move the insertion of the following clause after Clause 14 :—

(Repeal of s. 78 of 2 Will. 4.)

"From and after the passing of this Act section seventy-eight of the Act of Parliament passed in the second year of the reign of His Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter four, shall be and the same is hereby repealed."

The Amendment was on the same subject as one lower down on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy). He (Mr. Marum) had not been aware, at the time he put down his Amendment, that there was another on the same subject on the Paper. If he had been, he should not have made his proposal. Even now he had been prepared to give place to the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan and his Amendment; but the hon. Member had desired him to retain his position and proceed with his proposal. That part of the Reform Act he wished to repeal set forth that nothing contained within its provisions should in any way affect the election of Members to serve in Parliament for the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or for the city of Oxford or the town of Cambridge, in respect of any occupation of any chambers in any of the Colleges or Halls in the Universities. The merits of the matter had been fully debated by the House on the Amendment in regard to the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill brought forward by the hon. and learned Member, that Amendment having for its object the disqualification of certain students in the University of Dublin, and the bringing of them under a similar electoral law to that he had just mentioned. The House, by a large majority, had declared that it would not disqualify these students. There was no occasion for his entering into the merits of the large question as to whether students ought or ought not, under certain conditions, to be entitled to the franchise; but he took it that his Amendment would test the sincerity and consistency of the Committee. The Irish Members had determined to test that consistency, and to bring about an assimilation of the franchise, as regarded University students, throughout the United Kingdom. He did not wish to detain the Committee, and would merely state that there might be an objection raised to the Amendment of a technical character—it might be said that this was a Registration Bill, and that the Amendment was outside its scope. It was true that the Bill was a Registration Bill; but this was an enabling clause—a clause enabling persons to be put upon the register, and to avail themselves of the registration facilities of the measure. For this reason, he held his proposal to be thoroughly germane to the Bill. He trusted the Committee would vindicate the consistency of the vote it had given on a previous occasion, and would accept this proposal to enfranchise a body of literary persons.

New Clause (Repeal of s. 78 of 2 Will. 4.)—(Mr. Marum,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. HEALY said, he had expected the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to at once rise and announce his determination to accept the clause. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not been in the House when the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had so warmly defended the principle of retaining the franchise for the students of Trinity College, Dublin. The right hon. Gentleman had, at the commencement of the debate the other day, challenged the Irish Members to produce any Act disfranchising the students of Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and had declared that, if they could do so, he would be for disfranchising the students of Trinity College, Dublin. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Allen) had immediately risen, and quoted the section of the Act disfranchising the students of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been immediately attacked by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the junior Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson), who said that this was not to be a disfranchising Act, and that the Premier had declared that the group of Bills associated with Reform were to disfranchise no one, but were purely enfranchising Bills. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had then got up, and expressed regret to find that there was an Act disfranchising the students of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. He declared himself precluded from voting for the extension of any privilege to Dublin which was not extended to Oxford and Cambridge. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had protested against the conduct of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who had excused himself by saying that he had only spoken for himself—as if a Member of a Government in charge of a Government Bill had a right to declare that "he only spoke for himself." The new clause before the Committee was a matter which would test the sincerity of the Government. He must say it was an extraordinary thing that Members of a Government should find it convenient to absent themselves from the House whenever anything embarrassing was coming on. He had first raised this question on the Redistribution Bill, when the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had declared that the matter, so far as Ireland was concerned, would be reconsidered. When he had brought it on a second time on the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill, the right hon. Baronet, the moment he found his Colleagues in shoal water, scuttled out of the House. Now, when the question cropped up once more, they found the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General solely in charge, and he, in all probability, would get up presently and say that he was not in the House when declarations were made by other Members of the Government, and could not hold himself responsible for what might have taken place. As he (Mr. Healy) had before had occasion to remark, the Government was constructed in water-tight compartments. One set of Gentlemen faced them one day, knowing nothing whatever about what had been done or said by their Colleagues yesterday, or the day before; and another day a fresh set of Gentlemen faced them, equally ignorant of what had been said or done by other Ministers. As he had said, this proposed new clause would put to the test the bona fides of the Government. He, of course, admitted that if the clause were carried the towns of Oxford and Cambridge would fall to the Tory Party at the next Election. He believed the Tory Party in those places would be immensely strengthened by the clause, just as the Tory Party in Dublin had been immensely strengthened by the Government refusing to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England; but what was sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander—what was sauce for Trinity College should be sauce also for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Could hon. Gentlemen consistently vote for the continuance of a law in the case of the English Universities which they said should not be applied to the Irish University? He appealed with confidence to English Members, and asked them not to allow themselves to be misled into inconsistency; and those who opposed his proposal the other day he would ask to explain why it was that a provision which applied to Dublin should not also apply to Oxford and Cambridge?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was in charge of this English Bill, and could only deal with the provisions of it as they were required in regard to the registration of voters. The hon. Member for Kilkenny

(Mr. Marum) knew very well the objection which had been taken on behalf of the Government to this proposal. It was not germane to the Bill; in fact, he (the Attorney General) had rather doubted whether it would be considered in Order. It was a matter of franchise, and not of registration. It was not enough to say that because they used registration as a means of putting voters on the list, therefore they could deal with the question of enfranchisement or disfranchisement, otherwise they might now be discussing the subject of female suffrage. Their object was not to make the action of one day consistent with the action of another, or the legislation of one country consistent with the legislation of another. They must deal with these questions as they were proposed, and on their merits. What was now submitted to them? Why, that the settlement arrived at in 1832 should, in consequence of something which had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), be put on one side. Why was that to be done? Assuming for a moment that what the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Healy) had said was true, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made a mistake, were they, in consequence of that individual mistake, to be asked to legislate in a particular direction? The object of the legislation of 1832 was this—the 78th section of that Reform Act, having allowed the representation of the Universities, said that the persons voting at elections for the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge should not be allowed to vote also at elections for the city and town. The clause applied not only to students and undergraduates, but to members of the University and of Convocation; and now Parliament was asked to reverse that law. Hon. Gentlemen opposite admitted it was evil legislation to give a double representation; but they based their claim for it in this instance on something which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He (the Attorney General), however, asked the Committee to deal with the case on its merits, to be consistent with itself, and not to say that, because a course was taken in one country which might be wrong, therefore they were to take a wrong course in another.

MR. JAMES STUART said, he must apologize for interposing to address to the Committee a very few words on this subject. He had not adopted the line of argument he was about to develop because of what had been said or done in the House the other evening in regard to the University of Dublin. He had adopted it because of the sense of injustice which he had suffered under for 20 years, which made him glad of the opportunity, on this Bill or on any other, of making a plea for representation for a class of whom he was one. It had been impossible for him to take any part in the franchise debates, because when they took place he was not a Member of the House; and in connection with the Registration of Voters Bill, he should, at an early period, have put down some Amendment—if not exactly the same as those which had been put down by hon. Members opposite, yet somewhat similar—had he not imagined that that which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General said ought to have been the case really would have been the case, and that the Committee would not have been permitted on this Bill to enter into any question of enfranchisement or disfranchisement. But, now that the question had been raised, he was glad to give his support to, at any rate, a part of that which was contained in the clause before them. The hon. and learned Attorney General had said they must remember that the Disfranchising Clause of the Act of 1832 applied not only to students—meaning certain persons in statu pupillari—but also to Professors, Fellows, and graduates of their Colleges; and it was precisely because it did not apply to these that he (Mr. Stuart) wished to see the law amended. The hon. and learned Attorney General had made use of the very remarkable argument, which went the rounds pretty generally on such occasions, that the Government did not want to give those who were resident members of the University—not in statu pupillari—a vote for the city of Oxford and the town of Cambridge, because it would be giving them a dual vote. Well, no one took more than he did the view that it was a pity that there should be a dual vote. He was sorry that there should be two votes; but if any set of persons were to have the dual vote, let it be justly distributed. If any member of the Senate of Cambridge University resided in Chelsea or Hackney, or wherever else it might be, he not only had a vote as a member of that Senate, in consequence of his degree and his payments, but he had a vote for the borough in which he resided. When, however, he went to live in one of the Colleges of Oxford or Cambridge, he still, of course, retained his vote for the University, in virtue of his degree and payment and of nothing else, but he was not allowed by this Disfranchising Clause of the Act of 1832 to have any vote whatever for the city or town. And the ridiculous character of the disqualification was more evident from this, that if he chose to keep outside the College gates, and took lodgings in the town, he possessed a vote for the town just the same as if he were in any other borough. It really was a remarkable thing that a man should be disfranchised by Act of Parliament as soon as he went to reside within the College walls. He should have been only too glad, if he had been able, to move an Amendment—if it were in Order, he should ask leave to do it on Report—to the effect that all persons not in statu pupillari occupying chambers in any of the Colleges or Halls of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, should be entitled to be registered as voters and to have votes, notwithstanding the 78th clause of the Reform Act of 1832. That was the form in which he would desire to see the present Amendment modified, if adopted, as he had already given Notice on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) on which he expected the discussion would arise. The body whose disqualification he wished to see removed were persons of full age, who had political instincts, who were permanent residents, and who paid rates—who paid large rates, although they paid them collectively and not individually. They were in a position no other set of people in the country occupied, except women. This it was, possibly, which gave them sympathy for women in their electoral disqualification, and which accounted for the number of Petitions which reached the House in favour of the enfranchisement of women, signed by resident members of the University of Cambridge. The Government were proposing to tax corporate property, and the corporate property they were proposing to tax might include University and College property, and might come to 3s. in the pound on the resident members of the Universities, whom they debarred from the vote in the boroughs of Oxford and Cambridge, though if they were living in other boroughs they would not be so debarred. If they came to the other portion of the Enfranchising Clause submitted to the Committee, if he might so call it—that portion which related to the undergraduate students in the Universities—that was a different question; but let them consider for a moment whether there might not be a mistake as to what the extent of that enfranchisement might be. He had heard it said by an hon. Member, in conversation somewhere or other outside the House—"If this proposal is agreed to, you are going to enfranchise about 3,000 voters in the town of Cambridge, and, in that way, to swamp the whole of the ordinary electors." There never was a greater mistake. There were not 3,000 undergraduates in the University over the required age. The age that entitled a man to a vote was not 21, but was nearer 22, because he had to be an occupier for a year, and he could not be an occupier until he was of age. If that was so, a man must be nearly 22 before he could come upon the register properly. If he were wrong in this statement, he could be corrected. If, however, he were right, there were a large number of students in Cambridge who were undergraduates, or in statu pupillari, under the age of 22, and only a small number of the 3,000—if that were the total number—were over that age. It would not be a great number of the students, therefore, who would have the right to vote. The Amendment put on the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) referred to students, and he (Mr. Stuart) presumed it meant all members of the Universities, whether students technically in statu pupillari or not—those who occupied chambers in the Colleges or Halls of the Universities were to be registered and have the right to vote. The clause dealt with students having chambers in the University, and he did not know whether it meant simply students having chambers in the Colleges or Halls of the University. If it was not limited in that way, but applied to all students in the University, then he must say he had never heard of any enactment or of any interpretation of the law whereby a student of the University of Cambridge living in lodgings, and not in one of the Colleges, and possessing otherwise the proper qualifications, was debarred from having a vote. How many students in the University of Cambridge lived in lodgings? Why, considerably more than half. The number, therefore, living in the Colleges was under half the total number of students, or rather over 1,200. Of that number, those over 21 would, he should think, be not more than one-third. He spoke roughly, from long acquaintance with the subject. He could not give exact statistics; but he should say that those over 21 years of age who would ever be able to qualify themselves as lodgers or occupiers would not be more than one-tenth of the whole 3,000, for of the students living in the Colleges there were only a small number who occupied their rooms under circumstances that would eventually qualify them to vote—in regard to continuity, and so forth. He held himself justified in voting for the Amendment, therefore, without any apprehension of swamping the town constituency with the University vote. He did not feel any predilection for that part of the clause which placed members of the University in statu pupillari on the register. He wished to point out another thing in connection with this matter. It was to his mind somewhat doubtful whether the clause would admit upon the register any persons who were undergraduates and who were resident in College, for the restrictions to which they were subject were such that it might be fairly argued that they were living under circumstances where their tutors or the Heads of the Colleges stood towards them in loco parentis. He should vote for the Amendment before the Committee, and should it fail to pass, he should propose on Report the modified Amendment he had referred to.

Mr. RAIKES said, he thought that what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. J. Stuart) left little more to be said on this part of the question. The hon. Member had pleaded the cause of the resident graduates, who were at the present moment deprived of the franchise, because they happened to live within the University, with all the fervour of one who was personally interested in the question. The Committee was called upon to contemplate a state of the law which, though it did not exclude his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Stuart) from sitting in the House, excluded him from being placed on the Register for the borough of Cambridge in which he resided. That was a good illustration of the injustice of the present state of the law, and, no doubt, would intensify the desire of the Committee to see it remedied. For himself, he (Mr. Raikes), broadly speaking, wished to lay stress upon two points. This exclusion of the residents in the Colleges, which was made part of the Act of 1832, was decided on at a time when the constituencies in towns were very much smaller than they were at present, and when it might, perhaps, have been argued—he did not know whether it was so argued, but it might well have been—that the admission of 200, 300, or 400 voters who were connected with the Universities would have unfairly biassed the elections in the towns of Oxford and Cambridge. But now that the constituencies had enormously increased, and that the standard for voting was less exacting than it had been, it appeared to him that the whole argument, as far as this point was concerned, had materially changed. He would lay stress also upon the injustice done by the present law to some members of the University as compared with others. There might, for example, be half-a-dozen Fellows, three of whom resided in the town and could vote at the elections of its Members, and three of whom were excluded from the right to vote in consequence of their residence in College. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the borough of Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler), though a Fellow of his College, was not allowed to vote at an election for the borough. This was even a more striking example of the injustice of the law than that supplied by the case of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Stuart). It must be borne in mind, moreover, that the chief residents in the Colleges were the representatives of property which contributed very heavily to the rates, and yet they were excluded from a franchise the basis of which was said to be a ratepaying qualification. Take the case of a Master of a College. He resided in a commodious house, which was heavily rated, but was not allowed to vote for the borough. The Dean was similarly situated, whilst the tutors, who might be married men, would be allowed to vote. How was it possible for anyone to say that such an arrangement was just and equitable? Then, as to junior members of the Universities. He thought the calculation they had heard from the hon. Member for Hackney as to the number of undergraduates who would be likely to come on to the Register was as fair a one as they could arrive at without more accurate material to go upon. But if they were to consider the number of undergraduates out of a total of 1,200, or 1,500, who might be resident in the Colleges—if they were to consider the number of those who continued to reside in the Colleges, after having turned 21 years of age, they would find that a very small addition would have to be made to the electorate from that quarter. As to Bachelors of Arts, they, he thought, had a special claim to vote. Most of those who were resident had had distinguished academical careers, and yet they had no vote for the University, the right to vote for that constituency being attached exclusively to the degree of Master of Arts. Surely these Bachelors of Arts ought not to be excluded from voting for the borough in which their University was situated. During the three years they remained Bachelors of Arts he ventured to think they would be as capable citizens as Members would be likely to find in the country, even amongst the 2,000,000,000 newly enfranchised electors they had about to put upon the Register. Healing would not argue the matter on the justice of the present appeal at one now ther, preferring to leave the matter to the general sense of justice of the House of Commons. He did not think of joint tration Bill the most conveniently took place of dealing with this subject; of 1868. He regard to the question as showed that the the arguments put forward and learned Gentlemen below the Government Amendment Opposition side of the House ground that the the hon. Gentleman

Hackney on the other side, he sincerely trusted the Government would fall back on the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General, rather than adopt the more restrictive interpretation of the law given to them to-day by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who had done his best to defend the Bill as it stood. It did not appear to him (Mr. Raikes) that anything which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman should induce them to reject the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum); and if that hon. Gentleman went to a division he (Mr. Raikes) should certainly support him.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he should like to say a word or two about this clause, partly because he had voted for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) the other day in favour of excluding from the franchise the students of Dublin University, and partly with a view to pointing out why this Clause 78 was put in the Act of 1832. When the first Reform Bill was passed the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the Colleges paid no local taxation whatever. Later on, the University of Cambridge was constrained to pay local rates by an adverse legal decision, and when that decision was given the University of Oxford yielded the point quietly. So far, therefore, as the position of residents in the Universities was concerned, he admitted that it had materially changed since the passing of the Reform Act of 1832; for, whereas they paid no local taxation whatever at that time, they did contribute to such taxation now. And here he might observe, be it regarded to the clause which had been put upon the Paper by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), that he thought the word "residents" was extremely ambiguous. He (Mr. Rogers) understood the hon. and learned members did not mean to include every student in the Halls of Colleges, as not—those in many cases embrace the Colleges; and he could point to ties were to his own knowledge, where right to vote, the porter's lodge lived students having, and, if he were a lodger, he would be entitled to a vote as a lodger in the College, and as a householder in the town. The word "lodger," again, was an objectionable word to employ in regard to a College, because every one of the College rooms in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was a separate tenement—that was to say, each room was a separate dwelling-house; and, consequently, if every person residing in one of those rooms was entitled to be registered, he would be registered not as—

THE CHAIRMAN called the hon. Member to Order. He was now discussing a clause that had been put on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), whereas the Question before the Committee was the clause that had been moved by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum).

MR. THOROLD ROGERS bowed to the ruling of the Chair. He would say, then, with regard to the general policy of the Question before the Committee, he did not think, as a resident in Oxford, that it would be expedient to confer the franchise on the residents in the Colleges. He had no means of knowing what direction the views of those who might be so enfranchised would take, and whether the effect would be to give a preponderance to the Conservative or to the Liberal Party was a matter about which he did not care; but he thought the residents in the Universities had quite sufficient to distract their attention already without the introduction of so fruitful a theme of debate and discord as the adoption of such a proposition would necessarily bring. When, for example, the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) went down to advocate his peculiar views, or when Mr. Hyndman went to Oxford to develop the principles of Communism, the authorities of the Universities very justly and wisely forbade the young men in statu pupillari to attend the meetings they addressed. On such occasions the presence of individuals who advanced the peculiar views they were known to entertain produced a good deal of excitement, and the result was that the speakers were very apt to be mobbed. He did not think it desirable that these scenes should be encouraged, and was of opinion that the University authorities were perfectly right, and acted very wisely, in checking the free access of the young men who were in statu pupillari, and preventing their attendance at popular political meetings. At the same time, if the Amendment were carried and the residents in Colleges were indiscriminately admitted to the franchise in the way proposed, he did not see how the University authorities could be expected to prevent the undergraduates from attending all kinds of public meetings. If the proposal were confined to the graduates in the Universities, the number of persons who would be enfranchised at Oxford and Cambridge would be very small; but, at the same time, he protested, on behalf of the two ancient Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, against the enfranchisement of the undergraduates and the permission that must be given to them, as a necessary consequence, to take part in all kinds of public meetings.

MR. SHIELD said, that, as the Representative of a University town and the Fellow of a College, he had no objection to his own enfranchisement; but he certainly entertained a decided objection to the enfranchisement of the undergraduates generally. It was, he admitted, quite true that only a small number of undergraduates would be enfranchised, but it must be remembered that if they were to repeal the 78th section of the Act of William the Fourth, although they would only confer votes on a few undergraduates they would be converting the whole body into an electioneering element; and his own experience had been sufficient to convince him that this would be a very undesirable proceeding. One of the reasons why he entertained a strong respect for the memory of the late Lord Beaconsfield and had always felt grateful to him was that he had brought about the General Election of 1880, at the end of a term, and therefore at a time when they were not troubled with the presence of the undergraduates during the electioneering proceedings in the University towns. He was quite convinced that in the interests of the Universities it was very undesirable to bring the undergraduates into the political arena. Personally, he was not glad that the Dublin students had acquired a dual vote; but the cases of Oxford and Cambridge were very different from that of Dublin, as in the latter University the residents were but a small and unimportant portion of the Dublin constituency, whereas in Oxford and Cambridge they would dominate the elections. On the whole, he thought that if the franchise were to be given to residents in the Oxford and Cambridge Universities, it would be much better not to confer it on the undergraduate class.

DR. CAMERON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had based his objection to the Amendment on the grounds that it would introduce the principle of double qualification, and also that it was not applicable to the present Bill, inasmuch as the measure was not one which dealt with the question of the franchise. Now, as to the question of the double qualification, his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Stuart) had so effectually disposed of that point, that he (Dr. Cameron) should not attempt to slay the slain. He would, however, point out that at the present moment persons who would not be otherwise qualified to vote in the towns in which they resided were already entitled, if they lived within the walls of the Universities of Scotland or Ireland, to vote as electors for those boroughs; whereas in England this was not the case. What he desired to point out was that it was the policy of these Registration Bills to rectify such anomalies, and he had risen merely for the purpose of putting before the Committee a case in point. In the discussions that had taken place on registration matters in Scotland, it appeared that the joint occupiers of lodgings, who were entitled to be put upon the Electoral Roll in England, were not entitled to be put upon the Roll in Scotland; and this fact having been represented to the Government, the consequence was that a clause had been introduced into the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill assimilating the law on this point in the two countries. In that case, therefore, they had a precisely similar instance of dealing with the question of enfranchisement under a Registration Bill to the one now before the Committee. Moreover, a further illustration was to be found in the fact that the enfranchisement of joint lodgers in England originally took place under the Registration Bill of 1868. He thought these things showed that the objection urged by the hon. and learned Attorney General to the Amendment under discussion, on the ground that the present Bill was not an enfranchisement Bill, was as futile as the objection with regard to the double qualification had already been shown to be, and that hon. Members opposite had particular reason to protest against any opposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the acceptance of the Amendment on such grounds, especially when it was remembered that when the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had put upon the Paper his enfranchising clause on the Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill, he was asked by the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) on what grounds he had proposed that clause, and had replied that he had introduced it for the purpose of assimilating the Scottish law with that of England; whereupon the hon. and learned Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) had asked the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) whether he would bring forward the same proposal in regard to Ireland, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had replied that he would give the matter his favourable consideration. Upon these grounds, therefore, he (Dr. Cameron) should give his support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had not the opportunity of taking part in the debate that had occurred the other night; and, therefore, he thought it right to say a few words on the proposition now before the Committee. He admitted that there was some force in the observation of the hon. and learned Attorney General that the enfranchisement of the residents in the Universities was a question somewhat beyond the scope of a Registration Bill; but now that the matter had been brought before the Committee it was one on which their vote must be guided by the general feeling. For his own part, he should unhesitatingly give his vote for the proposal to extend to the students resident in the Universities of the city of Oxford and the borough of Cambridge the same privilege as had been conferred on students resident in Trinity College, Dublin. The hon. Member who had recently spoken (Mr. Thorold Rogers) had pointed out the dangers which, in his opinion, would be created by allowing persons in statu pupillari to take part in elections either at Oxford or Cambridge; but the hon. Member ought to have remembered that this was exactly what they were able to do at the present moment. There was nothing in the Statute 2 & 3 Wil. IV. which prevented a student, either in the city of Oxford or the borough of Cambridge, from voting for the election of a Member of Parliament, so long as he occupied chambers or rooms that were independent of the Colleges. The section of the Act which it was proposed to repeal provided—

“That this Act shall not entitle any person to vote in an election of Members to serve in Parliament for the city of Oxford or the borough of Cambridge in respect of the occupation of premises in any of the Colleges or Halls.”

They were all well aware that both in the city of Oxford and the borough of Cambridge there were a great many persons in statu pupillari who resided in lodgings, and who were just as much entitled to vote at any election of Members for those boroughs as any of the ordinary residents having the occupation or lodger franchise. It was, therefore, a mere bugbear to introduce the argument with regard to these students being in statu pupillari, because there were numbers who as lodgers in the University towns were already able to exercise the franchise. Besides, the Committee must remember that in the case of Trinity College, Dublin, the privilege that was now proposed to be extended to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had been actually tried for a long time, and the evils that had been urged against it had not been shown to exist. It had been said that the number of residents in the Dublin University possessing the franchise was very small; but he understood, in regard to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, that, of the total number, some hundreds were in lodgings outside the Colleges, the remainder being in residence inside. Consequently, it seemed to him that all the objections urged against allowing the students to vote fell to the ground; and he should certainly give his support to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Stuart), should this clause be rejected, if the hon. Gentleman carried into effect his promise to bring the matter before the House in another shape on the Report. On these grounds, and believing it to be desirable that the Universities in England and Ireland should be placed upon the same footing, and seeing also that Her Majesty's Government had changed their front in regard to the matter since it was last before the House, he should unhesitatingly give his support to the Amendment.

MR. BRYCE said, he wished to say only a word or two on this subject. He desired to remove any apprehension that might exist in the minds of the Committee with regard to an undue extension of the franchise to the undergraduates of the University of Oxford, by pointing out that in the case of that University the custom was for the students to reside in the College rooms during the earlier part of their time, and to go out into lodgings in the town afterwards. Very few, therefore, would be above 21 years of age at the time when, in respect of the occupation of College rooms, they could acquire a vote; and those who were living in lodgings during the last year of their University residence might, under the present law, enjoy the franchise for the borough, so that the adoption of the clause would make little or no difference with regard to the Oxford undergraduates. He could say, however, that it would be very unwelcome to the University authorities if the right to exercise the franchise were to be extended to students who were in statu pupillari, or, at any rate, to such of them as had not taken even the degree of B.A. [MR. HEALY: How about Dublin?] He was only now referring to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; but he thought that exactly the same rules ought to be applied to Dublin; and he was of opinion that if the clause were passed, and the franchise were thereby extended to those who were in statu pupillari, that House would have strong representations from the University authorities against introducing undergraduates into the political contests of the borough, representations to which the House would do well to listen. He should be ready to give his support to the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Stuart) if, in case of this clause not receiving the assent of the Committee, he were to bring up on the Report a clause limiting the operation of the proposal in the manner he had stated—that was to say, allowing graduates, but not undergraduates, to vote in respect of College rooms.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his hon. Friend who had just spoken, and several other hon. Members, had expressed their desire to minimize the effect of the clause now under discussion. It would seem that they regarded the clause as an evil, or they would hardly desire to minimize its operation. There was one point he desired to put before the Committee in connection with this subject, and that was that it was now proposed to give the students of the Universities generally votes for the election of Members of Parliament, while it was not proposed to give them municipal votes. They were prevented by statute from voting at municipal elections, and yet it was proposed that they should have the Parliamentary vote conferred upon them, and this, too, under circumstances that were not relevant to the scope of the Bill by which it was to be done, and which, it had been argued, would be detrimental to the interests of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The matter was, however, fully before the Committee; and although Her Majesty's Government regarded it as one of very great importance, they proposed, at the same time, to leave it as one upon which the Committee could exercise its own judgment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time accordingly, and added to the Bill.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he had now to move the insertion of a clause providing that medical or surgical assistance, or the giving of medicine, should not be deemed to constitute parochial relief within the meaning of the Representation of the People Acts. In doing so, he hoped he should not be told that this proposal was outside the scope of a Registration Bill, especially when he referred to the fact that what was asked by the clause had already been acceded to in the case of Ireland. He might, however, be told that the two cases were widely different, and he was prepared to admit that medical relief in Ireland stood on a somewhat different footing from that which it occupied in this country. He was well aware that it had been a question open to a certain amount of doubt, whether medical relief, under the Acts relating to this subject in Ireland, did, in reality, constitute parochial or Poor Law relief within the meaning of the law; and that in Ireland the people did not look to the provision of necessities of that kind, in the shape of public medical relief, as constituting a disqualification for the exercise of the voting franchise. He was quite free to admit the general principle that the acceptance of Poor Law relief, by which the individual accepting it lived at the expense of the public, ought to be a disqualification for the exercise of the franchise, and he did not deny that medical relief was, both in law and in fact, Poor Law relief. But there were several considerations which had led him to think that, in the case of the administration of medical relief, the Committee would be justified in making the exception for which he asked, considerations which he ventured to urge before the Committee as involving reasons why the argument as to medical relief, which no longer applied to the Poor Law in Ireland, should, therefore, in this country continue to be employed for the purpose of maintaining the existing disqualification for the exercise of the franchise. The first of these considerations was a practical one, and, in putting it before the Committee, he asked them to bear in mind that this question related almost exclusively to the country districts, in which a very large number of people would be enfranchised. The practical consideration which influenced his mind in reference to this matter was, that in many instances the labouring people could not conveniently obtain the services of any other doctor than the parish doctor; while, in some instances, owing to the distances which separated them from the residences of other medical practitioners, it was actually impossible for them to obtain the assistance of any but the parish doctor. Of course, it might be said that those who were thus compelled to avail themselves of the services of the parish doctor might pay him for the medicine and attendance they obtained; but he thought the Committee would agree with him in saying that it would be asking too much of human nature to expect that when, as in these cases, a man availed himself of the services of the parish doctor, he would volunteer to pay him for those services. The second consideration which had influenced his mind in bringing forward this proposal was the circumstance that in fact and in truth medical relief of a parochial character was not regarded in the same light as other kinds of Poor Law relief. As a matter of fact, it did not destroy, and he might say it did not even impair, the independence of the person to whom it was administered; for if he were a man living and supporting his family by his own labour, he did not regard the acceptance of medical relief as in any way interfering with his own independence. It was, he felt confident, a general rule that medical relief was not regarded by anybody living in the country districts as coming within the same category as other forms of Poor Law relief. But there was a further consideration which he desired to put forward, and it was this—that a vast number of persons would be disqualified from the exercise of the electoral franchise which Parliament was about to confer upon them if the existing disqualification were maintained. He was certain that a large proportion of those who were about to be admitted to the franchise were totally unaware of the fact that the acceptance of medical relief was an electoral disqualification. There were many in the rural districts who might obtain a bottle of medicine, or whose wives might be attended in their confinements by the parish doctor, or who might call him in to mend the broken arm of a child, or to perform some service of a like character, who would do so without being in the slightest degree aware that in thus receiving the services of the parish doctor they were doing what would have the effect of disqualifying them from the exercise of the Parliamentary franchise. He did not speak without having had some experience in reference to this question; for the borough he had the honour to represent (Christchurch) contained a large agricultural district, in which what he had just stated had been the effect of the existing law within his own knowledge, so that many men who would otherwise have been entitled to the franchise had without being at all aware of the legal consequences following the receipt of medical parochial relief, been disqualified from giving their votes. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would see their way to the acceptance of his Amendment, and he would only add that he trusted his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would not tell him it was not a proper Amendment to bring forward on a Registration Bill; because.

[Second Night.]

unless he was very much mistaken, it had been copied, mutatis mutandis, from the Amendment that had been introduced that Session into the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill. He begged, therefore, to move the clause which stood in his name.

New Clause :—

(Medical or surgical attendance not to constitute parochial relief.)

"Medical or surgical assistance, or the giving of medicine, shall not be deemed to constitute parochial relief within the meaning of the Representation of the People Acts,"—(Mr. Horace Davey),

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
"That the Clause be read a second time."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he wished to express his view, in the strongest possible manner, against this clause being read a second time. He objected to it on this ground—in the first place, this was not a Bill on which to introduce a matter of this kind; and, secondly, it was a most objectionable clause. The clause raised questions of franchise, and was therefore altogether irrelevant to this measure, which was a Registration Bill. It was no argument to say that if they could introduce this clause it should be introduced. The tendency of such a clause would be to induce persons to pauperize themselves, to give up independence, and to seek that relief from the rates which they ought to obtain from friendly societies, or out of their own pockets. He did ask the Committee not to proceed with this clause. If they did, they would have a number of other matters of a like character introduced, and they would have a state of things happen which had been predicted by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). This Bill was not strong enough to bear the introduction of all these foreign matters. He hoped the Committee would allow them to proceed with the work of registration.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped the Committee would follow the advice of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. This matter had been fully discussed when the Representation of the People Bill was under discussion, and, after due consideration, it was decided not to interfere with the disqualification which existed. It was a franchise question, and, having been dealt with in the Franchise Bill, they were now asked to re-open the matter on a Bill which was not a Franchise Bill, but one purely of registration. He hoped the Committee would not assent to this, and that they might be allowed to proceed with the work before them.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was sorry he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). He thought the clause was quite relevant to the Bill before them; for it dealt not with the conferring of the franchise on anyone, but to certain conditions which should not lead to a man being struck off by the Revising Barrister. He had observed some very hard cases, in which the wife and children of a man had obtained medical relief, unknown to him, and he had been struck off the Register. If a child got hurt in the hayfield, for instance, and the mother took it to the parish infirmary for medical relief, the father would be liable to be struck off. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Davey) would press the clause to a division.

MR. CAUSTON hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see that there was some force in the proposition which had been made to the Committee that day, and if he could not consent to insert the clause which was now before them, that he would consent to a provision that the Relieving Officer should warn applicants of the consequences of accepting medical relief. He thought that some provision should be inserted in the Bill which would prevent a man being pauperized by the fact that he accepted medical relief, under stress of circumstances, for some member of his family.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that many people did not regard medical relief as a matter of charity; and, for his part, he failed to see why medical relief should not be accepted as a matter of course. He did not see anything more disgraceful, or of a more pauperizing character, in a man accepting medical relief for a sick child, than in accepting a grant for the education of his children who were perfectly healthy. He could not see why a man should be made a pauper because his child took a dose of Epsom salts at the expense of the parish, when his neighbour, who had raised a large family, cost the parish £10 a-year for the education of them. The retention of the disqualification in regard to medical relief he regarded as the height of Parliamentary hypocrisy.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he was exceedingly glad this question had been raised. In rural districts pauperization for the acceptance of medical relief would have the effect of disfranchising a very large number of honest people. Parliament had wisely provided that the receipt of free education for one's children should not be an act of pauperism, and the receipt of medical assistance should be similarly treated. The hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton) had suggested that the applicants for medical relief should be told what would be the result of their accepting it; but, in his opinion, that would be adding to the cruelty of the disqualification, because it would put a woman in search of medical relief face to face with the alternative of refusing medicine for her sick child, or sacrificing her husband's vote. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would take a broad view of this matter—he would say a common-sense view of the matter. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. Stanhope) had said that the question was not germane to the measure before the House; but hon. Members opposite did not hold that opinion last night, when they pressed a question which was in no way germane to the question before the House to an issue. He considered that the clause was germane to the Bill. As the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had pointed out, it was not a matter of conferring the franchise, but of deciding what people should not be disfranchised. He hoped that the poor people of the rural districts would not be deprived of their votes. In the small towns the people had their hospitals to go to; but this was not so in rural districts. It would be a farce to give these poor people the franchise on the one hand, and to disfranchise them in consequence of their poverty on the other.

MR. PELL said, he could add nothing to the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General as to this not being the place to move such a clause; but he opposed it on behalf of the Friendly Societies of England. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Davey) had a real acquaintance with the true interests of the humble orders of the people he would not have moved that clause. It was to be feared that its adoption would have the effect of discouraging the establishment or extension of sound Friendly Societies. In some districts the acceptance of parochial relief was very prevalent among persons who were able to pay for such assistance if they joined a Friendly Society; and representations had been made, over and over again, by managers of certain of the largest institutions of that description to Boards of Guardians, asking them to cease to exercise, by means of that form of parochial relief, a demoralizing influence among the people, so as to give those Societies a chance of rendering the people independent. There were, of course, certain Friendly Societies of the most vicious description, which would not allow a man any funds at all until he had made a most desperate effort to obtain from the Guardians medical relief; and although, happily, they were few in number, they would be encouraged by the passing of a clause such as this. He lived in a rural district—a very poor district. Ten or 15 years ago every eleventh person was a pauper; but now only one in 61 were paupers. The cases of medical relief in former times were innumerable; but, owing to the action of the Guardians, during the last three years there had only been two cases of medical relief. He assured the hon. and learned Member that if he had more acquaintance with the poor people he would never have moved such a clause as this.

MR. PICTON said, they were all agreed that pauperism should disqualify from voting; but he contended that the receipt of medical relief did not make a pauper of a man. The receipt of elementary education did not do so. He held that actual pauperism only existed when a man, so to speak, surrendered in the battle of life, and made himself a burden, temporarily or permanently, to his neighbours. Whatever tended to that state pauperized, and, he quite agreed, should disenable a man from exercising the franchise; but he submitted that any other form of relief which enabled a man to tide over an emergency and preserve his self-reliance and self-respect ought not to be allowed to remove a man from the list of voters. There were a great many people who obtained charity from Benevolent Societies, and they were not disfranchised; but the poor people who were obliged once in a way to have recourse to parochial medical relief, who had no friends, and who might happen to be entirely outside the circle in which private benevolence administered such aid to others of their class, were to be struck off the list of voters. He did not think that this was a proper state of things, and especially when they considered how very hard the struggle of life was for millions of people. The man who was only receiving from 10s. to 15s. a-week, and broke his arm, or had his family down with measles, was absolutely unable to provide medical relief; and yet, perhaps, he was making a most heroic struggle to keep himself off the rates generally. He hoped the Committee would listen to the arguments which had been used in support of this Amendment.

MR. J. R. HOLLOND said, that the difference between free education and medical relief was that, as a matter of fact, the former did not tend to pauperize, while the latter, as everybody who was well acquainted with the administration of the Poor Law system knew, was often the first step towards pauperism. If they once commenced to make subtle distinctions between medical relief and other forms of parochial relief, they would be led into all sorts of difficulties; and they would run great risk of breaking down the great principle under which the receipt of relief from the rates was held to be a disqualification for the exercise of the franchise. For his part, he thought it was extremely important that that principle should be maintained; and though there might be hard cases under the rule, yet if they once began to legislate on hard cases they would find they had the proverbial bad law.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought it was inexpedient for them to enter into the discussion of the question on the present Bill. When he served on the Select Committee, he understood the measure was merely one to provide for the registration of those who were already enfranchised. He thought they ought to have a different object.

MR. VILLIERS said, having had a pretty long experience with the circumstances of the working classes and the trials, he could state some of the causes of sickness and of hard work, exposure to damp, unhealthy dwellings, &c. The most industrious who were struck off the two first causes, he thought it was that the ill-housed were responsible. It would be a monstrous thing to disfranchise labourers compelled to accept of either of these causes. He hoped the hon. and learned Member for the church (Mr Horace Wilson) in his division he should vote for the Amendment.

MR. ALDERMAN COOPER said, it was nothing fell more than illness, a calamity and not a fault; and in many cases how hard he worked, it was necessary that he should have relief. He hoped the Committee would not take the view of the poor man because he was afflicted. To do so would be one of the greatest injustices imposed. In the case of the poor man he trusted they would accept the clause.

Question put.

The Committee divided.

Committee report again To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS
HOUSE—ORDER OF THE DAY

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had been intended to proceed to the Estimates to-morrow, but it was so important to get on with the Bill of Voters (England) that he could conveniently arrange to bring off the Army Estimates to-morrow—say not later than 11 o'clock. They should be very important, and the residue of the evening time was very important.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, this proposition would require a little further consideration on the part of the Opposition. They thought it would be necessary that the question discussed last night, on registration expenses, should be pursued at a further stage of the Bill. If the Committee were finished to-morrow, he presumed the Report could be taken on Friday.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that that would have to be considered to-morrow; he could not say anything now.

SIR MASSEY LOPES gave Notice that, in consequence of the very strong expression of opinion manifested last night with reference to the question mentioned by his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) he should move that the Bill be re-committed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Supposing the Bill before the House to-day gets through Committee to-morrow, will the Report of it on Friday be the first Order?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was of great consequence that the Bill should be got through as early as possible. However, he could not give a definite answer in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General; but he was disposed to think that that course would be adopted.

MR. PARNELL said, he should like some information as to when the next stage of the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill would be taken.

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe the hon. and learned Gentleman who is in charge of the Bill has just left the House.

MR. PARNELL: I wish to ask whether the Report of the Bill will be taken on Friday first?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will answer that Question to-morrow.

MR. PARNELL: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say upon what stage of the Bill the Government propose to move its re-committal in respect to the new clause about registration expenses?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: At the conclusion of the Report.

MR. PARNELL: Can it not be put down in the beginning of the Motion for Report?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Either at the end of the Report, or on the third reading.

MR. GIBSON: As it is quite obvious, from the narrow division of last night, that this is a matter upon which there is likely to be very considerable discussion, and also as many hon. Members would be anxious to take part in the discussion, I should therefore like to know what arrangements will be proposed? It would be very inconvenient to many of them if the matter was postponed from the beginning, which is a period which will be known to the final stage of the Bill, which is a period which cannot easily be fixed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite seriously urge that, in the present period of extreme pressure upon the Government, we should have four debates and four divisions upon the same subject?

MR. GIBSON: I only ask for some definite information on the subject, which is one of importance.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have already had two debates and two divisions, and now we are threatened with another, by the Motion of which the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Massey Lopes) has just given Notice.

MR. GIBSON: Very possibly.

MR. PARNELL: As I suppose, from the very narrow division which was taken last night, it is evident that this question will be raised again, I presume it will be equally competent for me to raise the same question in regard to the Irish Bill, in reference to which matter I may say we defeated the Government in the same way as the hon. Baronet (Sir Massey Lopes) proposes to raise it on the English Bill. I suppose that it will be arranged for a single discussion to be taken, either on the Irish or the English Bill, and so settle the question. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Hear, hear!] But it would be desirable for the Irish Members to know whether the Irish Bill or the English Bill is to be taken first? It will be also desirable to know what will be the order of procedure in regard to the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill; because it will be on the Question "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," after the Motion for the re-committal of the Bill, that I am advised that the Irish question will have to be raised?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is manifest that Notices of Motion of great importance having been given in to-day, I have no option but to say that I have to consider them, and will give an answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) as to the procedure on these Bills when the House meets to-morrow.

MOTION.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (CONSOLIDATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HARDCASTLE, Bill to consolidate the Law relating to the Representation of the People of England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HARDCASTLE and Sir ALEXANDER GORDON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 160.]

DOMINION OF CANADA—INSURRECTION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that he wished to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the information respecting the two engagements which were reported in the papers was accurate; and, whether the noble Earl was in a position to give the House any further information as to what had taken place in Canada between the insurgents and the Colonial troops?

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I shall be happy to lay before your Lordships the information which I have received. One telegram is from the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Governor General, in these words, received at the Colonial Office, 2.25 A.M. May 7:—

“Colonel Otter has fought successful engagement with Indians west of Battleford. Middleton resumes advance against Riel to-morrow.”

Another telegram, which has been addressed by Sir John Macdonald to Sir Charles Tupper, has been communicated to me, and it gives rather fuller details—

“Ottawa, May 7, 1885.—Otter's command attacked Poundmaker on Sunday, and demolished his camp. Our losses eight killed, 15 wounded. Indian loss, fully 100 killed and wounded.”

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, he would like to know what all that was going on was about; and whether the Indians, who were contending for something, deserved relief or not? He thought that many persons were totally ignorant of the cause of the rebellion.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The Government of Canada is responsible for the internal administration of its own affairs, and the question of the relations between the Government of Canada and the Indian tribes is not one which has come, or can come, before the Colonial Office, except, of course, in the exceedingly improbable event of the Canadian Government not being able to deal with the insurrection by means of its own resources. The question, therefore, is not one on which I can give any authoritative information; but, if I may give such information as I have received, I believe that the Canadian Government themselves are very much in the same perplexity as the noble Earl at the Table as to what the real causes of this movement are.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY asked, When the Report and the recommendations of the Scotch Fishery Board on Salmon Rivers and Fisheries would be presented to Parliament; and, whether, considering the demand and necessity for legislation, the Government intended to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in reply, said, the Report of the Scotch Fishery Board was presented last year on the 25th of July, and probably this year it would be presented about the same time, or possibly a little sooner. It was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill dealing with the matter.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES ACT (1875)
AMENDMENT BILL.
(The Lord Greville.)

(NO. 77.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD GREVILLE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to prevent the existence of bogus and swindling Friendly Societies, which at the present time many people were induced to join under the misapprehension that because a Society was stated to be "registered under the Act of Parliament" it must be a sound and honest one. The Bill would not be retrospective, but would apply to all Friendly Societies to be henceforward formed; and he thought that in proportion as those Societies were made sound undertakings they would inspire confidence among the working classes, who would be thereby encouraged in habits of thrift, and induced to invest their savings. He had received letters from working men expressing a hope that the law would be amended as this Bill proposed; and the Rev. Canon Blackley, who had very great experience on this subject, wrote—

"I hope and trust that this Bill may pass into law; I think it most highly desirable in order to protect the interests of those young men who may desire to join Friendly Societies."

The object of the Bill was to amend the Act of 1875 with regard to the registration of these Societies. There were at present two kinds of Societies, those registered and those not registered; but under his Bill it would be requisite for those who formed a Society to obtain an actuarial certificate as to the tables of contributions and subscriptions and the rates of payments for relief before they were admitted to registration. If the Bill passed into law he thought it probable that many of the Societies against whom it was directed would become affiliated with the great Societies —such as the Foresters, the Odd Fellows, the Shepherds, &c.—some of which had over 500,000 members. He thought the Bill would be welcomed by the thoughtful and prudent working men of the country, who would look to the Lordships' House with feelings of gratitude for introducing a measure which would greatly conduce to their comfort and prosperity.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Lord Greville.)

LORD THURLOW said, he was sorry he was not able, on the part of the Treasury, to support the Bill. He thought the House would appreciate the motion of the noble Lord in bringing it forward. The object aimed at was undoubtedly a most excellent one. It was the diminution of insolvency among Friendly Societies, which, it was stated—he did not know with how much accuracy—was assuming considerable and increasing proportions. There could be no question of greater importance, because nearly every working man in the country was connected with them in some form or other. But, at the same time, it was a question on which legislation ought not to be rashly and inopportunistically pressed forward. The Act of 1875 which the noble Lord sought to amend was very carefully drawn and considered and was the result of, and embodied most, if not all, the recommendations of more than one Select Committee which considered the subject. The Treasury had recently considered the subject with great care, and with the assistance of those most entitled to speak with authority on the matter—namely, the Chief Registrar and Actuary of Friendly Societies—and both those gentlemen concurred that to take the step contemplated by the noble Lord's Bill would be to take a retrograde step, and to return to the course which was abandoned in the Act of 1875. It would practically re-enact Section 13 of the Act of 1846, which in like manner, made the certificate of an actuary the absolute condition of registration. The Act of 1846 was repealed four years after it was passed, as experience showed that it drove the Societies from seeking registration. Immediately before the Act of 1846, 2,141 Societies applied for registration, and of them 1,683 were admitted; but during the two years immediately following the Act 1,780 Societies sought registration, and only 423 were actually enrolled. This falling off was, according to the high authority of Mr. Tidd Pratt, entirely owing to that Act, which, it would be seen, had had a decidedly deterrent effect. The Chief Registrar opposed the Bill, because it would practically have the effect of undoing what had now been going on very satisfactorily since the passage of the last Act in 1875. Compulsory actuarial certificates did not insure the safety of Societies, but rather created a false sense of security, and the only effect of the Bill would be to reduce registration to a minimum. The existing Act was sometimes considered a weak one; but it was really a stringent one. The result of the Bill would be to throw on the State the moral responsibility for the well-being and solvency of these countless Societies; while, as a matter of fact, the provisions of the existing law as to making Valuation Returns to the Registrar practically achieved the object of the proposed measure. Under the circumstances, he ventured to assure their Lordships that this was not a question to be hastily or rashly approached by Parliament without much further evidence of the desirability of amending the Act of 1875. Probably their Lordships would concur in the view taken by the Treasury, that it would be unwise to attempt new legislation on this subject except after due consideration by a Committee of equal weight to the one on whose recommendations the existing law was mainly based. He therefore ventured to appeal to the noble Lord not to press the second reading of the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, he had had the privilege of knowing Mr. Tidd Pratt very well, and it was a curious circumstance that that gentleman had once pointed out to him the very blot which the noble Lord's Bill was intended to cure. He said there were a large number of Societies throughout the country supposed to be perfectly sound, and which were joined because they were registered; but which were, in reality, perfectly unsound, and he also said the fact of registration was no guarantee of the soundness of a Society. This Bill was intended to cure that defect, and to give some real guarantee that a Society, when registered, was a sound and well-constructed Society. That purpose was a very important one; and he rejoiced to hear that it would be taken into careful consideration by Her Majesty's Government, and that the purpose of this Bill would therefore probably, somehow or other, be carried into effect.

LORD NORTON submitted that without a proper certificate of the tables there was no guarantee for the soundness of these Friendly Societies, many of which were admittedly unsound. Registration became a snare and a delusion to the people in the most essential concerns of thrift and savings. Without a guarantee of scientific calculation there was no use of registration at all, and it was simply a publication of names, not worth the cost of a Registrar. He suggested that if the Bill were rejected the subject should be referred to a Committee of Inquiry.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had not looked very closely into the Bill; but the subject was a most important one. There was great force in the proposal of his noble Friend who had just sat down, that the Government should assent to its being referred to a Committee of Inquiry, as it was a matter on which there was a very serious and real grievance. A large number of the Societies which it would affect were insolvent, and yet poor subscribers were induced to join them. He failed, however, to see why the Bill was to be thrown out.

TURKEY—THE BOSPHORUS AND DARDANELLES—CONVENTION OF PARIS, 1856, AND TREATY OF BERLIN, 1878.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I rise to move an humble Address to the Crown for the Protocols or Treaties which regulate the authority of the Sublime Porte to admit foreign ships of war into the Dardanelles. It is hardly necessary to refer to the circumstances which suggest a Motion of this character. In every society, young or old, grave or gay, political or private, they have recently been mentioned. It is true that on Monday last a new fact entered the discussion. I deferred, in consequence, the Motion on that day, and would have willingly postponed it altogether, unless reflection had convinced me that the official statement, although calculated to diminish, ought not to remove the public apprehension as to differences with Russia. Before sitting down, I may offer something in defence of that opinion. But it is first desirable to touch on the Conventions which explain the power of the Sultan in the matter now before us. My Lords, the Press at home and on the Continent is full of ambiguity regarding them, which can only be corrected by the documents I ask for united in a single view, and not dispersed in many volumes. We are always meeting statements that Germany or Austria, or some other Power, in the event of serious contingencies, will prohibit the Sublime Porte from admitting foreign ships of war into the Dardanelles. These statements are made with little reference to past occurrences, or past enactments on the subject. Journalists, in agitated times, are too much hurried to investigate. I will submit what seems to me a faithful outline of the question. In the beginning of the century there were, no doubt, Conventions to restrain foreign ships of war from going into the waters of the Sultan when he was at peace. So far back as 1809, it is certain, on the authority of Calvo, the great master of public law, that they existed. In a Treaty of 1841 they are referred to, in those of 1856 they are repeated. But in 1871 they underwent a grave modification. At that time, as a counterpoise to the arrangements by which Russia regained the power of cruising in the Black Sea, taken away after the Crimean War, the Sultan was permitted, even without hostilities beginning, to invite into the Bosphorus the armed ships of friendly Powers when he deemed it for his own security to do so. The new authority was brought about by what was termed the Black Sea Conference in London. It has never been exerted; it has been absolutely latent during the burning questions of the Eastern Question, which have followed it. But such a fact, whether the result of chance, irresolution, or impolicy, leaves the power equally unquestioned. The Treaty of Berlin does nothing to correct the rules as left in 1871. It, on the contrary, embodies and repeats them. As regards that point, the Treaty has been recently and carefully examined under my direction. The whole matter, if I am not deceived, admits a summary expression. According to the Law of Nations it is open to any State to give a passage over land or water it possesses to the military or naval force of a belligerent. But as regards the Straits within the Ottoman Empire, the Law of Nations has been disturbed and superseded by Conventions. Those Conventions have again, in 1871, been modified and widened. The upshot is, that prohibition falls not upon the Sultan, but on other Powers. No Power can despatch its Fleets without his sanction to the Dardanelles. But that sanction turns entirely on his judgment. His right over the waters on his territory is similar to that of France upon the Seine, of Russia, on the Neva, of Portugal upon the Tagus. If this interpretation is erroneous, the Papers I demand will bring the true one into notice.

Whenever the collision, so frequently anticipated happens, the facility of operating in the Black Sea is most important to this country. It is the only area in which Russia has ever been successfully encountered by Powers wishing to restrain her. Since she became a formidable member of the European system there are but a few instances in which campaigns have been designed or organized against her. They may be enumerated in a moment, and the last is most apposite. The earliest was that of the Swedish Monarch Charles XII. which was directed from the North to the South East, and ended fatally, at least disastrously, for him and for his Kingdom, at the well-known battle of Pultova. The next in order is that of the First Napoleon in 1812, of which the detail lives in the immortal pages of the Count de Segur. Advancing from the South to the North East, it culminated in the fire of Moscow, and the destruction of the Army which retreated from it. The third was our own attempt to threaten Cronstadt, in the Baltic, under Sir Charles Napier. Your Lordships know—as those who come back with force upon us—that while it succeeded as a defensive measure, or blockade, it failed so completely as an effort of invasion. The Expedition to the shores of the Crimea was almost a simultaneous one. It is the only Expedition against Russia which has had a brilliant, although, in some degree, ephemeral result. The Black Sea was its necessary channel. If the Black Sea is closed for her advantage, Russia is entitled, by the history of the past, to deem herself invincible. It is of practical importance to explore with accuracy all the diplomatic grounds on which the Sultan may be asked to grant her an immunity from the only danger which experience has taught her to consider as a grave one. My Lords, there is but one mode of thinking to which the Address would be obnoxious, and which it is therefore indispensable to guard against. It is the mode of thinking which rejects the possibility of war with Russia and counts upon a satisfactory adjustment. The announcement of the Government has, of course, done something to encourage that impression. The financial world has seized it with a natural, but yet, as it appears to me, unreasoning avidity. Let it be granted that the Government may smooth over the immediate questions on the Afghan Frontier. Let it be granted that arbitration may patch up the controversy between Sir Peter Lumsden and General Komaroff. But the movement on Herat which tends undoubtedly to war, on that point the voice of Professor Vambéry is known to us, can scarcely be arrested so long as Russia has rare, immense, and previously unknown encouragements to prosecute it. It is worth while to glance at those encouragements before the Motion is rejected as an useless one. Those encouragements reside not in the intrinsic force or unity or resolution of that Empire, great as they may be, but in the peculiar circumstances both of Europe and Great Britain. The Holy Alliance is in avowed, in flagrant lately-renovated vigour. Had it been working for two or three years we might derive a slender hope from its exhaustion and satiety. Like individuals nations may grow tired of one another. As things now stand, it is well known at St. Petersburg that Germany and Austria can offer no assistance to this country. There is no drag-chain upon Russia from that quarter. In the Crimean War it was not easy to obtain it. It is impossible at present. It is seen that France is bitterly opposed to us, or she would hardly have resented the suppression of a malignant journal by the Khedive. The Sublime Porte is irrecoverable until our Ministerial position has been altered. It would be devoid of memory, of dignity, of prudence, unless it were so irrecoverable—without some kind of reparation and security—after the series of transactions by which it has been diligently alienated. Those who know Constantinople — amongst whom I cannot reckon many Members of the Government — are aware that when the Embassies of Russia, Germany, and Austria are united, the British Embassy is pulled down to utter insignificance. It may be that acting on this theory the Government have virtually closed it. The Earl of Dufferin has not been replaced. There is no Ambassador at present to attempt communication with the Sultan. If he excludes Great Britain from the Black Sea, Russia may attempt Herat with absolute impunity. If he admits Great Britain to the Black Sea, she is wholly unsupported in it. Do we forget how many nations were required in the Crimea? It was only by the solemn union of this country, of France, Sardinia, and the Porte, with Austria in the rear as a benevolent spectator, that after countless toils and tragical vicissitudes Sebastopol was taken. But there is something else to urge on Russia to adventurous persistence. My Lords, it is that our foreign policy is still directed by the very agency, which led in 1870 to the concessions she obtained, which took away Sir Henry Layard from Constantinople, which did her work in Montenegro, which organized, or tried to organize, an European Concert in her favour. In our day, the problem of diplomacy, to put it in its essence, is a contention between London and St. Petersburg for influence at Berlin. Who does not see to which the palm belongs, to which it has inevitably fallen? But it is not only incapacity or isolation seen in Great Britain which urges Russia to activity and enterprize. It is well known to her rulers that our Government are unavoidably affected by the consciousness of military failure. The same body which retired from South Africa because unable to redeem its pledges or hold its ground against barbarians, the same body which has failed egregiously to rescue General Gordon, the same body which is now disposed to give up Khartoum, would have to undertake a task too great for the abilities of the First Napoleon, with recent laurels to inspire, with tributary Sovereigns to back, with conquered nations to fight under him. If nothing, according to the proverb, is so successful as past triumph, nothing is so calamitous as recent and profound humiliation. But there is something else to paralyze the Government and lead on Russia to the conflict. The movement on Herat can only be suspended or retarded, but never actually renounced, so long as Russia sees in Downing Street a First Minister—however subtle and ingenious—who encouraged the aggressive war of 1877, who opposed the Vote of Credit in 1878, who did not wish the Treaty of San Stefano to be attenuated to the Treaty of Berlin, who only the last autumn on the 1st of September, in his own name before his own electors, held up the keenest advocate of Russian despotism and of Russian conquest as the person to whom the British public ought to look for guidance and direction. So long as he remains, the temptation to advance we offer at St. Petersburg is wholly irresistible. It is imagined, feebly and erroneously, that a recent speech involves a metamorphosis which would no doubt be critically useful. In point of fact that speech blots out no passage of his conduct, since he invented the new faith in Russia as a civilizing Power to be followed. But if he underwent a moral revolution, a political convulsion—and he has traversed many—the old impression could not be immediately dispersed and superseded. The speech upon the Vote of Credit is a new encouragement to Russia, if only followed by concessions as it has been. It proves to Russia that his language may be safely disregarded, whatever colour it assumes. My Lords, in spite of any language he may hold, and even more of any views he may arrive at, the Russian leaders know that so long as he is our First Minister he shelters them from all the perils which might otherwise arrest them. So long as he remains it is impossible that the mass of European Powers should be arrayed against them. So long as he remains the Holy Alliance cannot be divided; the German Empire cannot be successfully appealed to; the Sublime Porte cannot be won back to common action with Great Britain. It must be also recollected by the statesmen at St. Petersburg that in the event of war Constantinople will be as much an object as Herat. When are they to reach Constantinople, so nearly grasped, so painfully relinquished, if not when the Western Powers are embroiled, and when the First Minister of Great Britain is unable to defend it without the sacrifice of something more than his professions and his policy? My Lords, that war with Russia is the consequence of retaining a First Minister who has, or only seems to have, an inclination to that Power does not stand on reason, probability, or theory, although they would effectually uphold it. A sad and remote example has betrayed it. It is seen by all who accurately measure the transaction that the imputed partiality of the late Earl of Aberdeen for Russia produced the war which led us on to the Crimea, and that had Viscount Palmerston replaced him in 1853 the Danubian Principalities would not have been invaded. There is not wanting evidence to show that the Czar Nicholas was hurried on to aggression by his dependence on the leniency and confidence with which the head of our Government apparently regarded him. The observation has been made a hundred times, but ought not to escape us when its conclusion is so vital. We do not come here to display originality at such a moment as the present. The situation is a clear one. An arrangement demonstrably calculated to bring on war with Russia in spite of pledges the most solemn was made in 1880. In 1885 for weeks that war has been impending. So long as the First Minister continues in his Office, so long as Russia keeps her eyes upon Herat the cloud remains, although the storm has been retarded. But while the cloud remains the storm is always ready to descend upon us. We are bound, therefore to look forward to hostilities. It is in the Black Sea alone we can pursue them with advantage. Until these Protocols or Treaties are collected, it will be doubtful how far that zone of operations is accessible. The research is insignificant, as I could easily convince the Government. As to the expense, it will not be considerable, and ought not to weigh with men who have prepared a gulf which only millions can bridge over.

Lord Stratheden and Campbell

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Protocols or treaties by which the authority of the Sublime Porte to admit foreign ships of war into the Dardanelles is regulated." — (The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

EARL GRANVILLE: Although I am not aware I gave any exaggerated expression with regard to any hope of peace, I am bound to say I do not share in the very gloomy views which the noble Lord has just expressed. He really reminds me of those who have entered in to a certain place and are said to have left all hope behind them. I do not believe that war with Russia is perfectly unavoidable. I do not agree that if that war came we should wage it with every possible disadvantage against us, and with every advantage in favour of Russia. I deny that Her Majesty's Government are conscious of constant military failures. I deny that it is certain Russia will go to Herat. I also deny—at least I disagree with—the sketch the noble Lord has given of Mr. Gladstone, which is one he gives from time to time from the seat he occupies in this House. On the other hand, I am confident my noble Friend was perfectly accurate, so far as I followed him, in what he said of the Treaties to which he alluded. I believe he is quite right—and I shall be corrected by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) if I am wrong—that the Berlin Treaty confirms the Treaties of 1856 and 1871. And I may mention as important that during the Conference at Berlin the noble Marquess declared, as is recorded in the Protocols with regard to the obligations concerning the closing of the Straits, that Her Majesty's Government's obligations were limited to the engagement to respect the independent judgment of the Sultan according to the Treaties in existence. Count Schouvaloff made a declaration on the following day to the effect that, in the opinion of the Russian Government's Plenipotentiaries, the principle of closing the Straits is a European principle, and that the Treaties concluded in that respect in 1841, 1856, and 1871, and confirmed by the Treaty of Berlin, were binding on the part of all the Powers, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the existing Treaties. If I am not mistaken, I think the noble Marquess, in his despatch, explains one of his main reasons for making the statement he did; it was made in consequence of the declaration which had just taken place that Batoum should be a free port or a commercial dépôt. With regard to the production of the Treaties, I really think my noble Friend need not press for them. They have been often presented; and in 1877 and 1878 they were presented and printed for Parliament.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: The remarks of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs demand one observation upon my part. The language of despair which he imputes to me is not despair as to the resources of the country, when the peculiar burden of the Ministerial position is withdrawn from it, but as to its power of opposing Russia when artificially and wantonly deprived of all support in Europe. For the rest, the personal allusions of the noble Earl are thoroughly innocuous. They are the necessity of his position since he resolved to be the organ of the Premier. He holds his Office on the tenure of attacking those who have disputed the authority of the right hon. Gentleman. I repeat what I have urged before, after full inquiry, that these Protocols and Treaties exist in no collected form, and that until they do the prevalent obscurity as to the rights of entrance to the Dardanelles is likely to continue. I shall not be able, therefore, to withdraw the Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I would make one observation with respect to the declaration to which the noble Earl referred. The object of the declaration which I had to make on behalf of Her Majesty's Government I understood to be to establish the principle that our engagements in respect of the Dardanelles were not engagements of a general, European, or International character, but were engagements towards the Sultan only; the practical bearing of that reservation being that if, in any circumstances, the Sultan should not be acting independently, but under pressure from some other Power, there would be no International obligation on our part to abstain from passing through the Dardanelles. Of course, that is a purely theoretical matter. I wish to point out that it was not merely with respect to Batoum, but with respect to any other matters which may arise calling for our presence in the Black Sea, that the reservation then made was made.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if he found he was wrong with regard to the Protocols he should have no objection to present them.

QUESTIONS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—INCIDENCE OF TAXATION.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will be good enough to lay upon the Table a Return embodying the details of the four groups of figures (between the years 1858 and 1885) introduced by him into his Budget Speech, to institute a comparison of the incidence of taxation on "Articles of Consumption" and on "Property" respectively?

MR. HIBBERT (who replied) said: My right hon. Friend will be happy to lay on the Table a Return as desired by the hon. Member.

The Marquess of Salisbury

VACCINATION—HOSPITAL ATTENDANTS.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in the case of officers and servants for the service of the Metropolitan Asylums Board Hospitals, a proper interval is always allowed to elapse between their re-vaccination and their entering on their duty; and, whether it is the fact that certain officers or servants at the Fulham Small Pox Hospital have entered on their duties without re-vaccination?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL (who replied) said: We have made inquiry, and find that in the cases of the North-Western, South-Eastern, and South-Western Hospitals an interval is allowed to elapse between the re-vaccination of the officers and servants and their entering on their duties. In the first mentioned hospital the interval is stated to be 48 or 72 hours. As regards the Eastern Hospital, it has been the custom to re-vaccinate the officers and servants on the day of arrival at the hospital or the day following. At the Hospital Ships no interval elapses between the re-vaccination and exposure to small-pox infection. At the Western or Fulham Hospital the officers and servants are usually re-vaccinated on the day of their entering on their duties. There have, however, since May, 1884, been two instances in which the re-vaccination was not performed until some days after the assistants had commenced discharging their duties, and this was in consequence of an omission to report the cases to the Medical Superintendent.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND)—THE SHOTTS SCHOOL BOARD ELECTIONS.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to the allegations contained in The West Lothian Courier of April 25th, that public houses were engaged, and "free tables" established, for the promotion of the interests of certain candidates at the recent election of the Shotts School Board, and that "as much as five shillings was offered to certain voters for their votes;" and, whether, in view of the numerous complaints as to bribery and treating at School Board elections that have recently appeared in the Scotch Press, he will consider the propriety of extending the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Acts to School Board elections at as early a date as possible?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have seen the letters in The West Lothian Courier. On inquiry I can find no confirmation of the statements that public-houses were engaged and free tables established in the interests of the candidates, and I have not heard of any instance in which money was offered for a vote. The only foundation for the last statement which I have been able to trace is that in the case of two miners who were asked to assist one of the candidates in his election, 1s. or 2s. were given to the children of each of them. It appears, however, that certain of the candidates treated the voters to drink. The instances which have recently been brought to light appear to me to establish the necessity for extending the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Acts to School Board elections in Scotland; and, as I think I have already mentioned, a Bill is in preparation which will extend those Acts to such elections, as well as to municipal elections. We cannot hope to pass the Bill this Session; but the School Board elections will not recur for three years.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1884—RETURNS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been drawn to the form of a Return under the provisions of "The Representation of the People Act, 1884," which has been issued by the Parochial Authorities of the Metropolis, requiring Returns to be made, as follows, under a penalty of forty shillings:—

Form of Return.

Property in respect of which the Person making the Return is rated [or liable to be rated, or occupied].

2.

Situation or description of every Dwelling House, as defined by the Representation of the People Acts, forming part of the property in the first column.

3.

Surname and other name of every Man who was, on the 15th day of July last, and has been up to the date of the Return, an inhabitant occupier of any Dwelling House in the second column.

whether he has considered how far it is likely that an ordinary ratepayer or occupier is in possession of sufficient information as to the meaning of the Legislature to enable him to fill up the first column; whether there is any clear and precise definition of a Dwelling House in the Representation of the People Acts which would enable him to fill up the second column; and, if there is, whether the ratepayer or occupier is to have recourse to the Acts for that definition, or whether the Parochial Authorities should not themselves supply it to him under some authoritative and legal definition; and, whether some guidance should not also be furnished to the person having to make the Return in the third column as to who is an "inhabitant occupier," and as to the circumstances and conditions under which the "inhabitant occupier of any Dwelling House" is entitled under that description to be entered upon the Return?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he had seen a form of Return in the Representation of the People Act of last year, which had been issued by the Parochial Authorities to the ratepayers of the Metropolis. This form was enjoined by the Act. When it was being discussed in the House the view of the Government was to leave the drawing up of the form to the authorities; but the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) expressed a strong wish that a form should be placed in the Schedule, and after consideration this form was adopted and inserted. He admitted the difficulty ratepayers would experience in understanding the form; but he had that morning received from the Vestry Clerk of St. Marylebone an instruction which had been issued along with the form, and which appeared to make the matter much more clear. He (the Attorney General) would suggest that in the Registration Bill now before the House a provision might be inserted in the Schedule enjoining upon the overseers the issue of a similar instruction. He would confer with the right hon. Gentleman opposite on the question.

MR. HEALY expressed the hope that the Attorney General would confer with the Irish Attorney General, in order that Ireland might participate in any benefit from the conference.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) intimated his readiness to do so.

PARLIAMENT—PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether with reference to the Report of the Select Committee on Westminster Hall Restoration, and in view of the indefinite recommendation of the Committee that they “Suggest for consideration, that the wall of the two storied building should be somewhat lowered, and that a plain coping should be substituted for the battlemented parapet,” he will be good enough to have elevations prepared, showing accurately the proposed treatment of the west front of Westminster Hall, and its general effect in combination with the existing buildings of the Houses of Parliament; whether he will further direct plans and sections to be prepared, showing the proposed Committee Rooms to be constructed, with an explanatory memorandum, setting forth the means of access to such Committee Rooms, the provisions for their lighting, warming, and ventilation, and the uses to which it is proposed to devote them; and, whether he will afford ample opportunity for consideration of such plans, sections, and elevations and memorandum before presenting to the House any vote for carrying out the recommendations of the Committee?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE (who replied) said: Mr. Pearson has reported that the models on the side of Westminster Hall, being only of canvas, are already in such a state that it is necessary to remove them without delay; and the Department cannot go to the expense of erecting further models to show the exact elevations. But the Appendix to the Evidence of the Committee will contain a drawing by Mr. Pearson showing the modifications which he proposes to make to meet the views of the Committee. The evidence and plans laid before the Committee will supply all the information required as to the rooms in the gallery proposed to be erected under the buttresses. These rooms are not intended as Committee Rooms for the use of the House; but will be available for conference or deputation rooms, or for such other purposes as may be ultimately found desirable.

In reply to MR. R. H. PAGET and MR. MITCHELL HENRY,

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that an alternative design had been laid before the Committee by Mr. Pearson as to the restoration of Westminster Hall and was now under consideration.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—VISITATION OF MOUNTJOY PRISON.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How often Mountjoy Prison was visited in 1883 and 1884 by the visitors appointed for that purpose by the Lord Lieutenant; and, whether, as recommended by the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons, full Reports in writing as to the condition and discipline of the prison for the above years were presented to the Lord Lieutenant?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It appears that when the term of office of the Visitors of the Dublin Prisons expired at the close of 1882 their appointment was not renewed, nor were new appointments made. This appears to be entirely due to an inadvertence, so far as I can see. Last year the Royal Commission was sitting, and no appointments of Visitors were made pending their Report. They have reported strongly in favour of such Visitors; and His Excellency who fully concurs, has appointed five Visitors for the Dublin Prisons—namely, Viscount Powerscourt, Sir James Mackay, Mr. Joshua Pim, Mr. Robert Warren, and my hon. Friend the junior Member for Dublin City (Dr. Lyons). I understand they visited the prisons last month and made observations in the books provided for the purpose; but their formal Report will not be presented until the end of their year of office. If the hon. Baronet will be good enough to move for it, I shall be happy to lay on the Table a copy of the letter of appointment and instructions given to these gentlemen.

EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE SUAKIN-BERBER RAILWAY.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, Whether, in view of the reported destruction of the wooden sleepers on the Suakin-Berber Railway, directions will be given to employ metal sleepers in future, the latter having been found serviceable on the Indian Government Railways and elsewhere?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked whether the construction of the Suakin-Berber Railway was to be continued at all?

MR. BRAND: The noble Lord asks me to prophesy, which I must decline to do. In answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I have to say that the relative advantages of metal and wooden sleepers were carefully considered before shipments were made for Suakin. Upon the advice of the contractors and their engineers it was decided to use wooden sleepers in the first instance, on the ground that they were best adapted to the rapid construction of a temporary line; they were ready to hand, while steel sleepers must have been specially manufactured, and would not have been so useful in completing cargoes. Under the circumstances which were sure to prevail at Suakin during the pressure incident to the disembarkation of troops, transport, animals, and stores, it was thought that the use of wooden sleepers, which could be floated on shore, would greatly facilitate the difficult process of unloading, while for rough and uneven ground they would offer great advantages in making a more secure road. A limited supply of metal sleepers has been sent out for use in watercourses; and in the event of a continuation of the line, or of the permanent completion of the part now constructed, under circumstances offering less difficulty, both in respect of the delivery of cargoes and of the rate of construction, metal sleepers would no doubt be preferred.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: Is the report true which has reached me, that a portion of the railway plant has already been shipped homewards?

MR. BRAND: No, Sir; I am not aware that there is any truth in the report.

SUGAR BOUNTIES—PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Belgian Government have recently proposed that a Conference should be held on the subject of Sugar Bounties; what answer has been given by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether he can lay any Papers upon the Table on this subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: An invitation to attend this proposed Conference was conveyed to Her Majesty's Government in December last by the Belgian Minister. Baron Solvyns was informed, in reply, that, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, any active steps for the relief of the sugar industry must be taken by the countries whose duties and bounties have placed this industry in an artificial position. Her Majesty's Government, before accepting the invitation, wished to know whether the Governments of the countries which grant bounties had expressed their intention of being represented at the proposed Conference. An answer was shortly afterwards received to the effect that the proposal was postponed. I will consult the President of the Board of Trade, whose Department deals with the general question, as to the presentation of the Papers on the subject to Parliament.

SPAIN—THE ZAMORA WATERWORKS COMPANY.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government can state what is the present position of the proceedings for enforcing payment of the amount due from the Municipality of Zamora, in Spain, to the Zamora Waterworks Company; whether it is the fact that whereas the Spanish Government at one time used their powers so as to compel the municipality to pay, they have now not only ceased to do so but are placing difficulties in the way of the creditors; and, if there are any papers on the subject which can be produced?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The real estate of the Municipality of Zamora was put up for sale on October 16 last, but there was no bidder. The Company then applied for a second sale at a reduction of 25 per cent on the upset price. In consequence of the action of the Spanish Home Office on the subject, Her Majesty's Minister felt obliged to address a protest to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, who promised to insist on the property being at once put up again for sale at the reduced price. Nevertheless, the property was again offered for sale without any reduction, with the same result as before.

There is reason to fear that the Spanish Home Office contemplate a revaluation of the property, which would entail a further delay of many months. Her Majesty's Government hope, however, to effect a speedy settlement of the case. They are in communication with the German Government, whose subjects are also interested. I cannot undertake at present to say whether Papers can be laid on the Table or not.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS—

THE JAPANESE VILLAGE—CONSTRUCTION AND MEANS OF EXIT.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether it is a fact that the condition of the Japanese Exhibition had been brought to the notice of the Metropolitan Board; if so, what action was taken; and, whether, if it is true that the premises are to be rebuilt, he will guarantee that sufficient protection will be afforded to the public against fire, both as regards the construction itself and also for proper means of exit?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: In reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to inform him that the attention of the Metropolitan Board was called, at the end of January last, to the state of the building in which the Japanese Exhibition was held, and that previous to that time communications had taken place between the Board's Superintending Architect and the District Surveyor on the subject. In the result, the owner of the hall was summoned by the District Surveyor before the magistrate, in order to obtain an amendment of certain irregularities in the construction of the hall, and the magistrate made an order that the works should be amended in accordance with the requirements of the District Surveyor. This order was not, however, complied with; and subsequently the Board was informed that the owner had obtained a licence for music from the Justices of Middlesex, although the Board had not issued a certificate that the building had been completed in accordance with their regulations, as required by the Building Act of 1878. Proceedings were accordingly taken to recover penalties against the proprietor of the Japanese Exhibition, and the case was heard at the Westminster Police Court on April 23; but at the hearing the owner of the hall put himself forward as, in fact, responsible for keeping open the entertainment, and, under these circumstances the magistrate dismissed the summons. I may add that the Board had prepared a series of requisitions for remedying the structural defects of the building, which would have been served in a few days but for the recent fire, which has shown conclusively that the Board has throughout been right in its contention that the building, until amended in accordance with the requirements, was totally unsafe and unfit for a place of public entertainment. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I can assure my hon. Friend that, in the event of the premises being rebuilt, the Board will spare no effort to secure proper protection for the public, both as regards construction and exit.

SECRET SOCIETIES (IRELAND)—USE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS FOR MASONS' MEETINGS—THE COURT HOUSE, MARYBOROUGH, QUEEN'S CO.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. If it is true that a Freemason Lodge was held in the County Court House, Maryborough, on the 14th of April last, and, if this is the usual place for meetings of this Society; and, if so, have the Freemasons any special right to make use of this building, erected by the ratepayers of the Queen's County, for public purposes?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am informed that the Freemasons use this Court House in common with other persons. The control of the Court House is vested in the Grand Jury, and the Government have no power to interfere in the matter.

MR. SEXTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman be in favour of a branch of the National League holding its meetings there?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have no power one way or the other.

MR. LALOR: Who are the other persons who meet there?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I have no knowledge on the subject.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTIONS OF GUARDIANS, MALLOWS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland

Whether the Returning Officer and the Mallow Board of Guardians have refused Mr. Thomas Barry, candidate for the poor-law guardianship of the Cleomor electoral division, permission to examine the claims lodged by landowners for property votes in the said division; and, if so, whether the Local Government Board will direct that facilities be given to Mr. Barry for the purpose of testing the legality of these votes; and, whether in view of the charges made by Mr. Barry that the votes cast against him by Lord Doneraile, Mr. W. Johnson, and Mr. B. V. Mackay were bogus property votes, and that two men named Hunter and Nagle, having three votes apiece, and having filled up their voting papers in Mr. Barry's favour, were intimidated into tearing up the papers, a sworn inquiry into the circumstances attending the election will be ordered?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I understand the Guardians have passed a resolution to the effect referred to, and they were within their right in doing so. It is, of course, open to Mr. Barry to appeal to the Local Government Board. If he does so, and furnishes particulars of his objections, the Board will take the matter into consideration.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — SUNDAY DELIVERY IN CO. MAYO.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Postmaster General, Why the Sunday Post established last year between Ballandine and Irishtown (county Mayo), on a numerous subscribed Memorial from the inhabitants of the district, has been discontinued; and, whether, having regard to the fact that the district served by the Sunday delivery contains three thousand persons, and that, under the present arrangement, letters arriving at Ballandine at twelve o'clock on Saturdays are not distributed until nine o'clock on Monday mornings, to the great inconvenience of trade in the district, arrangements will be made to re-establish the Sunday delivery at Irishtown?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The hon. Member appears to be under a misapprehension in stating that a Sunday post was established to Irishtown last year, and has since been discontinued. There never has been a post on Sundays; but the late Mr. Fawcett promised that the accommodation should be afforded if applied for in accordance with the rule by persons receiving two-thirds of the letters for the district. No such application has yet been received; but when it is I shall be glad to give it my best consideration.

POST OFFICE—SUNDAY DELIVERY IN THE METROPOLITAN DISTRICT.

MR. SMALL asked the Postmaster General, Whether he could not take steps to have even one delivery of letters on Sundays in the Metropolitan district, and thus obviate the inconveniences of the present system to dwellers in London?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: There does not appear to be any such general demand for a Sunday delivery in London as to justify me in making any change in the existing arrangements.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—ARMS LICENCE—NENAGH PETTY SESSIONS—CASE OF GEORGE NAPIER.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that on the 20th ultimo, a young man named George Napier, of Roscrea, was charged before the magistrates at Nenagh with having, on the 6th of the same month, "presented a revolver at a number of children;" whether several witnesses deposed to his having gone through the streets of Nenagh shouting "for the north," and calling the people "papists and rebels," and saying that he would "put a bullet through a Catholic or a rebel;" whether he was discharged without punishment on the occasion, and on what grounds; whether Major Waring, R.M., in giving the decision of the Bench, said—

"The magistrates who gave the defendant license to carry arms did not use discretion in doing so, and that he handled the weapon in a manner he ought not to have done;"

whether it is the custom with the magistrates of Roscrea to grant largely licenses to carry arms to persons of the same class as George Napier; and, whether the Government will make inquiry into the manner in which these licenses have been granted as well as into the decision of the magistrates in this case?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to repeat this Question on Monday, by which time I hope to have a written Report of the case which is on its way, but has not yet reached me.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS—ESKER DIVISION, EDENDERRY UNION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances under which Mr. Bor, clerk of the union and returning officer for the Esker Division of the Edenderry Union, failed to send a voting paper to one Luke Dunne, and afterwards, at the casting up of the votes, rejected the voting paper of Dunne, on the ground that he had not applied for it on the 20th March; whether, in fact, Dunne applied on the 19th March at the workhouse for the voting paper in question, and filled it up under the direction of Mr. Bor himself, to whom he then and there delivered it; and, whether the Local Government Board have already had cause to complain of the conduct of this officer in similar matters?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It appears the clerk made a mistake in allowing Dunne to vote on the wrong day, and on an objection being made to the vote on this ground, he felt himself compelled to disallow it; but this did not affect the result of the election. The Local Government Board had some reason to complain of the manner in which this clerk discharged his duties last year; but his proceedings have been more satisfactory at the recent election.

SEED SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT — EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REPAYMENT OF LOANS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he would extend by a year the time allowed the Unions to collect Seed Rate; and, if this extension can be legally granted by an order of the Local Government Board or the Treasury, or if special legislation would be requisite?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: There does not appear to be any necessity for this extension of time, which would require legislation. It is open to any Board of Guardians desiring additional time to make application to the Board of Works, who, I believe, usually accede to any request of the kind made on reasonable grounds.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE ULSTER CANAL

DR. LYONS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether My Lords will consent to stay the sale of the Ulster Canal until further evidence be taken as to the bearing and influence which this important link of connection in the inland waterways of Ireland may possibly exert in facilitating the transport of the materials and products of an extended system of industries in that part of the United Kingdom?

MR. HIBBERT: The Question of my hon. Friend affords me the opportunity of explaining the position of the Government with respect to this matter. The primary object of the Government throughout has been to do what seemed the best for the interests of the locality concerned, so far as could be done consistently with our duty to consider the pecuniary interests of the general taxpayer. As far as it was possible to ascertain it, the opinion of the district through which the Canal passes was and is, unanimously in favour of its retention as a water communication. There is also a general desire that the Canal should be improved, so as to make it more available for traffic; and my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) thought that he had secured both these objects with terms favourable to the interests of the locality and fair to the public by the scheme which is embodied in the Bills of the last and present Sessions. The local opinion appears to be in favour of this scheme, subject to certain amendments with respect to details, which have been accepted by the Government; but I have gathered greatly to my surprise, that, although the opinions of the localities are favourable, the feeling amongst the Irish Members is adverse to it. The objections of hon. Members seem to rest mainly on financial grounds; but they could be remedied by modifications in the scheme.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Does that mean that the Government will withdraw the Bill?

MR. HIBBERT: No; but that they will consider what modifications could be made in it.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—
SLIGO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS—MEMORIAL FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REPAYMENT OF LOAN:

MR. SEXTON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If the Treasury will grant the prayer of the Memorial of January last from the Sligo Harbour Commissioners, for extension of time for repayment of loan, postponement of instalments of principal, and lowering of rate of interest?

MR. HIBBERT: A full Report of this case has recently been received for consideration. I have already told the hon. Member that the interest on existing loans is based on the lowest rate legally possible, and therefore cannot be reduced. The decision as to prolonging the period of repayment of the present loans must depend on the willingness of the Harbour Commissioners to improve the securities which they have offered by a re-adjustment of the tolls.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—SUP-PLIES FOR THE TROOPS AT SUAKIN.

MR. DIGBY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that fresh mutton from New Zealand has been refused and beef from Russia accepted for British troops at Suakin; and, if so, whether it would not be possible to give a preference to Colonial meat, which would, in certain eventualities, probably become a matter of necessity?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The requirement of the Commissariat at Suakin was live cattle. The supply from New Zealand consisted of dead meat, frozen, and unsuited for use at the front. If Colonial live stock could be delivered at a price not greater than that paid for the produce of other countries, there would be every desire to give it the preference.

THE PAPAL SEE—DIPLOMATIC COM-MUNICATION WITH THE VATICAN
—MR. ERRINGTON.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that, with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government, Mr. Errington has been making endeavours at Rome to prevent the appointment of a particular ecclesiastic to the See of Dublin?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I am desired by Earl Granville to state, on his behalf, that I have no further information to give in addition to the statement which I have already made.

EGYPT (MILITARY EXPEDITION)— HEALTH OF THE TROOPS ON THE NILE.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the letter published by their Cairo correspondent in The Standard of May 5th, from an officer in the camp at Kurot, near Debbah; and, if the statements therein made, that the huts will not be completed till August, that seven men have died of enteric fever in the last twelve days, that, although the camp was only begun to be formed five weeks ago, there are already 150 sick, are correct; if so, and it is determined to keep the troops in that pestilential climate, if nothing can be done to alleviate their sufferings?

COLONEL DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the following extract from the letter of an officer in the camp at Kurot, near Debbah, on the Upper Nile, in The Standard, of Tuesday, May 5th:—

"We are all in miserable bell tents, the huts cannot be finished till August. The temperature is now 120 degrees:

"Every day is 24 hours of physical torture:

"Seven of our men have died of enteric fever in the last twelve days, and although we only began to form our camp here five weeks ago, we have already 150 sick. It is a disgrace to keep us in such a fiendish country; nothing can excuse it:

"The food is bad, we are still in rags, as no clothing has come up yet:

"If they keep the troops here all the summer none will be left worth a straw:

"Now the correspondents are gone everything is concealed, and there is no one to say a word for the soldier;"

and, whether, considering that Lord Wolseley has left that country before the real hot season commenced, the British force on the Nile will be brought back, or is it decided to retain them there under the conditions above stated?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have asked Sir Redvers Buller for information on this matter, and, by a telegram, dated from Dongola, this morning, he reports as follows:—

“Hutting not yet finished at Kurot, Tani, or Merawi; should be this week. But troops have had day shelter for more than three weeks. Principal medical officer reports percentage sick, 7·1. Health of troops not so good, but not materially worse than at the date of last returns—viz., 15th April. Doctors report health at Dongola, Abu Gus, Tani, Merawi as good; at Shabadood, Kurot, and Fatmeh as fair.”

With regard to the latter part of the noble Viscount's Question, I can only say that the statements made in Parliament have been sent to Lord Wolseley. We have been since that time in communication with him as to the measures to be taken upon them; and I expect that in the course of a very short time—probably in a day or two—I shall be in a position to inform the House that orders have been issued in accordance with the intentions stated to the House.

COLONEL DAWNAY: Are we to understand from the noble Marquess that the troops are still living in bell tents on the Upper Nile?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I presume that, at stations where the hutting has not been completed, they are; but, as stated by Sir Redvers Buller, day shelter during the great heat has been provided in all those stations for the troops for a considerable time.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM: Can the noble Marquess tell us what kind of hutting it is?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; I cannot describe it accurately; but I presume it is in the nature of shedding.

MR. O'KELLY asked upon whose authority the noble Marquess made the statement that the troops were hutted? Last year the noble Marquess made a statement in that House that the troops were hutted on the Nile at a time when all the troops in the Valley of the Nile were living under canvas.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have already stated that what I have said is on the authority of Sir Redvers Buller, who is the officer commanding at Dongola.

LAW AND POLICE—THE FOLKESTONE ABDUCTION CASE.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that the woman Johnson, sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for the alleged abduction of the daughter of the widow of a labouring man named Heardman of Acrise, in the parish of Folkestone, is about to leave prison; and, whether he has ordered any steps, and, if so, what, to be taken, in order to trace out the still missing child?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: With regard to the first part of this Question, I am informed that the prisoner will not be discharged till July. Every effort has been made by the police to find the missing child, both at home and abroad, but without success. The police are not of opinion that a reward should be issued.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IKELAND)—THE RIVER BARROW

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Commission appointed early in the year to inquire into the Barrow Drainage has yet proceeded to work, and if he can say where and when it is proposed to take evidence, and what (if any) further surveys are considered necessary; and, whether they have yet been directed, and how long they are expected to take?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My hon. Friend has asked me to answer this Question. The Secretary of the Commission informs me that they had their first meeting last month, and adjourned until they got the valuation, which is being made. This they expect to get in a few days, and they will then at once arrange for local sittings. No further surveys will be necessary.

ARMY (ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT — THE MARTINI-HENRY CARTRIDGE

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, What the Government intend to do with the large stock of Boxer cartridges to which he alluded on Monday; and whether he will endeavour to arrange that they shall be used only for target practice, and not for purposes of war?

MR. BRAND, in reply, said, he had answered this Question the other day, but for the information of the hon. Gentleman he would repeat his answer. Those cartridges would be issued for purposes of practice to the Auxiliary Forces.

The Marquess of Hartington

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—THE KILKENNY DRAIN-AGE DISTRICT SCHEME.

MR. MARUM asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the case of the arterial drainage scheme in the Goula and Erkina district, extending over portions of Tipperary, North Kilkenny, and the Queen's County for a distance of over twenty miles; that the land occupiers, mainly the tenant farmers of the locality, promoted this scheme, and subscribed a considerable sum out of their own resources to have the necessary surveys, maps, plans, and specifications executed by the county surveyor of Kilkenny, and further to have the same lodged with the Board of Works; that in due course, and during last autumn, the Inspector of the Board of Works, Mr. H. Barrington, C.E., inspected the drainage district and made his Report thereon, which was of a most favourable character, showing that it would highly improve the lands in the locality, and yield a considerable percentage upon the proposed outlay, besides exhibiting advantages of a sanitary nature, and further calculated to afford considerable employment in an impoverished district; that the summer period of the year is now at hand, when not only the proposed works can be executed with facility, but the labour market of the locality can be largely and beneficially availed of; and, whether the Board of Works, taking all these circumstances into favourable consideration, is prepared to carry out the undertaking of his predecessor in the office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by forthwith giving effect to the long-continued and expensive efforts of the promoters of this important and desirable drainage operation?

MR. HIBBERT: I fancy that this is the same district as that about which a Question was asked me on February 24. If so, I can only say that the Government have every willingness to help this work forward. But there is no power under the present law to overrule the objections of the owners, which, apparently, are the sole obstacles to the completion of the Provisional Order. A Bill giving us that power is before the House, but it is blocked by the hon. Member for Cavan; and if the hon.

Member could induce his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar) to allow that Bill to proceed, this defect might be remedied.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF MRS. ELIZA COLGAN.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he can state his decision in the case of the trust money of Eliza Colgan, appropriated by an Irish Crown Solicitor?

MR. HIBBERT (who replied) said: In accordance with his promise, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has considered this question, and has reviewed all the facts and circumstances of the case, dating back to 1852. He has come to the conclusion that Mrs. Colgan may properly receive a further sum of £250, in addition to the amount already given, and payment of this sum was made to her on April 30.

MR. HEALY: On behalf of this poor woman I beg to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for looking into her case after she has been for 20 years in vain seeking justice from Dublin Castle.

LUNACY LAWS—MR. HILLMAN'S CASE.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the decision of the Court of Appeal, in the Lewes lunacy case just concluded, in which, owing to a difference of opinion among the Judges on the Law, Mr. Hillman, who was unlawfully placed in an asylum, has to pay all the costs; whether it is true that the Lord Chief Justice of England decided in favour of Mr. Hillman, while two other Judges held opposite views; and, whether he will cause the Law regarding the confinement of persons alleged to be insane to be so altered as to be intelligible to those who have to administer it?

MR. GRANTHAM asked, Whether it was not a fact that Sir James Hannen and Lord Justice Lindley held in the Court of Appeal that Mr. Hillman had been lawfully placed in an asylum, and that there was no justification for the suggestion that the magistrates had acted in the slightest degree in any improper manner, or had not made a proper examination of Mr. Hillman before signing their certificate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that considering that the Court of Appeal had decided that Mr. Hillman was not unlawfully placed in an asylum, he did not see how he could interfere. It was, however, to be borne in mind that the judgment of the Court was not unanimous, and no doubt the Lord Chancellor would keep this case in view when dealing by legislation with the whole subject.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)—
HEAD MONEY.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has observed a statement, which appeared in a letter addressed to The Times by Mr. Wilfred Blunt, and which was published by that journal last Monday, that rewards had been given to any person belonging to the "friendly tribes," in the vicinity of Suakin, who brought in a human head; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made, in order to learn whether there is any foundation for this report; and, if true, who is responsible for this barbarity?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No such information has been received; and until some evidence is adduced in support of Mr. Blunt's statement it does not appear necessary to make any inquiry on the subject.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION—SIR PETER LUMSDEN.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When was Sir Peter Lumsden appointed on the Afghanistan Boundary Commission; what were the terms and tenure of his appointment; is his appointment over by his recall to London; what is the date of the letter or telegram summoning him to London; when Sir Peter Lumsden and Colonel Stewart leave Afghanistan, will any of their subordinate English officers remain; and, if so, what is to be their office and function; and, what is to become of the troops employed to escort Sir Peter Lumsden's Mission? He also wished to ask whether the Earl of Dufferin approved of the recall or withdrawal of Sir Peter Lumsden?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (who replied) said: Sir Peter Lumsden's formal appointment bears the date of the 25th of August last, and nominated him as Her Majesty's Commissioner for the demarcation of the North-West boundary of Afghanistan. The instruction sent to him does not cancel his appointment, but requests his presence in London. It was despatched by telegraph on the 4th instant. Colonel Ridgway will remain in charge of the Commission, with Captain Yate and other officers as his assistants. Their office will be to examine and trace on the spot the details of the line of frontier under the conditions agreed upon in London. With regard to the future employment of the escort nothing is yet definitely settled.

MR. GIBSON: Has Sir Peter Lumsden been summoned to London to assist Her Majesty's Government on the question of the frontier?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir. The facts have already been stated by the Prime Minister.

MR. ONSLOW asked, Whether the escort which accompanied Sir Peter Lumsden will remain on the frontier of Afghanistan, or will at once return to India; what officers will remain to delimitate the frontier with the Russian Commissioner; and, whether the Ameer is to be represented on the new Commission; and, if so, whether his Representative will have an equal voice with the English and Russian Commissioners in the settlement of the frontier line? The hon. Member desired also to ask the Prime Minister, Whether the initial step for the withdrawal of Sir Peter Lumsden came from this country or from Sir Peter Lumsden; and if from the latter, how long ago had he tendered his registration to Her Majesty's Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No time has yet been fixed for the return of the escort to India. A portion of it will, in any case, remain to attend Colonel Ridgway and Captain Yate, who will carry on the work of the Commission. There will be no change in the position of the Ameer's Representative.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Has any explanation been received from the Russian Government as to the reasons which prevented General Zelenoy from meeting Sir Peter Lumsden?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member in putting the Que-tion is attempting to anticipate the information which will be in possession of the House when Papers on the subject are laid on the Table.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: When will the Papers be laid on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot give the exact date; but I will present the Papers as soon as possible.

MR. ONSLOW said, the noble Lord had stated that there had been no change in the position of the Ameer's Representative; but the House had never been informed what the position of the Ameer's Representative was. Perhaps the noble Lord would now explain what the position was?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I believe this subject has been fully explained to the House.

"THE SYNOD OF THE CHURCH OF IRELAND."

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Did he officially authorise the letter, published on the 22nd inst., signed by his secretary, apologising for having addressed the Protestant Synod as "the Synod of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland," and consenting to address that body as "the Synod of the Church of Ireland," if so can he state under what circumstances the latter title has been officially given, is he aware that the Government have always hitherto refused to the Disestablished Church the title it claims, that in the draft charter which the Government was asked to sanction they struck out the words "Church of Ireland," inserted by the representative body, that as in the Marriage Act of 1870, members and clergymen of this church are designated "Protestant Episcopalians," the Irish Registrar General, acting under the advice of the Law Adviser, Dublin Castle, directed clergymen of the disestablished religion to enter their church in the marriage register as the "Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland;" that the Lord Lieutenant, in the recent order as to precedence, published in The Dublin Gazette of April 3rd, styles its bishops "Protestant Episcopalians;" that at the last Census members of this denomination numbered only 639,574 as against 3,960,891 Catholics, 470,734 Presbyterians, and 103,107 persons of other persuasions, and do the Home Office intend officially to style the Disestablished Church by a title calculated to give offence to other religious bodies in Ireland, while the Irish Government avoids the title complained of?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have not an intimate acquaintance with this matter—indeed, I never heard of it until I saw this Question on the Paper. This Question comes within the Heraldic Department of the Home Office, and, like all questions of nomenclature—especially ecclesiastic nomenclature—it is a very complicated question. However, I may tell the hon. and learned Member that I will consult the Irish Government as to the practice in the matter, as whatever is the practice of the Irish Government, it ought to be followed by the Home Office. The matter will be cleared up, so that in the Home Office and the Irish Office the Government might use some practice in the matter.

MR. GIBSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman, or the person in his Department who will consult the Irish Government, also look into the various Acts of Parliament relating to the matter, beginning with the Church Act, and see that they all recognize the title of "the Church of Ireland?"

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: What is the Heraldic Department of the Home Office? Who is the Head of it? I never heard of it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: These heraldic questions are extremely complicated questions, as are mostly all questions of changes of name when other people object to have the name changed. The question was dealt with by those of the Department having to do with the styles and titles, proceedings of which I am not very fond.

MR. HEALY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can state whether the letter signed by his Secretary, apologizing for calling this Body the "Protestant Episcopal Church," was written without his authority, because this was a matter that created a great sensation in Ireland?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am not sure when the letter was written. I am aware of the importance attached to these matters, and I can assure the hon. and learned Member that this matter will be carefully considered.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that when a short Bill was passed after the Church Act, and when it was proposed to call the Church "The Church of Ireland," it was called "The Disestablished Episcopal Church in Ireland?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am not aware of that; but I see that I will have to get up this subject.

MR. SEXTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to consulting the Irish Government as to whether there could be any reason in calling a certain Church "The Church of Ireland," when everybody knows the Church of Ireland is another Church altogether?

[No reply.]

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—
M. OLIVIER PAIN.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for War, If there is any truth in the following statement from the Cairo Correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, dated Cairo, March 28rd, and appearing in The Daily Telegraph of April 3rd:—

"You have already heard that Olivier Pain, the Communist, is 'wanted,' and efforts are being made to capture him on his way down country. Whether he has had enough of the Soudan, and wishes to avoid spending the summer there, or has been sent north on a mission by the Mahdi, is much in doubt. The official information about him is meagre; simply that he was seen near Debbeh with a small retinue, making his way on camel-back down country. The following is the official notification:—
'£50 Reward. The above reward is offered to anyone producing Olivier Pain (and his papers) dead or alive. He left Debbeh on a camel on the 13th March 1885. His description is as follows: Fair, with light hair and beard, about 5 feet 7 inches high, blue eyes, slight build, thin compressed lips, with a cruel looking face, reticent in speech and manner. He is very probably disguised as an Arab. His blue eyes should betray him. G. F. Wilson, Capt. R.E. Commandant, Sarras, March 16th 1885.' I knew of Pain's efforts to get down country at Dongola, but because of official interposition could not wire about him at that point;"

and, whether the alleged action has been sanctioned by the Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that he was not aware that the facts were as stated with regard to M. Pain, or with regard to the reward said to have been offered. The proceedings had not received the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked whether the Government would hold an inquiry into the case?

Mr. Illingworth

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that no information had been received from Sir Evelyn Baring on the subject, and that no instructions had been given by the British Government to countenance the arrest of M. Pain.

MR. O'KELLY asked whether the noble Marquess would undertake to give orders that the offer of the reward should be withdrawn?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON. I am not aware that the reward has been offered. If the hon. Member wants any information on the subject he had better give Notice of a Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether any such reward as this could be paid out of the Army Fund, or whether it would be paid out of the Secret Service money?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he did not think that any such payment could be made a charge against the Army Fund.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—
ARKLOW HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, with reference to the failure of Arklow Harbour Works, and the preliminary Report sent to the Treasury, which was alleged to be most re-assuring, Whether the preliminary Report has been borne out by the Report of Mr. Manning, Engineer in Chief to the Board of Works in Ireland, just laid upon the Table, in which the following statements are made:—

"On the 4th January a Report was received from the Superintendent of the works that on the previous day he observed cracks in the parapet of the sea wall, and that some of the face blocks had moved out. The principal Assistant Engineer was at once despatched to the Harbour, which he visited on the 5th, and reported that for 90 feet in length (of the 415 feet constructed) the face blocks had moved out from 2 inches to 20 inches, and had sunk a few inches, and that the sand had been scoured away from along the sea face of the Pier . . .

"I visited the work myself on the 6th of February, when it was in the same state as reported by Mr. Greene, and although it was to be regretted that any damage whatever had been done, still the amount of it was comparatively little, and its repair presented no difficulty, but it was obvious that the mud foundations had been scoured out . . . on the 3rd March fresh subsidence was reported. On the 9th March, Mr. Henry Keating, Assistant Engineer, was sent to Arklow to make a survey, but the weather was not sufficiently moderate to enable him to take soundings till the 14th and 16th of that month. This survey shows that for about 130 feet in length the sea slope had been more or less damaged, and that the sand foundations had been scoured out by the sea, forming a trench parallel with the Pier from 40 to 60 feet wide, and of an average depth of about 6 feet under the previous level of the bed of the sea.

"I need not here enter into more detail; it is sufficient to say that the damages described are to be entirely attributed to the scouring out of the sand already described, and which extended under the foundations of the storm-wall for its entire width of 19½ feet;"

whether he has noticed the following in Mr. Manning's Report:—

"It has been stated that the mode of construction adopted at Arklow was objected to by the members of a local committee; I have only to state in reply, that for the nine years during which I have been engaged on the subject of the design and erection of Harbour Works at Arklow, I have never upon any occasion received any suggestion of the kind from anyone;"

whether in consequence of this statement he will lay upon the Table the protest and objections submitted to the Board of Works by the local committee of Arklow; and, whether he will put a stop to the works until the opinion of a competent engineer is obtained as to what is best to be done under the circumstances?

MR. HIBBERT: The hon. Member's quotations from the Parliamentary Papers are accurately given so far as they go; but I do not know whether he disputes the statement which he omits to quote—that the local objections related to the general design, not to the method of execution. As the Question only appeared on the Paper this morning, I have not been able to look over the Papers bearing on this point; but I will obtain copies of them from Ireland, and show them to the hon. Member. The suggestion regarding the suspension of the works at the present moment seems to me inadvisable, as it would involve the loss of the favourable summer weather and incur the risk of exposing the works in an unfinished state to another winter's storm.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked whether, having regard to the fact that the official who reported was an employé of the Board of Works, and consequently interested in screening that Board, the Treasury would consent to the appointment of an independent engineer to give a Report on these works?

MR. HIBBERT: I would be glad to consider such an application if the Local Authority bore the expenses of it.

MR. PARNELL: With regard to the matter, I would ask the hon. Gentleman to consider again the desirability of sending over from this country some distinguished English engineer, so as to see how the Board of Works executes these undertakings.

MR. HIBBERT: I will consider the question of sending over an independent engineer to report on the matter.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked, did not General Sankey make a special inspection of the works, and why was not his Report published?

MR. HIBBERT: General Sankey's Report is not considered of any great importance; but if the hon. Member wishes to get it it will be given.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: If an independent engineer is appointed, why should the locality be asked to bear the expense, seeing that the whole thing has arisen from the failure of the Board of Works' officials?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

[No reply.]

INLAND REVENUE—STAMP DUTY ON FOREIGN BONDS.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Stamp Duty of 10 per cent. upon bonds to bearer is to be levied upon all existing bonds to bearer of Foreign States, the coupons of which are paid in London; and, if so, how this Stamp Duty is to be levied in the case of bonds the interest of which is paid, either in England or abroad, at the option of the holder?

MR. HIBBERT: The rate in question is 10s., or one-half per cent, not 10 per cent. It will not apply to existing bonds of the nature referred to.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN).—ALLEGED PROCLAMATION OF LORD WOLSELEY.

COLONEL DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government is prepared to support Lord Wolseley's proclamation that our troops would remain a hundred years, if necessary, in the Soudan in order to recapture Khartoum; and, if they are not prepared to abide by this declaration, what steps they intend to take to defend the friendly tribes from the fatal consequences of trusting to these assurances?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am not aware that Lord Wolseley ever issued any Proclamation in the sense of the Question. I have seen a report of a speech said to have been made by Lord Wolseley to some Black troops of General Gordon in which there is some expression to the effect stated; but I do not think that Lord Wolseley ever issued a Proclamation containing any statement of that kind. As I have stated already, we hope very shortly to be able to make a statement as to our intentions with regard to the troops in the Soudan; and I cannot say more upon this occasion except that I have not the smallest doubt that, on the movement of the troops in the Soudan, the officers in command will make as good arrangements as possible for the protection of persons who stand in need of protection.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked whether the noble Marquess would be in a position to make the statement to which he referred before the discussion on Monday?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I doubt whether I can make that statement to-morrow; but on Monday, before the discussion, I shall probably be able to state what orders have been given.

MR. O'KELLY asked whether the noble Marquess would take into consideration the desirability of issuing orders to the General commanding at Suakin to stop the attacks on the Arabs until the Government had made up their mind what they were going to do in the Soudan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not think that Question arises out of the Question on the Paper.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the complete text of the Despatch from M. de Giers, which contains the following words:—

Colonel Daunay

“It is impossible for us not to trace back the cause of the present situation to the military aspect with which the English Government thought it their duty to invest their Boundary Commission,” and “we cannot pass by the fact that the loudly proclaimed interview between the Amir and the Viceroy, and its bellicose surroundings, must certainly have emboldened the Afghans to the point of committing such acts of provocation as could not be tolerated by the Russian military authorities;”

whether there is the slightest foundation for the charges thus made by M. de Giers; whether the Russian Government have asked for the withdrawal of Sir Peter Lumsden and other British officers; and, whether the return of Sir Peter Lumsden to London is in consequence of such representations?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member will receive the information which he desires from the Correspondence which will shortly be laid before the House.

EGYPT—SUPPRESSION OF THE “BOSPHORE EGYPTIEN.”

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Ministers will lay upon the Table the words of “The expression of regret to the French Republic, in which Her Majesty's Government associated itself with that of Egypt;”

and, whether it is true that The Bosphore Egyptien is shortly to re-appear?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The words used by Earl Granville to the French Ambassador were recorded in a despatch to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, which will be laid before Parliament. I am informed that the owner or editor of the paper has announced that it will appear in a few days. I have no reason to believe that this will be the case.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Prime Minister had stated that the Papers could not be laid upon the Table until the unknown future had been rather more unrolled. He should like to know when they were to have Papers laid on the Table relating to matters as far as they had gone, and down to what date the Papers would go?

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has substantially conceived the Question in a proper manner, and conveys it very properly in his own poetical phraseology.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (REDISTRIBUTION) BILL—THE NEW DIVISIONS OF COUNTIES—ALTERNATIVE NAMES.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, considering the necessity for clearness and concise definitions in all matters connected with the Redistribution of Seats and the registration of great numbers of new voters, he will recommend on Consideration of the Redistribution of Seats Bill that no alternative names shall be given to the new divisions of counties, but that every such division shall be known solely and always by one single name?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have frequently expressed my dislike for double names; but, looking to the most recent decisions of the House, I doubt if the House would agree to strike out all double names.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSIAN ATTACK ON PENJDEH—THE PROPOSED ARBITRATION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What steps have been taken to inform the Ameer of Afghanistan of the agreement recently arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia on the subject of arbitration on the unprovoked aggression of General Komaroff on Penjdeh; and, whether the Viceroy of India has signified his approval of the recent decisions of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. HEALY rose to Order. He wished to know whether the words "unprovoked aggression" ought to be allowed to appear upon the Paper; and whether it was not an insult to a Foreign Power on a very delicate matter?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the Question of the hon. Member alludes to an expression previously used, and that the words are referred to as a quotation.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the expression referred to is intended to be a repetition of a phrase expressive of my own opinion it is nothing of the kind, and, moreover, it is not an accurate quotation. What I said was as follows:—Upon the very first day, I think, of the arrival of the first telegrams from Sir Peter Lumsden, having gone through all the material parts, or what we judged to be the material parts, of these telegrams as they had arrived, I stated that upon the face of those Papers what had taken place appeared to be an unprovoked aggression. I never presumed at that moment to qualify or to describe the incident in conclusive terms, because I knew very well that the information which we had received was partial; and, in point of fact, it was within 24 hours, or certainly within a very short time after the receipt of those telegrams, that very important qualifications of the information they conveyed were received from Sir Peter Lumsden himself. So much for this expression; and I will only observe that there is now a constant practice of inserting in Questions, as if they were matters of course, matters which do not touch the point of the Questions, but involve assumptions of the utmost consequence, and that these assumptions are sometimes made—as in the present instance—with very slight regard to accuracy. As to the substantial part of the Question, I am bound to say that this expression had escaped my attention, because it does not belong to the main issue of the Question. The Viceroy of India has arranged with the Ameer the basis upon which the British Government is proceeding; and if any further communication on the subject with the Ameer should be requisite he will make it. To that Question the hon. Member adds the inquiry whether the Viceroy of India approves the decisions which Her Majesty's Government have come to? I do not see that it would be any part of my duty to answer such a Question. The Viceroy of India must be taken to approve these decisions; and when the proper times comes the hon. Member will have plenty of information—perhaps a little more than he may like—as to what the Viceroy does think on the point.

MR. ONSLOW: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Viceroy, in the speech he made after his return from Rawul Pindi, also made use of the words.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, on the point of Order arising out of your ruling a moment ago, whether, if an expression is used in the course of a debate in this in order to recapture Khartoum; and, if they are not prepared to abide by this declaration, what steps they intend to take to defend the friendly tribes from the fatal consequences of trusting to these assurances?

Colonel Darnay

"It is impossible for us not to trace back the cause of the present situation to the military aspect with which the English Government thought it their duty to invest their Boundary Commission," and "we cannot pass by the fact that the loudly proclaimed interview between the Amir and the Viceroy, and its belaboured surroundings, must certainly have emboldened the Afghans to the point of committing such acts of provocation as could not be tolerated by the Russian military authorities;"

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, on the point of Order arising out of your ruling a moment ago, whether, if an expression is used in the course of a debate in this House, it will afterwards be in Order if quoted in a Question?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is putting an utterly strained interpretation on my words.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is not the case that the Viceroy of India, in a speech at the Durbar, in presence of a large number of Natives, described the attack of the Russians on the Afghans as an "unprovoked aggression," without any of the qualification which the Prime Minister now seeks to introduce?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not before me the exact words of the Viceroy on the occasion. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] I am not surprised at that demonstration; but I must enter my protest against it on behalf of the dignity and the traditions of the House. To me, personally, it is a very small matter that such demonstrations should be made; but to this House, and the future of this House, it is a very grave matter. ["Order!"] I am not out of Order. I have not the smallest doubt that the expressions used by the Viceroy have been perfectly warranted by the circumstances.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I shall put the Question to the right hon. Gentleman to-morrow.

CENTRAL ASIA—RUSSIA AND AFGHAN-ISTAN—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRON-TIER—THE BATTLE AT AK TEPE—
COLONEL ALIKHANOFF.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the letter in The Daily News of Tuesday, from a Correspondent who was present at the battle of Pul-i-Khisti, in which it is stated that Colonel Alikhanoff ordered his Sarik Turcomans to attack Captain Yate's party; whether Captain Yate was deputed by Sir Peter Lumsden to watch the course of affairs at Penj-deh; whether Captain Yate had taken any part in the engagement of March 30th, or in any way transgressed the limits of his Commission; and, whether Colonel Alikhanoff is one of the gallant Officers whose conduct is not to be inquired into?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Question of the hon. Member is in four parts, and I shall reply to them as they are stated. With regard to the first statement, as far as the Russian Government is concerned, the report has been repudiated by them in the strongest terms. As far as we are concerned, I am not aware of any foundation for the report except rumour. I have not seen the letter referred to. As to the second part of the Question, Captain Yate was deputed by Sir Peter Lumsden to watch the course of affairs at Penj-deh. With regard to the third paragraph, so far as we are informed, Captain Yate took no part in the action, and did not transgress the limits of his commission with regard to it. With regard to the fourth paragraph, Colonel Alikhanoff, as I presume, stands relatively to the agreement in exactly the same position as all the other officers on both sides who were concerned in directing the operations.

EGYPT (WAR IN THE SOUDAN)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can make any statement with regard to the policy they intend to pursue in the Soudan in the event of a peaceful settlement of the present controversy with Russia?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, perhaps he will allow me to put another Question on the same subject. I must apologize for not giving due Notice; but the point is one of great and immediate urgency. My Question is, whether it was in accord with the policy announced by the right hon. Gentleman in presenting the Vote of Credit that what was called the "brilliant engagement" of May the 5th took place when an encampment of Bedouins, their women and children, and their flocks, were attacked by General Graham, and 154 men killed, although it is alleged by eye-witnesses that they never made any serious defence?

MR. GLADSTONE: In regard to the first Question, I am not about to make any statement on the subject. With respect to the second Question, I think my hon. Friend would do well to put this Question to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, to whom it belongs, to receive information on the subject.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: May I ask the noble Marquess the Question now?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I have received nothing but a very short telegram from Lord Wolseley, containing a very short account indeed of something that appears to have been in the nature of a reconnaissance by General Graham yesterday. If I had thought the Question would have been put, I would have brought down the telegram and read it to the House. As far as my recollection serves, it does not confirm the particulars the hon. Member refers to as contained in the telegram of one of the correspondents. The hon. Member asks whether such an operation is consistent with the terms made use of when the Vote of Credit was laid on the Table. As far as my recollection serves me, what my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) said with regard to the Suakin Railway was that it was not intended to prosecute it for military purposes to Berber; but that it would be continued to such a point as the Government might consider expedient after consulting with the Military Authorities, and that, in the meantime, further proceedings with regard to the railway would be considered. Under these circumstances, I do not think it is inconsistent with that statement that the railway should be continued till such progress has been made as may be desired by the Military Authorities. While any progress is being made by the railway, of course adequate protection must be given, and measures of the kind referred to may be found necessary by the Commander-in-Chief.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL : May I ask the noble Marquess whether he is aware that the telegram from Lord Wolseley has been communicated by the War Office to the evening papers, and that, so far from the operation being a reconnaissance, the words used are, "Graham made this morning a most successful raid?" I should like to ask the noble Marquess whether, in the course of the evening, he will despatch orders to Suakin absolutely prohibiting the repetition of such aimless and purposeless raids?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL : Is the noble Marquess aware that a great number of sheep and cattle were driven off, that the village was burnt, and that the wells were blown up with gunpowder?

MR. LABOUCHERE : May I ask whether the noble Marquess is aware that not only one correspondent, but two, have confirmed the report? I am told that even three have done so. It is confirmed in strong terms by the correspondent of The Morning Post.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I have no doubt the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) is correct in regard to the description that is given of the operation by Lord Wolseley. It appears to me to be a matter of very little importance whether it is described as a "raid" or as a "reconnaissance." No doubt there was a military movement, and no doubt some fighting took place. In regard to the other Questions, hon. Members appear not to be aware that a body of troops, or more than one body of troops, under Osman Digna are still threatening, not only the advanced posts held by our troops, but would also threaten Suakin itself. Until a decision has been arrived at entirely to abandon the further construction of the railway, I consider that the General Officers are entitled to take such measures as they may consider necessary for its protection.

MR. JOHN MORLEY : I beg to give Notice, in consequence of the answer of the noble Marquess, that I will put the Question on the Paper for to-morrow, in order to enable the noble Marquess to give all the information in his power.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : May I ask the Prime Minister, considering that the House is occupied in voting money for the Soudan, and considering the slaughter that is going on in that part of the world, how soon he expects to be able to make a statement on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE : My noble Friend has already stated that on Monday he expects to be able to convey to the House the instructions which have been sent to the military officers in the Soudan, and I think it is too soon to make any statement on the subject generally. It is not usual, when one great subject of public policy is locked up with another, and dependent upon the conclusion of another, to make any statement in regard to it.

MR. JOHN MORLEY : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was or was not a statement of policy when, in presenting the Vote of Credit, he told us that, as to the Soudan, it was the intention of the Government not to prosecute further offensive operations?

MR. GLADSTONE: Most certainly that was a statement of policy, I conceive, of the utmost importance; but the Question put to me by the hon. Gentleman asks me to make a statement with regard to the policy we intend to pursue in the Soudan in the event of a peaceful settlement of the present controversy with Russia. I think I ought not to be called upon to say when I will make a further statement.

CENTRAL ASIA — RUSSIA AND AFGHANISTAN — THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. MONTAGU SCOTT (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have offered to allow the Russian Government to retain Ak Tépe and the Penj-deh oasis; and, whether an arbitrator has yet been found to adjudicate upon the breach of the sacred covenant?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a Question with regard to particular communications now going on between the two Governments with respect to the Afghan Frontier, and I cannot enter into explanations while these negotiations are in progress.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Commission for the Delimitation of the Afghan Frontier is still in existence or has been dissolved by the recall of Sir Peter Lumsden and Colonel Stewart; if it is still in existence why it is considered desirable, as stated by the First Lord of the Treasury on Tuesday, that these officers should come home to London forthwith; whether the settlement in London of the main points of the Afghan Frontier will be postponed until the arrival of Sir Peter Lumsden; whether the date of Sir Peter Lumsden's recall was prior or subsequent to the departure of Mr. Condie Stephen for England; and, whether such date was prior or subsequent to the receipt of Russia's acceptance of the proposal of arbitration?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it has already been stated by my noble Friend, as to the first head of this Question, that the Commission of Sir Peter Lumsden is still in existence. With regard to the second head—if the Commission is still in existence, why it is considered desirable that these officers should come home to London forthwith?—the fact is this, that as negotiations are to be carried on here, and only details are to be examined on the spot, it is not considered that the examination of details is a proper employment for Sir Peter Lumsden, a functionary who was despatched to that country for a purpose of a much higher order, and that is the cause of the change which has taken place in the instructions to Sir Peter Lumsden with Colonel Stewart to repair to this country. In reply to the third head of the Question—whether the discussion of the main points will be postponed till the arrival of Sir Peter Lumsden?—there is no such intention. We are in full communication with Sir Peter Lumsden, and I am not aware that there is any necessity for a postponement. In regard to the fourth Question, the dates, I believe, are as follow:—The telegram requesting Sir Peter Lumsden to come to England was sent on the 4th; the acceptance by Russia of the reference proposed to a friendly Sovereign was received on the 3rd. As regards the priority between the instructions to Sir Peter Lumsden and the information from Sir Peter Lumsden about Mr. Stephen, that information made us aware that Sir Peter Lumsden had directed Mr. Stephen to come home. It did not state the date when the direction to Mr. Stephen was given; but the information to us was despatched on the 22nd, and I have no doubt that the direction to Mr. Stephen must have been either on the same date or a date immediately antecedent to it. I have no doubt that the latter gentleman left about the same date.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the House may entertain the hope that the permanent presence of some Consular or Diplomatic Agent at Herat will form part of the contemplated arrangement with regard to the settlement of the Afghan north-western frontier, to whom the Russian Government may apply in case of any local disputes arising in connection with the frontier, and who will be in a position to advise Her Majesty's Government as to their merits?

MR. GLADSTONE: I take this Question to be in the nature of a friendly suggestion, which might well deserve consideration; but I think the hon. Gentleman will see that it would be too early to make any Parliamentary statement on the subject.

EGYPT (THE SOUDAN)—MILITARY OPERATIONS NEAR SUAKIN.

MR. LABOUCHERE: With respect to the answers of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for War in regard to these statements in The Times, I would really ask the Prime Minister, Whether he himself has read, or will read, what is stated by The Times' Correspondent; and, whether some communication will be made at once to General Graham, or the other officers commanding, to tell them that these acts are not in accordance with civilized warfare—that villages being looted and burned, and women and children being fired upon—

MR. SPEAKER: This is an argument, not a Question.

MR. GLADSTONE: With regard to the first part of the Question, it will be my duty, in conjunction with my noble Friend, to get the most authentic information of what has taken place; and my hon. Friend may rely upon it that any orders it will be our duty to give will be in strict conformity with the pledges we have given.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE REGISTRATION OF VOTERS BILLS.

MR. PARNELL wished to ask, Whether there would be any objection to take the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill first to-morrow, on the understanding that on the Motion for the Speaker leaving the Chair on going into a fresh Committee the question of the payment of registration expenses should be raised by an Amendment, and that the result of the debate and division on that Amendment should be held to decide the question of the payment of such expenses with regard both to Ireland and England?

MR. GLADSTONE said, when he was informed yesterday that the question which had been decided on Tuesday by a small majority was about to be raised again in Committee on the Registration of Voters (England) Bill, he felt it necessary, especially in the absence of many Members of the Government, to reserve the matter for consideration. With regard to the course of Business, on reflecting on it, it appeared quite evident upon the face of it that when it was desired and intended to raise again a question which had been settled in a House of nearly 500 Members that that was rather what might be called a serious intention. It was an intention to challenge the House at large, and the Government were of opinion that there ought to be sufficient Notice to Members of the debate and division which would take place. That being so, the Government could not propose to take that debate to-morrow. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has proposed that the Irish Bill should be taken first. There was no very great question of convenience in point of time as between the two Bills. Both were admitted to be urgent; but as the English question was much the larger, and was that upon which the House had already been called upon to give its opinion, the view of the Government was that they ought to proceed with the English Bill first. That was the appropriate method to give hon. Members the means of again raising the point. They had before them the Registration Bills, the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill, and the arrangement made with regard to the Vote of Credit. What the Government proposed was this—that they should make an effort to finish what remained of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill to-morrow; and he thought—considering the importance of that question, and the relations of different portions of the House to one another with regard to it, and the general desire there was to close it without associating it with contested questions—what he hoped was that if it should be found that it could not be finished to-morrow, the House would not, for once, grudge meeting on Saturday for that purpose. There was no reason to suppose that there would be any large residue of Business after to-morrow. He sincerely hoped it would be finished to-morrow; but if a small residue were left, he gave Notice, without asking any pledge from the House, that the Government would think it their duty to propose that course. With regard to the Registration Bills, which were undoubtedly urgent, what the Government thought was that they should take those Registration Bills on Monday, if hon. Gentlemen opposite were disposed to allow the debate on the Vote of Credit, which had been fixed for that day, to stand over until Tuesday. He should, however, have no power to secure Tuesday for that purpose by any right of the Government; but he thought he could undertake to try it if the arrangement were agreeable to hon. Gentlemen opposite. If, however, hon. Gentlemen opposite attached importance to keeping their hold on Monday for the Vote of Credit, the Government would take Tuesday for the Registration Bills.

MR. GORST asked whether, if the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill was finished to-morrow or Saturday, the Prime Minister would on Monday make his promised Statement as to the legislation contemplated for the remainder of the Session?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the pressure upon the Government had been so great that he was not certain that he could make that Statement fully; but he would make a Statement sufficient for the convenience of the House, and consider what might remain. If the Business proceeded as was expected, he should make the whole announcement in the course of next week.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it had been thought convenient to have the question on the Registration Bills decided before the end of the week; but if the right hon. Gentleman thought the other course more convenient, the Opposition were, he believed, disposed to take the arrangement he proposed. But what was more important than the question of redistribution, or registration, or anything else, was that they should have, as early as possible, a fair opportunity of hearing, and as soon as possible afterwards of discussing, the statement promised by the Secretary of State for War, because they felt it was becoming urgent—namely, an explanation of the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Soudan. He should be extremely sorry to consent to any arrangement for putting off the debate on Monday, which would deprive them of that opportunity. Were they to understand that in the event of the Parliamentary Elections (Redistribution) Bill being finished this week and the Registration Bill put down for Monday, that the latter would be preceded by a statement of the character they had reason to expect from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War?

MR. GLADSTONE said, his noble Friend had given the engagement with respect to Monday with every disposition to keep it; and he hoped his noble Friend would be in a position to keep it in the letter and the spirit. But it was really in the discretion of hon. Gentlemen opposite to determine what the course of Business should be on Monday and Tuesday as between the Registration Bills and the debate on the Vote of Credit. What he thought would be an inconvenient arrangement would be that they should nominally fix the Registration Bills for Monday, and then spend it on a debate on the statement of his noble Friend.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE thought that the arrangement proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would be satisfactory. They understood that they were to have the statement of the noble Marquess on Monday, and that the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to get Tuesday for the discussion of the Vote of Credit. [MR. GLADSTONE: Yes.] There seemed to be some misunderstanding, if they had the statement of the noble Marquess on Monday, whether they would not run the risk of losing the opportunity of discussing the Registration Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE replied that the Government had the arrangement of the Orders, and, that being so, they could provide against that.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, as the matter in controversy was raised first on the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill, and as it was proposed by the Government to insert a clause in that Bill which they did not propose to insert in the Registration of Voters (England) Bill, it would not be more convenient that the question should be discussed on the Irish rather than on the English Bill? Gentlemen on his side had no desire to raise the same question twice, and they would be content to take the vote of the House on the Registration of Voters (Ireland) Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that as the House, with a very large attendance and upon good Notice, had previously decided the point in reference to the English Bill, he hoped that they would proceed on that footing.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that Members in his part of the House did not understand how any assurance could be given that there would be no debate upon the statement of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War on Monday, even if right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite raised none.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that if he might be allowed to state his opinion, the best and the clearest course would be if his noble Friend made his statement on Tuesday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped that favourable consideration would be given to the suggestion that the noble Marquess would make his statement to-morrow.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not give an undertaking to the House, because the communications that were going on might not be complete. He might not be able to give a full statement to-morrow.

MR. PARNELL put it to the Prime Minister whether it would be fair to allow the question as to registration expenses to be decided, and the discussion taken on the Irish Bill, in view of the fact that, practically, there had been no debate on the merits of the question so far as the Irish Bill was concerned. When the question was raised and decided the other night, it was done in a very thin House, and almost without debate.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the argument of the case, as he was at present advised, was quite the opposite to that indicated by the hon. Member.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £58,100, Divine Service.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £38,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Administration of Military Law, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886.”

MR. HEALY said, he wished to put a question to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) in regard to a case which had been mentioned in the American newspapers, of the alleged deportation to this country of a soldier who had been formerly a piper in a Highland regiment. It appeared that the man had deserted, and had gone to America. After residing for some years in the United States he was decoyed into Canadian territory, under the pretence of finding him employment, whereupon he was arrested, put in irons, and brought in that condition to England. It was further stated that the American Consul had interfered on behalf of the man, on the ground that he was an American subject; and that his case had been tried before a military tribunal and dismissed, on the ground that the original charge against him was unfounded. He thought the whole matter was one which required explanation.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had never heard of the case until that moment; and he regretted that the hon. and learned Member had not made it the subject of a Question, put after Notice, in the ordinary manner, before the commencement of Public Business. If the hon. and learned Member had taken that course, he would have been able to make inquiry, and give the hon. and learned Member full information. As the matter stood, he was not able to give any details; but if the hon. and learned Member would put a Question to-morrow, he would give the information asked for.

MR. HEALY said, he would adopt the suggestion of the noble Marquess.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he had to complain that the information supplied with regard to Army administration was very meagre; and he thought there ought to be an annual Report presented to Parliament.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, that he had last year pointed out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) that it was advisable to give some idea to the Committee of the character of the offences for which trials by courts martial had taken place, and punishments had been awarded. He was under the impression that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had promised that, in another year, information should be supplied. He had looked carefully over the Return presented to Parliament for their approval; but he could not find out that it contained any further information with regard to crimes and punishments. He thought it would have been interesting to have had such a Return in connection with the troops now serving abroad in the Soudan. The system of military punishments had now been entirely changed, and it would be of advantage if hon. Members were able to form some conclusion as to the results of the change, as shown by the nature of the crimes, trials, and punishments in connection with courts martial. In the present state of the information, it was impossible to say whether the misconduct of the troops had been great or small. Then, again, they were unable to say under what conditions the men were kept in prison—whether they were detained in custody at Cairo, Alexandria, or elsewhere, or whether they were sent home to serve their sentences. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be able to give the Committee a full account of all that had been going on in the course of last year, so that the Committee might be able to form for themselves some information as to the merits or demerits of the system of punishment now adopted as compared with that which formerly prevailed.

GENERAL ALEXANDER, in moving the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000—the salary of the Judge Advocate General—said, he desired at the outset to disclaim all feeling of hostility towards the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) who now so pleasantly and ably discharged the duties of Judge Advocate General in that House. His business that night was not with the present or any past holder of the Office, but simply with the Office itself and its duties. He maintained, although he might be wrong, that there were no duties connected with the Office, or, at any rate, none which could not be equally well discharged by the subordinates in the Department of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. What, to begin with, were the duties of the Judge Advocate General in that House? His principal duty was either to pilot the Army (Annual) Bill in its several stages through the House—work which could not be said either to be very onerous, or of a very important character. His next duty in the House of Commons was to do that which he was now doing—namely, to be present at the discussion of the Army Estimates, and more especially of the particular Vote now before the Committee. In the third place, it was his duty in the House to answer any Questions which might be put to him in connection with the Department; but, as far as he (General Alexander) remembered, such Questions were very few indeed. As a matter of fact, no Minister of the Crown in that House was less troubled with Questions than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General. With regard to his duties outside the House, the first and most important was to attend Her Majesty, and, having previously read and ascertained the legality of the proceedings of all general courts martial, to submit them to Her Majesty the Queen for revision and confirmation. He had seen paragraphs from time to time in the newspapers, stating that the Judge Advocate General had had an audience of the Queen, and had submitted to Her Majesty the proceedings of certain courts martial; but by far the most onerous duty connected with the Office of Judge Advocate General, outside the House, was the revision of the proceedings of many thousands of district courts martial. Mr. O'Dowd, the permanent Judge Advocate, said to the Committee which sat to consider this subject in connection with the Mutiny Act in 1878 that there were between 7,000 and 8,000 district courts martial held annually. He understood that since that time the number had very largely increased. There could be no doubt that the revision would be laborious indeed if it involved the consideration of many abstruse legal points. But everybody who had served in the Army, and especially those who had discharged the duties of adjutant to a regiment, would know that that was by no means the case, and that the proceedings of most of the courts martial were of the very simplest possible character, involving no questions of law whatever. Even if there were any difficult points of law to be considered, it would not speak much for the system of examination to which the officers of the Army were subjected if they could not be dealt with by the officers themselves, as they had to pass a very strict examination in Military Law. He might mention that the set of cases which came before the Judge Advocate General for his revision were cases in which men had been tried by district courts martial for desertion, in which a difference arose between the Judge Advocate General and the court as to whether the offence amounted to desertion, or the minor offence of absence without leave. That was the sort of case which, as a general rule, came before the Judge Advocate General for revision, and there were very few even of those cases. He submitted that such cases of law, as did from time to time occur, might very well be disposed of by the permanent Judge Advocate and his assistants in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's Department. Mr. O'Dowd told the Committee in 1878 to which he (General Alexander) had just referred that he, or one of his military subordinates, was in the habit of reading over the proceedings of every court martial; and he (General Alexander) inferred from what Mr. O'Dowd told the Committee that the Judge Advocate General of the day was not in the habit of reading those proceedings himself. The custom in that respect might have changed in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's time, because he (General Alexander) understood from the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he was in the habit of reading the proceedings of all these courts martial himself.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): Not all of them.

GENERAL ALEXANDER: Well; a considerable portion of them.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): Only those in which questions of law are involved.

GENERAL ALEXANDER continued: Of course, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have a right to read the proceedings of any of the courts martial he liked; but he (General Alexander) maintained that the work was a very unnecessary work, and that to perform duties of that kind was very much like attaching a fifth wheel to a coach. Mr. O'Dowd was perfectly competent, with his two military subordinates, who received £700 a-year each, to discharge all the duties connected with the revision of the proceedings of the district courts martial. A further point was that, in revising the proceedings of the district courts martial, the right hon.

and learned Gentleman had nothing to do with the severity of the sentences, and had no right to interfere in that respect. Mr. O'Dowd told the Committee that it was not desirable the Judge Advocate General should be able to interfere with the severity of the sentence, as that would be, to a certain extent, an interference with discipline; and His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who appeared before the Committee, expressed a similar opinion. But Mr. O'Dowd further stated that the Judge Advocate General used a kind of backstairs influence in order to secure a mitigation of the sentence, whenever he considered it desirable. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had friends in the Department of the War Office, and when, occasionally, he thought that a sentence passed by a district court martial was too severe, he made a representation with regard to it, and it need scarcely be said that his representations were generally attended to. Then there was another very important point to which he (General Alexander) desired, for one moment, to call the attention of the Committee, and it was this—that the judgment of the Judge Advocate General was not a final judgment. It might be referred—and it had been referred—to the Law Officers of the Crown. Mr. O'Dowd mentioned a case which occurred in November, 1872, in which the Law Officers of the Crown reversed the decision of the then Judge Advocate General. In that particular case the War Office had appealed from the decision of the Judge Advocate General to the Law Officers of the Crown, and the Law Officers reversed the decision arrived at by the Judge Advocate General. The Law Officers of the Crown, in reversing the decision, were of opinion that the Judge Advocate General was not so much a Judge as an Assessor, and he (General Alexander) thought it was just as well that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should not be a Judge; because he believed that a great evil might arise from having Judges sitting in the House of Commons. He believed there was only one exception to that rule, and that was the case of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London (Sir Thomas Chambers), who was at present a Member of the House. Perhaps the strongest proof of all of the inutility of the Office was the circumstance that for two years and four months the Office actually remained vacant. From April, 1871, after the death of Mr. Davidson, until August, 1873, the Office was not filled up, and during the whole of the interval Mr. O'Dowd, the present permanent Judge Advocate, discharged the duties of the Office of Judge Advocate General.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): Oh, no! The duties were discharged by Sir Robert Phillimore.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he was aware that Sir Robert Phillimore had been nominally Judge Advocate General; but he had been under the impression that he did not actually discharge the duties.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): That is a mistake; Sir Robert Phillimore discharged the duties.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he would make inquiries, would find that Mr. O'Dowd virtually considered himself Judge Advocate General at the time, and he stated to the Committee that he had been discharging the duties of Judge Advocate General for a considerable period. Certainly, in the interval which elapsed from the death of Mr. Davidson in April, 1871, until the month of August, 1873, the Office of Judge Advocate General was not filled up. But, even admitting the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to be correct, that Sir Robert Phillimore, who was also at the time Judge of the Admiralty Court, filled the Office, it showed that it was not absolutely necessary, under any circumstances, that the Judge Advocate General should have a seat in the House of Commons; and if the Office could be kept vacant for two years and four months, it certainly appeared to him (General Alexander) that there was no very great necessity for filling it up at all. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to another point—namely, that the Navy and Royal Marines were not represented by the Judge Advocate General in that House, and that when any question arose in reference to courts martial in the Navy, the Secretary to the Navy was always ready to answer it. As a matter of fact, the Secretary to the Navy answered far more questions on such subjects than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General. With regard to the remuneration of the Office, it appeared to him that the salary was very high compared with that of the Financial Secretary to the War Office, whose work was much more onerous. The Financial Secretaryship to the War Office was an appointment instituted by Viscount Cardwell, and that officer was certainly very inadequately paid compared with the Judge Advocate General, although his duties were far more onerous and difficult than those of the Judge Advocate General. He (General Alexander) was bound to add that since he came into the House he had heard that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had, temporarily at any rate, taken upon himself this additional appointment—namely, that formerly followed by Mr. Clode as Legal Secretary to the War Office. He was told that on good authority; but of course, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman denied it, he would at once accept the denial, and would only say that the denial would make his case the stronger, because, if the Judge Advocate General did not perform this additional duty he submitted that he had made out a clear case why the Office of Judge Advocate General in that House should be discontinued. It appeared to him that the Office was one of those which were maintained merely for the purpose of muzzling independent Members who might prove inconvenient. They all knew the great talent and ability of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and that before he was appointed Judge Advocate General his voice was frequently heard in the House. It was now no longer heard, and he (General Alexander) was quite certain that it would be of advantage to the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself if he would give up the post, which had so well filled for the last five years, and seek from the Government, as he had a right to do, an appointment upon altogether higher lines. He did not propose to trouble the Committee by going to a division, if he could obtain any satisfactory information from the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He certainly did not expect to get much support from either side of the House—either from those who had, or those who hoped to fill this position. He fa-

rule, he invited the hon. Member who communicated with him to wait upon him at his Office; and in the same way he was prepared to invite the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander), if he wished for information respecting any case, when he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would be prepared to produce all the documents in his possession to show that substantial justice had been done. Now, the House would see that the number of courts martial set aside for irregularity had been decreasing year by year. In 1881 the number of courts martial set aside was 246; in 1882, 154; in 1883, 116; and in 1884, 100. Therefore, in the four years from 1881 to 1884, no less than 616 presumably innocent men had been saved from unjust punishment; and it would be further seen that the number of courts martial set aside for irregularity in 1884, as compared with those set aside in 1881, had been nearly 150 per cent less. It might be asked what had caused the diminution? Probably the hon. and gallant Member was not aware that many of the difficulties which undoubtedly did arise in 1879, 1880, and 1881 had been got rid of by the simplification and codification of the law in 1881. Last year a book revised by the Judge Advocate General was published by the War Office, entitled A Manual of Military Law, in which each of the decisions of the Judge Advocate General were given in the form of notes to the Army Act of 1881. He was afraid that the hon. and gallant Member could not have examined that book. Certainly, he could not know the amount of labour the revision of the book had entailed in merely putting the decisions into shape. Probably, if he had been acquainted with these facts, the hon. and gallant Member would not have made his present proposal. But even that work was not considered enough, and the Office was now engaged in bringing out a pocket edition, containing everything that it was necessary for officers in the field to know. The result of their simplifying the law, and codifying it, had been to correct many of the errors into which officers presiding at courts martial had been previously led; and, instead of 246 wrong decisions in the year 1881, they were reduced to 100 last year. This, however, was only one of the duties of the Judge Advocate General. In addition to the duties connected with the revision, from a legal point of view, of the proceedings of courts martial, the Judge Advocate General had another duty to perform—namely, that of advising the Horse Guards and War Office on legal questions, many of which involved considerations of a most difficult and delicate nature. The hon. and gallant Member had referred to the retirement of the Legal Secretary to the War Office. He would explain exactly how that matter stood. Mr. Clode, who held the office of Legal Secretary to the War Office, retired in 1881. His right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), who was then Secretary for the War Department, asked him if he thought it was not possible to effect an economy by throwing the greater part of the duties previously performed by Mr. Clode on the shoulders of the Judge Advocate General. Of course, he said that he was only too happy to perform the duties without salary, although they involved a very large addition to his labours, and the consequence was that he had effected a saving in the Army Estimates of £1,600 a-year—£1,500 in the salary of the Legal Secretary to the War Office, and £100 per annum for certain allowances. Therefore, since that date, he had saved the country something more than £6,000 in four years. Reference had been made by the hon. and gallant Member to the duties performed by the deputies in the Office. He was glad to be able to say that another piece of economy would shortly be effected in reference to those officers. He found that he would be able to get on with three Deputy Judge Advocates instead of four, and by abolishing the fourth Deputy Judge Advocate a saving would be effected to the country of £456 a-year, making altogether £2,056, or £56 in excess of his salary. In every transaction connected with the Office strict economy was studied. He had pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member how entirely he was mistaken if he fancied that the duties of Judge Advocate General were confined to the revision of the proceedings of courts martial. There were always matters arising which demanded the personal attention of the Judge Advocate General. A considerable number of questions were raised in the course of last year which concerned give the Committee some statistics to show the number of cases with which he had had to deal in four of those years—namely, 1881, 1882, 1883, and 1884. In the year 1881, the number of courts martial that came before the Judge Advocate General was 7,474; in 1882, 6,513; in 1883, 6,026; and in 1884, 6,108; making altogether 26,121 for the four years. The proceedings of every one of these courts martial was read over by one of the Deputy Judge Advocate Generals; and whenever any question of law or evidence arose, the matter was at once referred to him (the Judge Advocate General) personally, and he did not hesitate to say that, on the average, at least three or four such cases were every day brought before him. In order to show the hon. and gallant Member how constantly occupied the Office was in endeavouring to do justice, he might state that in 1881, out of 7,474 courts martial, 246 were set aside upon the ground of want of evidence, or for some other reason—that was to say, that 246 persons who, if this contemptible office did not exist, might have wrongfully suffered penal servitude, or imprisonment, had been set at liberty, or had had their sentences reduced. He maintained that if the Judge Advocate General did nothing more than save those 246 presumably innocent men from undergoing a punishment they had not legally incurred, he would have done his duty, and justified the retention of the Office. He did not suppose, for one moment, that the hon. and gallant Member, or any other Member, would wish that those 246 persons should have been punished unjustly. But he wanted to know who could have prevented the punishment of these innocent men if the Office of Judge Advocate General—the only individual who had the power of revising such cases—had been abolished?

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, he proposed that that work should be done by the permanent Judge Advocate General.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman suggested that the duty should be performed by the permanent Judge Advocate General; but the permanent Judge Advocate General did not possess a seat in the House of Commons. He was not, therefore, able to answer any questions that might be put in the House of Commons, as he would not be responsible to the House; and he took leave to doubt whether, but for the inducement of a place in the Government, any really competent man would be found to undertake the duties for the salary attached to the Office, to say nothing of the additional weight which such a position and a seat in the House gave to the Judge Advocate General in dealing with the Military Authorities. Every one of these cases had come before him as the Judge Advocate General) as a matter of course, and in many of them the most complicated questions of law which could be conceived had been involved. He did not mean to say that the Judge Advocate General in that House was always, though he ought to be, an expert lawyer. On the contrary, he deeply felt his own deficiencies in that respect. He only wished he was more capable; but he had done his best, and the result had been that in the course of five years, something like 700 or 800 persons had been saved from undergoing what was, presumably, an unjust sentence. The hon. and gallant Member told the House that the Judge Advocate General had no power to interfere with the severity of a sentence if it was legal. That was quite true; but when he (the Judge Advocate General) discovered a sentence which he believed to be unduly severe, he took the opportunity of mentioning the matter in the proper quarter, and in every case, or in nearly every case in which he had made such a representation, the sentence had been remitted altogether, or reduced. He might tell the hon. and gallant Member one thing. The hon. and gallant Member must be aware that the courts martial in the Navy, to which he had referred, had frequently been brought before the House, and commented upon; but although the proceedings of at least 30,000 military courts martial had passed through his hands, in not a single one of the cases dealt with by him had the decision arrived at in his Office been challenged in the House of Commons. The hon. and gallant Member said that very few Questions were put to the Judge Advocate General in the House itself; but he (the Judge Advocate General) constantly received letters from Members of the House calling attention to certain proceedings. As a rule, he invited the hon. Member who communicated with him to wait upon him at his Office; and in the same way he was prepared to invite the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (General Alexander), if he wished for information respecting any case, when he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would be prepared to produce all the documents in his possession to show that substantial justice had been done. Now, the House would see that the number of courts martial set aside for irregularity had been decreasing year by year. In 1881 the number of courts martial set aside was 246; in 1882, 154; in 1883, 116; and in 1884, 100. Therefore, in the four years from 1881 to 1884, no less than 616 presumably innocent men had been saved from unjust punishment; and it would be further seen that the number of courts martial set aside for irregularity in 1884, as compared with those set aside in 1881, had been nearly 150 per cent less. It might be asked what had caused the diminution? Probably the hon. and gallant Member was not aware that many of the difficulties which undoubtedly did arise in 1879, 1880, and 1881 had been got rid of by the simplification and codification of the law in 1881. Last year a book revised by the Judge Advocate General was published by the War Office, entitled A Manual of Military Law, in which each of the decisions of the Judge Advocate General were given in the form of notes to the Army Act of 1881. He was afraid that the hon. and gallant Member could not have examined that book. Certainly, he could not know the amount of labour the revision of the book had entailed in merely putting the decisions into shape. Probably, if he had been acquainted with these facts, the hon. and gallant Member would not have made his present proposal. But even that work was not considered enough, and the Office was now engaged in bringing out a pocket edition, containing everything that it was necessary for officers in the field to know. The result of their simplifying the law, and codifying it, had been to correct many of the errors into which officers presiding at courts martial had been previously led; and, instead of 246 wrong decisions in the year 1881, they were reduced to 100 last year. This, however, was only one of the duties of the Judge Advocate General. In addition to the duties connected with the revision, from a legal point of view, of the proceedings of courts martial, the Judge Advocate General had another duty to perform—namely, that of advising the Horse Guards and War Office on legal questions, many of which involved considerations of a most difficult and delicate nature. The hon. and gallant Member had referred to the retirement of the Legal Secretary to the War Office. He would explain exactly how that matter stood. Mr. Clode, who held the office of Legal Secretary to the War Office, retired in 1881. His right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), who was then Secretary for the War Department, asked him if he thought it was not possible to effect an economy by throwing the greater part of the duties previously performed by Mr. Clode on the shoulders of the Judge Advocate General. Of course, he said that he was only too happy to perform the duties without salary, although they involved a very large addition to his labours, and the consequence was that he had effected a saving in the Army Estimates of £1,600 a-year — £1,500 in the salary of the Legal Secretary to the War Office, and £100 per annum for certain allowances. Therefore, since that date, he had saved the country something more than £6,000 in four years. Reference had been made by the hon. and gallant Member to the duties performed by the deputies in the Office. He was glad to be able to say that another piece of economy would shortly be effected in reference to those officers. He found that he would be able to get on with three Deputy Judge Advocates instead of four, and by abolishing the fourth Deputy Judge Advocate a saving would be effected to the country of £456 a-year, making altogether £2,056, or £56 in excess of his salary. In every transaction connected with the Office strict economy was studied. He had pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member how entirely he was mistaken if he fancied that the duties of Judge Advocate General were confined to the revision of the proceedings of courts martial. There were always matters arising which demanded the personal attention of the Judge Advocate General. A considerable number of questions were raised in the course of last year which concerned important legal points in reference to the Military Department, and all of them involved a considerable amount of responsibility. He might inform the hon. and gallant Member that, in the course of a single year, something like 800 Minutes and letters were written by the Judge Advocate General in which a legal opinion was expressed; and he would like to know what his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would say if he found it necessary to write 800 legal opinions in the course of a single year. If the Office of Judge Advocate General were abolished a substitute must be provided, and surely it was far better to have a Judge Advocate General with a seat in the House of Commons directly responsible to the House itself than to have an officer altogether without responsibility to Parliament. He did not think it was necessary to say more. He thought he had shown that the Office of Judge Advocate General was not a sinecure; but that it was one in which a vast amount of work was carried on. He had pointed out to the hon. and gallant Gentleman what he (the Judge Advocate General) had done since he had filled the Office. He had given the hon. and gallant Gentleman a number of statistics, and he would be happy if the hon. and gallant Member would call at his office to give even further information, and to point out to him the complex nature of the proceedings in connection with some of the courts martial of which the hon. and gallant Member had spoken so lightly. He believed the hon. and gallant Member had made this Motion under an entirely mistaken view of the duties of the Office of Judge Advocate General, and he thanked him for having afforded him an opportunity to give this explanation. With regard to the questions put by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir George Balfour) and the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil), he was sorry that they had only the Returns from the Home Army for 1884 to go by; but, as far as those Returns went, he might say that there was an unquestionable improvement on the year 1883 in the number of courts martial held. This was particularly satisfactory, seeing that in 1883 the number of courts martial amounted only to 76 per 1,000 men, which was the lowest number they had ever had; and he might mention that in 1868 the number amounted to 144 for every 1,000 men, so that they had dropped down to little more than half that number. He had carefully compared the Returns from the War Office for 1883 and 1884, as far as they went, and he found that the improvement which took place in 1884 was still being maintained. The number of courts martial held in the Home Army in 1884 were 10,040, whereas they were 10,703 in the previous year. As to the punishments inflicted, they were 6,899 in 1884 against 7,209 in 1883, thus showing a considerable reduction. There had also been a great diminution in the number of non-commissioned officers who had been tried by courts martial. That was a very satisfactory fact, because he had always held that it was of the highest importance to get good and well-conducted non-commissioned officers. In 1883 the number of courts martial of non-commissioned officers in the Home Army were nearly 10 per cent, while last year they were under 8 per cent, showing a substantial decrease. There had been a remarkable decrease, too, in the punishments for drunkenness. In 1883 the number of men fined for drunkenness amounted to 102 per 1,000, but last year they were only 84 per 1,000. He had no desire to conceal the shady side of the question; but, at the same time, these figures were encouraging, and showed that there had been a considerable decrease both in the trials and punishments. He regretted that the Returns in his possession did not enable him to give the number of crimes which had been dealt with among the troops serving abroad. He had, however, noted all the proceedings of courts martial sent to him from Egypt up to a certain date—namely, since the 1st of November up to the present time, and he thought the result was highly encouraging. The total number of courts martial in Egypt and the Soudan between the 1st of November, 1884, and the present time—namely, May, 1885—had only been 171, and of that number there had only been two general courts martial. That, as far as it went, was, in his opinion, a very satisfactory result. He did not know exactly how many men there were in Egypt; but he believed the number was somewhere about 13,000; and that, among so many men, there should have been only 171 courts martial, of which only two were general courts martial, in six months, was, he thought highly satisfactory. With regard to severe punishments — speaking from memory — he did not think there had been many. He was sorry that he could not give a more complete answer to the question of the noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil); but it was not his fault, but arose from the fact that the information he had to give, so far as it was derived from official sources, was limited to the Home Army.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he had listened with great attention to the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and he did not wish to enter into the merits of the case, so far as the Office of Judge Advocate General was concerned. He would only say that he did not quite take the same view as the hon. and gallant Member behind him (General Alexander). At the same time, he could not quite understand why the business of the War Office should not be done very much in the same way as the business of the Navy. In the case of the Navy, there was no Judge Advocate General at all. He would not say whether that was a better or a worse system; but he believed that in the Navy the proceedings of courts martial were brought under the notice of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and if the First Lord found any occasion to question the accuracy or the justice of the decision conveyed to him he had the Report cancelled. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) had never heard that the business of the Navy was not done satisfactorily. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that some changes had been introduced into the Office, and into the duties of the Office as originally constituted. It appeared that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), when Secretary of State for War, evidently thought that the Judge Advocate General had not enough to do, because when Mr. Clode retired from the position of Legal Secretary to the War Office, which, as he (Lord Eustace Cecil) happened to know, involved very laborious work, it was thought that the Judge Advocate General might very well do his own work and that which Mr. Clode had performed also. As far as he (Lord Eustace Cecil) was acquainted with the duties of the Legal Secretary to the War Office, they were quite enough for one person to discharge, seeing that, in the course of a single year, something like 800 cases came before him upon which he was required to give 800 legal opinions, or from two to three per day. Under the present circumstances, he did not think that the Committee would say that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had enough to do for the salary he received; but that, he thought, hardly touched the point. As to the duties of the Judge Advocate General before, it was clear there was not enough work; and that had been the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when Secretary of State for War. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) only threw that out as a hint; he was not going to support the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend; but he would suggest for the consideration of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and the House of Commons generally, whether the practice which had hitherto succeeded with regard to the Navy might not also be carried out in the War Department. If it were necessary to have a Gentleman of the standing and rank of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, let the Office, at all events, not be an honorary one. That, however, was a point which he did not wish to go into, or to press upon the Committee at that time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had shown that he did a large amount of laborious work which appertained to another Office, and he had also managed to dispense with the services of one of the Deputy Judge Advocates General in his own Office; and that he (Lord Eustace Cecil) thought was in itself a proof that he had not originally enough to do. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) should be the last person to wish to disestablish the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the Office which he, no doubt, so ably filled; but he thought, without any desire to interfere with vested interests, that, should promotion happen to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or should there be any change, it should be a matter for the consideration of the Secretary of State for War whether the honorary Office of the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not be, in some way, arranged for, and the duties of the Office performed in the same manner as in the Navy, and whether the onerous office of Counsel to the War Office could not be otherwise provided for. There was a portion of the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman which his hon. and gallant Friend near him desired him to touch upon. That was the statement that 246 innocent men had been saved from punishment by the revision of the proceedings of courts martial. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) could quite understand the sense in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken; but the manner in which he had stated the fact gave the impression that the men were innocent men, and ought not to have been tried at all.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): I intended to say legally innocent men.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House understood perfectly what the right hon. and learned Gentleman meant; but coming from a Gentleman of legal attainments, who they knew always used the right word, his sentence might be interpreted to mean that the men were innocent and ought not to have been tried. He was glad, however, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had explained. With regard to the point in connection with the Army, about which he (Lord Eustace Cecil) desired further information, the right hon. and learned Gentleman last year engaged to give that information, or else that he would make a statement on the subject when the Vote came on. He was afraid that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not able to make that statement, or to fulfil his engagement; but he understood that he now engaged that the information should be forthcoming in future.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): I am told that this cannot possibly be done before a month, or two months, have elapsed; but I am in hope that next year it will be in time for the Army Estimates.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, it was necessary that the Committee should have the fullest information before it passed that Vote, and it should have information not only with regard to the conduct of the Army at home, but with regard to that portion of it which was abroad. He took notice, in passing, of the increased number of desertions from the Army; they were certainly larger now than they were last year. The number for the present year, according to the Return which he held in his hand, was 4,300, as against 3,700 last year. He was at a loss to account for that very large increase in the number of desertions; but he observed that in two arms of the Service in which desertions were most frequent were the Cavalry and the Artillery; and the fact might be due to the excessive amount of work thrown upon those corps. He was also struck with the circumstance that a very large number of courts martial had taken place in the Artillery as compared with other corps; he believed that in the Artillery last year there were 1,268 courts martial—a very large number as compared with the Cavalry, for instance, in which there were only 740. Without making any reflection on that gallant corps, the number appeared so disproportionate that it seemed to him to demand an explanation, because it should be borne in mind that these were district, and not regimental, courts martial. He pointed out these and similar matters in passing; and he could not help recurring to the main idea—that Returns of this kind were most useful, because they gave the fullest information to the Committee and the public, and because they more or less formed a check on the appointment of unnecessary courts martial. He recollected that, in the time of the Crimean War, there were a large number of badly-conducted soldiers in the ranks, and that when they came home there used to be courts martial daily. That was a state of things which, for his part, he very much deplored; but now that education had so much extended in the Army, now that out of 84,000 soldiers at home all but 3,000, as it appeared by the Return, could read and write, he thought it was time that courts martial for grosser crimes should diminish; and he was greatly in hope, with the steps now being taken in the direction of not giving the men unnecessary work, and not harassing them either at home or abroad, with the steps taken towards dealing with offenders summarily, and not by court martial, that a better state of things would shortly prevail. But he again impressed upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War that it was most important for the interests of the Service that the fullest information with regard to the conduct of the Army at home and abroad should be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. HENEAGE said, he thought it was not necessary that there should be a Parliamentary Judge Advocate General. The War Department had three other Representatives in the House, while the Board of Trade and the Admiralty had only two. But he would like to know whether this question had not really been dealt with in another way than that in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Alexander) proposed to deal with it? The hon. and gallant Gentleman proposed that the Vote should be reduced by the sum of £2,000, the amount of the salary of the Judge Advocate General; but he (Mr. Heneage) understood that already the War Office had reduced the Vote in another way by the sum of £1,600, and that the amount of the Vote was also to be reduced by £456, the amount of the salary of one of the Deputy Judge Advocates General; so that, as a matter of fact, the Vote was to be reduced by the sum which the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposed. The only questions that remained were as to whether the right thing had been done, and whether it would not be better to abolish—not his right hon. and learned Friend—but the Office of Judge Advocate General. He did not think the duties were very onerous, either of the Judge Advocate General or of the Solicitor to the War Office, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman, having, as he stated, done the work of the latter for over a year, had been able to compile a book.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): I beg pardon; I said I had revised the book.

MR. HENEAGE said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that he had volunteered to take upon himself the duties of Solicitor to the War Office, and that he had thereby saved the country £1,600 a-year. It was public-spirited on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to take over the duties of the Solicitor to the War Department; but he (Mr. Heneage) would like to know whether, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman were promoted to another Office, those duties would be left to his successor? The Committee had heard much about the legal knowledge necessary to the Office; but was it not a fact that, in former times, it had been held by Gentlemen who had not the slightest knowledge of Criminal Law? If that were so, he thought it followed that a knowledge of Criminal Law was not necessary for the Office of Judge Advocate General. If the hon. and gallant Gentleman divided the Committee he should vote with him.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he was unable to perceive how they could abolish the Office of Judge Advocate General without altering the whole constitution of the Army. The practice at the Admiralty was that the proceedings of courts martial came before the First Sea Lord, who, in case there was any doubt with regard to them, referred them to the counsel to the Admiralty. He had no doubt that, practically, the proceedings came before the First Lord, and that he gave an opinion upon them. But he thought it was hardly possible to proceed in the same way with regard to Army courts martial; and as the right hon. and learned Gentleman had shown how heavy were the duties of his Office, and how well he earned the salary which he received, he hoped the Committee would not adopt the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Alexander).

MR. RYLANDS said, he certainly thought that great credit was due to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for undertaking the duties of Legal Adviser to the War Office without any additional salary. No doubt, the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were perfectly aware that there was an opportunity of making an economical arrangement by adding those duties to the duties of the Judge Advocate General. His hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) had drawn attention to one point on which it was desirable that the Committee should have some information; he had asked whether the arrangement under which the right hon. Gentleman had taken upon himself the duties of Legal Adviser to the War Office was of a permanent character? He (Mr. Rylands) knew it was quite permanent, so far as the present holder of the Office was concerned; but he wished to be informed whether, in the unfortunate event of the present Government going out of Office and a new Government coming into power, it would be practicable not only to fill up the Office of Judge Advocate General, but also to refill the Office of Legal Adviser to the War Office?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN): It is a permanent arrangement.

MR. RYLANDS said, his right hon. and learned Friend said it would be a permanent arrangement. Well, he thought that was a fair reply to the very important inquiry made by the hon. Member for Grimsby. He recollected that it had once been asked in that House whether the Judge Advocate General was a General in the Army, and the reply was that he was neither a Judge, an Advocate, nor a General. No doubt, the Deputy Judge Advocate General performed very important duties towards the State—was there any Department of the State the permanent officers of which did not perform important duties? He was disposed to believe that the present Judge Advocate General brought to the Office not only great zeal, but great ability. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil) had alluded to a very serious matter—namely, the desertions which took place from the Army. Now, he (Mr. Rylands) went entirely with the spirit of the noble Lord's remarks. He thought it of the greatest possible consequence that they should make the condition of the soldiers as comfortable as possible, and also such as was consistent with their own self-respect, and free from unnecessary interference—that they should treat the soldier in such a way as would encourage him to like his corps, and not in a spirit calculated to induce him to desert. But punishments were necessary, and in that respect he thought that the right hon. and learned Gentleman filled a position of great responsibility; it was a position which, in his (Mr. Rylands's) opinion, he had no right to delegate to any deputy. The right hon. and learned Gentleman stood there as the administrator of justice in the Army, and it would be quite right for the House to hold him responsible if any failure of justice occurred. Under the circumstances, he should not be willing at the present time to see the Office in question abolished. If any inquiry should be made hereafter into the various branches of the Military Service, he should think that then possibly the Office of Judge Advocate General might be put into the crucible; but for the present he should certainly not support the Amendment before the Committee.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he must question the policy of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (General Alexander) in moving this Amendment. The hon. and gallant Member generally took an enlightened view of military matters, over which he believed he was anxious to establish the control of the House. He (Colonel Nolan) would be altogether against the abolition of the Office of Judge Advocate General, not only because they had in that Office a very able and courteous Gentleman, but because he believed that the abolition of the Office would be a great injustice to the private soldier, and that the morale of the Army would be thereby very seriously impaired. Those would be great evils. He did not think that ordinary General Officers could know anything about Criminal Law. Sir Edward Ward was an exception, because he was a barrister, and had practised in Court; but the majority of Generals proceeded only on red-tape ideas, and as to looking into the evidence to see that it fully established the charge, that was a matter about which they knew very little. He thought it absolutely necessary that the Army should have a real lawyer to supervise the proceedings of courts martial, and he believed that they had a very efficient one at the present moment. It might be said that there were now three or four barristers in the Army, and that one of them might discharge the duties of the Office. He believed that that proposition had received a certain amount of support; but his own opinion was that it would be a very dangerous experiment, because those officers would be entirely under the influence of the Commander-in-Chief. If the Office of Judge Advocate General were abolished, he supposed that a barrister would be employed; and that, in his opinion, would be extremely wrong from a military point of view. The position of the Army would be totally changed if there was no Judge Advocate General. At the present moment a private soldier could ask the opinion of the Judge Advocate General upon any point of Military Law. A private soldier who knew nothing about Common Law or Military Law could write to a Member of Parliament concerning any point of Military Law in which he was interested, and that Member could go to the Judge Advocate General, who would set him right, and show whether there was any foundation for the complaint the soldier might have. If the Office were abolished, who was the Member of Parliament to go to? He would have to go to the Secretary of State for War, who, perhaps, would know much less about the law than the Member himself; for it was not the business of the Secretary of State to know anything about the law. Therefore, as he had said, if the Office were abolished, the Member of Parliament would have no means of obtaining any redress desired except by going to the Commander-in-Chief, or refusing Supply. He (Colonel Nolan) thought the present plan a very good one. Of course, the Navy was very different to the Army. The Navy was generally afloat. In the whole of his Parliamentary experience, he never received a letter from a sailor with respect to a point of law; whereas he had received hundreds of letters from soldiers. Our Constitution taught us to be extremely jealous of the Army, but not of the Navy. The Army was a very Constitutional one; but it might take power into its own hands. It was very necessary, therefore, that people should be jealous of the Army, and keep the control of it in their own hands. Through the Judge Advocate General, Members of Parliament could exercise a very strict and Constitutional control over the Army, not only in a general way, but in matters of detail, and particularly in respect to the administration of justice in the Army. They would commit a great mistake if they abolished the Office. It was true they would not pay the salary of £2,000 a-year; but they would be required to pay large sums for counsel's opinions, and they would lose that control which, in the interest of the Army and the country, it was very desirable Parliament should exercise.

MR. JOHNSON said, that, of course, they knew the Judge Advocate General had very important cases to look into; but he should like to know how trivial cases, such as one which had come under his (Mr. Johnson's) notice, came under the Judge Advocate General's judgment? Some time ago he was at Chatham Station, waiting for the train, and there he met some officers with whom he fell into conversation. He asked them where they came from, and they told him they came from Maidstone, where they had been serving on a court martial; and it came out, as a matter of joke, that they had travelled considerable distances, at the public expense, to try a wretched boy—a boy who had only been a few hours in one of the Militia regiments—for not having sufficiently washed himself. It appeared that the boy, who had just been taken from the plough, was not over fond of soap and water; he was reprimanded by his lance corporal, who, possibly, was only a minute and a half his senior, the boy told him to go to Bath or something of the kind, and was reported to the Colonel. He (Mr. Johnson) was not conversant with Military Law; but he should have thought that a reprimand from the Colonel, or confinement to barracks for an hour or two, would have met the justice of the case. Instead of that, however, a court martial was ordered. Three or four officers were brought from Canterbury to Maidstone, at something like an expense to the country of from £5 to £10, merely to try this boy. “Mony a mickle makes a muckle,” and £5 and £10 soon mounted up to large sums; and therefore he thought that if some means could be found of settling such trivial cases like that, without putting the country to expense besides taking three or four officers from their duties, a great step in advance would be made.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he had noticed, since he was elected a Member of the House, a great disposition on the part of hon. Members to make a great ado about very small sums of money; while they offered no opposition whatever to very lavish expenditure for very unworthy purposes. He had noticed this disposition very strongly marked in hon. Members who sat below the Gangway opposite and called themselves Radicals. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had expressed the extreme indignation which he felt that the management of affairs in this country allowed the Judge Advocate General to receive a salary of £2,000 a-year. When the Vote was asked for £11,000,000 sterling, hon. Members, like the hon. Member for Burnley, had very little to say, either about the advisability of the expenditure of that money, or as to the lack of economy, on the part of the Government, which allowed such expenditure to be made. It was extremely irksome to listen to debates carried on by men who were supposed to be sensible men, and to have some degree of common sense—it was extremely irksome to listen to such debates as that which had just taken place. None of the speeches delivered that night had contained a single bit of information; they were mere dry repetition, and so far as he could see the only object that hon. Members had in delivering them was to waste the time of the Committee. If the hon. Members who had taken part in the debate had been Irish Members, the Committee would have howled at them, and very possibly to-morrow they would have been accused by the English Press of wilful Obstruction. But, as those hon. Members were not Irish Members, he supposed that all the twaddle which had been talked that evening would be put down by the English Press to the great solicitude which was felt by the hon. Members of the House that the affairs of the country should be managed as economically as possible. He did not care very much whether the Office of Judge Advocate General was abolished or not. He was not very much interested in the matter; but having listened to the debate—he regretted that he had allowed himself to listen to it instead of going to dinner long ago—he certainly felt—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's remarks concerning other Members of the House are not proper. It is forbidden by the Rules of Parliament for an hon. Member to use language which is calculated to be offensive to his brother Members.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he was sure the Chairman would believe him when he said he had not the slightest intention of being offensive in any way. He had no intention whatever of being unnecessarily offensive, or offensive at all, to any hon. Members of the House; and if he had been so, he should endeavour, in the few remarks which he wished now to address to the Committee, not to offend again. He merely rose for the purpose of saying that, in his opinion, it was absolutely absurd for hon. Members to come down to the House, and object, upon the score of economy, to a hard-working official getting a salary of £2,000 a-year, while they offered no objection to expenditure of millions of money for the most unworthy purposes. He did not know whether the Committee would go to a division; but if they did he should certainly vote against the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Alexander).

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to ask what steps had been taken to apply the Military Law to a series of outrages committed by soldiers a few nights ago in the town of Downpatrick? He put a Question last week with regard to the manner in which these men were billeted in the town. Some time ago the Government gave £1,000 for the tenant right of a piece of land in Downpatrick, and in the town itself there were a sufficient number of unoccupied houses to give accommodation to all the men. In the exercise of their judgment, the Government had billeted the men in the vicinity of the town. He believed that the men were Protestants, and that they had been mostly billeted on Catholics. Now, Downpatrick was a place where religious feeling influenced political feeling; and it might have been foreseen by the authorities that the system of billeting which had been adopted would lead to undesirable results. When he put the Question last week, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) said it was not usual to camp men out before the 1st of May, and there were not sufficient unoccupied houses in the town to accommodate them. (He (Mr. Sexton) had learned since that the latter statement was not correct. Anyhow, last week there were horse races near the town, and it was very desirable that care should be taken to keep the men apart from the general body of the people. They were, however, allowed on the racecourse, and they seemed to have partaken of a considerable quantity of liquor. They were allowed to go about as they pleased, and the consequence was that at 8 o'clock on Thursday night of last week, about 40 of the battalion, accompanied by three or four privates of the Devonshire Regiment, commenced an irregular march through the town. They were headed by a couple of civilians, whose names he had not ascertained, who pointed out the houses of the Catholics. The men broke the windows of these houses; they went through the streets indulging in the most offensive and provocative Party cries they could invent; and they wound up their evening by rushing into the licensed premises of a Catholic and making most violent assaults with their waistbelts upon the waiters and everybody in the place. When a cry of police was raised, they ran away, but not before they had broken all the glasses they could find in the house. The result was riot and excitement, and there had been the greatest confusion and indignation in the town in consequence. He was told the other day that no complaint had been made with regard to the system of billeting the men in the town. As a matter of fact, the clergy made complaints on the subject, and he had letters in his possession complaining in the very strongest manner of the probable effects of the system. He believed that the day following these extraordinary outrages an inquiry of an informal nature was held, at which Major Stewart, an officer of the battalion and the resident magistrate of the district, was present. He wished to know what was the result of that inquiry; whether any trial of the men had been held; and, if not, how soon one would be held; whether communications had been held with the Civil Authorities; whether, by the machinery of the Crimes Act, an endeavour had been made to ascertain who were the two civilians who led the marauders and pointed out the houses occupied by Catholics? It was very desirable that persons concerned in promoting outrages should be punished, and it was equally desirable that the soldiers should be withdrawn from the town at once. There was a camping ground outside the town; why not put the men into tents? He could only say that if they were not withdrawn, but allowed to go on committing these outrages night after night, the probability was that if the people of the town had not the spirit to resent such proceedings, the people of the surrounding districts would come in and clear the military out of the town.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that, as the general feeling of the Committee appeared to be against the Amendment, he should be glad to ask leave to withdraw it. In doing so, he wished to thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) for the very valuable book he had laid on the Table. He was also glad that the Amendment had afforded the right hon. and learned Gentleman an opportunity of justifying the retention of his Office.

Mr. CALLAN said, the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage), in the course of some observations which perhaps were not quite pertinent to the question before the Committee, made a sneering allusion to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Judge Advocate General for having written a book. The greatest enemy of the hon. Member, however, would never be able to accuse him of having written or even revised a book. He (Mr. Callan) rose on this occasion to bring before the Judge Advocate General a point concerning Military Law. He did not desire to bring it before the right hon. and learned Gentleman because he had written a book, but because he had a greater acquaintance with Military Law than the ordinary run of Judge Advocate Generals. He wished to put a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman concerning a proceeding that had lately taken place in Ireland—a proceeding connected with the embarkation at Kingstown for Suakin of the Royal Irish Lancers. Some months ago the portion of the regiment told off for foreign service left the Royal Barracks at an early hour of the morning under the command of Colonel Chichester. The senior colonel, Colonel Vandeleur, saw them leave the barracks, but remained in charge of the dépôt and of that portion of the regiment under orders to proceed to Dundalk. Now, the 5th Lancers arrived at what was called the jetty at Kingstown a few hours afterwards; but the steamer which was ordered for their embarkation was not ready to receive them, the consequence being that when the time for leaving arrived 20 or 30 of the men failed to appear. The jetty belonged to the town—the people had every right to it; indeed, no military order could exclude them from it. The troops remained there for some hours, and in course of time a large number of persons assembled to see them leave. He believed there was considerable confusion; but he was informed not more than always attended the embarkation of troops—not more, for instance, than occurred when the Guards were embarked on the Thames. When the facts became known, Colonel Chichester was recalled from the Soudan. He (Mr. Callan), however, was not at all concerned with Colonel Chichester. Colonel Chichester was in command of the troops; he was an Englishman, and he (Mr. Callan) would leave it to other people to take up the cudgels in that officer's defence. But Colonel Vandeleur was an Irishman; he belonged to one of the oldest families in Ireland—a family which had given heroes to the English Army. He was a near relative to one occupying an honoured position in the House of Commons. Colonel Vandeleur was the senior colonel of the regiment, and he handed over his command in obedience to the orders of the War Office—he handed over his command to Colonel Chichester at the Royal Barracks. In the course of the afternoon, Colonel Vandeleur, as was very natural, went to Kingstown to bid farewell to those who had for so many years been under his command; he went out unofficially and without any responsibility; he went to Kingstown, simply out of feelings of kindness and as a mark of old friendship, to see his brother officers away. And he believed that for the same reason Lord Clarina, who was in command of the Dublin district, also went to Kingstown. Well, Colonel Vandeleur had been suspended. Colonel Vandeleur, who relinquished his command, or rather the command of the troops taken from him, that morning, had been suspended on account of what happened at Kingstown, while Lord Clarina went unscathed. If Colonel Vandeleur, who was not in command, who had no responsibility whatever attaching to him, was to be suspended, or have his conduct inquired into, because of the confusion which occurred in the embarkation at Kingstown, surely Lord Clarina, who was in command of the district at the time, who had relinquished none of his authority, should be similarly treated. It occurred to him (Mr. Callan) that Lord Clarina was much more censurable than Colonel Vandeleur. It was alleged that the War Office had suspended Colonel Vandeleur from motives which were anything but creditable. Whether that was so or not, the treatment dealt out to this gallant officer was not such as ought to be dealt out to a British officer, or a British gentleman. He was sorry the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General had left the House. He had paid the right hon. and learned Gentleman a compliment, hoping to enlist his sympathies; he supposed that the Judge Advocate General took the compliment, and had now gone to take his dinner. Perhaps the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) would give him the information he desired. He wished to know how it came to pass that Colonel Vandeleur, who handed over his command at the Royal Barracks early in the morning, who might have remained in Dublin, and who by mere accident went down to Kingstown, was to have his conduct inquired into, while the commander of the Dublin district was to escape unscathed? The whole of the difficulty—that was to say, the negligence which led to the occurrence to which he was referring, arose in the Quartermaster General's Department. He wished to know whether it was not the duty of the Quartermaster General's Department, when the steamer was alongside the jetty in Kingstown Harbour, to have had it ready for the troops, when they arrived at the appointed hour? If the steamer had been ready the troops could have been put on board; they would not have been subjected to temptation, and these irregularities would not have occurred. Was it not the duty of the Quartermaster General's Department to have the ship ready for the reception of the troops at the hour appointed; and when an officer handed over his regiment, or a portion of it, for foreign service to an officer named by the War Office, to command it, did not his responsibility cease, and did not the fact of his being present accidentally, when irregularities took place amongst the men, relieve him from all blame? He would call the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General to the exact rules respecting the embarkation of troops, and ask whether the fault did not lie with the Quartermaster General's Department?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am sorry I was not here when the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Callan) commenced his observations; but to so much of them as I did hear I am able to say a few words in reply. It is true, as the hon. Member has stated, that a Court of Inquiry has been held for the purpose of reporting on the circumstances of the embarkation of two squadrons of the 5th Lancers for Kingstown some weeks ago. That Court has concluded its inquiry; but the decision of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief has not been promulgated; and, therefore, it is impossible for me at present to state what that decision is, and it is also impossible for me to enter into the argument of the hon. Gentleman. I desire, however, to controvert two or three statements made by the hon. Member. I understood him to say that Colonel Vandeleur, having handed over the detachment to Colonel Chichester, could not be held responsible for what took place afterwards. But, in the first place, Colonel Vandeleur was responsible for the state in which that detachment was handed over to Colonel Chichester; and so long as any part of that regiment was within his reach, and under his cognizance, he, as its commanding officer, could not absolve himself from responsibility. Colonel Vandeleur thought it necessary, or part of his duty—and I do not suppose that any hon. Member will be surprised at it—to go down to Kingstown to see the embarkation of the detachment, though not in command of it. He was in uniform, and was present during the irregularities, which took place within his knowledge, and for any orders which were given or not given Colonel Vandeleur could not possibly be held as not responsible. The doctrine of the hon. Member is one which no military officer in the House, or outside it, will countenance—namely, that a commanding officer can, under any possible circumstances, be held as not responsible for what takes place under his very eye. The hon. Member asks whether the Quartermaster General's Department is not responsible for the arrangements of embarkation? The hon. Member is quite correct in supposing that that Department would be responsible for these arrangements, and I cannot say whether the irregularities that occurred were caused or exaggerated by the difficulties of embarkation. But, even if there were such difficulties, they cannot excuse the unsoldierlike conduct of the detachment on the occasion, or do away with the responsibility of the commanding officer. It is impossible, until the decision of the Commander-in-Chief is promulgated—which I believe will be in a few days—to add anything further on the subject. All I can do now is to protest against the doctrine that Colonel Vandeleur, in handing over the command to a subordinate officer, can be held to be not responsible for what took place under his cognizance. If any further information is required, I shall be very happy to give it to the hon. Member.

MR. CALLAN said, he would take advantage of the invitation of the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess had said that Colonel Vandeleur was responsible for all orders given or not given on the day of the embarkation; and the noble Marquess, he was sorry to say, had mentioned in a tone of aggravation or justification that Colonel Vandeleur, when the irregularities took place, was in uniform—which would lead the public to suppose that he attended the embarkation officially and in the performance of his duty. He (Mr. Callan) wished to ask if it was not a fact that Colonel Vandeleur—whether in uniform or not—was not under any obligation to proceed to Kingstown? Colonel Chichester took the troops over in Dublin, and it was for him to take charge of the embarkation; and if Colonel Vandeleur was held responsible for any irregularities, as being the senior, why was it that Colonel Vandeleur's senior, Lord Clarina, the General commanding the district, was not held responsible? If Colonel Vandeleur was to be held responsible for orders given and orders not given at Kingstown, because he was the Colonel commanding, was Lord Clarina, the General commanding, not even more responsible—was he to go scatheless?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The General commanding would be held responsible for the failure of any arrangement he made. What I have said is this—that no orders to any other officer could absolve the commanding officer of a regiment from responsibility for the good conduct of that regiment where he was in its presence.

MR. CALLAN said, that, with all respect to the noble Marquess, what he wished to know was whether Colonel Vandeleur, having handed over command of the men to Colonel Chichester, was under any obligation to be present at the embarkation at Kingstown; and, next, if there was any failure of the arrangements—and no one would deny that there was a failure—and it was the fault of the Quartermaster General's Department, whether the General commanding the district was not to be held responsible? There had been no demand made for any explanation from Lord Clarina, though, by the Queen's Regulations, he might be held responsible for any irregularities which might happen in his district. For what more could he be held responsible than the conduct of his troops during an embarkation for foreign service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON. I am sorry I did not answer the hon. Member's question. Colonel Vandeleur was under no obligation to go down to see the men off, and I do not say that he would have committed an offence for which he could have been censured or tried by court martial if he had not gone down to see the embarkation. But there are many circumstances in connection with the management of troops which must be decided by the superior officer present. Colonel Vandeleur was not compelled to be present at the embarkation; but, being present, he could not absolve himself from responsibility. As for the Quartermaster General's Department, there was an inquiry, and it was shown that the arrangements made for the embarkation were perfectly well known. Many statements were made by the men as to what took place on the march, and so on.

MR. SMALL said, he had heard no answer given from the Treasury Bench to the complaint made by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), as to the conduct of the Royal Irish Rifles and the men of the Devonshire Regiment at Downpatrick the other day. He (Mr. Small) trusted the Treasury Bench would consider the serious character of the hon. Gentleman's complaint, and the very serious consequences which would ensue if that complaint was not attended to. He (Mr. Small) possessed knowledge in the matter that his hon. Friend had not had. Party feeling ran very high in the town of Downpatrick, and the result was that matters of a Party character sometimes caused breaches of the peace there. He held in his hand a report taken from The Belfast Morning News of the 2nd of May, which gave a circumstantial account of what occurred. This report said—

“Last night, shortly after 8 o'clock, a number of the recruits of the 5th Battalion Royal Irish Rifles, at present undergoing their annual training in this town, accompanied by a few privates of the Devonshire Regiment, a detachment of which is stationed here for the purpose of guard duty at the new convict prison, conducted themselves in a most disorderly manner, parading part of the town, shouting, yelling, and making use of Party expressions. On their way through John Street several windows were smashed, and the occupants put in terror of their lives. On arriving at the lower end of Stream Street a halt was made, and, as if by pre-arrangement, a most deliberate and cowardly attack was made on the public-house of Mr. John Gilmore. On entering the premises, with belts in their hands, the rioters commenced a fearful onslaught on the customers, some of whom were severely assaulted. The waiters of the establishment were overpowered, and one of them, a man named Nelson, was knocked down and trampled upon. On a shout of “police” being raised, a stampede was made for the outside, the rioters smashing more large panes of glass in the front of Mr. Gilmore's premises on their way. Word having been sent to the barracks, a large force of police were afterwards on the scene; but, before their arrival, no trace of the rioters was to be seen.”

It was evident, therefore, that however gallant these warriors might have been, there was, at any rate, something of prudence left in them; because, directly the cry of “police” was raised, they made off. None of them were caught or discovered. It would be an easy matter, however, for the commanding officer of the military in Downpatrick to ascertain which of the men were in that part of the town in which the disturbance occurred that night. He could scarcely imagine that the Military Authorities would fail to recognize the importance of this matter; because it would be most deplorable if a chronic state of ill-feeling were to arise between the military and the inhabitants of Downpatrick. Downpatrick was a peaceable town; but he thought there could be little doubt that it would not remain so long, unless punishment were meted out to the men guilty of the outrage, and unless they were removed to some other place where they would, perhaps, conduct themselves better. He understood it was alleged that no complaint had been made by any person as to the conduct of the military on the occasion to which he referred; but he held in his hand a copy of a letter from the Rev. Robert Headley, in which he said—

“Unless the existing arrangements are immediately changed, by which 190 men are scattered through the town at night, I have grave reason to apprehend that serious rioting will be the consequence. A strong feeling of just indignation prevails in the district through which these men passed, which is bound to manifest itself in retaliation, unless a collision is prevented by your men being placed under restraint.”

It had been alleged that there was not proper accommodation for the men in the town, and that it had been necessary to billet them by twos and threes in the houses of Catholics; but, as a matter of fact, Downpatrick was a declining place, containing a great many empty houses, and it would have been easy for the Military Authorities to have got accommodation for their men in those buildings. Their men, so situated, could be kept under better control than when scattered in twos and threes in the town. He considered it highly unsatisfactory that no reply had been given to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) by any occupant of the Treasury Bench. After the hon. Member had brought this matter forward, another case had been mentioned by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), and an answer had been vouchsafed to that hon. Member, although as yet the hon. Member for Sligo had received no reply. He hoped that this silence on the part of the Treasury Bench, to whatever it was due, would not be persevered in. He trusted to hear from the noble Marquess, or from some other Member of the Government, that this regiment would be removed from Downpatrick.

MR. BRAND said, that it was through no intentional discourtesy to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that he had not answered him before. As a matter of fact, he had been about to answer the hon. Member when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth rose to address the Committee. As to the billeting of this regiment, inquiries had been made of the General Officer commanding the district. He had been asked whether the statement made in the question addressed to the Government on this subject was in his knowledge correct; and he had replied that, in the first place, there was not a sufficient number of unoccupied houses in the town in which to billet the men; and, secondly, that the men had been billeted in the usual way. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Small) had said that Protestant soldiers were billeted in the houses of Roman Catholics; and his (Mr. Brand's) reply to that was that they were billeted in the usual way. He could not imagine for a moment that any selection of Catholic houses for Protestant soldiers had been made; and he could only hope that religious feeling did not run so high in the town that a Catholic would refuse shelter to a man simply because he was a Protestant. [MR. SEXTON: I made no point of that.] He had stated the other day that the men would be properly encamped on the 1st of May; and he had not understood from the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Small) that that was not the case. At any rate, he (Mr. Brand) had been given to understand by the Military Authorities that the men would be encamped on the 1st of May. It had been said that the clergy had made a complaint to the Military Authorities as to the way in which the men had been billeted; but no such complaint had reached the Military Authorities.

MR. SEXTON said, the rev. gentleman referred to had made a complaint to the Military Authorities in the first instance, and that not only were his suggestions unattended to, but the Military Authorities did not even vouchsafe him a reply.

MR. BRAND said, he would undertake to have the matter inquired into. Then the hon. Gentleman referred to a riot which had taken place on Thursday in last week. He had said that a certain number of men belonging to a battalion stationed in Downpatrick had marched through the town in a disorderly manner, breaking the windows of the houses of the Roman Catholic inhabitants. These were very serious charges, and he had no hesitation in saying that if they were true the proceedings could only be described as disgraceful. Inquiries, however, would have to be made before the statements which had been put forward in regard to the conduct of these soldiers could be absolutely accepted. He could say that within the past few hours some information had reached a branch of the War Office with regard to these proceedings, and that inquiry was to be made of the General Officer commanding the district. Of course, if it could be shown that this disturbance had taken place, and if the General Officer commanding the district could ascertain the men who were guilty of taking part in it, the authorities would do everything in their power to bring them to punishment.

MR. SEXTON said, that if the allegations he had made to-night were found on inquiry to be correct, he would ask that these men should be sent to some other part of the country; because, even if they were left in encampment in the neighbourhood of the town, their presence must be a source of irritation to those people who had had their windows broken and their houses injured by them. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brand) had said that no complaints had been made by the clergy of the district. Here was a letter written by the Rev. Robert Headley—“ Downpatrick, May 1st, 1885.

“ Parochial House,

“ Sir,—A large number of your men—40, I believe—were guilty of riotous conduct last night. They marched in a body through a district of the town, and wrecked a number of houses on their way. The houses upon which these cowardly assaults were made are occupied by Catholics, and it seems they were specially pointed out for attack by two civilians belonging to the town, who accompanied the Militia. I respectfully ask, have you taken steps to have the offenders duly punished, and also to preserve the peace to-night and the following nights? Unless the existing arrangements are immediately changed, by which 190 men are scattered through the town at night, I have grave reason to apprehend that serious rioting will be the consequence. A strong feeling of just indignation prevails in the district through which these men passed, which is bound to manifest itself in retaliation unless a collision is prevented by your men being placed under restraint.—I am, your obedient servant, “ Robert Headley.

“ Major Stewart,

“ 5th Battalion Royal Irish Rifles,

“ Downpatrick.”

He (Mr. Sexton) trusted that notice having been taken of this matter in the presence of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, it would have the double effect of getting these men removed from Downpatrick, where they were a danger to the place, and of bringing about an application of the Civil Law to those guilty of disorder.

MR. SMALL said, he understood from the hon. Gentleman the Survoyor General of the Ordnance (Mr. Brand) that an inquiry would be at once instituted into the alleged outrages. He wished to ask what kind of inquiry would be held? Would it be a purely military inquiry, made in private, or would it be a public inquiry held by civilians? If it was to be a military inquiry sitting with closed doors, he thought it would be of very little use.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the usual inquiry as to what had taken place would be made by the commanding officer, who was responsible for the conduct of his battalion. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Small) would see that the question was not purely a military one, and the War Office had no power to hold any inquiry except a military inquiry. In any matter which arose which ought to come before the Civil Authorities, it would not be necessary for the War Office to have a military inquiry; but he apprehended that there would be an investigation conducted before the magistrates.

MR. SEXTON said, that on the Report of the Vote he should expect to find that this officer had been taken away from the district. He hoped that the War Office would facilitate the holding of a civil inquiry, so that the compensation to be awarded to the people of Downpatrick for their broken windows might be awarded.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could not promise that.

MR. SEXTON said, that all the facts had been published in the newspapers, and they were of such a character that it was necessary the regiment should be taken away from the town.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that in justice to the regiment he could not undertake to state what steps would be taken.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought that an inquiry might be made into the conduct of the officer in command, in order to ascertain whether he had misconducted himself. He certainly trusted that the inquiry would be extended not only to the alleged riotous conduct of the men, but also into the conduct of Major Stewart, the commanding officer, who, having received a courteous letter complaining of the conduct of the men, and asking for assistance from the officers, had contemptuously ignored it.

and had not had the courtesy to forward a reply. He (Mr. Callan) wished to know whether, in the opinion of the Secretary of State for War, that was proper conduct on the part of an officer in Her Majesty's Service; and whether the matter was not one which ought to be made the subject of a special inquiry?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was impossible for him to say whether Major Stewart might not have some explanation to offer in regard to the course he had pursued. He could not pretend to judge Major Stewart upon a mere ex parte statement.

MR. CALLAN said, he could not understand why Major Stewart had not answered the courteous and proper letter he had received. No ingenuity on the part of the Secretary of State for War would justify such conduct, and he must say that if the men were riotous the officers were ungentlemanly; and, under such circumstances, orderly and proper conduct on the part of the men could hardly be expected. It was another verification of the old adage—"Like officer like man."

SIR FREDERICK FITZ-WYGRAM said, that at Aldershot and the Curragh there were great complaints on the part of the men of the arduous nature of the camp fatigue duties and the onerous burdens thrown upon their shoulders. He believed there were something like 200 military prisoners at Aldershot; and he would ask whether it would not be right and fair, in order to lighten the burdens of well-conducted men, to employ these 200 prisoners in camp work?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he thought there was a great deal in the appeal which had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram); and he hoped that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War would cause some inquiry to be made, in order to see whether some arrangement might not be carried out in the direction of the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, so that these prisoners might be utilized in the performance of the general camp fatigue duties. Such an arrangement, he was satisfied, would relieve the men generally from the hard duties they had now to perform. He had not risen, however, for the sole purpose of supporting the appeal of his hon. and gallant Friend;

but he wished to make an appeal on his own account to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General to give him some information as to whether he had satisfied himself of the position in which the Army stood as regarded the employment of Colonial troops in the field, acting in conjunction with our own Regular Forces? He believed there had been some doubt as to what their position was, and as to what their status would be from a military point of view when they came to be under Military Law. He believed it to be the fact that the Military Law was not the same in all of the Colonies, though the Colonies had their own Military Law. With regard to the men now serving in the Soudan, he believed that though they were under their own Colonial law, that law, except in one particular, was the same as the Military Law of the Regular Forces with which they were serving. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had been good enough to say that he would look into the question. It was evident that it was not quite so simple a matter as it was at first supposed to be; but that it would require careful consideration. He would not press for any long statement, or, indeed, for any definite statement now; but he wanted to be sure that the question had not escaped the attention of the Government, because it was one which might become of considerable importance at any moment. There was another point which he also wished to mention. He believed there had been some desire expressed that a Return should be given, as in former years, in regard to the discipline of the Army. The matter had already been the subject of conversation in the House. He did not attach extravagant value to such a Return; but, nevertheless, he thought it would be important in enabling the Committee to make a comparison between the state of the Army now and at former periods. At one time attention was devoted to this matter; but, for some reason or other, the publication of the Return had been discontinued since the time he had had the honour to hold the Office of Secretary of State for War. If the Return could be given without disadvantage to the Public Service, he thought the details would be of considerable value. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General would be able to make a statement on the subject.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he would answer the question of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman as far as he was able. He believed that the Colonial Forces now serving with Her Majesty's troops were placed under English Military Law, except in regard to certain matters. They were, for example, not to be subjected to corporal punishment; but that exception was of no consequence now. In the case of some of the Colonies, it was also provided that the men should not be tried by any court martial except one composed of their own officers. It seemed to him of great importance that troops serving under the same flag should be subjected to the same discipline and law; and therefore, in regard to the New South Wales troops, he had suggested that a short Act should be passed to place the men unconditionally under Imperial Military Law. [Colonel STANLEY: A Colonial Act.] Of course, it would be a Colonial Act, and it would place the men under our Military Law. He believed that the suggestion would be accepted by the Colonial Governments, and it was a matter which at present was under consideration. With regard to the suggestion which had been made by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) that prisoners should be employed in the discharge of camp duties, he thought it was one that was deserving of careful consideration hereafter, and he was much obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman for having called attention to the subject. He believed that there had been one or two small misapprehensions on the part of the Committee in regard to the statement he had made; but he would only say one thing in reference to the distinction between the Army and the Navy. No doubt, the Navy stood on an entirely different footing from the Army. In the case of the Navy all the proceedings of courts martial came under the supervision of the Board of Admiralty, to which the powers of the Crown were delegated; but in the case of the Army it was essential that there should be a separate Minister who should be responsible for these matters, and he believed that it was better to have an officer with a seat in the House of Commons, rather than to have a permanent official. He begged to thank the hon. and gallant Member opposite (General Alexander) for the manner in which he had spoken of him. He would again remind the hon. and gallant Member that Military Law was administered by the Queen herself, and that there must be some Minister in the House responsible for the action of Her Majesty. It would, therefore, be seen that, as a matter of fact, there was a wide difference between the administration of law in the Army and in the Navy.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that a very important question indeed had been raised by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), who had brought before the Committee the conduct of the Militia in the North of Ireland, and who had described the troops as acting in a very undisciplined and offensive manner. The remarks of his hon. Friend raised the whole question of billeting. There was no doubt that the billeting of English troops in Catholic districts in Ireland was a very great evil indeed; and he had himself heard many complaints, both from clergymen and from others occupying a position of authority, in regard to this question of billeting. In the South of Ireland, he believed, there was no objection entertained to the billeting of Militia regiments. On the contrary, he knew that in some districts in the South of Ireland the people of the towns where the regiments were assembled were very glad indeed to get what money was to be procured for the housing of soldiers for whom there was no room in the barracks. But the men so billeted were of the same religion and of the same habits as the people with whom they lodged, and, consequently, no disorder or evil arose from the billeting of Militia regiments in the towns of the South of Ireland; but the billeting of English troops fresh from England in the houses of Catholic people, who might entertain Nationalist opinions, was a very great evil indeed. He himself remembered, not very many years ago, a striking incidence of this evil which occurred in the town of New Ross, in the county of Wexford, and which was at the time referred to by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. J. Redmond), who brought the matter under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers), who was then Secretary of State for War. It was almost a similar instance of disorderly conduct to that which had been related by the hon. Member for Sligo that night. The troops stationed in New Ross got a little drink in the course of the evening, and, not being located in the barracks at the time, they behaved in the most grossly insulting manner to the people. They went round the town shouting—"To Hell with the Pope," and, meeting respectable people coming from church, several of these drunken soldiers ridiculed, in a highly offensive and sacrilegious manner, the observance of the rites of the Catholic Church. One man, outside the gates of a Catholic chapel, pretended to be a priest; and he and his drunken comrades mocked, as far as they could, the sacrament of penance as administered in the Catholic Church. He (Mr. W. Redmond) simply mentioned this circumstance to show that the story told by the hon. Member for Sligo in regard to the billeting of English Protestant troops indiscriminately in Catholic districts was not a solitary instance. Nor did the story told by his hon. Friend, and the one he had just narrated as having happened in the county of Wexford, stand by themselves, because he could enumerate at least a dozen instances in which similar riots had occurred in consequence of the action of the troops. What he would like to have from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General—and he was perfectly sincere in making this appeal, having received representations from a great many priests and other persons as to the evils which arose from the quartering of Protestant troops upon the Catholic population of Ireland—was an undertaking that, as far as possible, troops, especially when they were fresh from England, and unaccustomed to the habits of the people of Ireland, should not be billeted out in Catholic towns upon Catholic people. Of course, the barracks in many of the garrison towns of Ireland were extremely small, and were not capable of affording the necessary accommodation for the large number of troops Her Majesty's Government now considered it necessary to maintain in Ireland; but if the barracks were not large enough there was hardly a garrison town in Ireland where it would not be possible to obtain some unoccupied building, which might be used as a substitute for barracks. A great deal of the evil and mischief arose from the indiscriminate billeting of English Protestant soldiers upon a Catholic population. He knew of instances in the South of Ireland where the greatest possible trouble had been occasioned owing to the abuse of the present system of billeting. Soldiers had been lodged in houses where there was a lack of accommodation; and in more than one case, when they had procured more drink than was good for them, they had grossly outraged the feelings of the people on whom they were billeted. He could mention several cases where acts of impropriety had taken place between these drunken soldiers and the people of the houses in which they had been billeted. He could assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General that he was not drawing upon his imagination, but that he was simply narrating the representations which had been made to him. He believed it would give a great deal of satisfaction indeed to the people of Ireland, and especially to the clergy of that country who had charge of the morals of the people, if the Judge Advocate General would be good enough to say that in any case where it was at all possible a Protestant soldier should not be billeted in Ireland upon a family which professed a different religious creed, but that unoccupied buildings should be made available for the purpose of barracks.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the question of billeting was one which hardly arose on the question of the administration of Military Law. It would more properly be raised on a subsequent Vote; but he might remark that it was extremely unusual to billet troops at all. They were placed in barracks wherever it was possible; but when it was found necessary to resort to billeting, the allocation of the billets was not a matter which was left to the Military Authorities. The Quartermaster General had to make the arrangements with the Civil Authorities. He did not think it would be desirable to draw such distinctions as the hon. Member desired between Catholics and Protestants. He would, however, make inquiries into the matter, and see whether it was desirable to make any different arrangement.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he was obliged to the noble Marquess for his reply. He had not intended to raise the question of billeting upon that Vote; but after the attention which had been directed to certain proceedings in the North of Ireland by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) he thought that he was in Order in calling attention to this matter. In regard to drawing a distinction between Catholic and Protestant, he had no desire, personally, to do so; and he would point out to the noble Marquess that it was neither himself nor any other Member of the House who had drawn the distinction, but the soldiers themselves, who went about crying out "To Hell with the Pope."

MR. BIGGAR said, he could assure the noble Marquess that this question of billeting was one which gave rise to very general complaint. He had himself heard complaints of the same kind from the county of Cavan.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member had better defer any remarks upon the question of billeting until the Vote to which that subject relates is reached. I should have stopped the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. William Redmond), if I had not thought that he was going to connect his observations with the proceedings at Downpatrick. There is a Vote to be taken later on upon which this question can be more conveniently and appropriately raised.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had only wished to corroborate the statement made by his hon. Friend. As to the administration of Military Law, he agreed with the remarks which had been made by his hon. Friends. At Mallow, on a recent occasion, a military officer, who had been in charge of certain troops there, was allowed to give evidence in favour of Mr. Carr, an Inspector of Police, when, in point of fact, the military officer in question was himself open to the same charge as Inspector Carr. He thought that such a proceeding was highly irregular, and that it ought to have been avoided. In regard to the question which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (General Alexander), as to the Office of Judge Advocate General, he had listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Osborne Morgan) in defence of that Office; and he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been placed in an unfortunate and somewhat unfair position in being required to defend the Office at all. He thought that some of his Colleagues upon the Treasury Bench ought to have defended the Office for him, and that it was not reasonable to ask a Gentleman whose Office was attacked to defend himself. Some of the permanent officials of the Office could have supplied notes to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, or some other military official, so that the personal question might not have been allowed to intervene. He thought if the right hon. and learned Gentleman was right in his contention, he had really proved too much, because the personal experience of hon. Members was that they saw the Judge Advocate General about the House from 4 o'clock every afternoon until 1 or 2 in the morning; and it was perfectly impossible, if he had serious duties to perform in connection with a judicial Office, that those duties could be properly discharged. His own opinion was that there were too many political officials in the House. It was notorious that all the work of the Public Offices was done by the permanent officials. At the present moment, there were four military Representatives in the House, which he (Mr. Biggar) thought, at least, two too many. The War Office ought to be satisfied with two Parliamentary Representatives, who should be able to defend the action of those permanent officials who, from many points of view, were much preferable to political Representatives in the House of Commons. If a lawyer were permanently employed in the War Office to supervise the legal part of the business, he would, as a matter of course, be a thoroughly competent and efficient official, well versed in all matters connected with Military Law, and his services would be of value to the country. But if they were to have a Judge Advocate General, who was to be a political supporter of the Government, occupying the greater part of his time in the House, and selected, not because he was efficient in Military Law, but because he was a more or less important political Member of Parliament, it seemed to him that such a Minister had all his business to learn after he went into the Office, and that he was by no means as well qualified to discharge the duties as a permanent official would be. Upon this matter the distinction between the Army and the Navy was very great, although the difference between the nature of the cases that were dealt with in the two branches of the Service was purely of a technical character. The hon. and gallant Member (General Alexander) had complained of the decisions that were sometimes given in Admiralty cases; but he (Mr. Biggar) believed that the decisions given by the Admiralty were much more satisfactory to the sailors than the decisions given in the Army were to the soldiers. His own opinion was that these matters were much better managed in the Navy than in the Army. Whatever might be said as to the importance of the Office of Judge Advocate General, the fact still remained that the country paid a substantial salary to a political Gentleman, who spent three-fourths of his time, not in the performance of the duties of his Office, but in waiting in the House of Commons to give a Party vote. The official duties discharged by the Judge Advocate General in the House of Commons consisted in his attendance for a few hours while the Army Votes were being passed, and while the Army (Annual) Bill was under consideration. He did not think that that was a business-like way of managing any Office connected with a great Public Department, and the sooner the whole matter was revised the better and the more easily would the work be done. Any difficult question arising out of the business of the Office would be much better attended to by a permanent official at the War Office than by a political Representative in the House of Commons, who was usually supplied with written answers to the Questions put to him by permanent officials connected with his Department.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that in withdrawing the Motion he wished only to say one word. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had misunderstood what he had said. What he had said was that the discussion had given the right hon. and learned Gentleman an opportunity, not of magnifying the Office, but of justifying its retention.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) £320,500, Medical Establishment and Services.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he must be allowed to express an opinion that the Medical Officers were thoroughly satisfied with the way in which the Department was worked. Dr. Crawford, the Director General, was one of the most able officers who had ever presided over it. He merely wished to point out very shortly one matter in connection with Army medical practice in Egypt and elsewhere upon which it was desirable to have an explanation. He wanted to know what was the precise connection which existed between the National Aid Society and the Army Medical Department? He did not wish to make any suggestion in derogation of the excellent work done by the Society; but he thought some of the misconception which had sprung up might be removed by an explanation as to the precise relations between the National Aid Society and the Army Medical Department. What he wanted to know was, who, in the case of a campaign like that in Egypt, was primarily responsible for the care of the sick and wounded? There was a danger that the idea might get abroad that the soldiers there were starved, and that it was necessary to supply them with necessaries and luxuries by outside aid. He thought that was a total misconception, and that not only were necessaries, but even superfluities, supplied to soldiers in the camp, in the field, and in the hospital. All their wants were carefully and liberally attended to; and what the National Aid Society did was to step in and supplement, by means of their organization, the operations of the actual Medical Departments in the field. All he wished to know was what the precise connection was that existed between the two Departments, and if one was altogether independent of the other?

LORD EUSTACE OECIL asked what provision was made for Militia surgeons in connection with Militia regiments when embodied? Were surgeons found from the Staff of the Army, or had the regiments to depend upon the assistance given by their own officers? It was rather an important question, and he hoped to receive a reply to it. He would like to have an explanation as to the reduction of £6,000 in the item relating to these officers.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he had received several letters from Militia surgeons, complaining of their grievances. At present they were not entitled to pensions, no matter what the attendance was which they gave in the discharge of their duties in connection with the Militia regiments. Now, it was a well-known fact that Militia surgeons had to give up many opportunities for private practice; and he thought it was extremely hard that those gentlemen, after lengthened periods of service, received nothing at all in the shape of pension or other compensation for the time they had devoted to the requirements of their regiments. He knew that Militia surgeons, in some parts of Ireland especially, had very severe duties to perform—that they had to do their work with very great inconvenience to themselves, and that they had to forego all chance of receiving pensions—

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER rose to Order. The hon. Member, he thought, would be more in Order if he brought forward the question of pensions on the Pension Vote.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, if the hon. Gentleman had heard him to the end of his sentence, he would have found that he was leading up to the point. These Militia surgeons did not receive any pension; no matter how long they served, they should receive a little more pay, and be entitled to a pension. In case he received a reply from the hon. Gentleman that there was no provision made for them, his intention was to produce facts, and move an additional sum for the purpose. If the hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee now whether there was any intention of meeting the grievance of Militia surgeons—because there were many of them who had that grievance and he knew of half-a-dozen cases in his own county—if the hon. Gentleman would say how the matter stood, there might be no necessity for moving an increase of the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out that it was not within the competence of hon. Members to make Motions for additions to Votes; and he doubted whether it would be in Order for the hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the War Department to reply upon the question of pensions because they were provided for in a subsequent Vote.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, the National Aid Society was doing very good work in Egypt. With regard to the first question of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson), he had no hesitation in saying that the Army Medical Department was not only primarily, but entirely responsible for the care of the sick and wounded. In saying that, he wished to add that they all recognized the generous and charitable aid rendered by the Society in the form of medical comforts and clothing for the men; and further that this was not regarded as in any way relieving the Army Medical Department of responsibility. Then the hon. Member asked him whether there would be any clash between the authority of the Army Medical Department and that of the Charitable Aid Society—that was to say, whether the Society would be responsible to the Army Medical Department? He had the authority of the Director General to say that the officers who, at the instance of the National Aid Society, went to Egypt, had received instructions in all cases to defer to the authority of the Army Medical Officer on the spot: he need hardly point out that the officers of the Society would not be allowed in the camp at all, unless they recognized the supremacy of the Military Authorities there. Therefore, in case of any question arising between the doctors of the two Services, there would be a reference to the Military Officer in command. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil) had asked him for an explanation with regard to the footnote at the bottom of page 4, relating to a decrease of £6,000 in the amount paid for Medical Officers of Militia. The decrease of £6,000 for those officers was accounted for by the fact that there had been no new appointments of surgeons to the Militia since the establishment of the Medical Department in 1877. In case a Militia regiment was sent away from its headquarters, a Medical Officer would be appointed to it by the Department.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked if the hon. Gentleman would be good enough to reply on the general question he had raised? If he would do so, it would obviate the necessity of bringing forward the question on another Vote.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, before the hon. Baronet answered that question, he would like to point out that the item for the pay of Militia Surgeons was only for £10,000, as against £16,000 in last year's Estimate, and £20,000 in the year before. This continuous diminution of the amount of the Vote from £20,000 to £10,000 for the present year, was very remarkable. They were only asked for one-third of what was voted the year before last, and as such an alteration suggested an entire change of the system which had until recently existed with regard to Militia Surgeons, he asked the hon. Baronet whether it was proposed to abolish those officers altogether and get their work done by other persons, or whether the extraordinary diminution of the amount of the Vote was merely accidental? As the matter appeared on the face of the Estimates, it was impossible for the Committee without further information to avoid the conclusion that it was the intention of the War Office Authorities to get rid of Militia Surgeons. Then with regard to the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) as to the position of Militia Surgeons, he considered that subject to be very pertinent to the present Vote; and he asked the hon. Baronet if he would explain fully the present system, and indicate such alterations as the War Office Authorities might choose to make in it?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, he had already answered the question of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), as to whether the diminution in the item for pay of Militia Surgeons was accidental, to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eustace Cecil). It was the intention of the War Office that the Militia Surgeons should cease to be appointed. They would be replaced, as he had stated before, by Regimental Surgeons, who took charge of the Militia when they were at the depôts. The decrease was not only in the number of Militia Surgeons, but also in the number of Civilian practitioners, all of whom were superseded by the officers of the Army Medical Department. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. W. Redmond) when the Pensions Vote came forward, he should be in a position to reply.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, as one who took a great interest in the Medical Department, and particularly with regard to the efficiency of subordinates, he wished to know how many lady nurses, who added so much to the efficiency of the Medical Service in the Army, had been appointed in order to carry out the recommendation of Lord Morley's Committee? He would also be glad to know the number employed in India? Having several times called attention to this on the Army Estimates, when the hon. Member in charge had not been able to give the number, he trusted that the hon. Baronet would now be in a position to take notice of his observations on the subject.

MR. LEAHY said, it was stated that small-pox was present at Manchester, and it would therefore be apparent to the Committee that the removal of troops from that city to the Curragh Camp involved some danger. He asked the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, whether he had seen a communication from a Board of Guardians remonstrating against the removal of troops from Manchester to the Curragh Camp under the circumstances? He said it would be a serious thing if troops were sent there from a place where there was infection.

MR. BRAND pointed out that this sub-head of the Vote under discussion only provided for medicine and medical comforts for the sick.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he had no information on the subject alluded to by the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Leahy). No doubt, if it were known to the Military Authorities that small-pox was present at Manchester, in a manner likely to affect the health of the troops, it would be mentioned to the Quartermaster General, and the removal would probably not take place.

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, in reply to the first question of the hon. and gallant General (Sir George Balfour), £3,000 had been added to provide 40 additional lady nurses in order to carry out the recommendation of Lord Morley's Committee. He did not think that any charge in respect of the other matter referred to by the hon. and gallant General could appear on the Estimates.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the charge used to appear on the Estimates.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £526,900, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 136,175, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, upon this important Vote he should like to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, what steps had been taken, or what steps were being taken, to fill up the Militia? On looking through the Returns, he found that the number of officers proper for the Militia was 3,754; at the last training, however, there were only 2,484 officers out, the deficiency in respect of absentees being 1,270. He also found that of non-commissioned officers and men the number voted was 132,421, while the number actually out was 95,794. Now, having regard to the aspect of affairs all over the world at the present time, and looking to the Vote of Credit which had been given to the Government, he should be particularly glad to know what steps Her Majesty's Government were going to take, or had taken, to make the Militia as efficient a Force as it ought to be? He thought that no one would deny the great advantage to the country of the Militia. Nor would anyone deny the great services they had rendered in times past, and for his own part he was quite certain that those services would be repeated on future occasions. But he was bound to say that, with all the other Services, the Militia had been badly treated, and he believed that that bad treatment had led to the present state of affairs. Whatever it might cost to put the Militia into a state of efficiency, he held that no expenditure would be too great to put the Militia as well as all the Reserve Forces into an efficient condition, particularly at the present moment. He did not wish to labour this point, because these were plain facts, and he believed that the noble Marquess would see for himself that the state of things which now existed ought not to be allowed to continue, and that he should do everything in his power to raise the Militia from its present condition. With the permission of the Committee, he would refer for one moment to an Order which he saw by The Times of that morning had been issued with respect to Militia officers. The Order stated that Militia officers were accepted to serve now in the Line, and that they were to be appointed to regiments, and to fill the vacancies now existing in the Line regiments. He was particularly desirous of ascertaining from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War what would be the status of the Militia officers in the regiments to which they were to be appointed. Was it proposed that they were to join the Line regiments temporarily only, or that they were to be permanently appointed if their services were found to be efficient? He thought the question was one which deserved serious consideration at the hands of the noble Marquess. If they were to be permanently appointed in the way he described, which he could hardly believe, he thought the noble Marquess might go a step further. There were many men which had passed an excellent examination, although, unfortunately for them, they were not amongst those who obtained the highest number of marks, and had been passed by. Now, he thought that there should be some recognition of the trouble and expense those gentlemen had incurred. It should certainly be taken into account, and he thought they might also have some chance of getting appointments at the present time. Another point that he wished to mention in connection with the Militia was the case of a very small number of Militia quartermasters. He referred to those quartermasters who had been promoted from the Line, and who had served 21 years, and had risen to be sergeant majors or to some other high grade of non-commissioned officers. There were but few of those men—they were 16 in number—who would think they would be badly treated if something were not done for them. They were men, who having served 21 years as sergeant majors or quartermaster sergeants, drew their pensions, or became entitled to them, took the appointment of quartermaster under the Royal Warrant of 1878, thereby forfeiting the pensions they had earned for their services in the ranks. Those officers were compulsorily retired at the age of 55, so that if they arrived at that age before they completed 10 years' commissioned service they were obliged to take a retiring pension of 7*s.* a-day, and were debarred from counting the rank service or drawing the pension they had earned. For those 16 men a special case should be made, so that if they attained the age of 55 before they completed 10 years' service as quartermaster, they should be allowed to remain on their appointment, so as to complete the full 10 years, and then retire on the maximum pension of £200 a-year and honorary rank. He would say no more upon the subject than that he considered it was a case deserving of serious consideration at the hands of the noble Marquess, because the persons in question were men of the highest character and with the best testimonials, several of them having seen Crimean and Indian Mutiny service as well. He knew very well promotion was wanted for men of the Line regiments; surely then they ought to take into consideration these old soldiers who had done their duty so well to their country.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL begged to endorse what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Baronet. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) had several times put a question to the noble Marquess on the subject, and he had understood from him that he was going to make an explanation on this Vote, and tell the Committee what steps he proposed to take to increase the men up to the establishment, which was 24,000 below the number voted by Parliament, and also, what was still more important, that he would tell them something about the subject his hon. and gallant Friend had touched upon—namely, the number of officers, which was still below what it ought to be. But there was another point. He was sure the Committee and the country would be of opinion that the Militia, the old Constitutional Force of the country, should be in a state of the highest efficiency; but he was bound to confess, from what he had seen in the papers and had heard from some commanding officers, that the state of the equipment of the men was far from what it should be. He had been told by the commanding officer of one of the Bedfordshire regiments, that most of the belts were rotten, the knapsacks were worn out, and that they had no pouches or water bottles. All these matters should be attended to. The Government had an opportunity now which did not fall to every Government. They were going to get a large amount of money in the shape of a Vote of Credit, and that would afford a good opportunity for putting the Militia into a thoroughly efficient condition. The complaints which were made with regard to this Force were most time honoured; they had been made time after time, year after year. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) had sat in this House a great many years, and he declared that every time the Army Estimates had been discussed the same complaints had been made. That was the case, notwithstanding that the Militia was the Force which ought to receive the very first attention, for the reason that before the Regular Army was thought of, the Militia, or what served for a Militia in old times, was the Force that the country had to depend upon in case of an invasion. That subject spoke for itself, and, therefore, there was no reason for him to enlarge upon it. If the noble Marquess would be good enough, in the explanation he was about to give them on this Vote, to tell them what conditions he was going to offer, and what he proposed to do to fill up the ranks of both the men and the officers, now that he had armed the Militia with the Martini-Henry rifle, to put the Force in an efficient state to take the field if necessary, he should be glad, and he was sure such a statement would be received by both the Committee and the country with satisfaction.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) made some observations as to the number of Militia officers; other attention was also called to this subject, and I am very glad that it has been raised, because it gives me an opportunity of stating what are the facilities and what steps we are taking to enable Militia officers to obtain commissions in the Line. That opportunity is, I believe, one of the greatest inducements to young men to enter the Militia. I gave an answer on this subject on the 28th February; and since that time there has been a considerable increase in the number of Militia officers. On the 2nd May, the actual increase in the number of Militia officers was 88, besides 32 who had obtained commissions in the Line at that time; so that the actual increase in the number of Militia officers who had entered the Line was 120. The number of vacant commissions on the 28th February in the Militia was 797, and now it is only 685. That, I think, is satisfactory, and shows the efficiency of the men, and also that the inducements to join the Militia are now better understood, and that there is a better prospect, without violent measures, of the commissions in the Militia being filled up. The hon. and gallant Member also asked me about a Circular, which I have seen, as to the service of Militia officers being accepted for duty in the Line battalions. Of course, that was owing to a mere displacement during a period of pressure—to the great and unusual call upon the services of commissioned officers. Militia officers so joining would, of course, serve in the rank which they now hold; but the hon. and gallant Member will observe that no officer would obtain permanent promotion except through the ordinary channels, and that he would have to enter as lieutenant. Well, the hon. and gallant Member also referred to certain old Militia quartermasters. He cannot expect me to follow the technical grievance he expressed to the Committee, and I must confess I am not prepared to enter into details upon this matter. I have some recollection, however, that the case has been repeatedly brought forward—I think it has been repeatedly brought forward by memorial and representation to more than one Secretary of State for War, and that it has been referred to more than once in this Committee—and though I cannot refuse to look into the matter again, I must tell the hon. and gallant Gentleman that I think the case of these officers has been minutely inquired into, and that I cannot hold out any hope of arriving at any other conclusion, substantial justice having been done to them. The noble Lord the Member for West Essex (Lord Eustace Cecil) said he expected I would make some statement on the subject of the Militia. I am not aware that I held out any prospect that I would make a statement on this subject. I have informed the Committee of what has been done as to the officers of the Militia, and as to the special measures taken for increasing the numbers under the establishment. I am not aware that it is in our power to take any special measures, except to impress upon officers commanding districts to do everything in their power to obtain Militia recruits—to impress upon the officers to make the Service as popular as it can be made. The noble Lord speaks of the deficiencies in the ranks of the Militia as of something about which complaint has to be made.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: What I said was that I had heard it mentioned year after year.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The noble Lord is aware that, under the present arrangements, the establishment of many Militia regiments are larger than the districts are able to supply. However, with all the means now at work, and which cannot be said to be in complete order yet—with these means, when they have been thoroughly tested and tried, it will be found unnecessary and inadvisable to make any alteration in the establishment. I think I cannot do more than assure the Committee that the importance of this Force is fully appreciated by the Military Authorities, and that every effort is being made to raise the Militia and keep them up to a proper state of efficiency.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: The noble Marquess has not referred to the equipments of the Militia, with regard to which I made some observations.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope on that point the noble Lord will address his observations to the Surveyor General of Ordnance.

COLONEL GUNTER said, that after the remarks of the noble Marquess and his expression of a desire to put the Militia into as good a position as possible, he (Colonel Gunter) would venture to put before him a matter which he thought it important to consider at this time. The point he wished to raise was as to the Army Reserve. Army Reserve men, as a rule, enlisted at the age of 18, and left the Army at 30. When they had done their service in the Line and Army Reserve they were dismissed altogether. Would it not be well to adopt some plan whereby these men could be brought into the Militia, where their presence would be of the greatest value? They would be of the greatest service in forming a nucleus of steady soldiers, and adding stability to the Militia regiments. Such an arrangement would be extremely valuable for this reason—and he spoke upon this point with considerable knowledge—that when a Militia regiment was called on for its Reserve men, as it was in the case of the last Russian scare, it took the best men away, at any rate the best non-commissioned officers. In most Militia regiments the commanding officers made it a point of giving their best men the option of belonging to the Militia Reserve. If they did not do so, non-commissioned officers would give up their stripes and return to the ranks rather than lose the extra bounty given to them for being in the Reserve. Sometimes the fourth of a regiment belonged to the Militia Reserve, and when that fourth was taken away the commanding officers were deprived of their oldest and ablest and best men, and most of the ablest non-commissioned officers. If the noble Marquess could see his way to induce the men of 30 years of age, when they had done with the Army Reserve, to join the Militia, by giving them a larger bounty—say, an annual extra bounty of £1 a-year—when the Militia Reserve was called out the effect would be that, instead of the Line regiments denuding the Militia of all its best men, there would be in the Militia a large number of men who had served in the ranks of the Regular Army to give stability and steadiness to the regiments. The men in the Militia Reserve were not expected to remain there after the age of 34 years; but then, on joining the Line regiment, they could be sent to any part of the world. On the other hand, if they could get back into the Militia Reserve, by a trifling increase of bounty, Linesmen who had done their service in the Line, they would be forming an excellent nucleus of steady soldiers. He ventured to bring this matter before the noble Marquess, because the last time the Militia Reserve was called out the best of his men and the best of his non-commissioned officers were taken away from him; and if his regiment had been called out and sent to the Mediterranean, he should have been unable satisfactorily to fill the places of those men. There was no means of getting at these men otherwise than by re-enlistment. He would ask the noble Marquess whether he could not see his way to increasing the bounty? Supposing £2 were given when the men came in, and an extra £1 a-year bounty whilst they served, a valuable class of men would be got into the Militia. At the present moment these men were thrown away, for after they had served about 12 years in the Line, notwithstanding they had become excellent and good soldiers, they ceased to have connection with the Army. He ventured to bring this matter under the notice of the War Office, because he believed it was a subject capable of being dealt with to the great advantage of the Army and to the country generally. There was another point upon which he ventured to touch. The noble Marquess had said he was anxious for the efficiency of the Militia, and he (Colonel Gunter) would therefore recommend that when the men came up on their enlistment, and for training in the barracks, they should be put under their own officers. At the present moment they were put with the soldiers of the Line. He knew very well the object of the arrangement at present adopted; it was to get the men who came into the Militia to go into the Line. That object was a good one, and he did not object to it; but what he asked was that the men, when they came up, should be put under their own adjutant, and in their own barrack-rooms. He wished to bring these matters under the notice of the noble Marquess, because probably they had not struck him before. He wished to recommend the plan, by which they could induce the Army Reserve men to serve in the Militia up to 45 years of age. If they could do that, they would be bestowing a great boon upon the country. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he thought, had said he was very anxious to do everything he could for the good of the Service—everything in reason. Well, if he could venture to put it before the Government in a very humble way, he would suggest a means by which they could add greatly to the satisfaction of the men. They enlisted men, and told them they were to have free rations. Well, "free rations" was known in this country now—it used not to be in the olden time—to consist of three meals—namely, breakfast, dinner, and tea. Now, a man could not have breakfast and could not have tea unless coffee and sugar or tea was supplied to him. He (Colonel Gunter) had gone into this question, and he found that if they wanted to carry out the wording of the enactment which provided for "free rations," they must not make the charge at present imposed on the men of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ a-day, but should find them breakfast, dinner, and tea without any charge. It was impossible to say that a man had "free rations," when he had to put his hand into his pocket and pay for any of these things out of his own money. It would be a source of great satisfaction to the men, if they found their breakfast, dinner, and tea supplied to them, instead of having to put their hands in their pockets to pay this $\frac{1}{2}d.$ It might be said that $\frac{1}{2}d.$ was a very small amount; still, it was a consideration with the men, and it was only right that the Government should carry out the undertaking it entered into when the men enlisted, and give them free rations. He brought these matters before the War Office because he thought it was his duty to do so.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that a few years ago the scheme of compulsory retirement on account of age was fixed for officers commanding Militia regiments, and it was found afterwards that the compulsory retirement was not applicable to officers commanding regiments of the Channel Islands Militia. He thought the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War had said he had no power whatever over this Militia, and that he had nothing whatever to do with the Channel Islands Forces, and that the ages of the commanding officers were not known. In order to test the case, he (General Alexander) had asked the noble Marquess to give him a Return of the ages of the officers commanding the Channel Islands Militia. That Return had been supplied, and he (General Alexander) now held it in his hand. He found that out of nine officers commanding regiments in the Channel Islands, three, if they had been commanding in England or Scotland, would have been disqualified by age; one of them was actually 77 years old.

Colonel Gunter

Surely that was too great an age for any officer commanding a regiment. He thought himself that the Secretary of State for War had gone too far in fixing compulsory retirement on account of age where it had been fixed in the case of the British and Irish Militia, because in that way they lost a great many officers who were still in the prime of life, and great difficulty was felt in filling their places. But he thought that whatever rule was applicable to the British Militia and the Irish Militia, it ought certainly to be applicable to the Channel Islands Militia. The object of the rule which had been adopted in the case of Great Britain and Ireland was, no doubt, to increase the efficiency of the Militia. He did not know whether or not that result was attained; and, therefore, to give an opportunity to the noble Marquess to reply to the question, and, if necessary, to raise a discussion upon the matter, he begged, as a matter of form, to move to reduce the Vote by £7,000, being the amount put down for the Channel Islands Militia.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That a sum, not exceeding £519,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Allowances of a Force of Militia, not exceeding 136,175, including 30,000 Militia Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886."—(General Alexander.)

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that in reply to the hon. and gallant Member (General Alexander), all he had to say was that the Secretary of State for War had nothing to do with this matter. It was not in the power of the Secretary of State for War to fix the limit of age of commanding officers in the Channel Islands Militia. Service in that Force was compulsory, and the age of retirement for commanding officers, and everything else connected with the Force, was regulated by the laws of the Islands, and could not be altered by the Secretary of State for War.

GENERAL ALEXANDER said, that nothing to that effect was stated last year, and the Return which he had moved for had been granted. However, he did not wish to press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that with regard to the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Gunter), the hon. and gallant Member would see that the subject had been brought forward in the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting this year. The Inspector General, in the figures he presented, showed that the number of men who had served 12 years in the Army, and had gone to the Reserves, had increased since 1883 from 893 to 1,652. He showed that the number of men whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite thought it desirable to obtain for the Militia, was increasing. The Inspector General had suggested that more liberal terms should be offered them.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £72,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886."

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he wished to draw attention to a small grievance, which he thought was of some importance in connection with this Vote; it was a small one, but it militated against the whole Force. It had reference to a Regulation of 1862. He would refer the noble Marquess to page 66 of the Regulations, to the subject of grants for compensation, and it would be seen that a yeoman was entitled to compensation if his horse was killed in the field during drill. If, however, in attending troop drill, or permanent duty, his horse happened to meet with an accident on his way to or from the field, he was entitled to no compensation. He would like to quote a case in which some hardship had been inflicted on an unfortunate farmer in consequence of this Regulation. There was a trooper belonging to a Yeomanry regiment in Lancashire going to drill in the town of Rochdale—either going to it, or coming from it, he did not know which. That trooper happened, unfortunately, to meet with a detachment of the Salvation Army with its drums, trumpets, and tambourines. The consequence was that his horse, which was perfectly accustomed to military operations, not being accustomed to the operations of the Salvation Army, reared up and fell over, breaking its back. It was killed in the streets of Rochdale. A claim was made on the War Office for the small grant of £20—an amount which, of course, did not by any means cover the value of the horse. There had been a great deal of correspondence on the subject, and the claim had eventually been refused, in consequence of the Regulation to which he had referred. Well, he ventured to think that the Regulations pressed very hardly on the yeomen. He could quote another case which was brought under his notice in connection with a regiment of Yeomanry with which he had been for some time connected, and in which he himself had served. In this case, a horse was attacked with pneumonia during permanent duty, and died a day or two after. No compensation was given by the Government, and in the result compensation had to come out of the troop officer's pocket. He had to pay £20, or whatever the sum was, the value of the horse, otherwise it would have been impossible for him to have kept his troop together. It might be said that the alteration of these Regulations might lead to abuse; but he believed it would be very easy to adopt safeguards to prevent the Regulations being abused, and to provide only for accidents to horses going to or coming from the field, as well as those engaged in field operations. Claims of this kind should be certified by the commanding officer or adjutant, or, if necessary, by the General Officer commanding the district. This was a small grievance, but it was one of the small grievances which conduced to the inefficiency rather than the efficiency of the Force. He commended it to the consideration of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington).

MR. RYLANDS said, that he had almost allowed the Chairman to put the Question before rising, because he was waiting for the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berkshire (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) to rise. He fully expected the hon. and gallant Gentleman to express some opinion upon this Vote. He believed he was correct in saying that the hon. and gallant Gentleman, who was an acknowledged authority upon questions of this kind, was not prepared to justify the present administration of this Vote, and he should have been very glad indeed if the hon.

and gallant Gentleman had given the Committee the benefit—he hoped he would still give them the benefit—of his experience. He (Mr. Rylands) recollected perfectly well that for a great many years past this Vote had been received with a considerable amount of objection and criticism on the part of hon. Members. He recollected reading, before he was a Member of the House, the admirable speeches of the late Mr. Henry Berkeley, in which that gentleman ridiculed the various branches of the Yeomanry Service in different parts of the Kingdom, and in which he showed the Committee that the Yeomanry was an altogether absurd and inefficient Force. Of course, he (Mr. Rylands) could not speak with the authority of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay); but he could say that, in regard to the corps with which he was personally acquainted, and of which, in his early years, he was in the habit of seeing something—he meant the Cheshire Yeomanry, or, as they were popularly called, the “Cheshire Cabbage Cutters”—there was a general impression that that corps would not prove very efficient unless it was in cutting down cabbages. His objection to the Yeomanry Force was that it was altogether a sham Force. If there was any necessity to make any demand upon the Reserve Forces of the country, the Yeomanry Force would be found absolutely useless for fighting purposes. He did not doubt for a moment that some of the yeomen with their horses could limber up waggons, and do work of that kind; but that could be done without keeping up an establishment of this kind. If ever they were, unfortunately, in a position to require assistance in the Commissariat Department, there would be no difficulty whatever in getting the number of waggons and horses wanted. Military men, and, in fact, the Inspecting Officer of Yeomanry himself, were distinctly of opinion that the Yeomanry in its present state was an unsatisfactory and inefficient Force. It did seem to him (Mr. Rylands), that at a time when they were called upon to pay large sums of money for the Military Services of the Crown, it was most ill-advised that they should persist in voting, year after year, a sum of £60,000 or £70,000 for a Force which was condemned by the very highest authorities. He did not grudge the Vote which was given to the Volunteers; he thought that, probably, in some respects that Vote might with propriety be increased. The Volunteers formed a Force of the most valuable description, and the money given to them was money well laid out. Not so with the Yeomanry; they were not worth the money the country spent upon them, and therefore he should certainly say “No” when the Vote was put.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE said, that this Vote did not concern Ireland either directly or indirectly; indeed, it was very unjust that Ireland should have to pay even the smallest fraction of this Vote, or of any Vote for Volunteers, when it was not allowed to have Volunteer corps. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) that £70,000 was a most extravagant sum to give to a Force like the Yeomanry, which did not even supply recruits to the Regular Cavalry. The country ought not to be called upon to supply the money, especially when they were required to meet large bills for military operations in all parts of the world, which up to this had not been very successful.

SIR FREDERICK FITZ-WYGRAM said, the Reports of late years with regard to the Yeomanry regiments had been very favourable. There were, as the Committee were aware, two Inspecting Generals of Auxiliary Forces. All the Reports of these officers passed through his hands during his late period of office, and he found that the Reports made with regard to the Yeomanry were to the effect that that Force of late years had improved, and that they were still improving. That improvement was due to the establishment of a School for Auxiliary Cavalry at Aldershot; and up to 1882 that School was a great success. The Commandantship of the School was, up to that year, a five years' appointment. In 1882, for certain reasons, he believed connected with economy, it was decided to make it an annual appointment, and to give £100 to a captain who would take the place for a year. It was impossible that the School could be a success when the Commandant was changed every year. He believed that the appointment of a Commandant for five years was absolutely necessary for the success of the School. As a matter of fact, of late the Commandantship had been changed even more than once every year; he believed there had been three changes in the office during the last 12 months. A Yeomanry School was required as much, if not more, for non-commissioned officers as for commissioned officers, and for the very reason that of late years Cavalry had been largely engaged in scouting and reconnaissance duties; indeed, latterly, such duties had become almost the primary duties of Cavalry. Now, the Yeomanry sergeants were, for the most part, men who had been in the Cavalry for years, men who belonged to the Cavalry before the days when the new duties were much considered or taught. He, therefore, believed it was of the utmost necessity that a School should be open, say, six months in each year, for Yeomanry sergeants. For three months of the year, the School, under the same Commandant, could be open to officers. Now, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had attacked the use of the Yeomanry. He (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) had seen a good deal of the Yeomanry and of the Cavalry too, and his own impression was that the Yeomanry formed a very useful portion of the Auxiliary Forces; and he believed from what he saw of them that, in the intelligence and zeal which they brought to bear on their duties, they would compare very favourably with any of the Volunteers of the country. He believed that if the necessities of the Empire required the employment abroad of a large portion of the Cavalry, the Yeomanry would be found very useful. Nearly all of them were men who could ride, men who knew how to get about, men very well suited for outpost and scouting duties, and he believed they formed as valuable a portion, if not the most valuable, as any of the Auxiliary Forces. He hoped this Vote would be given willingly, and that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) would see that the School for Auxiliary Cavalry, which was absolutely necessary for the efficiency of the Yeomanry, should be placed on a proper footing, with a Commandant appointed for at least five years. He never wished to throw any burdens on the Estimates. If it was necessary that the Estimates should be kept down, he would suggest that one or two of the smaller and least efficient corps should be disbanded, so that they would be able to have all that was requisite for the efficiency of the Force. He felt that a smaller number of Yeomanry thoroughly drilled and taught, both with regard to officers and non-commissioned officers, would be far more useful than a slightly larger but less efficient body. He would willingly assent to a reduction of strength, in order to make the remainder as efficient as they could be made.

Mr. DIGBY said, he could not approach the experience of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) who had just addressed the Committee; but he thought it would not be out of place if he, as a humble member of the Yeomanry, said a word or two in favour of that body. The Yeomanry had before now proved its usefulness, and he submitted that it was fully entitled to the small amount of money which the country allowed it. It had been said that it was not an efficient Force. Now, while a man in the Regular Cavalry regiments cost eight times what an Infantry man cost, a Yeoman cost only four times what a Volunteer cost. In the Yeomanry, therefore, the country obtained the services of a man and his horse for only four times the amount which a Volunteer cost the country, and, therefore, in proportion, the Yeomanry were only half as expensive to the country, per man, as the Cavalry were. It was quite news to him to hear the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) say that the Yeomanry were expected to do Commissariat work. He did think that farmers could be very usefully employed in their own counties as scouts, as eyes to the Army, if the Navy proved inefficient. It ought to be remembered that, at the present time, there were Yeomanry officers doing duty in the Regular Cavalry regiments.

SIR ROBERT LOYD LINDSAY said, he must confess that there was nothing more invidious than for any hon. Member of the House to point out the shortcomings, or what any Member might suppose to be shortcomings, of any Force, and therefore far be it from him to say anything against the individuals who composed that old and much respected Constitutional Force, the Yeomanry. But, as his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had somewhat challenged him in a pointed way, he felt he could not do otherwise than express the opinions he held with regard to the Yeomanry Force. Now, he was of opinion that in England they might have the very finest Irregular Cavalry in the word. Englishmen were devoted to horsemanship, and they were shown to excel in rifle shooting, and it was this latter consideration which kept the Volunteers together. Rifle shooting and horsemanship might be said to be the genius of the English people, and the two combined were what, in his judgment, would make the finest Irregular Cavalry in the world, if, by any piece of good fortune, they could persuade their friends, the Yeomanry, to turn their attention to that mode of military training. Those hon. Members who could go back as long as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Rylands) and others, would remember that Mr. Cardwell deliberately stated in the House of Commons that it was intended to train in future the Yeomanry as mounted riflemen. From time to time, the desirability of doing what Mr. Cardwell wished to do had been shown in the House; Committees had sat to consider the question, and they had almost invariably recommended it should be done; but the Yeomanry had presented the most determined opposition to being trained in that way. He was not altogether astonished at that opposition, because the men who taught the Yeomanry their work were, in the first place, old men; they were captains or adjutants of Cavalry regiments, or old Dragoon sergeants, who had been trained under the old conditions of Cavalry services—tight trousers and spurs, entirely unsuited for the purposes of mounted rifles. They would rather perish than take up the teaching of rifle shooting. Their thoughts were bent in the one direction; and it was impossible to get these old Cavalry sergeants to take up Infantry duties which many of them regarded as less noble than Cavalry duties. It was vain, therefore, to hope that the Yeomanry could ever be turned into anything like efficient mounted riflemen. Some of the Yeomanry officers themselves—he might mention one, Colonel Edwards—were particularly anxious that the change should be made. Colonel Edwards gave evidence before a Committee of the House, and he had delivered lectures on the subject at the United Service Institution. General Hamley, writing on the subject, said he was only delighted to find it was recommended that the Yeomanry should be trained as mounted riflemen; he was pleased the recommendation came from the Yeomanry themselves, and he hoped that was a good augury that something would be done in that direction. But year after year had gone by, so it was evident that the change was not to be made. If, therefore, the Yeomanry were to be maintained, they must be used to the sword and not to the rifle. He was sorry that so many county gentlemen went into the Yeomanry, because he wanted to see them joining the Volunteers. He wished county gentlemen supported the Volunteers more than they did. As it was, they went into another Force, and did not give the Volunteers the assistance which it was so very desirable they should give. He should be very glad indeed if the Yeomanry were to become Mounted Rifles. An hon. and gallant Friend who sat near him said—"We should be very pleased if we could bring our Yeomanry to the butts; but we have not got rifle ranges." The Volunteers had rifle ranges, which were at the service of Mounted Rifles. The Volunteers had drill halls as well; therefore Mounted Rifles could be trained with the greatest facility, and very economically. If the proposed change were made, he (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) felt sure they would have the finest Irregular Cavalry in the world, instead of having an Auxiliary Cavalry Force which he believed was the worst trained—he meant for useful purposes—and the worst armed in the world. The Yeomanry were not even armed. He believed it was intended to give them shortly a better arm; but at the present time they had not even got the carbine. Formerly there was at Wimbledon a competition for Mounted Rifles. It was a very interesting competition; but the Yeomanry now said that they could no longer come to Wimbledon, because they were beaten out of the field by the Mounted Infantry. Consequently, the competition had ceased—a fact very much to be regretted.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan (Mr. A. F. Egerton) had called attention to a grievance which respect to the compensation for the loss of horses. The hon. Member was quite right in saying that the grievance had been the subject of very prolonged correspondence between the War Department and the corps concerned. It seemed to him (the Marquess of Hartington) that the line must be drawn somewhere, and he believed that such claims were dealt with in a liberal spirit. But it was an altogether different thing if a horse was lost while it was going to or coming from duty. There must be a line drawn between the time when a horse was on duty and when it was off duty. The accident to which the hon. Member referred was one which might have happened to the horse when it was not in the service of the State at all; and, therefore, he did not think that any great grievance was made out. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) had called attention to the good service done by the School of Auxiliary Cavalry, and he had pointed out that more good service would be rendered by the School if the Commandant held his office for a longer period. He understood from his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office (Sir Arthur Hayter) that under the present system there was considerable difficulty in obtaining competent officers to accept the appointment. The subject would be brought up again, and when that was done he would give it his best consideration. He did not think he need take up much time of the Committee by replying to the observations of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). He could not altogether congratulate his hon. Friend upon the opportunity he had taken to display his economical leanings. For many years past this Vote had been the chief object of attack from the economical Party, and, so far as he could see, his hon. Friend had not brought forward any novel argument against the Yeomanry. No doubt the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Berkshire (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) was a great authority upon Cavalry questions; but so was the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Hampshire, who had borne testimony to the substantial value, under certain circumstances, of the Yeomanry Force. There might be a good deal of advantage in the Yeomanry Force being converted into Mounted Infantry as the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) suggested. It was a fact that this Force was capable of producing the finest Irregular Cavalry in the world. There was a great passion for equestrian exercise, and for rifle shooting, and those conditions were extremely favourable for the formation of a Mounted Infantry Force. However, for one reason or another, which he could not now undertake to explain, Mounted Infantry had not been successful. At the present time, there was only one company of Light Horse Volunteers, numbering about 60 men. That fact alone showed that there was one reason or another which prevented the formation of Mounted Infantry. Parliament ought to be very careful before they attempted to get rid of the present Yeomanry Force, which, as had been said in the course of the debate, was of very considerable value—they ought to pause before they attempted to convert the Force into something which did not appear to be equally popular. If there was a disposition voluntarily shown to convert the Yeomanry into Mounted Infantry, the matter would be worth consideration. At the present time, the Yeomanry was extremely popular, while the popularity of Mounted Infantry was not great. He did not think it was wise that he should do anything to disturb the popularity of the Force, which, under certain circumstances, was calculated to be very valuable.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was disposed to follow the recommendation of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) and not allow this Vote to pass without a division, unless they got a proper opportunity of getting some information in regard to the Antrim Militia. From the opinion he got from a good many military gentlemen, it appeared to him to be a waste of money to spend it upon the maintenance of Yeomanry Cavalry. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had said that the Vote was criticized each year, but that there was nothing new said about it; but he (Mr. Biggar) did not think that was a strong argument in favour of the Vote. He heard, last Session, from an hon. Member who had come from a very remote part of England—the county of Chester—that the Yeomanry Cavalry were a very dangerous body of men, because they were so unhandy with their swords that there was considerable risk of their cutting each other's heads off. If that was an example of their skill, he thought it would be much better to give a grant of money to get rid of them altogether. The Yeomanry were supposed to be a Military Force, but they had no military training whatever, and if they were called upon to vote on the question, he should certainly vote against the Estimate. If the Yeomanry were properly trained they might become proper soldiers; but, in point of fact, the Force was so mismanaged at present that it would be better to get rid of it altogether. They never went on foreign service, or did any good whatever, and therefore it would be better to get rid of them.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that notwithstanding the disparaging remarks of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), he would venture to say a word in support of the argument of his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands). Now, the noble Marquess had said this question was brought forward year after year without result; but he (Mr. Illingworth) was inclined to think that, by returning to the Vote, again and again, they would eventually bring conviction that this Force was altogether a useless one. He did not pretend to be a military man, but he was the Representative of taxpayers. Now, what had they heard from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite the Member for South Hampshire (Sir Frederick Fitz-Wygram) and the hon. Member for Berkshire (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay)? They had assured them that if this Force was made into something entirely different from what it was at present, it might be of some use to the country. That was the argument which had been brought forward year after year. There was a time when it had a use; when the Government of the day thought it might be badly treated at home; but, happily, such times had gone by now, and if it was to be made of any use at all, it would have to be made a part of our ordinary Military Service. But he would ask this question. Would any military authority in that House say that this Force, for a century past, or as it was likely to be in the future, could have been, or could be now, utilized for any kind of modern warfare? He ventured to say it could not; and, therefore, its existence was a sham and the sooner it was wiped away the better. How was it possible that there could be anything like discipline or military knowledge acquired in one week's training a-year? It was true that young officers who had acquired a good deal of technical knowledge at training schools might obtain a little practical experience by means of this Force; but it was impossible that they could impart any efficiency or knowledge on military matters to the men. The whole Force was a bye-word and a laughing-stock from one end of the country to the other. Although the noble Marquess had defended the Force, he had not indicated how it could be made useful; and his (Mr. Illingworth's) conviction remained as strong as ever, notwithstanding what had been said—namely, that this was a wasteful and useless expenditure.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th May.]

[THIRD NIGHT.]

MR. GLADSTONE: It may be for the convenience of the House if I start at once that, in consequence of a communication with the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), Her Majesty's Government propose to make a certain alteration in the course of procedure on Monday and Tuesday, by exchanging the places of the Bills that were intended for those days. It is now proposed, therefore, to take the Consolidated Fund Bill for the purpose of the debate connected with the Vote of Credit on Monday, and to take the Registration of Voters (England) Bill on Tuesday.

Bill considered in Committee.

Mr. Biggar

(In the Committee.)

MR. TOMLINSON said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to move a new clause. He did not propose to move it as it appeared on the Paper, as he had placed it there somewhat hurriedly. He was more anxious to mention the difficulty, and if the Government were not satisfied with the wording of his Amendment he would be glad to alter it in any way they liked, so long as his object was attained. The difficulty which he sought to meet arose from Section 9 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which was as follows:—

“A person shall not be entitled to be enrolled as a burgess unless he is qualified as follows:—

“(a.) Has been rated in respect of the qualifying property to all poor rates made during those twelve months for the parish wherein the property is situate.”

Some difficulties with regard to the construction of that clause having arisen in the minds of Revising Barristers, he thought the Government might take advantage of this Act to make it perfectly clear, and he therefore begged to move the clause he had referred to.

New Clause:—

“Section nine of ‘The Municipal Corporation Act, 1882,’ shall be read and construed as if Section nineteen of ‘The Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869,’ and Section fourteen of ‘The Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878,’ were incorporated with the former part of that Act,”—(Mr. Tomlinson,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read the second time.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) trusted the hon. Member would not press his clause. The law was perfectly clear, and they could not legislate against every mistake which a Revising Barrister was liable to make. He had looked carefully into the matter, and was satisfied that the law as it stood was perfectly clear, and therefore he trusted the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would comply with the request of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and not press his Amendment.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SCHEDULES.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Enactments repealed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in moving an Amendment, in page 12, line 4, to leave out “suspended,” and insert “repealed,” said, the Amendment was necessary in order to meet a mere clerical error in the Schedule. He saw that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Tomlinson) was struck with the same fact. The words should be “part repealed.”

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

SECOND SCHEDULE.

INSTRUCTIONS AND FORMS FOR COUNTIES.

INSTRUCTIONS TO CLERKS OF THE PEACE.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in moving an Amendment, in page 13, line 15, after “1,” to insert “33,” said, that it was simply an addition which was necessary to carry out the object which the clause had in view.

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved an Amendment, in page 13, line 18, at end, insert as a fresh paragraph—

“In the year 1885 the clerk of the peace will omit so much of the precept as relates to the old lodgers list and the forms relating to that list.”

Amendment agreed to; paragraph inserted accordingly.

Mode of making out Lists.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was in receipt of a large number of resolutions from election agents and others in regard to this Schedule, as it appeared that the compilation of the lists of voters in alphabetical order gave rise to great difficulties. The overseers were compelled to pick out all the A's and B's from the street list, in the first instance, and put them in ordinary alphabetical order; and when a General Election came, the election agents were obliged to go through the lists again, and turn them back again into street order. The overseers' grievance, therefore, was that they were put to a great deal of unnecessary trouble. It appeared to him that the arrangement at present involved double trouble. He was quite aware that Clerks of the Peace were in favour of the Bill as it stood; but he thought the Committee had also to consider the convenience of candidates and of their election agents in matters of this sort. The present system involved both expense and trouble; and he thought it would be well if they gave the Local Authorities power to dispense with the alphabetical list altogether, if they thought the existing street list would meet all the requirements. It was desirable they should have a decision on the question as to whether the list should be made out, as was proposed in this part of the Second Schedule, in undoubtedly alphabetical order, or whether, as would be more convenient in many districts, it should be made out in the order, numerical or otherwise, of the streets. His proposal, however, was to get rid of the hard-and-fast line in the Schedule, and leave it to the Local Authorities of the districts to adopt the most convenient course with regard to the list; and the Amendment he was about to move would raise the question whether there might not be districts in which it would be necessary to keep to the street order, and not break up the present arrangements by having the list of voters put alphabetically.

[Third Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 18, before the word "each," insert the words "unless the local authorities otherwise determine."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had touched upon a question, the determination of which was a matter of some difficulty, and upon both sides of which there was a good deal to be said. He would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the Select Committee which considered the Bill had had before them all the evidence they could get on this subject, including that of Clerks of the Peace, and upon that evidence they had arrived at the conclusion that the lists of voters should be made out in alphabetical order. It was felt that there were insuperable difficulties in the way of using street lists. The Committee were told that the overseers had been accustomed to the alphabetical method, and that if they were to be required to change their system and make out street lists, it would add very considerably to the onerous duties which they had to perform. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that the representations made to him on this subject had not come from overseers. It was an election agent's question. The overseers had to do that which other people had to do—they had to do their duty, and part of that duty consisted in making out their own lists, which they had always done in alphabetical order; and, as he had said, after careful consideration, the Committee were satisfied that it would be better to have the alphabetical list. Then the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make the rule elastic—that was to say, to apply it to some districts and not to others, as the Local Authorities should decide. But they were met by this difficulty—that it would be impracticable to have two different systems working at once which would be necessary in the case of a district in which there were, say, 1,500 voters subject to the Local Authority and 500 county voters who were not. Therefore, he said it would be impossible to use different lists for different parts of the same districts which included both urban and rural voters. The question was how far the duties of the overseers could be fulfilled; and upon the evidence of those persons of practical experience who came before them, the Committee unanimously came to the conclusion that the balance of convenience was in favour of not disturbing the existing practice of having an alphabetical list.

MR. BIGGAR said, the only fault he had to find with the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was that it did not go far enough. He could not agree with the argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General that it would be impossible to adopt anything but the alphabetical system in counties. As a matter of fact, in Ireland they had printed lists of electors that were in alphabetical order for every polling district in the counties. Those lists related to a great many different townlands, and the names of the voters were given in consecutive order as in the streets of towns. He might remind the Committee that the term parish represented in England an area similar in character to that of a townland in Ireland. What occurred in Ireland was this—the rate collector or overseer in the rural districts had the names in consecutive order; but he had to go through the labour of putting them in alphabetical order, although it was much more convenient that they should be kept in the order in which they appeared in his book. It had been pointed out that it would be for the convenience of candidates if the overseers had a second list of names in the parishes, in rural districts, and in streets of towns and villages. But that was a plea which they could not admit at all; because, in their opinion, it would be much more convenient for the overseers, and also much more convenient for the candidates, to have the list made out at first in the order proposed. The argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General that the names should be copied out from the rate book in consecutive order appeared to him to be erroneous. If the Government wished to facilitate the work of the overseers and the candidates, they would do as the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman proposed—namely, make it a rule that the lists should be according to streets in rural districts, parishes, and townlands.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he regretted his inability to follow the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) with regard to the practice in Ireland, although he could speak as to what occurred in England in connection with the lists of voters. For his own part, he thought the Committee would do well to follow the decision of the Select Committee, who, as they all knew, had considered this point very carefully. He had been much struck with the evidence given by one witness before the Committee; he was a gentleman able to speak on the matter; he had for many years acted as registration agent, and knew thoroughly well the practice in respect of overseers and Clerks of the Peace. In answer to a question put to him as to the best way of having the lists of voters made out by the overseers, he said, in effect, that if he spoke from the point of view of his own convenience he should say—"Give me the street list;" but that having regard to the convenience of overseers and Returning Officers he should say—"Take the names in alphabetical order." He (Mr. Stanhope) held that the Committee ought to consult the convenience of the overseers and Returning Officers rather than the convenience of the election agents. Another reason for adopting the alphabetical system was that it enabled them to get rid of double entries, which it was much more easy to detect in an alphabetical list of names than in a list made out on the street system suggested by his right hon. Friend. For these reasons it appeared to the Select Committee that the list of voters would be best arranged alphabetically, and they accordingly came to the conclusion that the alphabetical system should be adopted for the purpose of the Bill. Therefore, knowing that the decision of the Select Committee was arrived at after careful consideration of the facts of the case, he trusted his right hon. Friend would not feel it his duty to press the Amendment to a division.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, when the Irish Bill came back, he should feel very strongly inclined to state his view of this matter in relation to Ireland. As far as the English Bill was concerned, he was bound to say that he was of the same opinion at that moment as he was before he moved the Amendment. It appeared to him that, in this question, three classes of persons were concerned. They had to consider the position of the overseers, the Clerks of the Peace, and the candidates; the latter especially under an Act which limited expenditure at elections, and he was sure that no one would join more readily than the hon. and learned Attorney General in a proposal which would have the effect of doing away with expenditure that was not absolutely necessary. So far as the overseers were concerned, he could not imagine that what his hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope) had stated represented in practice the real state of the case; because, if he were rightly informed, the returns in populous places were usually made out in the order of streets. It would, therefore, be imposing a large amount of work on the overseer to make him cut up his lists and re-arrange them alphabetically; and he should think, under the circumstances, that it would be better for the overseer to take the lists of voters according to streets and hand them over to the Clerk of the Peace. He could understand that it would be more convenient for the Clerks of the Peace to have the lists printed alphabetically, and therefore he could not resist the opinion that the evidence given before the Select Committee was for the benefit of the Clerks of the Peace and not for the election agents. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): No; the election agents.] There were a number of Clerks of the Peace called before the Committee, and amongst them the Clerk of the Peace in his own district, a most excellent officer, whose evidence, he must say, had caused him some surprise. The cost of converting the street lists, now in use in many places, into alphabetical lists would be considerable; but the expense of cutting them up again and reconverting them would be very much greater. It seemed to him absurd first to have street lists made out, then to put them into alphabetical order for the purpose of elections, and then for the practical purposes of the locality to put them back again into street order. He would take the town of Macclesfield—not the borough—and he did so because it was a large place, and because the name represented a number of towns which, as boroughs, used to return Members of Parliament, but which were now merged in the county. Now, the overseers of those towns would have first to make out street lists, then the moment an election came they would have to cut them up and put them in alphabetical order, and afterwards bring them back into street order. He did not wish to detain the Committee any longer; but he was obliged to express his opinion that the machinery that would be put in motion by the Bill was extremely cumbersome and, at the same time, perfectly useless.

MR. HEALY said, he trusted that the convenience of other persons than Clerks of the Peace would be considered in this matter. Members of that House had been for years under the direction of the hon. and learned Attorney General endeavouring to cut down election expenses. But here was an Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir

R. Assheton Cross) which would tend in that direction, and they found the hon. and learned Attorney General opposing it—and on what ground? Because of the convenience of Clerks of the Peace. Now a word was said about the convenience of the 650 Members of that House whose purses ought to be considered—and they, the Members of the House, had to deal with the Bill. He said that they ought to consider this question a little more from their own point of view, and not so much from the point of view of the Clerks of the Peace. For his own part, he was not in favour of allowing his own pocket to be mulcted for the purpose of making an arrangement that would save Clerks of the Peace a little trouble. He contended that nothing had actually been said against the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire, or in answer to the arguments with which he supported the Amendment. It was admitted, in the first place, that the rate collector had to deal with the list of parishioners in the order of streets and by areas; that the list had, so to speak, then to be boiled down into alphabetical order, and when that was done, that it had to be reconverted into a street list. Thus it would be seen that the operation had to be performed twice—once at the expense of the candidates, and then again at their expense. They contended that when this had been done once at the expense of the candidate, no further expense should fall upon them. Now, the hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. E. Stanhope), in opposing the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire, had said that the alphabetical list would tend to prevent double entries. He (Mr. Healy) admitted that as the only argument in favour of the arrangement proposed in the Bill; he admitted that double entries were more possible under the street order system than they were under an alphabetical list. No doubt, it was a much easier process for Clerks of the Peace to detect double entries by that means. But when a man presented himself at the polling station, he could be asked the question—"Have you voted before?" And in his opinion the law against double voting was sufficiently stringent to deter people from committing the act, and besides, the agents of the candidates would be sure to look after the people who were likely to be guilty of double voting. As a matter of fact, in the Irish boroughs, they were not allowed the option of the street arrangement, as against the alphabetical arrangement, so that England had one reform which had not been made in Ireland; and for that reason, if the right hon. Gentleman went to a division, he should support him.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would take this matter into consideration before the Report, when he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would again refer to it. It was a matter that ought not to be lost sight of, and, in the meantime, he would make further inquiries and communicate with the hon. and learned Gentleman. As he did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the point raised by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had been brought very seriously under his notice within the last few hours. He found that the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out a blot on the registration system, and one could hardly suggest the amount of cost and trouble that the arrangement proposed in the Bill would cause. In the first place, the various organizations would have to provide copies of the Registers, and pay 10s. 6d. for them, a sum which would no doubt appear small in the eyes of highly salaried officials, but the cost appeared a heavy one to persons of a different class; and then the committees would have to go carefully through the Registers, and divide them according to streets, a work that would occupy a week or a fortnight at least. This was a Bill intended to facilitate the registration of voters, and yet the hon. and learned Attorney General proposed for that purpose the very worst arrangement possible—namely, that they should be put on the Register alphabetically. At that moment he could only express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire had allowed this matter to drop so suddenly; it was one of the points on which the Government would be expected to yield, and he could promise the right hon. Gentleman that it was a point to be considered before the final stage of the Bill was taken; and, for his own part, he should certainly call attention to it again.

MR. HEALY: Will the hon. and learned Attorney General give us the alternative system which prevails in England?

MR. BIGGAR said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had not carried this matter a little further, because, although the point was small, it was of great importance to candidates of moderate means, whose expenditure at elections would be considerably increased by the arrangement proposed in the Bill. But he supposed the right hon. Gentleman had an election agent who looked after his political interests, and thus he did not trouble himself about details. His (Mr. Biggar's) own experience, however, was that when a person became a candidate, and did not want to spend much money, he wrote out a list; in one case the candidate came and asked him to get people to vote for him, and what happened? When he set to work to ask the people for their votes, he found those he wanted scattered over all parts of the borough, and it was very difficult to get at them; but having got the list arranged according to streets, he found himself able to get through the list with the greatest ease and call on the electors one after the other in regular order. It seemed to him that not only was there a large extension of the franchise, but an extension of the difficulties in the way of candidates of moderate means in the form of expenses which only persons of large means could afford. The matter would not, on the whole, be felt so much in Ireland, because candidates of the Party to which he belonged would for the most part be returned without opposition; but where there was a contest the expenses would press very heavily on candidates of moderate means, because the number of electors being greatly increased, there must be a corresponding increase in all mechanical work connected with candidatures.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had promised to look very carefully into this matter before the Report, and he therefore trusted hon. Gentlemen would save the time of the Committee by agreeing to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he should like to call attention to the reason for moving the first of the Amendments next standing in his name. The Committee would see that the Government were in error as to the provision contained in Sub-section (c) of Clause 13 of the Schedule, which was that the overseer should state the nature of lodger qualifications in the manner prescribed. It was not the duty of the overseers, but of the Clerks of the Peace to do this, and therefore he proposed to omit the sub-section in question.

Amendment proposed, in page 19; lines 14 to 17, leave out Sub-section (c).—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to; words left out accordingly.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the same remarks as he had made on the Amendment just agreed to applied to the Amendment he was about to move. Clause 14 instructed the overseer as to the description he was to give of the property or source from which tithe rent charges and other rent charges issued, which constituted a voting qualification. In the same way, as with the lodger qualification, the overseer had nothing to do with this; it was not within his duty; and he therefore proposed to omit the instruction.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 24, leave out from "tenant" to the second "and" in line 31.—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to; words left out accordingly.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he had an Amendment which he had intended to propose at paragraph 31, page 24, of the Bill, the object of which was to enable people to obtain the lists of persons disqualified. It having been pointed out to him, however, that page 24 would not be the proper place at which to introduce the Amendment, inasmuch as no point as to date was involved, and that his proposal was not in the nature of a precept, but of an amendment of the law, he would not move it now, but bring it forward on the Report.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I think it should be done.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment made:—In page 25, lines 37 and 38 leave out "lists of occupation voters" and insert "occupiers and old lodger lists;" in page 27, line 2, after "August," insert "next;" and in page 31, line 17, leave out "on the 6th of December, 1884," and insert "in the register in force in the year 1884."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was often an unnecessary amount of expenditure for printing bills, and the next Amendment which he had to propose was for the purpose of saving the cost of printing in the present case. The words he proposed to leave out were already in the form, and it would, therefore, be quite unnecessary to retain them here.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, lines 20 to 23, leave out "or division of the county of _____ or as the case may be."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to; words left out accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment made:—

In page 31, after line 9, insert "overseers must insert in the foregoing list the name of the Parliamentary division in which their parish is situate."

Amendment proposed, in page 31, line 20, add:—"Note.—In this form copy particulars from Register of Voters."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the suggestion of the hon. Member for Preston a very good one, and he was prepared to agree to it with a slight alteration of wording.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he wished to draw attention to page 33, lines 25 and 26; surely the words should be "in July last?" Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would take note of it?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his Amendment as the Paper was at page 34, line 5, in the margin, to insert—

“ This form must be omitted in 1885 if the paragraphs of the precept referring to it are not sent.”

The Local Government Board had issued the form to the overseers this year too late for it to be acted upon.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to move an Amendment in page 35, line 9, after “ premises,” to insert “ wholly or partly.” He thought that payment of the poor rate should apply to the whole of the property, and not to a part of it. He thought a difficulty might arise in this case unless his Amendment were agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 35, line 9, after “ premises,” insert “ wholly or partly.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “ That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he quite saw what was in the hon. Gentleman's mind; but he would point out that for voting purposes, with which alone they were dealing, they required that the premises should be wholly in the possession of a person; for instance, supposing 10 or 12 cottages belonged to a person, they must be wholly in his possession.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would withdraw the Amendment, and see if he could not, at a later stage, bring it up in a better form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished with the Amendment he was now going to move, and with the next Amendment on the Paper, to alter the margin from the right to the left hand side.

Amendment proposed, in page 35, line 33, insert at left hand side of column, “ Margin for Objections by Overseers.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “ That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had been very anxious about the particular drafting of these forms; but it did not appear very important whether this were put in the right hand column or the left hand column. However, if there was an advantage one way over another, it would be in having the form drawn as it was in the Bill, for the reason that it was in accordance with the old form, to which the overseers were accustomed. To change it now would be to place unnecessary difficulty in the way of the overseers.

MR. H. G. ALLEN thought it would be very convenient to have the form in the way the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) proposed, because the name of the voter was always on the left hand of the description, and it was a great saving of trouble to have the objection entered close to the name. The Attorney General was quite mistaken in supposing the overseers' objections to be usually on the right side.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would urge upon the hon. and learned Gentleman the desirability of accepting the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Committee would agree with him that it was desirable to give the overseers as little trouble as possible during the present year, seeing the vast amount of work they would have to do. He would rather, if he could, adhere to the old form, with which the overseers were familiar.

MR. TOMLINSON said, in that case, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. TOMLINSON said, his next Amendment was to strike out the words “ Cottage in,” in line 15, these words being mere surplusage.

Amendment proposed, in page 36, line 15, leave out “ Cottage in.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “ That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Member opposite looked carefully at the matter, he would see how necessary it was that the words should be kept in. The object of the 4th clause was to distinguish the property qualification, and what they wanted to do was to show where a person was living. In this form, under the head of “ description of qualifying property" there was no street named, and there was nothing to guide them unless they adhered to such plan as this "Cottage in Lewes Road," or "Green Lane," or "Church Farm," or as the case might be. It was here necessary to have the words "Cottage in."

[Third Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. TOMLINSON said, his next Amendment was to insert in the form to which the Amendment referred, after "Brick Street," the word "Brighton." His object was to let people understand that they had to put in the whole address. He understood that in some cases letters got addressed without the name of the post town, so that they came back through the Dead Letter Office; if the post town name were put on there would be no fear of that.

Amendment proposed, in page 37, line 20, after "Brick Street," insert "Brighton."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That that word be there inserted."

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that it would be inconvenient to adopt the Amendment, as it would necessitate a great deal of printing and altering in the Bill; they would have to reprint the word "Brighton," or similar words, some thousands of times.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he presumed the question had been considered since his Amendment had been put upon the Paper, so that it was not necessary for him to insist upon his proposal. He presumed, also, the propriety of inserting this word in other cases had also been considered, and that it would not be necessary for him to raise the point again.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious to move an Amendment in this Form, "the Occupiers List—No. 2, Lodgers," and hon. Members, if they would look carefully at the matter, would see that what he proposed was necessary; it had been proposed to him by a gentleman intimately connected with these matters. They had in the 5th column, under the head "Name and Address of Landlord or other Person to whom Rent is paid," the name "William Johnson, High Street." William Johnson would have a different residence from the place where the lodger lived under the form as it stood; and he would, therefore, alter the words "High Street," to the words "51, Brick Street," which came in the 3rd column under the heading "Street, Lane, or other Place, and Number (if any) of House in which Lodgings situate." The Amendment would show that the landlord was living in the same place as the lodger; because the lodger franchise was given to persons living in the same place as the landlord.

Amendment proposed,

In page 37, line 20, leave out "High Street," and insert "51, Brick Street."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That the words 'High Street' stand part of the Schedule," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words '51, Brick Street' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to move an Amendment in line 32, in order to prevent a difficulty arising as to persons not knowing what they signed. It often happened that people signed forms without knowing what they were doing. There were two distinct things to be done. In the first place, the claimant's signature had to be witnessed, and there was then the necessity of having someone to testify to the person who was put on the Register being a proper person to be so put on. He was told that a practical difficulty did arise on this matter, and that was why he brought forward the proposal. If the addition he suggested was accepted, he thought the difficulty would be got rid of. He proposed, in line 32, to leave out "at the date," to "correct" in line 33, a consequential Amendment being to insert in line 37—

"Declaration of correctness of Claim. I am acquainted with A. B. of . I have read his claim, and believe it to be correct. My means of knowledge are derived from my being (landlord, brother, &c.) of the Claimant. E. F. (State residence and calling of deponent. Witness G. H. (State residence and calling of witness)."

Amendment proposed,

In page 37, line 32, to leave out from "at the date," to "correct," in line 33.—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the Form in the Bill was the old one to which the overseers were accustomed. It had been found to work very well, and he did not see any necessity for changing it.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that if it was difficult for a man to define his place of lodging it showed that he was not a proper man to sign the deposition. If a man came forward and said that he was entitled to be on the Register, he should be able to explain where his cottage was. The subject had been brought under his (Mr. Tomlinson's) notice not now for the first time. It had often been mentioned to him that there was great ambiguity in the matter of this form, and that it frequently led to grave mistakes. He thought the sense of the Committee was in favour of his clause.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the two signatures were obliged to take place on the same day?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): No.

Question put, and agreed to.

THIRD SCHEDULE. INSTRUCTIONS AND FORMS FOR BOROUGHES.

INSTRUCTIONS TO TOWN CLERKS.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there were a number of Amendments on the Paper with regard to Forms C and E, and certain numerical distinctions. These Amendments were proposed in consequence of what had been done in the Select Committee. When the Bill was before the Select Committee the Forms were altered so as to make them more clear; and as they could not go back and alter them in the precept he now desired to do it.

Amendments, as proposed, agreed to.

MR. PICTON said, he wished to move an Amendment in page 46, lines 9 and 10, to leave out all after "be," in order to insert—

"Omitted in copying and printing the revised lists for the Parliamentary Register and Burgess Roll."

The object of the Amendment was to remove a practical inconvenience of which he had heard a great many complaints by those who had to prepare the lists for voting purposes. It would be observed that there was a great difference between Parliamentary counties and Parliamentary boroughs. In Parliamentary counties all useless entries were to be erased, but in the boroughs they were to be retained; and not only were they erased in the Parliamentary counties in England, but in Scotland likewise they were erased; and in Burgess Rolls it was the same, according to the Municipal Act of 1882. He did not see why these useless entries should be retained in printing the lists of borough electors, as it certainly occasioned a great deal of unnecessary printing, which would involve unnecessary expense. The unnecessary printing would make the lists more bulky than was necessary, and, at the same time, would entail some danger of confusion.

Amendment proposed,

In page 46, lines 9 and 10, to leave out all after "be," and insert "omitted in copying and printing the revised lists for the Parliamentary Register and Burgess Roll."—(Mr. Picton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that this was a matter of a very practical character; and if the Committee would consider what the proposition was they would see the hon. Member (Mr. Picton) was justified, to a certain extent, in making it. The hon. Gentleman was right in saying that two systems prevailed—one in counties and one in boroughs. But the hon. Member did not suggest that they should get rid altogether of the asterisk in boroughs, and revert to the system of erasure in counties; but he proposed that the Revising Barrister in a borough should keep to the old system of the asterisk, and the Revising Barrister having made the asterisk against the double entry, and having returned the Register to the Returning Officer, the Town Clerk should have the right of erasing names. That could not, for one moment, be allowed. He (the Attorney General) would not enter now upon the merits of the two systems; but he thought the present was a very objectionable time to alter either system. All he could say was that the Government could not consent to give to a Town Clerk the power of striking out what names he pleased. He knew the Town Clerk of Leicester was a most intelligent man; but he did not think he would like to possess the power suggested. He trusted his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR said, he hoped the Amendment of his hon. Colleague (Mr. Picton) would be accepted. The system by which double entries were made involved great trouble and expense, and was, at the same time, quite unnecessary. The hon and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had just stated that the adoption of the Amendment would place the power of erasing names in the hands of the Town Clerk. He (Mr. A. M'Arthur) was informed that that was not exactly the case. The Town Clerk of Leicester, writing upon the subject, said the Revising Barrister saw the great convenience of the proposed plan, and did not, therefore, press his objection to it. The matter was one in which a good many boroughs were interested, and he hoped that the Government would take it into consideration, and, if it was possible, make some alteration in the manner suggested.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 46, line 37, after "voters," insert "for the said parliamentary borough;" in line 38, after "said," insert "municipal;" in line 41, after "said," insert "parliamentary;" and in page 47, line 7, in the margin, insert "Omit (d.) where any reserved right does not exist."

MR. TOMLINSON proposed, as an Amendment, to insert after "as a," in page 47, line 16, the word "parliamentary."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) assented to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; word inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendment

The Attorney General

made:—In page 47, line 36, in margin, leave out "but no more are entitled to be registered as voters," and insert "are entitled to be registered as voters, but no more are so entitled."

On the Motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the following Amendments made:—In page 48, line 1, after "as a" insert "Parliamentary," and insert the same word in line 32 of the same page.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 49, line 14, in margin, leave out "those rights do not," and insert "no reserved rights;" in line 36, after "months," insert "and during that time has not resided as above mentioned;" and in page 51, lines 17 to 20, leave out sub-section (e.).

Amendment proposed, in page 51, line 23, to leave out "after the last day of July."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Schedule."

MR. H. J. TOLLEMACHE said, he noticed that the list of the scheduled people were to be omitted from the list of Parliamentary voters and from the list of burgesses. He understood, however, there was no intention whatever to disqualify these people from voting in municipal elections.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment was proposed to make it clear to the overseers that they must provide against confusion.

MR. H. J. TOLLEMACHE asked why the information was only to be given to the overseers in the year 1885?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that there might be, in 1885, disqualifications under the Corrupt Practices Act.

MR. H. J. TOLLEMACHE said, that supposing there was a municipal election in 1886, the names of the individuals who had been scheduled by the Commissioners in 1880 would not appear.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Clearly not; but in the meantime, we cannot tell whether there will be other corrupt practices committed.

Question put, and negatived: words left out accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 58, line 2, insert in margin "Omit 'or is on the reserved rights list' where no reserved rights exist;" in line 4, leave out "the occupiers," and insert "any;" in line 4, after "burgess," insert "only;" in line 20, after "occupiers," insert "reserved rights;" in line 20, insert in the margin "Omit 'reserved rights' where no reserved rights exist;" in page 60, line 5, after "occupation," insert "as a ten pounds occupier;" in line 6, leave out "of the clear yearly value of ten pounds;" in page 63, line 15, leave out the second "borough;" and in page 65, in the margin, after "merged," insert "or altered."

On the Motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the following Amendments made:—In page 66, line 24, after "voters," insert "and burgesses;" in page 67, line 14, after "voters," insert "and burgesses;" in line 17, after "should," insert "if there is more than one list;" and in page 68, line 2, after "should," insert "if there is more than one list."

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, the following Amendments made:—In page 69, line 27, at end of page, insert—

"In this form the particulars should be copied from the claims sent in;"

and in page 70, after line 10, insert—

"This list need not include the names of persons who claim, where the occupiers' list is made out in divisions, to be entered in division one of that list."

MR. HOULDSWORTH proposed, as an Amendment, the insertion of a new Form, entitled—

"Notice of Objection to be given to a person who is a Duplicate Voter."

Question, "That that Form be inserted in the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. BULWER said, that, before the Bill was finally disposed of, he would like to call the hon. and learned Attorney General's attention to a matter he had pressed on the attention of the House in Committee—namely, the position which the Isle of Ely bore to the county of Cambridge. Through the courtesy of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) he had been placed in possession of the view of the draftsman of the Bill. He had looked at the Statutes which regulated the jurisdiction of the Isle of Ely, and he was not at all satisfied that the object contemplated by the promoters of the Bill had been carried out. Perhaps the hon. and learned Attorney General would take a list of the Statutes. There was the 7 Will. IV., which dealt with the Isle of Ely expressly, and stipulated that the Isle should be deemed and taken to be a division of a county. There was the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 52, which provided that the Justices of the Isle of Ely were to carry into effect the provisions of the sections of that Act of Parliament, so far as regarded the Isle of Ely—that was as regarded the settlement of polling places, and so forth. Then there was an early Statute of Victoria, which required that the Justices might pay all the expenses of registration incurred, not by the overseers, but by the Clerks of the Peace, so that, possibly, this difficulty might arise. They would have the Justices of Cambridgeshire requiring the Clerk of the Peace of Cambridgeshire to make out a list of voters in the Isle, where they had no jurisdiction, and the Justices of the Isle would have no voice in the matter, but would have to pay the expenses. Also, if the Justices of Cambridgeshire were empowered to do this, a portion of the business of the Clerk of the Peace of the Isle of Ely, and, therefore, a portion of his remuneration, would be taken away. He (Mr. Bulwer) did not know whether he was in Order in mentioning these matters; but he did so to avoid future complications. He trusted the hon. and learned Attorney General or the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department would consider the point.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) for calling attention to the Statutes he had cited, and he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would take care they were properly inquired into. There was no doubt that under the Bill, as it stood, the Isle of Ely became a part of Cambridgeshire. The matter should be attended to before Report.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 163.]

[Third Night.]

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 151.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved the following new clause to be inserted in place of Clause 12 :—

(Separate valuations to be made by Assessor of Railways and Canals in Police Burghs.)

“The Assessor of Railways and Canals shall value the lands and heritages belonging to Railway and Canal Companies, and to Water Companies, Gas Companies, and other Companies within Burghs having Commissioners of Police under any General or Local Police Act, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions, as in Royal and Parliamentary Burghs, and the word ‘burgh,’ wherever it occurs in sections twenty to twenty-nine inclusive of the Act passed in the Session of the seventeenth and eighteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter ninety-one, intituled ‘An Act for the Valuation of Lands and Heritages in Scotland,’ shall include any burgh having Commissioners of Police as aforesaid.”

“And section five of ‘The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1867,’ is hereby repealed.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Clause be now read a second time,” put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time accordingly, and added to the Bill.

Clause 3 (Power of Her Majesty in Council to prescribe forms. Publication, Variation, and effect of Order. Form of valuation roll).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In page 1, line 23, leave out “sections,” and insert “section;” leave out “four and;” in line 24, after “1861,” insert “is hereby repealed, and section four of the said Act;” and in line 26, leave out from “repealed,” to end of section, and insert—

“In so far as those sections provide that the name of the person to whom the amount of feu duty, ground, annual, or other yearly consideration payable as a condition of his right by any proprietor, is to be entered in the valuation roll.”

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—At the end of the Clause add—

“Provided, That the second column of the Valuation Roll, headed ‘Description and situation of subject,’ may be printed for any county without sub-division if the Commissioners of Supply of such county shall so determine.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Special provision as to voters in 1885).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 22, after “occupier,” insert “tenant.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Register in Parliamentary burghs merged in counties).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 36, leave out “as heretofore except,” and insert “separately but.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, Clause 12 struck out of the Bill.

Clause 16 (Remuneration of collectors of poor rates).

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, as an Amendment, the omission, in page 4, line 19, of the word “thousand,” and the insertion of the word “hundred,” instead thereof.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked what was the object of the Amendment?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that under the various Acts the collectors of the poor rate were obliged to make certain returns; and as this was not a part of the regular duties of their office they were paid for it. The practice had been to pay the collectors for the making out of those returns at the rate of 6s. per 100. The work involved filling in three separate columns and a good deal of labour; and he certainly thought, from the examples which had been furnished to him, that the payment proposed was a very moderate one.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 18 (Double entries of voters).

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In page 4, line 37, after "same," insert "Parliamentary;" leave out line 38; in line 39, leave out "county or;" in same line, leave out from "burgh," to the second "the," in line 40; in page 5, line 12, after "one," insert "only;" in line 13, after "proprietor," leave out "and unobjected to;" in line 15, leave out "none of the entries is," and insert "all or none of the entries are;" in line 17, leave out "and unobjected to;" and in line 27, after "and," insert "both in counties and in burghs."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) moved, as an Amendment, to add at the end of clause, in page 5, certain new paragraphs, which, he said, required a few words of explanation. Hon. Members would have observed that there were many cases in which the first option was given under the Bill to the voter to make his selection; and if the voter failed to make a selection of the place he wished to vote in respect of, in the case of a double entry, there were directions given to the Sheriff, acting as Revising Barrister, as to which place he should retain and which he should strike out. It might happen that from error or other cause the Sheriff might fail to strike out the second entry, and the paragraph he now proposed to add to the clause was to provide for what should be done in that case.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to point out that the clause was a Definition Clause, and to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate that during a discussion on the English Registration Bill as to whether a definition should be entertained, it was understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would take into consideration the question whether all the definitions could not be brought into one clause, or one particular place in the Bill. In this case, they had a definition something like one that was given in the English Bill; and he should be glad if the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would state whether any conclusion had been come to on the matter.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR), in reply, said, it was proposed to insert the definition he had moved at the end of the present clause, because it would come in more conveniently there.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, at end, add as new paragraphs:—
“(4.) Where a borough is divided into divisions and, notwithstanding the provisions of this section, the name of a person is entered in the register of Parliamentary Voters of more than one division of the said burgh, and one of these entries is his place of residence, he shall be entitled to vote only in that division in which he is registered as a voter in respect of his place of residence, and shall not vote in respect of any other entry;

“(5.) In this section the expression ‘Parliamentary county’ means a county returning or contributing to return a Member or Members to serve in Parliament; and, where a county is divided for the purpose of such return, means a division of such county.”—(The Lord Advocate.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

SCHEDULE.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments made:—In second column, omit the word “and,” insert the word “or,” instead thereof; and in last column, omit the words “as adjusted on application or appeal.”

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

MR. PRESTON BRUCE said, he had a Notice on the Paper for the introduction of a new Schedule which had been passed over; and he wished to ask whether he should be in Order in bringing it on at that moment?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member had not risen at the time his name was called.

MR. PRESTON BRUCE said, he had not heard his name called.

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. Member would not be in Order in moving it now.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the service of the year ending on the 31st day of March 1886, the sum of £13,315,334, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to Burial Grounds.

Resolution reported: — Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN, Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 164.]

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

• greater interest in the of 1830-32, have much it has become difficult to

Moreover, many persons whose ancestors were original subscribers of this work, but who have themselves ceased to be so, finding a long series of volumes, relating to times long gone by, encumber their shelves to the exclusion of more modern works, are apt to discard these antiquated though valuable records. From these causes it is to be feared that many sets now of value have been sacrificed.

Unwilling that these national muniments should perish, Mr. Cornelius Buck has been instructed to purchase the earlier volumes of the Third Series, commencing with the REFORMED PARLIAMENT—including the whole Reign of William IV.—and the two first Parliaments of the Reign of Victoria—namely, to 1847.

The fair market value will be given for these volumes; or the Sessions of recent Parliaments will be given in exchange.
